CIVIL HISTORY
Francis Hargrave.
OF THE KINGDOM OF NAPLES.

In Two VOLUMES.

VOL. I.

Wherein is contain'd,
The History of that Kingdom (comprizing also the general Affairs of Europe) under the Romans, Goths, Greeks, ~~Danubians~~, Normans, and the Princes of the House of Suevia, 'till the Death of the Emperor Frederick II. in the Year 1250.

With the History of the Civil, Canon, and Feodal Laws; the Ecclesiastical Polity; the Succession of the Popes, and by what subtle Arts the Pontificate gain'd upon the Régale.

Where the Author clearly demonstrates, That the Temporal Dominion and Power exercis'd by the Popes, has been altogether owing to the Ignorance, and Connivance of, or Concessions extorted from Secular Princes during the dark Ages, &c.

R I G H T H O N O U R A B L E the Earl of GRANDISON.

My L O R D,

THE History of Naples, which I now lay at Your Lordship's Feet, I may venture to say, is a valuable Piece, and worthy your Lordship's Protection, however it may have suffer'd in the Translation.

THE Author dedicates it to * The Emperor: a Great * Prince; and in Your Lordship I have found a Patron truly Great and Good. I speak from Experience; for your Lordship was no sooner apprised of the Change of my Circumstances, than I began to feel the happy Effects of your great Goodness. The fatal Year that involved so many in irretrievable Ruin, was the Date of my Misfortunes; and from that Time, to this Day, your Lordship, and your good Lady, have relieved me and my Family with a bountiful Hand; and, in a Manner so ingaging, as has left no Impressions upon me, but those of a lasting Gratitude and Veneration. It is certainly one of the greatest Afflictions of a depressed Condition, that it is commonly attended with Contempt and Scorn: But when your Lordship relieves, you consult the Modesty of the unfortunate Object, as well as the Distress. I should never make an end of my Acknowledgments for all the Goodness with which your Lordship treats me, and with the Sense of which my Heart is full charged; but as I know you love to do Good, rather than hear of it, I shall be grateful and silent. But I must give myself the Pleasure of reflecting reflecting upon the happy Situation of your Lordship's Affairs, within whose Gates nothing is seen but Magnificence and Splendor, under the Rules of that exact OEconomy and Order, with which your Lordship, and your excellent Lady did so remarkably distinguish yourselves before the Accession of the ample Fortune of your Ancestors: Such a Conduct, my Lord, is a great and rare Example of Wisdom and Prudence; but the Virtues in which you both shine out, are the conjugal Harmony in which you live, mutually deserv'd, and mutually express'd. And next to that, the tender Affection to your Children, visible in the Care of their Education, and of which you have the Comfort to behold the happy Effects in your accomplish'd Daughters, adorned with that Modesty, and those Graces of their Sex, which, to indulgent Parents, must give the most exquisite Pleasure this World can afford. These Felicities, my Lord, are the Fruits of Domestick Virtues, which, though they don't make such Glare, as those that are acted upon the Publick Stage, have ever been thought to set a great and wise Man in the truest Point of Light. And among the

* Scipio Africanus.

Romans *, one of the Greatest and Best is celebrated, not more for his Victories and Triumphs, than for his Behaviour among his Children, even in their Nursery, where some little Amusements of his have been represented by all Historians, as the most convincing Proof of the greatest good Nature and Humanity; which Qualities were always thought essential in the Composition of a Hero. But now I am talking of a great Man, it may be expected I should say something of the Nobility of your Lordship's and your Lady's Extraction: And I have at hand the noble Historian, who, in his Catalogue of Heroes (great as any Greece or Rome ever produc'd) has not two more beautiful Characters, than those of Falkland and Grandison; but these Things, your Lordship does not call your own, any farther than as you think yourself oblig'd to imitate them; And may your Lordship's promising Sons, and their late Posterity, form their Lives by the Examples of their Great Ancestors; which is the hearty Prayer of,

My LORD,

Your Lordship's most oblig'd, most devoted, and most faithful humble Servant,

Translator's PREFACE.

THE Author's Introduction renders a Preface to this Work in a manner useless. He himself tells us, that his Style is very plain and simple; that he had so great a Regard to Truth, in every Thing, as to make the Credibility of his History depend more on the Connexion of Events, with their Causes, than on an elaborate Style, and a nice Order of Words: That though he was not ignorant of the Laws of History, yet he has sometimes neglected the scrupulous Observation of them, by insisting too much on Matters, perhaps of small Importance to a great many Readers particularly in the History of the Laws; and that he did it for the Advantage of Professors, and Gentlemen of the Long Robe. Notwithstanding all this, the Reader will not think his Labour lost, if he values Profit more than Pleasure, tho' a due * Mixture of both were better. The Author, tho' in Communion with the Church of Rome, has not been afraid to tell a great many bold Truths, nowise consistent with the Credit and Honour of that Court. To give one Instance among many; throughout the Course of the History, he clearly shews us, how that Monster of a Spiritual Monarchy, an Imperium in Imperio, was conceiv'd, brought forth, and nourish'd, till it came to full Maturity. The Reader will likewise see what Opinion he had of Relicks, Pilgrimages, Image-worship, the great Number of Holy-days, and other Practices introduc'd during the Ages of Ignorance and Darkness. For these and other Reasons, the Work no sooner appear'd in Publick, A. D. 1723, than the Court of Rome was alarm'd: It was Censur'd, Condemn'd, and the Sale and Reading of it prohibited, under severe Penalties.

While the Country, which is now call'd the Kingdom of Naples, was under the Romans, and before the Italian Language prevail'd universally over all Italy, I thought fit to render the Names of Provinces, Cities, &c. as they were denominat'd by the Romans; but after the Italian became the general Language of all Italy, I have given them the modern Names, such as Benevento for Beneventum; Reggio for Rhegium, &c.

The Second Volume of this Work, contains the History of the Kingdom of Naples, I may say of all Italy, and even of all Europe, so far as the Princes thereof found themselves oblig'd to be concern'd in the many Wars and Revolutions of that Kingdom, during the Reigns of the Houses of Anjou, Aragon and Austria, down to the Year 1723. All I have to add, is, that if I had not undertaken the following Translation (the Book, as I have said, being suppress'd, and so few Copies got Abroad in the World) 'tis probable it never would have appear'd in English; therefore I hope the Reader will excuse, and with the Pen correct the following Errata.

their Royal Seats plac'd elsewhere, from whence they govern'd it by their Ministers, it ought to be imputed to cruel Necessity only, that in order to the right understanding its peculiar Polity, we are oblig'd to give a Hint of the Form and Disposition of the Roman Empire, and after what manner its Provinces were govern'd; amongst which, the most considerable that it had in Italy, were certainly these of which our Kingdom is compos'd. We should not be able to comprehend their Revolutions, if at the same Time we did not shew the more general Causes, whereby the whole being chang'd, this Part likewise came to be altered; and seeing these Provinces, on account of their noble Advantages, invited many Princes of Europe to conquer them, therefore they were long disputed, every one pretending Right to them, some as Tributary, others to have the Protection of them, and, in fine, some as Feudatory. Therefore we thought it worth the while to discover the Springs of all these Pretensions; neither could they be otherwise made clear, but by giving a general Idea and Relation of the State of Italy at different Times, and often of other remote Principalities, and of the Transferring of Kingdoms from one People to another, from whence arose the numerous Pretensions which set a going and encourag'd the Undertakings.

NEITHER have such Searches been necessary only for giving an exact and distinct Knowledge of the Political and Temporal State of this Kingdom, as perhaps some have thought, but likewise of what concerns Ecclesiastical Affairs; forasmuch as the Disputes were no less among Secular Princes, than among the greatest Prelates of the Church. This Kingdom was also contended for by the two most famous Patriarchs of the World, the one of Rome in the West, and the other of Constantinople in the East. By all Right the Government of our Churches belong'd to the Roman Pontiff, not only as Head of the Universal Church, but likewise as Patriarch of the West, even altho' his Patriarchal Authority had been confin'd to the Suburbicarian Cities only; but the Patriarch of Constantinople, with a rash Boldness, attempted to usurp his Right. He pretended, that many Churches of this Kingdom belong'd to his Patriarchate of the East; that it was his Right to erect Cities into Metropolis's, and to assign them what Suffragan Bishops he thought fit: Therefore it was necessary to shew, how these two Patriarchates by degrees have extended their Bounds; which cannot well be done without a general Knowledge of the Polity of the Ecclesiastical State, and of the Disposition of its Diocesses and Provinces.

THE Civil History, according to the present System of the Catholick World, surely cannot be separated from the Ecclesiastical. The Ecclesiastical State vying with that of the Political and Temporal of Princes, is so strongly fix'd and rooted in Empire, by the means of their Statutes, that at present the Changes of the one cannot be distinctly perceiv'd without the Knowledge of the other. Therefore it is necessary to see, how and when the Ecclesiastical State intruded itself into Empire, and what Novelties it occasion'd in this Kingdom; which, truly, was one of the greatest Causes of the Change of its Political and Temporal State; and thereby, not without Astonishment, we shall discover, how, contrary to all the Laws of Government, one Empire hath been able to establish itself within another, and how the Priesthood often, by perverting the Devotion of the People, and its own Spiritual Power, hath inroach'd upon the Temporal Government of this Kingdom, which was the Source of the numberless Disputes about Jurisdiction, with which the Christian Republick will always abound, and our Kingdom more than any other, which induc'd some worthy Men to labour to bring these two Powers to a perfect Harmony and Agreement, by mutually communicating their Power and Energy; it being known by long Experience, that if the Empire assist the Priesthood with its Power, in order to support the Honour of God, and if the Priesthood, in return, tie and unite the Affection of the People to the Obedience of the Prince, the whole State will flourish and be happy; but on the contrary, if these two Powers disagree with one another, so as that the Priesthood, by exceeding the Limits of its Spiritual Power, should inroach upon the Political Government, or if the latter, by turning against God that Power which he has put into its Hands, should intrench upon the Priesthood, all will go into Confusion and Ruin; of which the many Disorders which have happen'd on that account in this our Kingdom are flagrant Testimonies.

IN treating of the Use and Authority, which as well the Roman Laws, as the Ecclesiastical Statutes, and the Laws of other Nations, had in these our Provinces, vinces, we have spar'd neither Labour nor Pains; and, perhaps, my having dwelt so much on that Part of the Work, will discover my Profession, and prove me to be more a Lawyer than a Politician. This Part truly wanted to be well explain'd among us; seeing that in all Places, and at all Times, the Practice and Authority of the Roman Laws were not the same; so that our Lawyers having neglected this most valuable Part, and likewise that of the Origine and Use of the other Laws that have been introduc'd into our Kingdom by foreign Nations, has been the chief Occasion of their having stuffed their Volumes with gross and stupid Errors; which shews us clearly, how much better it is for a Man to toil himself in searching after the various Fortune and Chance of the Roman Laws, and of those of his own at home, than to go wandering up and down doubtful, and with little Certainty, in a foreign Country. Forasmuch as, altho' it be in the Power of one Man to collect the History of the Rise and Progress of Learning in other Professions, and of its various Success over all the Parts of Europe, in which we have seen some now and then who have succeeded; nevertheless, as to the Jurisprudence, which often changes its Shapes on the Change of Princes and Nations, it is not an Undertaking that can be perform'd by one Man, but ought to be divided amongst many, each of whom must set about to treat of the Use, Authority, and the various Changes that have happen'd in his own Country. So we perceive, that a Sort of a History of the Roman Jurisprudence has been compil'd by some excellent Writers; nevertheless they have all labour'd to make it clear and evident in relating its Origine and Progress in the Times when the Roman Empire had its Rise, Growth, and when it came to the highest Pitch of Grandeur; but its various Turns of Fortune, when the Empire began afterwards to fall from its Glory, its Declension, Extinction, and Restauration, the Use and Authority that it had in the new Dominions establish'd in Europe after the Inundations of so many Nations, when by the new Laws it was in a manner extinct; and when, being restor'd, it eclips'd these, cannot surely be exactly describ'd by any one Man in the whole World. Therefore it was well advis'd of some noble Genius's, who, after having given a Specimen of general things in their own Kingdom or Province, set Bounds to themselves, beyond which they seldom or never went.

A BRITON, separated from the rest of the World, thinking that others had confin'd the Reach of human Understanding to too narrow a Compass, shew'd that he had Courage enough for so great an Undertaking. This was the famous Arthur Duck ¹, who would not confine himself to his own Country of England, but went in Search of the Use and Authority of the Roman Laws in the new Dominions of Christian Princes, as well to the neighbouring as the remoter Countries: He made diligent Inquiry after them, for Example, in the neighbouring Dominions of Scotland and Ireland; he went over to France and Spain; to Germany, Italy; and also came to our Kingdom; besides, he travell'd as far as Poland, Bohemia, Hungary, Denmark, Swedeland, and to still remoter Parts. But even this Work, tho' very famous, has clearly demonstrated to the World, that this Undertaking was not to be perform'd by one Man; seeing that altho' by his great Care, and Travelling into diverse Parts of Europe, such as France, Germany, and Italy, he has been able, in a great measure, to remove the many Difficulties in the Prosecution of his Undertaking; nevertheless the Event has demonstrated, that tho' he may have perform'd it exactly in England, Scotland, Ireland, and in some Countries not far distant from them; yet in other Parts, and especially in our Kingdom, we see that he has demean'd himself like a Stranger; and, by following the common Guides, falls into many Blunders, having only furnish'd us a very slight Account of the Practice and Authority both of the Roman, and those Laws of our own, that have been introduc'd by the different Princes who have govern'd us. Neither has his Ingenuity allow'd him to dissemble it in the Conclusion of his Book; expecting to be pardon'd by Strangers, if in treating about their Laws and Customs he has been so sparing; and he confesses, that he had no other Design, than to incite the Lawyers of other Countries, that, by following his Example, they might do in their own Countries, or Provinces, what he had done with relation to England. A little before Arthur Duck, some Writers on this Subject, without much Travelling, confin'd themselves to their own Countries. Innocentius Cironius ², Chancellor of Toulouse, made a Tour through France only, yet very superficially: But Alteserra ¹ made a more exact and distinct Search in the Province where he was born, to wit, Aquitania: And Joannes Costa, an Excellent Professor in Toulouse, promis'd to do the same, with the greatest Exactness, over all the Kingdom of France; but this great Work, which was impatiently expected by Cironius ², by Arthur Duck ³, and all other learned Men, hath never been publish'd to this Day, that we know of. Joannes Dovjat ⁴ did the same since, without going out of France; and sometimes it has fallen out, that some, by having been too curious in the searching after the Laws of other Nations, have neglected what was most valuable in their own, and thereby have fallen into a thousand Mistakes.

GERMANY wants not its own Historian on this Subject. Hermanus Coringius ⁵ compiled a Treatise concerning the Origine and various Fortune of the Roman and German Laws, of which Georgius Pasquius ⁶ makes honourable mention; and in our Time Burcardus Struvius ⁷ has compiled another more diffusive, wherein he mentions other Authors, who have done the same with respect to Germany.

HOLLAND has its own Historian, and Joannes Voetius compos'd a Book intitled, De Usu Juris Civilis, & Canonici in Belgio Unito.

AS for Spain, we have Michael Molinus, who wrote such another for the Kingdom of Aragon. Joannes Ludovicus Cortes wrote the History Juris Hispanici; and Gerardus Ernestus de Frankenau, has enlarg'd more than any other on that Subject ⁸. Swedeland, Denmark, Norway and other Northern Provinces, have also their Historians on the same Subject. Neither are there wanting such in some Parts of our Italy, as in Milan, Franciscus Grassus, ⁹ and in other Countries likewise of the same.

WHAT others have done for the Glory of their respective Countries, hath always been neglected in our Kingdom only: Neither truly can we expect to see it supply'd. What a strange thing it is, that in so large a Kingdom, and productive of so many great Genius's, which the Works they have publish'd testify, and wherein they have shew'd that they had no other Study more at Heart, than that of the Laws, yet for all that, have neglected so noble and renowned a Subject: Because an exact History of the Use and Authority that the Roman Laws had in our Kingdom, and of the various Fate of the other Laws that from Time to Time were by different Nations introduced into it, by which the former were eclips'd, and how being afterwards restor'd, they recover'd their ancient Splendor and Authority, and are in the State we see them at present; ought truly to be what we should most desire, not for slight and vain, but for grave and most important Reasons: Not that we ought to be anxious in diving into the various Turns they have undergone; nor by so doing, that we may add to their Lustre, nor out of Ostentation of rare and uncommon Erudition; but for more weighty Reasons: which are, because from an exact Knowledge of what we have propos'd, besides the Improvement of Wisdom, by the Use of the Laws, and a right Judgment, we may form the Idea of a most excellent Government; for, by observing in History the Disturbances and Commotions in Civil Matters, the Vices and the Virtues, and their various Vicissitudes, we shall be best able to distinguish which is the true, and to choose the best.

BUT especially upon that, in a great measure, depends the clearing of the Laws of our own Country, and of our Institutions and Customs; which Matters have been so coarsely treated of by our Writers, and so strangely explain'd to us, and often without comprehending the Sense of them, for no other Reason, but because they were ignorant of the History of the Times, of their Authors, of the Occasions of their being establish'd, and ignorant of the Use and Authority of the Roman Laws, and those of the Longobards; therefore they fell into the many Errors, Puerilities and useless Things with which their Volumes are stuff'd; and they were so blinded with Ignorance, that they valued themselves upon being only Professors of Law, and not Historians; not being sensible, that by their not being Historians, they were but wretched Professors of Law, and render'd themselves despicable, as well to Strangers, as to many of their own Countrymen. How many gross Errors through Ignorance of History, did *Carolus Molineus*¹ lay to the Charge not only of Baldus, but likewise of our Andrea d'Isfernia? And how much were our Writers despis'd on that account by others? How much was Nicholas Boerius laugh'd at, who wrote, that the Longobards were certain Kings that came to us from Sardinia, as also Matth. de Afflict. and many others?

ADD to this likewise, the great Advantage the Knowledge of History is of to the Practice of our Courts and Tribunals, and even to publick Pleadings: For which we can produce no better Evidence in these Times, than the Cardinal de Luca, who had been a famous Advocate in Rome, and a most accomplished Barrister, who in almost all his numerous Discourses, whence so many Volumes were compiled, and from long Experience, has demonstrated in a Thousand Places², that the numerous Blunders of our Writers are owing to nothing else but the Ignorance of the Law-History; so that he recommends nothing so much, both to Judges and Advocates, as the exact Knowledge of it, without which, Blunders and Stupidity are inevitable. But among our Writers none have made this Truth more evident, than that greatest Ornament of our Tribunals, the incomparable Franciscus d'Andreys, who in that learned Feudal Disputation³, which he publish'd, has fully demonstrated, that by no other means, than this of History, was it possible to remove the Difficulties into which our Writers had involv'd that Matter; which had occasion'd their committing a thousand Mistakes. And this ought to be a Warning to all, how much the Knowledge of the Law-History is necessary in all Pleadings at the Bar: Whereof this learned Man, as far as his Purpose would bear, has given us an excellent Intimation. And truly it has been our Misfortune, that he did not attempt to do for our Country, what other Writers have done for theirs; for then certainly, we should not have had occasion to lament such a Want at this Day. For what could we not have expected from the Strength of his divine Genius, from his great Skill in the Laws, in History, and from his Erudition; from his wonderful Eloquence, unwearied Application and Accuracy? Neither, in my Opinion, are fewer Endowments requir'd for accomplishing such an Undertaking, which, when shar'd out amongst many, create Admiration, and yet, were most surprizingly center'd in him alone.

WEIGHTY then, and perhaps superior to my weak Abilities, is the Task that I have undertaken; and so much the more weighty, that I have declared it impracticable to treat of the Law-History to any purpose, without joining at the same time the Civil with it, which I have done, by treating of the Polity of this Kingdom together with its Laws; the History of which could not have been perfectly understood, if at the same time we had not shewn from whence they sprung, and what Disposition and Form these Provinces had that were govern'd by them. And thence it hath happen'd, that by attributing their Changes to the Ecclesiastical Statutes, which afterwards were call'd Canonical Laws, this Work of mine has become a great Attempt, whereby I have involv'd myself into many Difficulties, out of which it will be hard to extricate myself: Therefore, I was many times tempted to give it over, forasmuch as considering with myself the Difficulty of the Undertaking, the Bustle of the Courts of Justice that diverted me from it, and much more being conscious of my weak Capacity, I thought, that not only all my Endeavours would be to no purpose, but likewise, that I should be accus'd of too great Assurance; whereupon, being terrified at so many Difficulties, I banish'd all thoughts of prosecuting it, by reserving the Task to a more fit Opportunity, and when I should be at more leisure.

BESIDES, from my Youth I had heard, that P. Parthenius Giannettasius, in the Solitudes of Surrentum, freed from all worldly Cares, with great Helps, and a huge Apparatus, had undertaken to write the Neapolitan History; and altho' my Design was quite different from his, nevertheless both of us, tho' with different Aims, designing to treat of the same Subject; I apprehended that he, by prying more narrowly, might deprive me of the Novelty of many Things which I had observ'd; and perhaps, might search more nicely into others, than I was able to do, who wanted so many Helps, and so much Leisure: And this contributed to incline me to lay aside the Undertaking.

BUT being on the other hand exceedingly encourag'd by several Persons of the most exalted Genius, I went on in prosecuting the Work, with a Design, that it should only serve for myself and the Curious; amongst whom there wanted not some, who, besides approving of the Matter, and pushing me on to prosecute it, with very prevailing Arguments, accus'd me of Pusillanimity; whereupon I took courage, and became more bold; especially as I reflected, That this Work, whatever it might prove, was not to be expos'd to all the World; nor to go beyond the Limits of this Kingdom; seeing it was only design'd for the Perusal of Persons curious in our Affairs; and that if it should ever be of any Advantage, it was we ourselves that were to reap it. But what most of all embolden'd me, was, The favourable Assurance of those who are employ'd in the Magistracy and at the Bar (of whose Kindness and Friendship towards me, I had had long Experience) That this my Essay would not be reckon'd Impudent, and whatever Defect they might find in it, they would rather excuse and bear with it, than blame and despise it.

But whilst I, stimulated by so many Motives, was prosecuting the Undertaking, behold; when I scarcely came to the tenth Book of the Work, the so long expected History of Naples was publish'd in the Year 1713. in Latin, by the aforesaid famous learned Man. I read it immediately, and, quite contrary to my Expectation, it cannot be express'd, how much more bold it made me in the Prosecution; when I found, that this able Man had had little other Design, than to translate into good Latin the History of Summonte, for the Benefit of those who do not perfectly understand our Italian Language.

THEREFORE this Fear being over, I can now boldly promise those, who will undergo the Trouble of reading this History, that I present them one altogether new, and as yet never attempted by any other Person.

MOREOVER, I have endeavour'd to support all that I have related, with the Authority of Men most worthy of Credit, and who were either Contemporaries with the Events that are treated of, or most exact Searchers of our Records. My Style shall be altogether plain and simple, being willing that my Talents, few and weak as they are, should be all employ'd in Matter rather than Words, by directing my Reader to the Search of Truth alone; and I was willing likewise, that its Clearness should depend much more on a right Connexion of Events with their Causes, than on Phrases of Speech, or the over-nice Ranging of Words. And as I was unwilling to arrogate to myself so much Authority as to think that my single Narration ought to be credited, I have added in the Margin the Authors that liv'd nearest the Time of the Events treated of; or at least those who are the most exact and careful; and all that was not supported with lawful Vouchers, I have excepted against as fabulous, or pass'd it over as doubtful.

I AM not so ignorant of the Laws of History as not to perceive, that sometimes I have not carefully observ'd them; and that, perhaps, by my having been at too much Pains in searching into many Things of little Moment, I may have sometimes derogated from them; and that often by deriving Things from too remote Principles, I may have too much deviated from the Design of the Work. But I likewise know, that all Subjects cannot be fitted to the same Rules, and that mine being concerning the Polity and Civil State of this Kingdom and its Laws, as the Matter was quite different, so likewise it behov'd me to make use of a different Method; and as I pretend that it may be of some Advantage, even to our Affairs before the Courts of Justice, it will not be imputed as a Fault in me, if by descending to the most minute Things, I may, perhaps, in some measure have lessen'd the Gravity of it, because our Professors; for whom it is chiefly intended, and especially what concerns the Law-History, cannot read it without reaping some Advantage by it; On the contrary, some things would have perhaps required a more strict and narrow Examination, but not being intirely Master of my Time, I should never have ended. And my having sometimes enlarg'd upon the Principles of Things, was, because Events could not otherwise be distinctly connected with their Causes; which besides Knowledge, carries along with it Perspicuity; as will be perceiv'd in the Course of this History.

BUT upon what more solid Foundations could I build the Civil History of our Kingdom than by beginning with the Romans, to whom, as we may say, the Art of Government and making Laws was peculiar, when these our Provinces had the Fate to be long govern'd by them? For which end, in the First Book, before we come to the Time of Constantine the Great, which shall be the Beginning of our History, we shall give, by way of Apparatus, a Specimen of the Form and Disposition of the Roman Empire, and of its Laws: Of the Favour of the Princes to which they ow'd their Glory: Of the Wisdom of their Constitution: Of the Prudence of the Lawyers; and of the two most famous Academies of the World, the one of Rome in the West, the other of Berytis in the East: Seeing the Decay and many Revolutions and Changes of the Civil State of our Provinces, which happen'd afterwards, when Constantine was pleas'd to translate the Seat of the Empire to Constantinople, and of one, to make two Empires, may be more clearly describ'd, by a succinct Account of their flourishing State, as well with respect to what belong'd to their Polity as their Laws, in the Times preceding that Prince.

THE

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K I.

HAT large and potent Part of Italy, which now is call'd the Kingdom of Naples, being surrounded both by the Upper and Lower Seas, has no other inland Limit but the Estate of the Church of Rome; when, by the victorious Arms of the People of Rome, it was happily join'd to their Empire, had a Form of Government very different from that which it had afterwards in the Times of the Roman Emperors. When it came under the Dominion of the Kings of Italy it got a new Polity. It suffer'd other Changes under the Emperors of the East. And it underwent many more strange Alterations, when by various Fortune it pass'd from one People to another: At last it came under the most august Family of Austria.

DURING the Time of the Free Commonwealth it was not divided into Provinces, as it was afterwards; neither had it any other Laws but the Roman. The different People who inhabited it, took from, or gave Names to the different Regiones into which it was divided; and the Cities of each Regio, according as they kept in Friendship with, and were faithful to the People of Rome, receiv'd hard or mild Usage as they deserv'd. They had no occasion to look out for a better Form of Government than that which the provident Romans had introduc'd in those early Times, the Art of Government being peculiar to them, for which they were remarkable above all other Nations in the World; as the incomparable Virgil testifies, ¹ who after having given to each Nation the Praise for those Arts in which they were most famous, prefers the Romans alone for the Art of Government to all other Nations: By which Rome gain'd more Renown than it did by its Conquests; for if we have regard only to the Extent of its Empire, the Assyrians may, in some measure, boast of theirs acquir'd by Ninus; the Medes and the Persians of theirs by Cyrus; and the Grecians of theirs founded by Alexander the Great. The Conquests of the Turks were not inferior to those of the Romans, and under the famous Emperors Mahomet II. and Soliman, their Empire was nothing less¹; and even the Spaniards, with more reason may brag of that of the most fierce Kings of Spain; being greater, if we consider the Largeness of its Extent, which is such as the World never saw the like before². And how excellent and incomparable soever the Wisdom of their Councils was, the Intrepidity of their Minds, their Virtues, and the Success wherewith all their Undertakings were crown'd; yet the Opinion of the World, and of the gravest Writers³, who have look'd upon all their Expeditions as unjust, and their Wars often carried on and supported without any reasonable Cause, has very much lessen'd their Reputation, and the Glory of their Arms. The most famous Writers in the World have tir'd themselves purely in extolling the Wisdom of their Government, and the Justice of their Laws, for which alone they have deservedly been renown'd above all other Nations. A most evident Argument of which we see, That although their Empire be long ago ruin'd and extinct, yet the Authority and Use of their Laws are continued in the new Dominions founded in Europe; for which, no other Reason can be given, but that the Roman Laws were fram'd with so much Judgment and Wisdom, as to diffuse and propagate themselves in all Parts of the World, not so much by the Power of their Empire, nor because, by the Law of Nations, the Vanquish'd were always subjected to the Laws of the Victorious, as that those who were subjected were sensible of the Advantage they receiv'd from their mild and just Government. Whence it was, that the most remote and barbarous Nations of their own Free-Will receiv'd their Laws, having the Prudence and Justice of them to comfort them in their Servitude. Thus Cæsar while he triumph'd over Euphrates, and subjected these Countries to his Empire, being victorious, gave Laws to these People, but *Populo Volenti*⁴. Neither did they stand in need of less than the Wisdom of their Government, and the Justice of their Laws, for begetting, amongst so many different and distant Nations, that Tractableness and Mildness of Manners which *Libanius*⁵ exaggerates in those who lived according to the Institutions and Laws of the Romans; and that Concord, and Bond of compleat Civil Society which Prudentius describes to us⁶ amongst those who were in Subjection to them. So there are not wanting some very grave Writers⁷, amongst whom we must not forget *Augustine*⁸, who believ'd that it was by Divine Providence the Romans conquer'd the World; that by their Government, which was the highest Pitch of Wisdom and Justice, the Manners and Savageness of so many Nations might be render'd more tractable and mild; to the end that Mankind might be the more easily dispos'd to receive that Religion, which was at last design'd for the Overthrow of Paganism; and being establish'd upon more solid Foundations, was to enlighten the Earth and bring it to a true Faith: Wherefore, as a Reward of their Justice, the Empire of the World had been bestow'd upon them. The Emperors Dioclesian and Maximinian in one of their Edicts which we read in the Gregorian Code, left us this very grave Encomium on the Roman Laws: *Nihil nisi sanctum, ac venerabile nostra jura custodiunt: Et ita ad tantam magnitudinem Romana majestas cunctorum Numinum favore pervenit: Quoniam omnes suas leges religione sapienti, pudorisque observatione devinxit*⁹. For which Cause it was, that the Nations of Europe esteem'd them not as the Laws of one single People, but as Universal and Common to all Nations; and that Princes and Commonwealths strove to frame their Dominions after their Model, so that it seems at this Time, as if the Christian World was guided and govern'd by their Rule; whence it is, that in all well instituted Academies they are publickly taught for that end.

Hæ tibi erunt artes, &c.

'Tis true, it will appear very surprizing to any one who considers the Success of the Arms of the People of Rome, that in so short a Time they should be able to extend their Empire over so many and distant Provinces. Neither can it be mention'd without Astonishment, that in the Infancy of their Government, and while they were wrestling with their Neighbours, they should so soon overcome them; that soon after having subdu'd Italy, even before they were fully grown up, they should be in a Condition to conquer the most remote Countries. They took Sicily, Sardinia, and Corfica, and afterwards advanc'd into the large Countries of Spain; and being now arriv'd at their Manhood, and become powerful, they subjected Macedonia, Greece, Syria, Gallia, Asia, Africa, Britain, Egypt, Dacia, Armenia, Arabia; and lastly, the furthest Provinces of the East: So that at last, being oppress'd with the great Weight of such an excessive Bulk, they were oblig'd to give way, and sink under the Burthen.

BUT, perhaps, the Method and Moderation which was practis'd with respect to the People they vanquish'd and overcame, ought to seem a Thing more wonderful and worthy of greater Commendation; and their not following the Example of the Athenians and Lacedemonians, by whom all were treated as Aliens, in governing them with too much Severity: Conditions were granted them severe or mild, according as either their Fidelity and Friendship, or their Obstinacy and Frowardness had deserv'd. Some People, says *Flaccus*¹, obstinately made War against the Romans. Others having Experience of their Fidelity and Justice, kept themselves in continual Peace. Some others knowing their Virtue, yielded to them of their own accord, and united with them, and frequently carried Arms against their Enemies; whence it was necessary, that according to the Deserts of each Nation they were to receive Laws and Conditions; because it would have been unjust to have treated the People that were faithful, upon the same Foot with those who so often had broke their Faith and Oaths, by taking up Arms against the People of Rome. For which cause Italy was govern'd with Conditions different from the other Provinces of the Empire. Whence it came to pass, that in the Cities of Italy themselves were introduc'd these different Orders, and these various Privileges of Roman Citizens, such as Municipia, Latinitas, Præfectura, and Civitates Fœderatæ; whence likewise it came to pass, that having made themselves Masters of so many and so remote Provinces, they very prudently ordain'd some to be Vestigales, some Stipendiariæ or Tributariæ, others Proconsulares, and others Præsidiales.

C H A P. I.

Of the STATE of the CITIES of ITALY.

THE Romans having driven away their Kings, resolv'd to get rid of all Sorts of Despotick Government, to enjoy a perfect Liberty, as well in their Persons as Estates: And as they would submit to no King nor Monarch, neither would they depend upon any other Magistrate, who claim'd an arbitrary Dominion over them; this they called Jus Libertatis, by which they reserv'd to themselves the Power of condemning a Roman Citizen, either to Capital or Corporal Punishment: And 'tis to be believ'd, that they likewise would have had no Magistrates, if they had been able to subsist without them; so much did they abhor arbitrary Dominion, because some of their Kings had made a tyrannical Use of their Power. It was the Privilege of the Roman Citizens to be number'd amongst the Tribes and Centuries by the Censors; to give their Suffrages; to be rais'd to the prime Honours and supreme Magistracy; to be admitted only into the Roman Legions, partake of the military Offices, and the publick Treasury; to enjoy only the paternal Power with respect to their Children, the Jus Gentilitium, of Adoption, of the Toga, of Commerce, Connubium, and the other Privileges learnedly explain'd by Sigonius.²

AS to their Estates, the Romans likewise would have their Inheritances intirely free, exempted from Seignory, and that they should belong to the Proprietors optimo jure, or, as they call'd it, jure Quiritium; which oblig'd Bodinus to say³, that Seignory was the Invention of barbarous Nations, not known to the Romans with respect to their Persons or Estates; which is very true as to the Persons of Roman Citizens, and those who by Privilege had become such, and with Regard to the Estates in Italy: But, with respect to those who were not Roman Citizens, and consequently had not that Title to Liberty peculiar to them; over their Inheritances situated out of Italy they acknowledg'd that Tenure, as we shall shew by and by; the jus Quiritium not being allow'd to the Provincials for their Goods, which was known by that old Division of theirs, Rerum mancipi, & nec mancipi.

THESE were the most remarkable Privileges of Roman Citizens, to wit, of those who had the good Luck to be born in Rome, or in its Neighbourhood; and accordingly some of them were granted out of special Love and Favour to other Places of Italy; whence the different Conditions of Municipia, Coloniæ, Civitates foederatæ, and Præfecturæ.

THE Condition of the Municipia was the most desirable and honourable that any City of Italy could have, particularly when the Privilege of Suffrage was likewise granted with it; in which Case the Municipes differ'd little from the Citizens of Rome themselves, except only the being inrolled in the Curia, which was the Privilege of native Romans; and they were called Municipes cum Suffragio, to distinguish them from those to whom such a Privilege was not granted, called therefore Municipes sine Suffragio. They were also allow'd to chuse their own Magistrates, and to retain their own Laws, to distinguish them from the Coloniæ, who could have no other Laws but the Roman. And whence it comes, that in our Time the particular Laws of a Place or a City are called Municipal Laws; which Prerogative, either by the Permission or Connivance of the Prince, we see that many Cities of these our Provinces do still retain⁴.

The Coloniæ were the next honourable. The Writers of all Ages cannot enough extol the Institution of Romulus, afterwards so frequently practis'd by the Romans, in sending new Inhabitants to the conquer'd or waste Countries, whom they called Coloni: From which admirable Institution they drew many Advantages; the City of Rome, which was oppress'd with the Multitude of Citizens, for the most part useless and burthensome, thereby became eas'd; the Citizens themselves, who had Fields assign'd them in these Countries, were comforted, and had Conveniencies of Life; and even the conquer'd People had their Advantage in it, by their Country's being more frequented, their Fields better cultivated, and all put in a better Way of living, whence they became more Polite and Civil; and lastly, the Roman Empire itself was better'd by it; for such a Law occasion'd new Towns and new Cities to be built, and render'd the conquer'd Country more secure to the Conqueror; and filled the waste Places with Inhabitants, dispers'd more conveniently in all Parts, who by living more at Ease, multiply'd the more, and were the more ready to defend themselves, and offend their Enemies; for a Colony planted in a Country newly possess'd, is like a Citadel and a Guard to keep the Country in Awe. For these Reasons the Coloniæ, as deriving all they had from the City of Rome, differ'd from the Municipia, (which supported themselves, and were protected by their own Magistrates and their own Laws) had nothing of their own, but were oblig'd to observe the Laws and Institutions of the People of Rome. Which Condition, although it seem'd less free, nevertheless it was more desirable and excellent, by Reason of the Majesty and Grandeur of the City of Rome, of which these Colonies were small Resemblances and Images: And by their being subjected to the Laws of the People of Rome, because of their Excellency and Usefulness, it was rather acquiring Liberty than Servitude: Besides that, the particular and peculiar Laws of the Municipia, as A. Gellius reports ¹, were obscure and out of Date, and being so obliterated, they could not be made use of; but the Administration and Government of the Colonies were no otherwise appointed than that of the City of Rome itself; forasmuch as there were in Rome the People and the Senate, so in the Colonies there were the Plebeians and the Decuriones: These were the Resemblance of the Senate, and those of the People. From among the Decuriones every Year were elected two or four, according to the Bigness or Smallness of the Colony, which were called Duumviri or Quatuorviri, who resembled the Roman Consuls. They appointed an Ædilis, who had Care of the Annona, the publick Buildings, the Streets, and such like Things; a Quæstor, who had the Charge of the publick Treasury; and other lesser Magistrates, after the Manner of Rome. In short, they were in every Thing, as to Customs, Laws, and Institutions, the same with the Romans themselves; and it seem'd to the new Inhabitants as if they lived in Rome itself. It was Augustus, who seeing the Colonies in Italy increas'd to the Number of Twenty-eight, ordain'd, that they should not have an independent Privilege of electing their Magistrates out of their own Body, but only allowed the Decuriones to give their Votes for what Magistrates they would have, which Votes they were to send inclos'd and seal'd to Rome, where they were chosen ².

BESIDES the Municipia and the Coloniæ, there were likewise, before the Italian War, other Cities in Italy which had Conditions more honourable and free: These were the Civitates fœderatæ; save some Tribute which they paid to the Romans, by the League and Confederacy agreed upon, in all other Things they were reckon'd free. They had their own Form of a Republick, lived according to their own Laws, made their own Magistrates, and many times prided themselves in the Title of the Senate and People. So from Livy we learn, that Capua in ancient Times, when it was a confederated City, before it was reduced to a Præfectura, was govern'd as a Republick, having Magistrates, Senate and People, and its own Laws. We read likewise of the Tarentini, that altho' they were subdu'd, they were left at their Liberty by the Romans: The Neapolitans, those of Præneste ³ and Tivoli, and other People, were treated after the same manner, as Polybius testifies ⁴, whose Cities were so free, that it was allow'd to those who were condemn'd to Banishment, to take up their Abode in them, and so to fulfil their Sentence.

IN the last Place follow the Præfecturæ. Without all doubt, amongst all the Cities of Italy, the Præfecturæ were in the most wretched Condition; since those Cities which had been Ungrateful and Unthankful to the People of Rome by renouncing their Allegiance, and being again reduc'd under their Power, were punish'd no otherwise than by making them Præfecturæ; as they were wont to send from Rome every Year Prætores into the Provinces, so to those Cities were sent Præfecti, to whom the Administration and Government of them were committed; wherefore they were call'd Præfecturæ. Their Citizens could neither use their own Laws, as the Municipia; nor make their Magistrates out of their own Body, as the Coloniæ; but were govern'd by Magistrates sent them from Rome, and liv'd under such Laws as they were pleas'd to impose upon them. Capua was once in that state, to wit, after the second Carthaginian War, and before it was chang'd into the Form of a Colonial City. The Præfecturæ were likewise of two Sorts. Ten Cities, all situated in this Kingdom, were govern'd by as many Præfecti, who were appointed by the People of Rome, and sent to command them. These were Capua, Cuma, Casilinum ⁵, Linternum, Pozzuolo, Acerra, Suessula ⁶, Atella, and Calatia ⁷. The Prætor Urbanus was wont to send Præfecti to the rest, and these were Fundi, Formia ⁸, Cere, Venafrum, Alisa, Piperno, Anagnia, Frusilone, Reate, Saturnia, Nursia, and Arpinum.

ONCE the Number of the Civitates Fœderatæ in Italy, was greater than that of the Coloniæ, the Municipiæ, and the Præfecturæ: But there have been many Changes since, one City passing to the State of another, and that into the State of this. Thus Capua, from a Fœderata became a Præfectura; thereafter, in the Consulship of C. Cæsar, was a Civitas Colonia: Cuma, Acerra, Suessula, Atella, Formia, Piperno and Anagnia, were first Municipiæ, afterwards Coloniæ, and sometimes also Præfecturæ. Fundi, Cere and Arpinum, once were Municipia; Casilinum, Vulturnum, Linternum, Pozzuolo, Saturnia, were Coloniæ; and Calatia, Venafrum, Alifa, Frusilone, Reate, and Nursia, while the Liberty of the People of Rome lasted, were always Præfecturæ.

BUT we ought not to proceed without observing, That those various Degrees, and different Conditions of the Cities of Italy, had all their Stability as long as the Liberty of the People of Rome continu'd. For afterwards, not to mention that Augustus depriv'd many of the Civitates Fœderatæ of their Liberties which they had made a wrong Use of¹; by the Julian Law all Suffrages being made equal, and the Freedom of the Roman Citizens being granted to all Italy, as afterwards by Antoninus Pius, it was allow'd to the Provinces; the Rights of the Municipiæ, Coloniæ, and Præfecturæ were abolish'd, and these Titles began to be confounded, so that sometimes Colonia was taken for Municipium, and Municipium for Colonia, and also for Præfectura; whence, after the Julian Law all the Cities of Italy, to which the Jus Suffragii was allow'd, might be call'd Municipia; and Antoninus Pius made the Condition not only of the Cities of Italy, but of all Nations the same; and Rome was the common Country of all those who were subject to its Empire².

THESE were the various Conditions of the Cities of Italy. We shall now relate those which the People of Rome granted to the Provinces out of Italy, which were much the same.

CHAP. II.

Of the STATE of the PROVINCES of the EMPIRE.

THE Lands of the Provinces continu'd subject to the Publick Seignory of the Empire as formerly. The Romans having in the Space of Five hundred Years subjected Italy, and carrying their victorious Arms out of it, subdu'd to their Empire many vast and immense Countries, which they divided into Regiones, but in the Form of Provinces; the first were Sicilia, Sardinia, Corfica, the two Provinces of Spain, Asia, Græcia, Gallia Narbonensis, the Balearian Islands, Thracia, Numidia, Cyrene, Cilicia, Bythinia, Creta, Pontus, Syria, Cyprus, and Gallia Transalpina. To which Cæsar afterwards added Mauritania, Pannonia, Mesia, Ægyptus, Cappadocia, Britannia, Dacia, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Arabia.

THE chief Conditions, and which were common to all these Provinces of the Roman Empire, were, I. That they were to obey the Roman Magistrates; whence it was, that from the various Titles of Magistrates some were called Proconsular, others Præsidial. II. That they should receive Laws of the Conqueror. III. That they should be Tributary to him. But in laying on the Tribute there was great Difference amongst them; since the Romans dispos'd of the Lands³ possess'd by the Enemy after this manner, some they sold, some were given to the Veteran Soldiers, others they left to the old Possessors, either out of Favour or Friendship, or other Reasons moving the Captain so to do. Those from whom the Lands were not taken, neither in Whole nor in Part, were made Vestigales, Stipendiarii or Tributarii; for which Cause some Provinces were called Vestigales, others Stipendiariæ and Tributariæ. The Vestigales were those, which paid certain Tolls or Customs for particular Things agreed upon, such as Carriages, Vendible Things, Metals, Salt, Pitch and Tar, and such like Things as are wont to be farm'd by Toll-gatherers. The Stipendiariæ or Tributariæ were those, which paid certain Taxes or Tribute to the People of Rome; and although these two Words Stipendium and Tributum are confounded by Ulpianus ¹, yet they were certainly different, since Stipendium was a certain and ordinary Weight; the Tributum was uncertain and extraordinary, which according to the Difference or Necessity of the Times and Things was impos'd ².

IN this manner then, some Provinces of the Roman Empire were Vestigales, such as Asia, Gallia Narbonensis, and Aquitania; some others were Tributariæ. But as the Conditions of the Cities of Italy were not always the same, nor fix'd, and were afterwards alter'd by Cæsar; so the State of the Provinces, as despotick Power began to creep in, and the Authority of the Emperors still increased, likewise chang'd their Conditions according to the Pleasure of the Princes. Thus Asia was Vestigalis, until that Cæsar having overthrown Pompey, chang'd it into Tributaria ³. Gallia from Vestigalis was made Tributaria by Augustus, and afterwards made free ⁴. And on the contrary, in the Times following, we see, that Vespasian granted the Jus Latii to Spain ⁵. Nero likewise made all Greece free; but Vespasian soon depriv'd it of its Liberty, making it again Vestigalis, and subjected it to the Roman Magistrates, as having made a bad Use of its Liberty, according to Pausanias ⁶.

FINALLY, the other Roman Emperors, who coveted nothing more than by Degrees to bring the Roman Empire to a Monarchy, by taking from the Romans all their Privileges (as had been practis'd with respect to the Cities of Italy, which by the Julian Law were all made equal to Rome) treated the Provinces after the same manner: Whereupon the Emperor Antoninus ⁷, not daring to take away these Privileges openly from the People of Rome, began to do it by a cunning Trick of State, from all the Subjects of the Empire, by giving the Freedom of Roman Citizens to all the Provinces ⁸, in making all their Inhabitants Romans, in putting them all upon a common Footing; and, as St. Augustine said, very much to the Purpose ⁹, Ac si esset omnium quod erat ante paucorum, which Rutilius Numatianus explains so well in these his Verses ¹⁰.

AND a long time after, Justinian avowedly abolish'd that Difference betwixt the Lands of Italy and those of the Provinces; and in order to cancel all the Vestiges and Footsteps of Popular Liberty, at last he said, that the Jus Quiritium was an empty Name without Foundation ¹¹. And he really took away all the Effect of it, when he abolish'd the Difference rerum Mancipi, & nec Mancipi ¹², and decreed, That every Man was Master, and had the Disposing of his own Goods. Thus on the one Hand, the Romans were divested of their Privileges; and on the other, the People of the Provinces to whom the Freedom of Rome was granted, gain'd nothing by it; forasmuch as by Degrees, the being reputed a Roman Citizen, became at last to be only a bare and vain Title of Honour; since by it they were not exempted from paying Toll and Tribute, as St. Augustine himself writeth ¹³: Numquid enim illorum agri tributa non solvunt? So at the Time when their Empire was far gone in its Decay, the Condition of the People of the Provinces was become so low and servile, that being no longer able to endure their Bondage, and the Tyranny of the Roman Officers, they went over willingly to the Goths and other foreign Nations. Salvianus, ¹⁴ a Writer of these last Times, who flourish'd in the Reign of the Emperor Anastasius, reports, That the People of the Provinces went over frequently to the Goths, neither did they repent them of it, choosing rather, under a kind of Captivity, to live Free, than under that specious Name of Liberty, to be in reality Slaves; so that he subjoins, Nomen Civium Romanorum aliquando non solum magno aestimatum, sed magno emptum, nunc ultro repudiatur, ac fugitur; nec vile tantum, sed etiam abominabile pene habetur. And Orosius¹ and Isidorus likewise testify, that they chose rather to live poor among the Goths, than rich among the Romans, and bear the heavy Yoke of paying Tribute: Of which we shall have occasion in another Place to discourse more at large.

SUCH, and so changeable were the Conditions of the Cities of Italy, and of the Provinces of the Roman Empire; but what Form of Polity, and what Divisions the Empire underwent until the Reign of Constantine the Great, for the better Understanding of what is to follow, 'tis necessary we should briefly treat of here.

C H A P. III.

Of the Disposition of the Empire under AUGUSTUS.

ALL Writers agree, That the Roman Empire, from its Beginning to its Decay, had four Divisions, and four Aspects and Forms of a Commonwealth, which were owing to as many Authors. We shall say nothing of the first, which had Romulus for its Author, as not conducing any way to the present History, and too remote from us: But of the Second establish'd by Augustus, and of the Third which acknowledges Adrian for its Author, 'tis necessary we should treat here succinctly; without the Knowledge of which the Fourth could not be well understood, which being introduc'd by Constantine, was afterwards re-establish'd by Theodosius the Younger, of which, in the Second Book, as being its Place, we shall treat.

ALL these Countries, which in the Space of 500 Years, were subjected to the People of Rome, pass'd under the general Name of Italy. But that had different Extents, and various Bounds; since formerly its Confines were the River Eso from the Upper Sea, and the River Macro from the Lower; but after the Galli Senones were subdu'd, it reach'd to the Rubicon; and at last, having all Gallia Cisalpina added to it, the Roots of the Alps became its Borders; so that its Limits towards the Upper Sea were Istria, the Castle of Pola, and the River Arfia: And towards the Lower, the River Varo which divides Gallia Narbonensis from the Ligures, and for inland Boundary it had the Roots of the Alps.

ITALY, according to this Extent, was divided by Cæsar Augustus into eleven *Regiones*², the First of which comprehended the old and new Latium and Campania, the II. the Picentini; the III. the Lucani, the Brutii, the Salentini, and the Pugliesi; the IV. the Ferentani, the Marrucini, the Peligni, the Marsi, the Vestini, the Samnites, and the Sabini; the V. Picenum; the VI. Umbria; the VII. Hetruria; the VIII. Gallia Cispadana; the IX. Liguria; the X. Venetia, Carni, Japygia, and Istria; and the XI. Gallia Transpadana. These Regiones, as we have said above, were govern'd by the Romans according to the various Conditions of their Cities, and receiv'd the Roman Laws, and were never divided into Provinces.

THOSE Places, and those large Countries, Italy being subdu'd, which, by its Assistance the People of Rome conquer'd afterwards, were divided into Provinces. The first were Sicily, Sardinia, and Corfica; whence it came, that Sicily, according to this Description of the Empire, was reckon'd a Province out of Italy; whence Dio wrote, that Augustus having made an Edict, that the Senators were not to go out of Italy without the Licence of Cæsar, excepting to Sicily, or the Province of Narbonne; therefore it was necessary to except these two Provinces in the Edict, because otherwise they would have been comprehended in it. Afterwards Spain, Asia, Etolia, Macedonia, Illyricum, Dalmatia, Africa, Achaia, Grecia, Gallia Narbonensis, the Balearian Islands, Thracia, Numidia, Cyrenaica, Cilicia, Bythinia, Creta, Pontus, Assyria, Cyprus, and Gallia Transalpina were added.

IN the Time of the Free Republick, the Government of these Provinces was regularly given to Præsides, who were sent to them from Rome. There were likewise Provinciae Consulares, which were govern'd by Consuls or Proconsuls; these under Pompey and Cæsar, were Spain, the Galliæ, Illyricum, and Dalmatia; and Cilicia and Syria, were under Cicero and Bibulus Proconsuls. Others were Prætoriae, to wit, I. Sicilia, II. Sardinia and Corsica, III. Africa and Numidia, IV. Macedonia, Achaia and Græcia, V. Asia, Lydia, Caria, Ionia and Mysia, VI. Pontus and Bythinia, VII. Creta, and VIII. Cyprus.

THERE were afterwards other Provinces added to the Empire by the Cæsars, these were Mauritania, Pannonia, Mesia, Africa, the Eastern Provinces, Cappadocia, Britannia, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Arabia, and others; which Provinces were by Augustus made, some Proconsular, others Præsidial. The most peaceable and quiet Provinces, which could be govern'd without Force, and only by Command, he gave the Charge and Care of them to the Senate, who sent Proconsuls to them. The more Barbarous and Turbulent, which could not be kept in Awe without military Force, he reserv'd to himself, and to these he sent Præsides. Such in short was the State of the Roman Empire under Augustus.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Disposition and Polity of the Regiones, which at present compose the Kingdom of Naples; and the Condition of their CITIES.

HIS Part of Italy then, which we now call the Kingdom of Naples, was not divided into Provinces, as 'twas afterwards in the Reign of Adrian. It was divided into Regiones, which took their Names from, or gave them to, the different People who inhabited them. It comprehended the Campani, the Marrucini, the Peligni, the Vestini, the Pre-cutii, the Marsi, the Samnites, the Hirpini, the Picentini, the Lucani, the Bruttii, the Salentini, the Fapygi, and the Pugliesi.

EACH of these Regiones had Cities beautiful and famous in themselves, which according to their various Conditions were govern'd by the Romans, and their Laws. Some of them were Municipia, which besides the Roman, retain'd their own and municipal Laws. Of this Condition in Campania, were Fundi and Formia, which afterwards by the Triumviri, were made Coloniae; Cuma and Acerra were likewise made Coloniae by Augustus; Sessa and Atella were also chang'd into Coloniae by the same Prince: And in like manner was Bari in Puglia, and many other Cities situated in the other Regiones.

BUT the Coloniae were more numerous in these our Provinces, which from time to time, both under the Free Commonwealth, and likewise under the Emperors, were successively increas'd.

THE Coloniae in Campania were Calvi, Sessa, ¹ Sinuessa, Pozzuolo, Vulturnum, Linternum, Nola, Suessula, Pompei, Capua, Casilinum, Calatia, Aquaviva, Acerra,

Formia, Atella, Teanum, Abella, and afterwards our Naples also, which from Fœderata was made Colonia.

IN Lucania, Pesto, Buxentum, Conza, and others were also Coloniae. And in Samnium, Saticula ¹, Casert, Isernia, Bojanum, Telese, Samnium, Venafrum, Sepino, Avellino, and others were the same.

IN Puglia, Sipontum, Venosa, Lucera, from Fœderatæ were converted into Coloniae likewise; and to pass over others, Beneventum, which in the Reign of Augustus, as Pliny reports ², did not belong to Campania, as it did afterwards, but to Puglia ³.

BRUNDISIUM, Lupia and Otranto among the Salentini were likewise Coloniae. Valentia, Tempa, Besidia, Reggium, Crotonè, Mamerto, Cassano, Locri, Petelia, Squillace, Ruscia, and Turio among the Brutii ⁴, some of which, although formerly they enjoy'd the Benefit of Fœderatæ were afterwards turn'd into Coloniae; and in like manner, Nocera and other Cities among the Picentini; and some others situated in the other Regiones, which we need not mention.

IN all these Cities they liv'd according to the Customs, Laws and Institutions of Rome itself. In Imitation of the Senate, People and Consuls, they had their Decuriones, Plebei, and Duumviri. They had likewise their Ediles, Quæstores, and other lesser Magistrates every way like those of Rome, of which they were small Resemblances and Images: Whence they made use of the Titles of Ordo, or Senatus Populusque ⁵; therefore we see upon some Marbles dug from under Ground, and which in spite of devouring Time have remain'd intire, that they us'd these Titles indifferently. Many of which are to be seen in that admirable and laborious Work of Gruterus ⁶; where, among others, we read many Inscriptions of the People of Nola inscrib'd to some of their Benefactors, all of them ending, S. P. Q. Nolanorum. Likewise the Signini in Latium, inscrib'd a Marble to a certain Volumnius, thus ⁷,

THERE were likewise Præfecturæ in these our Regiones. There were in Italy, according to Pompeius Festus Twenty-two Præfecturæ, to ten Cities, all of them in this Kingdom, to wit, Capua, Cuma, Casilinum, Vulturnum, Linternum, Pozzuolo, Acerra, Suessola, Atella, Calatia, to which were sent ten Præfecti appointed by the People of Rome, to whom the Government and Administration of them were committed. To twelve others the Præfecti were sent by the Prætor Urbanus, and were appointed as he thought fit. These are Fundi, Formia, Cere, Venafrum, Alifia, and Arpinum, all in this Kingdom; Anagni, Piperno, Frusilone, Rieti, Saturnia, Nucia, in other Regiones of Italy.

THE Conditions of these Præfecturæ, as we have said, were the most hard; they could not have their own Laws as the Municipia; they could not choose their Magistrates out of their own Body, as the Coloniae did; but they were sent them from Rome. They were under the Roman Laws, and such Conditions as the Roman Magistrates were pleas'd to impose upon them.

THERE were not wanting, in these Regiones which now make this our Kingdom, Civitates fœderatæ. These, excepting the Tribute, which by the League and Confederacy enter'd into with the Romans, they paid them, were reckon'd in all other Things intirely Free: They had their own Form of Republick; enjoy'd their own Laws; made their Magistrates; and often us'd the Title of Senate and People. In such a State was our City of Naples for a long time, so were the Tarentini, the Locresi, the *Rheggini*¹, and for some time the *Lucerini*², the Capuani, and some others of the Greek Cities which were in Italy; and such were Naples, Tarentum, Locri and Rheggium, which for a long time not only did not differ from the Greeks in their Laws, their Manners and Dress, but also as little in their Language. These Cities were treated by the Romans very favourably, and reputed rather Friendly and Confederated than Conquer'd: excepting the Tribute agreed upon which they exacted as a Token of the Confederacy, they left them at their Liberty; so much, as if these Cities had been without the Bounds of the Empire, it was allow'd to those who were banish'd from Rome to live in them³.

S E C T. I.

Of NAPLES, now the Head and Metropolis of the Kingdom.

NAPLES, although a small City, retain'd all these noble Prerogatives. It had its own Polity, its own Magistrates, and its own Laws. But what these were, as *Sigonius*⁴ well says of other confederated Cities, 'tis a very difficult Task to go a groping after them amongst so much Antiquity and Darknes. 'Tis but reasonable to believe, that it being a Greek City, was govern'd in the Beginning by the same Form of a Republick, and the same Laws with Athens. It had its Archontes and Demarchi, which were Magistrates in every Thing like unto those of Athens. At first the Authority of the Archontes lasted only for one Year, as that of the Consuls in Rome; afterwards it was prolong'd to the tenth Year. They were of the Senatorial and Equestrian Order. And as the Roman Tribunes belong'd to the People, so did the Demarchi: Whence our most accurate Writers⁵, not without Reason, carry back the Division which at this very Time we see between the Nobles and the People, to those most ancient Times. Another conjecture likewise would persuade us to believe it to be true, which is, That this being a Greek City, and so call'd by ancient Writers with a Speciality, as Janus Doussa demonstrates⁶, from that Place in *Tacitus*⁷, where writing of Nero, Neapolim quasi Græcam Urbem delegit. It likewise had its Curia like Athens, which the Neapolitans by a Greek Expression call'd Phratria.

IT was a solemn Institution of the Greeks to divide the Citizens into many Bodies, which they call'd Philæ; and those they divided into smaller Bodies, which were call'd Phratria. So in Athens the People was divided into Philæ, and these into Phratria; just after the same manner the Romans of Old were divided into Tribus, and these into Curia. But it was not so in all the Greek Cities; some had only Philæ, others Phratria: Whence the Grammarians take the one for the other, and give the same Power to the one Word, as to the other. The Neapolitans certainly were distributed into Phratria, and not into Philæ.

These Phratria or Curia, were nothing else but Brotherhoods or Bodies into which they inroll'd themselves and united, not only those who were akin, or Brethren of the same Family, but many together of the same Street or Quarter: And at most the Phratria was made up of thirty Families. The Place where they met was an Edifice, in which, besides the Porches and the Chambers, they erected a private Temple, which they dedicated to some of their particular Gods or Heroes; and by the Deity to whom they dedicated the Brotherhood, the Phratria were distinguish'd from one another. In this Place they celebrated their private Sacrifices, Feasts, Banquets, and other holy Things, according to the Rites and distinct Ceremonies, peculiar to, and fitting the God or Hero to whom the Temple was dedicated. They had their Priests, who were chosen by Lots out of this or that Family; and since the Pbratriæ consisted of thirty Families, the Priests were chosen out of each by Lot. They conven'd here with the Chief Men of the Precinct, where they not only treated of sacred Things, such as Sacrifices and Banquets, but likewise of the Publick Affairs of the City, whence they also took the Name of Colleges.

THERE were many of these Fraternities dedicated to their particular Gods. Amongst the Neapolitan Gods, the most renown'd and great were Eumelus and Ebo; whence that Pbratria that worshipp'd the God Eumelus, was call'd Fratria Eumelidarum. So that which was dedicated to Ebo, was nam'd Pbratria Heboniontorum. Amongst the Tutular Gods which Statius reckon'd, Naples had likewise Castor and Pollux; and Ceres; to whom many Temples were erected by the Neapolitans, of which there are some Vestiges remaining to this Day; whence the Pbratria dedicated to these Deities, was call'd Pbratria Castorum; meaning by that Plural Number, as well Castor as Pollux. So the Spartans meant when they swore per Castores; and that dedicated to Ceres, was call'd Pbratria Cerealeusium. They had also another dedicated to Diana, call'd Pbratria Artemisiorum, for amongst the Greeks Artemisia was call'd the Goddess *Diana*¹. Not only to the Gods, but likewise to the Heroes did the Greeks dedicate their Pbratriæ; so in like manner Naples, besides those which it dedicated to its Tutular Gods, also had some consecrated to the Heroes, one of which was dedicated to Aristeus, therefore it was Pbratria Aristæorum. Aristeus was the Son of Apollo, and reign'd in Arcadia: He was commended for having been the first Inventor of the Use of Honey, Oyl and Rennett: He was not esteem'd a God, only a Hero. Peter Lasena had promis'd us a complete Treatise of the Pbratriæ of Naples, but his untimely Death, as it robb'd us of a great many of his other excellent Works, which he had not brought to Perfection, so it likewise depriv'd us of this. From such Pbratriæ, as Tutinus has also told us², in which the Chief and most Noble of the Precinct join'd, not purely for sacred Functions, but likewise in order to consult about Publick Affairs, have the Sedilia of the Nobles had their Origin in Naples, which in the ancient Monuments of this City, were by our Forefathers call'd Tocchi, or Tocci, from the Greek Word Σῶζας, which the Latins call Sedile, and we now call them Seggi, of which in a more convenient Place we shall have occasion to speak more amply.

THESE Greek Institutions were long kept up in Naples; and Strabo, who flourish'd under Augustus, witnesseth, That in his Time there were remaining many Vestiges of the Rites, Customs and Institutions of the Greeks there, such as the Academy, of which *Peter Lasena*³ hath fully and most accurately written; the Assemblies of the Youth, and these Fraternities which they call'd Pbratriæ, and a hundred other Customs: Plurima, says he⁴, Græcorum institutorum ibi supersunt Vestigia, ut Gymnasia, Epheborum Cætus, Curie (ipsi Pbratrias vocant) & Græca nomina Romanis imposita; and *Varro*⁵ who was Contemporary with Cicero, likewise reports the same: Pbratria est Græcum vocabulum partis hominum, ut Neapoli etiam nunc.

HOWEVER, 'tis true, this City by Degrees left off these Greek Customs, and having been long a Civitas fœderata of the Romans, and afterwards reduc'd to a Colonia, becoming daily more subject to the Romans, began to disuse the Names of its ancient Magistrates, such as Archontes and Demarchi, which were in use till the Reign of Adrian; since *Spartianus*⁶ reports, speaking of that Emperor, who was Demarchus in Naples, that it was the Custom of some of the Roman Emperors, when they had a mind to shew Respect to any City, for which they had a Friendship, when they were in them, to accept of the Titles and Honours of the municipal Magistrates⁷. But afterwards, in process of Time, leaving off the Greek Institutions, and being made a Roman Colony, it imitated Rome in every Thing, by making use of the Titles of Senate, People and Commonwealth; and of lesser Magistrates, such as Ediles, Quæstores, and other Officers of that City, after the same manner as all the other Roman Colonies did, as we shall shew by and by.

THERE are some¹ who believe that these Institutions, and some of the most ancient Laws, notwithstanding the Course of so many Ages, have not been quite abolish'd in Naples; but that part of them continue amongst us as yet, and are those which were recorded in the Book of the Customs of this City, which under Charles II. of Anjou, were committed to Writing; which Customs (without doubt very ancient) take their Origin from those, of which, altho' the Voracity of Time hath depriv'd us, yet there are left with the Citizens, by Tradition, these Institutions and Customs, that neither Length of Time, nor the so many Revolutions of worldly Things, have been able to cancel: but that Point shall be more narrowly examin'd into, when we come to discourse of the Compiling of that Book.

LOOKING upon this City then as a Confederate of the Romans, it cannot be deny'd, but that both before and after the Reign of Augustus, excepting the Tribute it paid to the Romans, it was treated very favourably by them, and left at its Freedom, in preserving the Form of a Republick, and esteem'd rather a friendly than a subjected City. What *Cicero*² supplieth us with, is a clear Argument of its Liberty, since he says, That by the Julian Law, the Franchises of the City of Rome being granted to Italy, there was a great Debate, and very different Sentiments amongst the People of Heraclea and our Neapolitans, whether they should accept or refuse that Favour so earnestly long'd for by all the other People of Italy; at last thinking it more for their Advantage to continue in their ancient Liberty, than, for the Honour of that Privilege, to subject themselves to the Romans, they prefer'd their own Liberty to the Freedom of Roman Citizens. In short, excepting the Tribute, which, in Token of its Dependance, was paid to the Romans, in all other Things it was intirely free, as also all the other Civitates Fœderatæ were, and they look'd upon themselves as out of the Roman Empire; insomuch, that we have seen, the Roman Exiles could fulfil the Sentence of Banishment in them³.

BUT what Tribute Naples was subject to, as well as Tarentum, Locri, and Reggium, likewise confederated Cities, two grave Authors have demonstrated, to wit, Polybius and Livy. Their Duty it was to furnish Ships in Time of War: These being Maritime Cities abounded in Shipping, and the Neapolitans apply'd themselves to Sea Affairs more than any Business, as Peter La-sena observes⁴; whence they were bound to that in which they could be serviceable; so that to the first Naval War, which the Romans had with the Carthaginians, the Neapolitans, the Locrians, and the Tarentins, sent fifty Ships. And *Livy*⁵ introducing Minio answering the Romans, who were dissuading him from the War, which, in the Name of Antiochus, he intended to make upon some Greek Cities, which were at their Devotion, makes him speak after this manner: Spetioso titulo, uti vas Romanæ Græcarum Civitatum liberandarum, video; sed facta vestra orationi non conveniunt & aliud Antiocho juris statuistis, alio ipsi utimini. Qui enim magis Smyrnæi, Lampface-nique Græci sunt, quam Neapolitani, & Rhegini, & Tarentini, a quibus Stipendium, a quibus Naves ex fœdere exigitis?

THE Capuans, as the most accurate Pellegrinus thinks⁶, when their City was confederated with Rome, were not oblig'd to furnish Ships, but Land Forces: because that they commanded a most fertile Country, their Supplies were to be Horse and Foot; and it is well known, that the Capuans were very numerous in the Roman Land Armies. But as the Infidelity of the Capuans to the Romans, brought the Ruin of their City, being reduc'd to a Præfectura, they were without Senate, without People, without Magistrates, and in a most pitiful Condition and Servitude⁷; so, on the contrary, Naples continuing stedfast, with great Constancy, in the same Friendship with the Romans, both in their prosperous and adverse Fortune, and particularly during the Time of the second Carthaginian War, when the frequent Victories which Hannibal obtain'd over them, had fill'd all Italy, and Rome it self, with Terror and Confusion, Naples, I say, remain'd constant and faithful. This City was most agreeable to the Romans on Account of the pleasant Manners and Exercises of its Grecians, and its delightful Climate; so that the Romans, of all Degrees and Ages, as well the robust, as those worn out with Fatigue and Years, used to come here to solace themselves ; for which Reason, the Neapolitans were exempted from a Garrison : on the contrary, the Capuans, by their Unfaithfulness, had always a Garrison of Roman Soldiers in their City, tho' the Fear of War with their Neighbours the Samnites was over, which their Inconstancy was the Occasion of. But there was no Garrison sent to Naples, not even in the dangerous Time of the aforesaid Carthaginian War, but at the Desire of the Neapolitans themselves.

So likewise by their steady Faith, they deserved so well, that none of the other Conditions of the Confederacy were diminish'd, by which it was allow'd to the Roman Exiles to live in Naples without any Fear ; whither the treacherous Q. Pleminius was going for that end, when, on his Way, he was made Prisoner by Q. Metellus ². 'Tis not a small Argument, that such a Franchise was never violated, that even Tiberius Nero shelter'd himself in Naples ⁴; when by the long Civil Wars, and the Factions in the Roman Empire, neither the publick Laws, nor any other thing was safe. Thus was the Fidelity of the Neapolitans rewarded by the Romans; and so long as the ancient Manners and Customs were preserv'd in this City, of all the other Cities of this Country, it almost alone underwent no Changes, having had only Rhegium, Tarentum, and Locri, for Fellows ⁵.

N A P L E S was not altogether a Free Republick, and independent of the Romans.

BUT all these Prerogatives were free Gifts of the Romans as Rewards of Fidelity, and for the pleasant Life they used to lead in this City ⁶; not that Naples was altogether free from Servitude, and an independent Republick, even in despite, and against the Power of the Romans, as some out of too much Love to their native Country have ventur'd to say. Can any Man be persuaded, that the victorious and triumphant Romans, most greedy of Empire, after having conquer'd, not only all Italy, but almost all the then known World, having subdu'd most powerful Kings, and most warlike Nations, after long Voyages both by Land and Sea, and most difficult Enterprizes, during the Course of many Ages, should not have Force enough to conquer one single City which was just in their view? It shews that they knew very little either of the Roman History or Courage. Is it a new Thing to the Romans, to have given to many People and Cities, after divers Manners, their Liberty, and particularly to the Grecian, after having subdued them, and, sometimes, after having been depriv'd of it for some Fault? The Books of Appianus Alexandrinus ⁷, Livy, Suetonius, Strabo, Tacitus, Dio, Velleius, the two Plinies, Diodorus Siculus, Justin, Plutarch, and abundance of others, are full of Examples; and, not to collect all that so many grave Authors have said upon a Point that never was in question, we may learn from what Strabo alone hath collected concerning the Roman Monarchy, as it were in an Epilogue at the End of his Books of Geography ⁸, that is to say, That amongst the various Conditions of Kings and Provinces which have been under that Empire, there were still some Cities free, or had remain'd so, for having continued in their ancient Confederacy, or having been made Free as a Reward of their Fidelity. His Words in Latin are these: Eorum, quæ Romanis obediunt, partem Reges tenent, aliam ipsi habent, provincie nomine & Præfectos, & Quæstores in eam mittunt. Sunt & nonnullæ Civitates liberæ conditionis: aliæ ab initio per amicitiam Romanis ad- junctæ, aliæ ab ipsis honoris gratia libertate donatæ. Sunt & principes quidam sub eis, & Reguli, & Sacerdotes: his permissum est patria seclari instituta.

THEREFORE these Prerogatives were their free Gifts, and as Publius Sulpitius the Roman says, who answers Minio upon the Fact above related; Quæ ex fœdere debent exigimus ¹? which shews, that the Tribute of Ships was due to the Romans as a certain sort of Servitude; so far were they from being oblig'd on their part to assist the Neapolitans, as some have dream'd, that they mutually contributed Ships. Cicero ² gives us an Example very much to the purpose, of Messina, likewise a confederated City, that was oblig'd to furnish one Ship, declaiming against Verres for having, by a Gift, freed it from that Tribute in the Time of his being Prætor in Sicily, by which he had lessen'd the Majesty of the Republick, and the Right of the Empire: Pretio, atque mercede minuiſti Majeſtatem Reipublicæ; minuiſti auxilia. P. R. minuiſti copias, majorum virtute, ac ſapientia comparatas. Suſtulſti juſ imperii, conditionem ſociorum, memoriam fœderis; adding afterwards, Inerat neſcio quomodo in illo fœdere ſocietatis, quaſi quædam nota ſervitutis. Besides, the Romans also often assumed a certain Power over the Neapolitans, to make up the Quarrels they had with their Neighbours, whence we read in Valerius Maximus ³, That the Senate sent Q. Fabius Labeo, as Arbiter, to settle the Limits between the People of Nola and the Neapolitans, which were disputed. In short, whatever these Cities preserv'd of their Franchises and Liberty, all was owing to the Moderation and Generosity of the Romans; and, oftentimes, many Cities that abused these Favours were depriv'd of them: On the contrary, those who made a right Use of them had greater Prerogatives and Honours bestow'd upon them. The Marseillians were also exempted from Tribute, and Strabo ⁴, besides the Example of Marseilles, adds that of Neumaufum. Cicero ⁵ says, That by a Decree of the Senate it was granted, that some other Cities, besides Marseilles and Neumaufum, should be free from the Roman Jurisdiction, and exempted from all Power of any of their Magistrates.

SUCH being the Manner and Generosity of the Romans, we may, on good Grounds, believe that most diligent Searcher of our Antiquities Camillus Pellegrinus ⁶, that the Romans, in Process of Time, not only discharged the Neapolitans from the Obligation they were under to furnish Ships, but also from obeying any of their Magistrates, as well because of their constant Fidelity, as in Consideration of the pleasant Life they used to lead in Naples; whence, he says, it is not to be wonder'd at, that this City, which was so dear to them, should be freed from the Tribute of Ships, when the World enjoy'd an universal Peace in the Reign of Augustus, and exempted from all Power of their Magistrates. Cæsar for some time hated the Neapolitans, as Cicero writes; perhaps it was, because when Pompey fell grievously sick in Naples, which happen'd in the Beginning of their Emulation, the Neapolitans offer'd many Sacrifices for the Recovery of his Health, and by their Example the rest of the Cities of Italy, both great and small, kept many Holidays ⁷. But on the contrary, Augustus lov'd them dearly; and 'tis a manifest Argument of his having given them some signal Privilege, that they, in Honour of him, dedicated and celebrated a noble Game of Wrestling, at which he desir'd to be present ⁸. His Livia, whom he convey'd thither in their greatest Danger, found shelter there, from her first Husband Tiberius ⁹: As also his darling Virgil, whom the Neapolitans strove so much to please ¹⁰; so that all these Things were pleasing Allurements to gain his Affection: whence it is attributed to Augustus, that he added to the Prerogatives of this City, and freed it from the Tribute of Ships, and the Power of any Roman Magistrate: Upon which Account ¹¹, some, upon the false Belief that Naples was become altogether Christian, from St. Peter the Apostle's first preaching there, when coming from Antioch to Rome, he ordain'd the first Bishop Asprenus, have stily maintain'd, that there were no Christian Martyrs in Naples, as not being subject to any Gentile Prince, therefore such Butchery wou'd not have been suffer'd: But how false that is, hath been shewn by *Peter La Sena*¹, and at length demonstrated by *P. Caracciolus*², and shall be examin'd by us when we come to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity of these Countries.

THESE noble Prerogatives, and agreeable Conditions, continu'd in Naples for a long time under the Successors of Augustus. But as soon as the Neapolitans, by degrees, began to disuse their native Customs, and Grecian Manners, and to make Use of those of the Romans, and at last to imitate them in all their Proceedings; their City put on a new Countenance, and a new Form of Republick appeared. *Fulvius*³ Ursinus believ'd, that Naples was reduc'd to a Colony, with the other Cities of Italy, by Augustus; but by what hath been already said, and what P. Caracciolus hath written⁴ against the Opinion of that Author, it is evident, that it was not by Augustus, but afterwards by Titus or Vespasianus, that Naples was reduc'd to a Colony. However that may be, it was not by being made a Colony, that it lost that Liberty and Polity as to its Magistrates, that it had at first, not being, as Capua was, from a confederated City converted into a Præfectura. As a Latin Colony it kept the same Institution of making Magistrates out of its own Body⁵, and had no Præfecti sent from Rome to govern it: It had yet its Senate, and its People; had Censors, Ediles, and other Magistrates as Rome had; was allow'd to make Use of the Title of Senate, of People, and Republick; and we read upon many Marbles, S. P. Q. N. and amongst the rest, those transcrib'd by *Gruterus*⁶, which the Neapolitans inscribed to a certain Galba Bebius, Censor of the Republick:

S. P. Q. NEAPOLITANUS
D. D. L. ABRUNTIO. L. F.
GAL. BAEB. CENSORI REIPU. NEAP.

And this other,

L. BÆBIO. L. F. GAL.
COMINIO PATRONO COLONIAE.

Which Title of Senatus they changed afterwards into Ordo, whence we read on many Marbles O. P. Q. N. changing regularly these Titles, as may be observed, indifferently on other Marbles of other Colonies.

NEITHER was it called a Colony, because then there would have been new Inhabitants sent to it from Rome, or some other Places; but the Old continued, and the Laws of Latium were in use, as in all other Latin Colonies, which were adorn'd with the Franchises of Rome, and many other Prerogatives, for which Reasons, to distinguish it from other Colonies, it kept its paternal and municipal Laws, without in the least being dependent upon, or govern'd by the Roman Laws alone; which municipal Laws, and many Grecian Rites, it never lost: the Vestiges of some of them it retains to this Day.

'TIS a great Error in those who think that Naples was altogether free, and independent upon the Roman Empire, only because they find the Title of the Neapolitan Republick in more than one antient Inscription, and in more than one ancient Author; not having observ'd, that in the Time of Adrian, much more in that of Constantine the Great, and other Emperors his Successors, it was a City, like many others, under the Government of the Consuls of Campania, as we shall presently demonstrate.

And much greater was the Error of those, who believ'd that down to the Time of Roger, the first Norman King, Naples was in no manner subject to the Roman Emperors, nor after them to the Gothish Kings of Italy, and much less to the Eastern Emperors, so that Alexander Abbot of Telefinum ¹, in his Norman History speaking of Naples conquer'd by Roger, being possess'd with this Error, could not forbear saying, that this City, which vix unquam a quoquam subdita fuit, nunc vero Rogerio, solo verbo præmissa, submittitur; forasmuch as it was not because Naples was originally a Grecian City, that it was so kindly us'd by the Romans as to have the Honour of being a confederated one; neither because after it became a Latin Colony, and preserv'd the same ancient Appearance of a Republick, in having Power of chusing its Magistrates out of its own Body, and retaining its own Laws, and not being oppress'd with severe Usage, as other Præfecturæ were; it could not be said to be exempted from the Roman Empire, and much less from that of the Goths and Emperors of Greece; seeing it was certainly subjected to them, not only by Force of Arms, but by ancient Subjection, it came, with the rest of Italy, under their Power, and obey'd them, as we shall make appear in the Prosecution of this History; and if some Writers give it the Title of Republick, it was because it kept up that Form of Government, which was neither forbidden by the Romans nor Goths.

NEITHER ought these Authorsto harp upon that word Republica so much; since, in the Latin Language, it signifies the Community, not the Dignity of publick Things; and often it is us'd to denote some Form of Administration or publick Government; even in the Præfecturæ also, which were deprived of all publick Council: Erat, as Festus says ², quædam earum Resp. neque tamen Magistratus suos habebant; at that rate, Capua, Teanum, and Atella, were Republicks in the Time of Seneca ³: The same might be also said of Nola, Minturnum, Segna, and many other Colonies, that were call'd Republicks, and which inscrib'd likewise upon their Marbles these Letters, S. P. Q. each of them a Cubit in length; and in latter Times, there are, in good Authors, a thousand such Instances, of which the Theodosian Code gives us a Multitude ⁴.

MUCH less ought they to fall into that Error, by taking their Argument from the Dominion which Naples had over the Island of Caprea, and afterwards over that of Ischia, which it chang'd for the other to please Tiberius ⁵; since as the most accurate Pellegrinus answereth them ⁶, without their going far, they might have observ'd, that Capua likewise, while it was a Colony, possess'd the Country of Gnosia in the Island of Crete: and if that Argument, of Naples having had the Dominion of that Island, was sufficient to make it a free Republick, it ought not to be doubted, but that it continued to have the same Prerogative many Ages after, under the Goths, the Emperors of the East, and other Princes; since it still kept the Dominion over its neighbouring Islands, even to the Days of Gregory the Great ⁷; and later also, in the Time of the Pontificate of Benedict VIII. and likewise in Times less remote from us, in which it would be Folly to believe, that Naples was a free Republick, and independent of any Government whatsoever.

Of other famous Cities in these Countries.

THIS, in short, is the Aspect and Polity which the Regiones that compose the Kingdom of Naples, had, in the Ages we are treating of. It was not then divided into Provinces, as afterwards, but Regiones; each of which had Cities, which were govern'd according to their Conditions, either as municipal Colonies, Prefectures, or confederated Cities. They generally had the Roman Laws, which, for their Excellency, were, in the Esteem of all Nations, most Just, most Wise, and most Useful to human Society; only we must observe, that the municipal and confederated Cities, could use their own and the municipal Laws; but when these fail'd, they had recourse to the Roman, as the Fountain of all divine and human Laws. The Government was according to the Condition of each City ; many were govern'd by Prefects sent from Rome ; many more by Magistrates, who were allow'd to be chosen out of their own Body ; and almost all of them studied to imitate the Government of Rome their Head, of which they were small Resemblances and Images.

IT was not, as now, that all the Beauty, Magnificence, and Riches, were to be found only in one City, as the Head and Chief of the rest : Every Country had many Cities magnificent and famous in themselves. Capua once exalted it self above all the rest ; so very renown'd and famous, that Lucius Florus ¹ declareth, that it vied with Rome and Carthage, the most famous and wonderful Cities in the World : A City so full of Inhabitants, and of such Traffick, that it was reckon'd the Mart of all Italy ; and was always equall'd with Ephesus by our Lawyers ², and almost all the Examples they quote, either in Matters of Contract, or Remittances of Payments, from the most remote Places, or of Traffick amongst the most famous Merchants, are all taken either from Capua or Ephesus.

THERE was in Puglia, Luceria, so famous and so much extoll'd by Livy and Horace : Sipontum, which, for Antiquity, yielded to none other in the World : Venosa, so renown'd and remarkable for the Birth of Horace : Beneventum, the most famous of all the Roman Colonies : Bari, and other illustrious Cities.

The Salentini had Lupia, Otranto, and the beautiful and pleasant Brundisium, famous for its Harbour ; and, by our Lawyers, celebrated for the many Voyages undertaken from thence to the East ³.

THE Brutii had Tarentum, Croton, Rhegium, Locri, Turio, Squillace, all famous Cities ; Cities fertile in producing so many bright and excellent Mathematicians and Philosophers ; from whence arose that most noble Sect called the Italic, and which had for its Head Pythagoras, who liv'd there very long, and had sometimes in Croton, six hundred Scholars.

THE Lucani had Pesto and Bassento. The Picentini, Salernum and Nocera. The Samnites, Isernia, Venafrum, Tetese, and Samnium, so very famous, that it gave the Name to the Country ; not to pass over Sulmo remarkable for the Birth of Ovid : Nola, Surrentum, Pozzuolo, and these other pleasant and ancient Cities, Cuma, Baia, Misenum, Linternum, Vulturnum, Heraclea, Pompei, and many others, of which there are scarce any Vestiges.

Of FAMOUS WRITERS.

WHO can number so many famous and noble Wits, as have had their Births in these illustrious Cities ; the Philosophers, Mathematicians, Orators, and above all, the so renown'd and famous Poets ? What we have now a-days of the Ancients, who were most singular and exquisite in Philosophy, Mathematicks, Rhetorick, and especially Poetry, we owe all to the Wits, who were either the Product of this Soil, or being born elsewhere, liv'd and cultivated their Studies here.

AMONG so many, I may reckon, for his Knowledge in the Laws, the incomparable Papinianus : As some have made him to be born in Beneventum, I would willingly do the same ; but the Necessity of telling Truth, and not deceiving any body, obliges me to do otherwise : Since the native Country of such an able Man is so uncertain, that only vain Conjectures, and too much Love of their own Country, could excite those who have wrote, to say, that he was of Beneventum. Their Ignorance was greater and not to be pardon'd, when they had their recourse to the Pandectæ, and that Law of Papinianus ⁴, which we have under the Title Ad S. C. Treb. forasmuch as they ascribe to this Civilian the Words of a certain Testament made by one born in Beneventum, in which he left a Legacy Coloniæ Beneventanorum Patriæ meæ; and believing that Papinianus spoke of himself, wrote, that Beneventum was his native Country. I have taken notice of this Blunder, because a grave Author among us is a Stickler for it, and that is *Marinus Freccia*¹; 'tis now to be found in many Books of our Professors, and even in a modern Author of *Samnium*², to whom, as Writers not so ignorant in these Matters, as some others, perhaps he has been easily induc'd to give Credit.

Of the STATE of ITALY, and of these our Provinces under Adrian, to the Time of Constantine the Great.

HIS Form and State of the Regiones of Italy, and the Provinces of the Empire, continued to the Time of Adrian. As this Prince gave a new Turn to the Roman Laws, so likewise he divided Italy after another manner; not into Regiones, but Provinces³; of eleven Regiones, of which it consisted at first, he made seventeen Provinces. The Islands of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corfica, which Augustus divided from Italy, and number'd amongst the Provinces of the Empire, were by Adrian added to the Provinces of Italy: He enlarg'd the Bounds of Campania, to which, although Augustus had added some Part of Samnium, the two Latia, Campania, and the Picentini, Adrian afterwards join'd the Hirpini, so that Beneventum was near being call'd a City of *Campania*⁴.

HE alter'd likewise the Civil Government and Magistrates, by instituting four *Consulares*⁵, to whom the Government of the greatest Provinces of Italy was committed; the rest were given to Correctores, and others to Præsides, which were Names of Magistrates of different Dignities.

UNDER the Consulares there were eight Provinces, which were, I. Venice and Istria. II. Æmia. III. Genua. IV. Flaminia and Picenum. V. Tuscany and Umbria. VI. Picenum Suburbicarium. VII. Campania. VIII. Sicilia.

UNDER the Correctores were two Provinces, I. Puglia and Calabria. II. Lucania and the Brutii.

UNDER the Præsides were seven, I. The Alpes Cottia. II. Rhetia Prima. III. Rhetia Secunda. IV. Samnium. V. Valeria. VI. Sardinia. VII. Corfica.

TO the Provinces out of Italy he gave another Form and Disposition. He divided Spain into six Provinces, some of which were Presidial, others Consular. He divided Gallia and Britain into eighteen Provinces: Illyricum into seventeen: Thracia into six: Africa likewise into six: And after the same Manner did he divide Asia, and the other Provinces, of which there's no need of making a longer Catalogue.

IN the mean time, these Regiones, which make up the Kingdom of Naples, took a new Form of Government. Now the Name of Province began to be known in Italy; and according to this new Scheme of Adrian's, that which is now a Kingdom was divided into four Provinces, I. A Part of Campania. II. Puglia and Calabria. III. Lucania and the Brutii. IV. Samnium.

THE Government appear'd new and more absolute, taking from the Cities these Prerogatives, which either the Condition of Municipia, Coloniae, or Fœderatae, was in use to have: Naples lost much of its ancient Liberty; as also the other confederated Cities and Colonies. The Authority and Jurisdiction of the Consulares, Correctores, and Præsides was great, and became yet greater, when Constantine the Great translated the Imperial Seat to the East, and left intirely to them the Government of these our Provinces, which was giving the finishing Stroke to the Ruin of Italy, by bringing in that new Form and Polity, which shall be treated of more at length in the second Book of this History.

CHAP. VI.

Of the LAWS.

It was not sufficient to have so well divided the Provinces and Regiones, if good Laws and Institutions had not been provided at the same Time; in which the Romans discover'd no less Knowledge than Prudence: For if we will but consider the Origin of their Laws, with how much Maturity and Wisdom they were establish'd, and with how much Prudence expounded afterwards, and to the Multitude and Variety of Affairs adapted; their Durableness will not appear strange nor wonderful.

ALTHOUGH the Romans were govern'd more than the Space of two Ages by the Laws of their own Kings¹; nevertheless, these being driven away, their Laws were likewise cancell'd², some few only being preserv'd, to wit, the Tullian, the Valerian, and the *Sacratæ Leges*³; for the rest, they were govern'd by their ancient Customs, and unwritten Laws, which being various and uncertain, were the Occasion of grievous Contests and Disorders: For which Cause they considering, that these were not sufficient for establishing a perfect and well order'd Republick; and that Travelling, and the Knowledge of the Laws and Institutions of different Countries, were very helpful for the better establishing of it, as Aristotle says⁴, they order'd, That the Laws and Customs not of one City only, but of many, should be known and examin'd, to the End, that those which should be found proper, and worthy, might be receiv'd and incorporated among their own: And likewise considering, that the best Laws were those which proceeded from true and solid Philosophy, and that, amongst all Nations, the Greeks appear'd to be superior in Wisdom to all others, they sent for that End to Athens, and other Cities of Greece, even to the Greek Cities that were in Italy, and also to that Part which of old was call'd Magna Græcia, where the Pythagoreans flourish'd, and those two famous Lawgivers Seleucus and Caronda, who gave the Laws of these to the Locrians, and they gave them to the *Turians*⁵. They sent to Lacedæmonia, and to Hetruria; by which they discover'd, by a new and rare Example, that Philosophy, which the Greeks confin'd to their Porches and Academies, could be made useful likewise to the Civil Society of all the Citizens; and that the Principles and Axioms of it, being manag'd, not by meer Philosophers, but Civilians, could be adapted to human Commerce in such a manner, that Mankind might reap both Profit and Justice from it, as the Spring of all Tranquillity and worldly Contentment. Thus from the Laws and Institutions of so many bright and famous Cities, and from those which Rome it self had, as is at large reported to us by Riterfufius ¹, the Roman Civil Law, and those famous and celebrated Laws of the twelve Tables, were compil'd by the Decemviri, which were the first and lasting Foundations of the Roman Jurisprudence, and the Spring, as Livy says ², of all publick and private Laws; of which Cicero speaks thus ³, Fremant omnes licet, dicam quod sentio, Bibliothecas, Mehercule omnium Philosophorum unus mihi videtur duodecim tabularum libellus, si quis legum fontes, & capita viderit, & authoritatis pondere, & utilitatis ubertate superare.

NEITHER was their Wisdom less in establishing the other Laws, which were publish'd by the People of Rome; since that after they drove away their Kings, the Majesty of the Empire remaining in the People, it was in their Power to make the Laws ⁴. Neither was it less in the Plebiscita, to which, by the Law of Hortensius, a Power and Authority, not inferior to the Laws themselves, was given ⁵. Nor in the Senatus Consulta, which had no less Authority ⁶: And, lastly, in the Decrees of the Magistrates, which from being annual, were by the Cornelian Law, made perpetual, and, under the Emperor Adrian, by the Labour of Julianus, put in order, and by them call'd Edita Perpetua ⁷; whence sprung that beautiful Part of the Jurisprudence ⁸, which was afterwards so much illustrated by the Roman Civilians, and became, as it were, the North Star and Foundation of that which we find in the Books of Justinian ⁹.

Of Lawyers and their Books.

UT that which gave greatest Authority and Stability to the Roman Laws, was, the Study of the Jurisprudence being always had in great Esteem, and honoured by the most excellent Men of that Republick: They knew very well, what was requisite for the Occasions of the Citizens, was not their having provided them only with the bare Laws, if there were not likewise those who understood, and could explain the Force and Energy of them; and in the Multiplicity of Cases, and Variety of Business, might be assistant to the People: Therefore they were willing that the most knowing, and the brightest Men of the City might be appointed for so noble an Exercise, such as the Claudii, the Sempronii, the Scipiones, the Mutii, the Catones, the Bruti, the Craffi, the Lucilii, the the Galli, the Sulpitii ¹, and others of the like Fame; by which it is manifest, that they had nothing more at heart, than the Study of the Jurisprudence, and Skill in the Civil Law, which was of great Advantage to the Publick, either by interpreting, disputing, teaching, or writing. What other Nation can we mention, that could contend with the Romans in this Point? Surely not the Hebrews, whose legal Discipline being very mean and vulgar, was never much esteem'd ²: Not the Greeks themselves, (to pass over the rest) with whom, the Office of Lawyers was confin'd to mean and low Cases, and was solely taken up with Actions, Forms, and Evasions; so that the Professors, as being of the Dregs of the People, were not honour'd with the venerable Title of Lawyers, but with that of plain Attornies; so that Cicero us'd to say ³, That all the Laws and Customs of other Nations, being compar'd with those of the Romans, appear'd ridiculous and trifling. With the Romans, none were the Protectors or Guardians of the Laws, but the most excellent Men, indu'd with all Learning and exquisite Knowledge, grave, uncorrupted, severe, and venerable, in whom was lodg'd the Defence of the Citizens: they had their recourse to them for their Advice, as well in publick as private Concerns: To them, either while they were walking in the Market-place, or at home in their Houses, did they apply, not only in Cases concerning the Civil Law, but in all other Matters; if a Father was to marry his Daughter, he took their Advice; or if any Man was to buy a Farm, to plough his Field, and, in short, there was nothing determin'd, neither publick, nor private, nor domestick, which did not depend upon their Advice; so much, that the same Cicero was wont to say ⁴, That the House of a Lawyer was the Oracle of the City. They had yet three other principal Functions; to advise Parties, which was the only Function of the old Practitioners; to consult with the Judges in Points of Right in Processes, which were to be judged; and lastly, to be Assessors to the Magistrates, to instruct them, and sometimes to judge in Processes, either with or without them ⁵. They had yet another Authority, that is to say, That when there arose any difficult Question in Rome, they join'd all together in order to debate and concert it, and that Conference was called Disputatio Fori, of which Cicero makes mention in his first Book, ad Q. P. and in the Topici; and what they resolv'd in such Assemblies, was call'd Decretum, or Recepta Sententia, which was a kind of unwritten Law, as it is very methodically treated of by Revardus ⁶.

But if the Jurisprudence was had in such honourable Esteem in the Time of the free Republick, it was no less under the Emperors, down to the Time of Constantine the Great. Afterwards, in the Time of the Decay of the Commonwealth, there not being so many able Lawyers, by the Vice of the Age, by degrees it came to pass, that every one trusting solely to his own Studies, interpreted publickly the Laws after his own Fancy, and according to his own Talent advis'd, and gave Answers; so that by the Multitude of Professors, or by their Ignorance and Sordidness, a Thing of so great Value, and of such Importance, came to be despis'd; or else, as Pomponius ⁷ says, (or whoever may be the Author of that Book) that the Laws might have the greater Authority, it was decreed by Augustus, that no Person whatsoever should presume to take upon himself that Power, as had been done in Times past; but that, by his Authority alone, and by his Permission, the Laws were to be expounded, and Consultations given, which they were to acknowledge as a Favour from him, or as a Reward of their eminent Virtues, or singular Knowledge and Skill in the Civil Laws: whence he ordain'd the taking of Licences from him; from whence it came, that the Civilians were reputed Officers of the Empire; at which Adrian was offended, not without Reason, saying, That it was not the Emperor's Business to give a Character of the Capacity that was requisite in a Civilian; whence Pomponius ⁸ judiciously remarks, Hoc non peti, sed præstari solere; so that from that Time forward, the Civilians, by giving their Advice by the Authority of the Emperor, were reckon'd publick Officers and perpetual Magistrates, at least, as Manlius qualifies a Civilian, Perpetuus Populi privato in limine Prætor.

IN those very Times 'tis to be observ'd, that the Roman Jurisprudence, by the Favour of the Princes, was at its Height of Greatness and Honour; since Princes themselves, who now a-days mostly encourage the Study of Mathematicks, had nothing more at heart than the Knowledge of the Laws: None others but Civilians were call'd to Council upon difficult and serious Matters; so we read, that Augustus, a most prudent Prince, when he was about to give that Force and Authority to the Codicilli, which he afterwards gave, our Justinian says ¹, That he conven'd the most wise Men, among the rest Trebatius, on whose Advice he depended much in his most weighty and serious Affairs. So likewise we observe from the Historians of those Times, that Trajan had Neratius Priscus, and Celsus the Father, in great Esteem. Adrian advis'd with Celsus the Son, Salvius Julianus, and other learn'd Civilians ². The Works of Volutius Metianus, of Ulpianus Marcellus, and others, pleas'd Antoninus Pius. Marcus Antoninus the Philosopher, in his Deliberations, and establishing the Laws, always had Cerbidius Scevola, a most grave Civilian for his Collegue, who had the Honour to have for his Scholars many famous Civilians, and among the rest, Paulus, Trifonius, and the great and incomparable Papinianus. Alexander Severus advis'd with Ulpianus, neither did he make one Constitution without the Advice of twenty Civilians ³; and Maximinus the Younger consulted Modestinus. Neither, at last, did these Emperors, in these very Constitutions, rob those great Men of their deserv'd Honour, since their Opinions are mention'd in them with great Encomiums, as Carus, Carinus, and Numerianus did by Papinianus ⁴; and as Dioclesian did, who, by publick Testimony, valu'd the Opinion of Scevola, as other Emperors did those of other Civilians. And truly whoever will but attentively consider, that which is extant of the Works of these Civilians, (since few of those who flourish'd under the free Republick are left us) the greatest part of which Justinian depriv'd us of by that Compilation of his, for which I don't know if we ought to blame or praise him; because the Vicissitude and Revolution of worldly Things are such, that perhaps without it, none of them should have reached us; it will clearly appear, not only how admirable their Knowledge and Learning has been, but likewise persuade us, that nothing escap'd their Exactness, by consulting about every thing that could fall out, either in the Courts of Justice, or other Affairs of the Commonwealth. For that Purpose, the Solicitors and Pleaders provided themselves with the Books of the Quæstiones and of the Responsa, of the Decreta, the Constitutiones, the Epistolæ, and of the Digesta: For those who were assum'd to be Magistrates and Judges, there were many Books ready prepar'd, of the Offices of the different Magistrates, their Authority, and Jurisdiction. Those who were curious to learn the legal Discipline of speculative Matters, had many Opportunities of satisfying themselves: They found Books full of Notes which expounded the Laws of the People of Rome, the Decrees of the Senate, the Edicts of the Magistrates, the Orations, the Constitutions of Princes, and the Responsa of the old Civilians: There were Treatises upon almost every Case that could ever belong to the Jurisprudence: There were not wanting Books upon the various Readings; and, last of all, there were to be found Books, teaching how to reduce Jurisprudence it self to a certain Method and Order, far exceeding that which Cicero left us in writing ⁵, which the Titles of their Volumes demonstrate to us, the Loss of which we, with good Reason, lament at this Time; such were the Enchiridia, the Pandectæ, the Regulæ, the Sententiæ, the Definitiones, the Brevia, and the Books of Institutions; so that tho' the Course of so many Ages, and the dismal Alterations of the World, have robb'd us of a great many other valuable Antiquities, if they had not likewise taken from us the Books of so many eminent Civilians, we should not have had Occasion now for the Works of those who in barbarous Times succeeded them; or rather, there wou'd not have been Occasion to load the Jurisprudence with so many new and insipid Volumes.

Neither was the Dignity and Elegancy of the Style of these Civilians, inferior to their Prudence and Care. It is a Thing truly worthy of Admiration, that their Elegancy of Expression should be in every thing the same, and perfect, altho' they did not flourish at the same Time, but distant by whole Ages, that nothing can be added to it: Or if we consider their Stile and Writings, it cannot be perceiv'd who amongst them deserves the Pre-eminency; and it is yet worthy of Observation, what *Laurentius Valla*¹, and *Gulielmus Budeus*², speaking of the Uniformity of the Words and Sentences of their Books, which are collected in the Pandects, have written, That it is not inferior to what is observable in the Epistles of Cicero, as if these Books had likewise been written by one Person; since commencing from Augustus to the Time of Constantine the Great, under whom flourish'd Hermogenianus, Arcadius, Carisius, Aurelius, and Julius Aquila, (whose Memories we see scatter'd by Justinian in his fifty Books of Digesta) there were three Ages, during which we observe in the Historians, Orators, Poets, and other Writers, a great Difference of Stile, but in these Civilians 'tis always the same, and constant.

IT is not then to be thought strange, if in the Course of Time, (and especially under Valentinian III.) the Authority and Force of the Sentences and Opinions of these Civilians gain'd so much Credit, that Justinian says³, it was finally resolv'd, that the Judges should not depart from their Opinions.

BUT this being a Point of History not rightly understood, hath occasion'd many Mistakes in some; but give me leave to observe, that it ought not to be thought, as some have imagin'd, that this Authority was acquir'd, when Augustus order'd the Licences to be taken of him, as if giving Counsel by the Authority of the Emperor, had given so much Strength and Authority to their Advice, as that the Magistrates were oblig'd to follow it in giving Judgment: This is repugnant to all the History of the Law; since that Authority was given them from the Time of the free Commonwealth, but only in case, as we have said above, when there happen'd any difficult Question in Rome, and that they join'd together to debate and decide it, and what they concluded in such an Assembly was call'd Decretum, or Recepta Sententia, which was a kind of unwritten Law, from which the Judges could not depart in their Decisions, as having been long debated, and receiv'd in the Courts of Judicature, and had acquir'd Strength and Vigour, not inferior to the Laws themselves; which was also practis'd with regard to some of their Decrees receiv'd in Courts in the Times of Augustus, and the other Emperors his Successors. But it is altogether repugnant to Truth, that without this, every one of their Sentences and Opinions were no sooner pronounc'd, but they had so much Authority, as that the Magistrates were oblig'd inviolably to follow them; and much less in the Time of Augustus, when the Dispute amongst the Civilians broke out into open Factions; whence the Sects of the Sabiniani and the Cassiani on one side, and the Proculejani and the Pegasi on the other⁴. These Disputes were never more obstinate than under Augustus, when the Commonwealth began to take the Form of a Principality; since under his Reign, they were maintain'd by Attejus Capito, Disciple of Ofilius, on the one side, and by Antistius Labeo, Disciple of Trebatius, on the other: Under Tiberius, by Masurius Sabinus, who had Nerva the Father for Antagonist: Under Caius, Claudius, and Nero, by Cassius Longinus, from whom the Cassiani had their Name; and by Proculus from whom the Proculejani: Under the Vespasians, by Celius Sabinus, from whom the Sabiniani, and by Nerva the Son, and Pegasus, from whom the Pegasi: And under Trajan, Adrian, and to the Time of Antoninus Pius, on the Side of the Sabiniani and Cassiani, were Priscus, Javolenus, Alburnius, Valens, Tuscianus, and Salvius Julianus; and on that of the Proculejani and the Pegasi, Celsus the Father, Celsus the Son, and Priscus Neratius.

AND although after the Death of Antoninus Pius, the Heat of such sharp Disputes and Contentions was not so obstinate, whence arose the Mediani Civilians⁵, who not bearing the Slavery jurare in verbo Magistrum, took another Course; but for all that, the Controversies, and different Opinions did not cease; so that it behoved, afterwards, to end some of them by the Decision of Princes. Neither can Justinian much commend the Care of his Tribonianus, who made him believe, that by his Collections he had put an end to all these Disputes, and of which that Prince bragg'd; nevertheless, a great many escap'd his Accuracy, and at this time the Vestiges of them are to be seen in the Pandectæ: so that those who were possess'd with such a Prejudice by the Boasts of Justinian, gave themselves up to believe, that there was no clashing Contrariety amongst the Laws which he had collected; altho' when they met with that Contrariety of two Laws, it made them sweat and toil to reconcile them, till at last they had no other Business upon their Hands, but, as the Saying is, Peliam levare; and 'tis Matter of Fact, that very often we see Ulpianus on purpose differ from Africanus, and so one Civilian from another.

AMONGST such a Variety of Opinions, it would be foolish to believe, that it could be impos'd upon Magistrates, of Necessity, to follow them, excepting those, which after long debating, had been receiv'd into the Courts of Justice: and much less in the Time of Augustus, and the other Emperors, down to Constantine the Great, during which time, there were Magistrates adorn'd with many rare and excellent Virtues, and they well knew, by their Learning and Prudence, what Decisions of the Civilians had been receiv'd in the Courts, and consequently what had been rejected, and what use to make of them in their Judgments; besides that, their Experience and great Knowledge, was able to prevent any Confusion from the Variety of Opinions. Their Prudence, Learning, and exact Judgment, was not inferior to that of the Civilians themselves; since the Romans shew'd their Wisdom, not only in establishing and interpreting the Laws, but, as Pomponius saith¹, they knew very well, that the Laws, with the Interpretations of them by the Civilians, would not be answerable Provision for the Necessities of the Citizens, if they did not likewise appoint Judges that were grave, severe, uncorrupted, and most wise, who should be able to do Justice to every body; great was the Care and Diligence they us'd in making good Magistrates: Whence that which Justinian says was determin'd, that the Judges could not depart from the Opinions and Sentences of the Civilians, ought not to be attributed to Augustus, as Cujacius and others have believ'd, from whom, nor any of the other Emperors of these Times, when the Jurisprudence was in its Perfection, can any one Constitution be deriv'd; but we must believe, that Justinian speaks of the latter Times of *Valentinian III.*², when the Jurisprudence was in its Decay; when there were no learn'd and grave Civilians, nor bright Magistrates, but Ignorance of the Laws, Decrees, and Decisions prevail'd, and every thing was in such Confusion and Disorder, that the Judges, by their Insufficiency, knew not how to determine Causes, and were often misled by the false Allegations of the Advocates: For remedying such Mischief, it behoved Valentinian to lay down a Rule to the Judges, and to point out to them what Civilians they were to consult in giving Judgment, and not to swerve from their Opinions. He refuted the Notes made by Paulus and Ulpianus on Papinianus, (but afterwards Justinian was of a different Opinion as to that Matter); moreover, he ordain'd, that in reciting the different Sentiments, the greatest Number of the Authors should carry it; and if the Numbers were equal, they were to adhere to the Side Papinianus was on: And lastly, that if the Opinions were altogether equal, the Discretion and Award of the Judge was to take place. Such a Remedy in the Time of Valentinian III. was necessary, the Discipline of the Law was so decay'd: It was not so in the Time of those bright Civilians to that of Constantine the Great, when, after Modestinus, Hermogenianus, and Arcadius Carisius, those famous Oracles of the Law, there were none to be found; since those who flourish'd under him and his Sons, of obscure Fame, publish'd nothing of Moment: The ancient and grave Institution of Interpretations and Consultations being quite left off, they were contented to teach in the Schools what these first Civilians had treated of and written, of which we shall afterwards discourse.

WE have thought fit so far to treat of these Civilians, and their Works, only because the Body of the Laws, which after Constantine was dispers'd over the East and West, was compos'd, for the most Part, of their Opinions; since of the Laws of the twelve Tables, after the Incurſion of the Goths into Italy, and the Devastation of Rome, when, as *Rittershusius*³ believes, these were lost, there were transmitted to Posterity; only a few Fragments, which Cicero, Livius, Dionysius, and *A. Gellius*¹, have given us of some of their Books; and what we have of them at this Day is owing to the good Fortune of our Times, and those of our Fore-fathers, and to the Industry of some able Men, who collected and interpreted them; amongst the first of which were *Rivallius*², Olendorpius Forsterus, Balduinus, Consius, Hottomanus, Revardus, Crispinus, Rosinus, Pighius, and Fr. Piteus; to whom succeeded, Theodorus Marcilius, Adrianus Turnebus, Justus Lipsius, and Conradus Rittershusius; and last of all, 'tis owing to the great Care and Accuracy of Jacobus Gothofredus, who in his Tables, hath put them in the Order and Disposition as they were compos'd by the Decemviri. As for the other Laws which were afterwards establish'd by the People of Rome, to wit, the Plebiscita, Decrees of the Senate, and the Edicts of the Magistrates, our Fore-fathers had no other Knowledge of them, but what they had from the Works of the above-mention'd ancient Writers, and especially from the Books of these same Civilians; in which likewise the Writers of the latter Times have been very careful, who with unwearied Pains have collected them from various Marbles and Tables, and from the Rubbish of Antiquity, in which none excell'd Barnabas Bissinius, Antonius Augustus, Fulvius Ursinus, Balduinus, Franciscus, Hottomanus, Lipsius, and many other Lovers of Roman Antiquities. The World was full of the Volumes of these Civilians only, by which the Tribunals govern'd themselves, who flourish'd after Augustus in the Times preceding Constantine; so that afterwards, in the Time of Valentinian III. there was a Necessity, because of their Confusion, to make Regulations concerning them; and in the Times following, their Number was so great, that it gave occasion to Justinian to compile his Pandectæ, which, in the following Ages down to our Time, have made one of the two most famous Parts of the Jurisprudence.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Constitutions of the PRINCES.

THE Number of the Books of the Civilians was great, no less afterwards did the Bulk of the Constitutions of the Princes appear to be; so that out of them there were many Compositions and Codes made: Whence all the Body of the Laws is reduc'd to these two principal Parts; to wit, the Books of the Civilians, out of which our Justinian compos'd his Pandectæ, and the Constitutions of the Princes, from which sprung the Composition of more Codes, and the many Collations by the Novellæ, and that besides the Institutiones, which were only compos'd to instruct the Youth who took Pleasure in the Study of the Law. And seeing the relating of these Facts hath detain'd me longer perhaps than a general Relation requir'd, 'tis incumbent on me now, that with the same Care I likewise relate distinctly the Constitutions of the Princes who reign'd before Constantine, while the Roman Jurisprudence was at its Height; by which the Knowledge of what I am to treat of in the Prosecution of this History will be made more clear.

AS soon as the despotick Power was approv'd of by the People of Rome, as being more expedient and wholsome for the Commonwealth (neque enim, says Dio¹, fieri poterat, ut sub populi imperio ea diutius esset incolumis) all that Power which they had of publishing the Laws, was transferr'd to the Prince, nothing material remain'd with them; therefore the Opinion of some, who believ'd that the People of Rome did not strip themselves of their Authority, but communicated it to the Prince, is an Error so well known, and demonstrated by most able Writers, that, besides its being foreign to our Purpose, we should be esteem'd very idle if we undertook to confute it: And it would be thought the Height of Folly to believe, that the People of Rome did not strip themselves, or were not altogether stripp'd of that Power, only because the Roman Emperor did not take the Title of King and Lord. It was a Piece of great Policy, since they knew that these Titles were abhorr'd by the People, that they appear'd likewise to detest them; and besides, that they might not, all of a sudden, introduce into the Commonwealth a Form altogether new, they kept the same Magistrates, and the same Solemnity of the Comitia, and Senate; but in reality, under these specious Appearances, they exercis'd the Kingly Power to the full, as *Appianus Alexandrinus*³, and *Dion*⁴, assure us, who say, Hæc omnia eo fere tempore ita sunt instituta: at re ipsa Cæsar unus in omnibus rebus plenum erat imperium habiturus; adding afterwards, Hoc pacto omne populi, Senatusque imperium ad Augustum rediit. And much less ought we to fall into that Error, because the People had a sort of imaginary and empty Privilege in giving their Suffrages, or that the Senate retain'd a precarious and sham Authority of establishing Laws, since in those Times there were yet remaining, as Tacitus very wisely observes, Vestigia morientis libertatis; whence *Juvenal*⁵, speaking of the People of Rome, said very truly, that they who formerly gave the Empire the Fasces, the Legions, and all, in his Time, coveted nothing but only Panem & Circenses.

HOWEVER 'tis true, that the Emperors being solicitous to keep up the same Appearance of a Commonwealth, did not usurp the Sovereignty all at once, but by little and little, and in the Course of many Years became afterwards real Monarchs; since the Senate of Rome after the Civil Wars, having, either out of Fear or Flattery, conferr'd the Title of Emperor on Julius Cæsar: that Surname, or Title of Honour was afterwards continu'd by Augustus and his Successors, which they found was very well adapted to their Designs, taking it in a double Sense, and jumbling the two Significations of it together, the first of which gave them the pure Command in the highest Degree; such as the Military Command of the General of an Army, and the other render'd their Charge perpetual, and continual in all Places; it was not so with regard to the other Offices of the Roman Commonwealth. And although in the Beginning, these Emperors appear'd to be satisfied with the absolute Military Command, and to be exempted from the Forms to which the ordinary Magistrates were confin'd, by Subjection to the Sovereignty of the Commonwealth, nevertheless they commanded absolutely, and dispos'd of the Commonwealth at their Pleasure, for which Cause Suetonius calls their Command *Speciem Principatus*⁶.

ALTHOUGH the first Emperors usurp'd so great Authority, there were still some Remains of ancient Liberty preserv'd, while the Commonwealth was drooping, after which, by degrees, all Remembrance of it vanish'd; 'tis not to be doubted, but that the succeeding Emperors exercis'd, independently, the Character and absolute Power of true Monarchs, and Sovereign Princes; and those who afterwards settled in the East, a conquer'd Country, carry'd it higher.

SUCH a Power then being lodg'd in the Prince, his Pleasure was a Law; but by a cunning Politick, they called these their Decrees, Edicts or Constitutions, and not Laws, seeming willing to leave to the People the Power of making Laws⁷: These Constitutions of the Princes were not of one sort, but differ'd by the End or Occasion which the Prince had when he made them. Some were call'd Edicts, and then the Prince, of himself, was mov'd to publish some general Order for the Profit and Good of his Subjects, directing them either to the People or Provincials, or, which was more frequent, to the Præfectus Prætorio. Others were call'd Rescripta, which were issu'd by the Emperors at the Desire of the Magistrates, or at the Request of private Men. Some of these were likewise call'd Epistolæ, and that was when the Prince gave Answer to private Men according to their Claim; and those were also call'd Epistolæ, which upon the like Occasion he sometimes directed to the Senate, to the Consuls, Prætors, Tribunes, and to the Præfecti Prætorio. There were also some that were call'd Orationes, directed to the Senate, by which the Emperors confirm'd the Decrees of the Senate, and were often sent also at the Desire of the Senate, or of the Senate and People together. Constitutions were likewise nam'd Decreta, which were pronounc'd upon Acts made in the Prince's Council; which was, when the Prince took Cognizance of the Cause himself, heard the Parties, and pronounc'd Decree. This was a commendable Custom of the Emperors, never enough extoll'd by all the Authors of the Augustan History; many Examples of which we have in the Theodosian Code¹; there's also another very elegant one in the Pandects of *Justinian*². And these Decrees, although given in particular Cases, yet by the Dignity and eminent Station of the Person who pronounc'd them, they had, in like Cases, the Force and Vigour of Laws³.

We read likewise in the *Theodosian*⁴ Code, some Constitutions call'd Pragmaticæ, pronounc'd on Occasion of Demands sent from some Province, City, or College, and the Prince order'd what he thought convenient; which, when he commanded any thing to be done, were call'd Jussiones; when he forbid the doing any thing, they were call'd Sanctiones. In fine, there were others which were call'd Mandata Principis, and were, for the most part, Injunctions, directed to the Governors of Provinces, Tax-Masters, Inspectors, Tribunes, and some other Officers, on Account of some of their Occasions, which for the Good and Quiet of the Province, requir'd special Provision; of which Injunctions there is an entire Title in the Theodosian Code⁵.

All these sorts of Constitutions of which the Justinian and Theodosian Codes are full, were by *Ulpianus*⁶ confin'd to three Sorts, to wit, Edicta, Decreta, and Epistolæ; and also Justinian himself did the same⁷, by restricting them likewise to these three.

IT was a wonderful Thing, that of all these Roman Emperors, who govern'd the Empire down to Constantine, some of them being wicked, cruel, and rather Monsters than of human Kind; such as Nero, Domitian, Commodus, Heliogabalus, Caracalla, and others; their Constitutions nevertheless shone with Wisdom, Justice, and Gravity; all of them wise, prudent, elegant, short, weighty, and quite different from those prolix ones, which by Constantine, and his Successors, were afterwards publish'd, being fitter for Orators than Princes⁸; which was owing to nothing else, but the laudable Custom they had in making use of the Works of the famous Civilians, without whose Advice nothing was done, either in the Government of the Commonwealth, or in any other serious Matters. For which Reason the Justinian Code ought to be more esteem'd by us than the Theodosian; forasmuch as Justinian compil'd likewise the Constitutions of the Emperors before Constantine, which Theodosius did not, who only collected those of the Princes from Constantine the Great, down to his own Time: Wherefore we likewise observe, that some Constitutions, of which the Civilians make mention in the Pandectæ, are to be found in the Justinian Code, but not at all in that of Theodosius.

Of the Papirian, Gregorian, and Hermogenian Codes.

THE Constitutions of those Princes who flourish'd after Augustus, down to Constantine the Great, were, for their Excellency collected into certain Codes. The first Collection, altho' not Universal of all the preceding Princes, seeing they have not been transmitted to us, was that, which Papirius Justus made of the Constitutions of Verus and Antoninus, which famous Civilian, whom Justinianus mentions in his Pandectæ, flourish'd in the Time of Septimius Severus, and compil'd the Constitutions of these two Brothers, dividing them into Twenty Books¹. *Jacobus Labittus*², in his ingenious and most useful Work de indice Legum, makes a Catalogue of all the Laws which Tribonianus collected out of these Twenty Books of Papirius. Neither do we find that there were any other made afterwards, except these two of Gregorius and Hermogenianus the Civilians, who flourish'd under Constantine the Great and his Sons, and from them the two Codes took the Names of Gregorian and Hermogenian. In these two Codes were collected the Constitutions of several Princes, beginning with the Emperor Adrian down to Constantine; since, in the Gregorian Code, there is related a Constitution under the Consulship of Dioclesian in the Year 296, ten Years before the Empire of *Constantine*³. These two Civilians propos'd the same Epocha, and both of them, in their Codes, collected the Constitutions of these Princes promiscuously, who reign'd from Adrian to the Time of Constantine the Great, which is manifest from the Laws contain'd in them; whence *Jacobus Gotifredus*⁴ deservedly blames Cujacius for an Error, in his affirming that Gregorius and Hermogenianus intended different Epochas, and that, in their Codes, they relate the Constitutions of several Princes, not promiscuously, as they really did, but that some were related by Gregorius, and some others by Hermogenianus.

JACOBUS GOTIFREDUS, not without Reason, believ'd, that these Civilians did begin their Collection from Adrian, and not from the preceding Princes, because Adrian was believ'd to be the Author of a certain new Jurisprudentia, by his famous Edictum perpetuum, which he establish'd; the Matter and Order of which serv'd for a Standard and Model of Jurisprudence; and it is the most excellent Body of the Roman Law, which we have at this Day: And which is a manifest Sign of it, Hermogenianus himself, in his epitomiz'd Books, the Remains of which we owe to Justinian, proposes to follow the same Order of the Edictum perpetuum. The Order was very singular and remarkable, into which he put the Administration of Publick and Court Offices, and also the Military Affairs, which Order was constantly observ'd to the Reign of Constantine, who began to change it; and afterwards, in the Time of Theodosius the Younger, it was totally chang'd, and the Jurisprudence had a quite different Aspect, as shall be seen in the Course of this History. Neither doth it appear unlikely, what *Gotifredus*⁶ suspects, that these Codes, in the Time of Constantine and his Sons, who were Christian Emperors, were made use of by these Heathen Civilians, at least to retain some Shew of ancient Jurisprudence ; since that by the new Laws, which by them, and other Christian Emperors were frequently publish'd, a remarkable Change appear'd in it ; and that there were such Heathen Civilians in the Time of Constantine and his Sons, the laudable Gotifredus, upon very strong Conjectures, assures us.

HOWEVER 'tis uncertain, whether it was by publick or private Authority that Gregorius and Hermogenianus compos'd these two Codes : A Place in Egineta, related by Gotifredus, would persuade us to believe, that they were written by private Authority : But be that as it will, 'tis certain that the Authority of these Codes was very great, and they were publickly receiv'd ; so that the Advocates and Writers of these Times, and much later, whenever they had occasion to cite any Constitution, made use of all their Books. St. Augustine ¹ took the Advantage of them, as is plain, in Lib. 2. ad Pollentium, where he cites a Constitution of Antoninus from the Gregorian Code, which had been neglected in the Justinian. The Author of the Comparison between the Mosaick and the Roman Laws likewise made use of them, who, according to Freherus ² and Gotifredus ³, flourish'd in the Sixth Century, sooner therefore than Justinian, and in the same Age with Cassiodorus : By him likewise is cited a Constitution of Dioclesian's from the Gregorian Code, Lib. 5. de Nuptiis ; part of which was inserted by Justinian in his Code ⁴ ; and from the same Gregorian Code there is another reported, marking also the Consulship of Dioclesian in the Year 296. The Author of that ancient Comparison likewise makes use of them, which being preserv'd from the Injury of Time, by the Industry of Cujacius, are to be read among his own Works, in citing the Hermogenian Code, Lib. 2. de Calumniatoribus. And lastly Tribonianus makes use of them, who from these two Codes, and that of Theodosius, compos'd his own by the Order of Justinian. Besides, the Author of the said old Comparison, Papinianus in his Book of Answers, and other Writers of latter Times, as shall be told in its Place, made use of the Compendium of them. Of these two Codes, there are scarcely any Remains left us, but some Fragments, which by the Toil of Tribonianus have reach'd us, and which are owing purely to the Care of Cujacius.

AS for the Compiling of the Theodosian Code, it being made many Years after the Time of Theodosius the Younger, we shall have Occasion to treat of it at large, when we come to speak of the famous Deeds of that Prince.

Of the ACADEMIES.

NOT only in these most flourishing Times, and especially under the Emperor Adrian, by so many famous Civilians, and by the Wisdom of that Prince, by his Edict, and by so many Constitutions of the other most knowing Princes, was the Jurisprudence, and the Study of it, in its greatest Splendor, and at the Height of its Greatness; but the two celebrated Academies of the World, that of Rome in the West call'd the Athenæum, and the Schola of Berytis in the East, were likewise two bright Ornaments of it.

S E C T. I.

Of the ACADEMY of ROME in the West.

BEFORE Adrian, there were no publick Academies in the famous City of Rome. The Masters taught in their private Chambers, which they call'd Pergulæ; there it was the Youth were train'd up¹: and the Civilians themselves, besides their commendable Employments of Interpreting, Writing, Answering, Consulting, and others above-mention'd, used to teach the Civil Law to the Youth in their Houses: And Cicero tells of himself, that he was employ'd in these Studies under the Discipline of Q. Scervola, Son of Publius, altho', as he says, *Nemini ad docendum se dabat*². *Labco*³ divided the Year thus; six Months were employ'd in Rome by the Students, in learning of him the Legal Discipline, and the other six Months he retired to his Country House to compose Books, of which he left four hundred Volumes. Sabinus, as Pomponius relates⁴, not having Means sufficient of his own, was often supply'd by his Scholars; Huic nec amplæ Facultates fuerunt: sed plurimum a suis auditoribus sustentatus est; and so it was practis'd in other Professions, as the Mathematicks, for which we have the Testimony of *Suetonius*⁵, and for Grammar, we have the Author of the illustrious Grammarians.

ADRIAN was the first, who in the eighth Region of the Forum Romanum, founded the Athenæum, where Discipline and Learning were publicly taught; and that Place, which is situated at the Foot of the Aventine Hill, retains the Memory of the Greek Schools to this Day⁶, forasmuch as the Profession of the Latin Eloquence was no less studied there than that of the Grecian, and the Rhetoricians and Latin Poets had their Stations there as well as the Grecian. *Dio*⁷, Lampri-dius, Capitolinus, Gordianus, and *Simmacus*⁸, make honourable mention of this Athenæum.

ALEXANDER SEVERUS enlarg'd it, and put it in a more noble Form. He establish'd Salaries for the Rhetoricians, Physicians, Grammarians, and all the other Professors. He instituted the publick Auditoria, and allotted some Revenues to the Students, whose Parents were Poor, in order to make them ingenious¹. The Romans did not make these Men of Letters an Order by themselves; but they were reckon'd of the third Rank; and they had not so many Persons as we have, who took themselves to Learning as their Profession or special Calling². Next to the few they had of them, were those of the Military Profession, which in a manner were perpetual Employments; so that they were had in more Esteem with them, than with us, and they honour'd them with very great Privileges, as may be seen in the Theodosian Code.

SO that by the Renown of that famous Academy, the Youth from all Parts flock'd to Rome, in great Numbers, to acquire Learning, and especially the Legal Discipline. It was not our Provinces, which now make the Kingdom of Naples, only, which sent their Youth to study in Rome, but likewise those more remote and distant; they came not only from France, but also from Greece and Africa. There are yet some Vestiges remaining in our Pandects, which assure us of the Custom of sending our Youth to study in Rome: We have an Advice of Scevola's, in favour of a young Man, who Studiorum causa Romæ agebat, reported by Ulpianus³, who was likewise speaking of the Provision which was ordinarily given by Fathers to their Sons when they sent them to Rome to study: and this same Civilian⁴ elsewhere makes mention of that Custom of sending the Youth to study in Rome; of which also Modestinus⁵, and others of our Civilians give an Account. And the Grecian Youth came to Rome, particularly to study the Laws; whence it was, that the impudent Lust of Domitian was likewise made notorious, who caused Arca to be imprison'd, a comely Youth, who came from Arcadia to Rome to learn the Jurisprudence, only because, by a rare and memorable Example, he would not consent to his unchaste Desires⁶; for which the Youth, according as Philostratus⁷ has it, all in Tears, blam'd his Father, because he could have been taught the Grecian Learning in Arcadia, but he would send him to Rome to learn the Laws. The Greeks themselves, who are not usually satisfied but with themselves, and their own Things, were even oblig'd to confess, that from the Roman Laws only, was to be learn'd a just and upright Rule of Manners; whence Dio Chrysostomus⁸ haranguing the Corinthians, and endeavouring to persuade them, that he having been long in Rome, with the Emperor Trajan, had always liv'd vertuously, made use of this Argument; That he being in Rome, had been in the Center of the Laws, and those who convers'd in them could not go astray. They came likewise from Africa, as in the latter Times the incomparable Augustine⁹ testifies of Alipius, of whom he says, that Romam processerat, ut jus disceret. From France, and the other Western Provinces in Times less remote from us, the Concourse of Youth was frequent in Rome for studying the Laws. Of Germanus Bishop of Auxerre, Henry of Auxerre in his Verses¹⁰ witnesseth. And Constantius in his Life says¹¹, Post auditoria Gallicana, intra Urbem Romam juris Scientiam plenitudini perfectionis adiecit. Rutilius Numatianus¹², speaking of Palladius a noble French Youth, says, that he had been sent to Rome to learn the Laws;

*Facundis juvenis, Gallorum nuper abarvis

AND Sidonius¹³ Apollinaris persuaded Eutropius, to go to Rome to learn the Law, for which Cause he call'd it Domicilium Legum: Whence not only from the Writers of those Times, but also from the succeeding, did Rome deserve these Encomiums, not only for Jurisprudence, but likewise for Eloquence, and all other Discipline. Thus we read in Claudian, that Rome was call'd *Armorum, Legumque Parentem, quæ prima dedit cunabula juris*¹; and elsewhere, Legum Genetricem: and by Simmachus, *Latioris facundiæ domicilium*²; and Ennodius, Hieron, Cassiodorus, and many other Writers gave her such like Epithets.

SO great was the Care and Study of the Emperors, to be watchful over the Decorum and Re-establishment of that Academy, that in the Time of Valentinian the Elder, Rome being now decay'd in its ancient Splendor, and the Youth being given to all sorts of Luxury and Vice, insomuch that the Academy was much fallen from its Institution, and many Abuses having crept into it, that Prince, who had the Care of the Exercises of Rome much at heart, thought of redressing these Disorders: He publish'd there for that end, that famous Constitution, which in the Year 370. he directed to Olibrius, Præfect of that City, part of which may be yet read in the Theodosian Code.³, where he establish'd eleven Academical Laws for redressing so many Abuses, of which in a more proper Place I shall speak: So that being restor'd by these Laws, it might, for a long time after, maintain its Splendor, and draw to it self, as before, the Youth from all Parts of the West for attaining Learning, and especially the Jurisprudence. So in the Time of Theodorick the Ostrogoth, we see the Custom of sending the Youth to Rome for Instruction continu'd; but he would not allow them to return home, until they had compleated their Studies in that City. In effect, he deny'd such a License to Philagrius, altho' he deserved well at his Hands, who having sent some Nephews to Rome to study, and being about to recal them, he order'd Festus to hinder them from departing, extolling mightily the Residence in Rome for Youth; *Nulli sit ingrata Roma, quæ dici non potest aliena: illa eloquentiæ fecunda mater: illa virtutum omnium Latissimum Templum*⁴. He deny'd it likewise to Valerianus, who had sent his Sons to study at Rome; he wrote to Simmachus not to let them go⁵. The same Injunction was continu'd by Athalarick his Nephew, who, imitating Valentinian, took special Care of it; and we read yet in Cassiodorus.⁶, a Letter he wrote for that purpose to the Senate of Rome, in which he enjoyn'd the Studies, and re-establish'd the usual Salaries, for those who taught in that Academy; in which, besides the Grammarians, Orators, and other Professors, there were Expositors of the Laws; by which new Restoration, Rome might afterwards, and also in the most barbarous Times, deserve those Honours and Encomiums, which most of the Writers of that low Age gave it, which are collected by Savaro on *Sidonius Apollinaris*⁷.

Of the ACADEMY of BERYTIS in the East.

BERYTIS, a City in Phœnicia in the East, was so deserving at the Hands of Theodosius the Younger, that he adorn'd it with the Title of Metropolis of Phœnicia, as he did Tyre: A City no less famous for the Study of the Laws in the East, than Rome in the West; and as the Civil Law was taught at Rome in Latin, so it was at Berytis in Greek. On account of the famous Academy establish'd here, it was call'd the City of Laws, because it replenish'd the World with them. By whom this Academy was instituted is not certainly known: 'Tis beyond all Dispute, that it flourish'd a long Time before the Reign of Dioclesian the Emperor, as is manifest from a Decree of that Emperor, which we see in the *Justinian Code*¹, directed to Severinus, and other Scholars in Arabia; who, for learning the legal Discipline, stay'd in Berytis:

A. L. E. the Youth of the Provinces in the East flock'd to this City, as to the Mansion-house of the Laws. A most clear Testimony of which, is that which Gregorius Thaumaturgus; Bishop of Neocesarea; gives us in the Panegyricall Oration on *Origen*¹, where he tells; that he had learn'd the Roman Jurisprudence in the Academy of Berytis, famous for the Study of all Professions; but particularly for that of the Law. Neither was the Fame of this Academy less under Constantinus and Constantis about the Year of Christ 330. The ancient Geographer² (which Author we owe to the Diligence of the learned Civilian G. Gotifredus) who flourish'd at the same time; speaking of the City of Berytis, and of the Academy of the Laws; says thus; according to the ancient Latin Translation; Berytus Civitas valde delitiosa, & Auditoria legum habens, per quæ omnia judicia Romanorum. Inde enim viri docti in omnem orbem terrarum adfuerunt iudicibus, & scientes Leges custodiunt Provincias; quibus mittuntur Legum ordinationes. For which Cause, *Nonnus*³, in his Dionysicks, said, That Berytis fill'd all the World with Laws. *Eunapius*⁴ likewise, who flourish'd under Constantinus, Zacharias, *Scholasticus*⁵, and *Libanius*⁶, who liv'd under Valens; upon the same Account, call'd her the Mother of the Laws. And in the Time of Valens the Emperor, there was such a Crowd of Youth in that City learning the Laws, that Libanius himself was sorry for having neglected the Study of Eloquence for that of the Laws. And *Agathias*⁷, speaking of the Ruin of Berytis, occasion'd by an Earthquake which destroy'd almost the whole City; affirms, that there was a great Slaughter among the Citizens, and those who were learning the Laws of Rome. Lastly, our *Justinian*⁸ calls Berytis the City of the Laws; and in another Place, the Nurse of them: Whence he caus'd Dorotheus and Anatolius to come, that they might, jointly with the others, have a Share in composing the Digests, and would not allow the Explaining of the Laws to any other Academy in the East, but to those of Berytis and Constantinople (because this last was founded in his Time by Theodosius the Younger, in the Year 425.) as in the West to that of Rome.

T H E R E were, in these Times, in some Cities of the East, other Academies, where Learning was profess'd, as in Laodicea, of which Alexander Severus makes mention in one of his Constitutions, which we read yet in the *Justinian Code*⁹. In Alexandria, call'd the Musæum, of which Agathias speaks¹⁰; and in Cæsarea. So in the West, besides that famous one at Rome, some Cities had likewise their Schools where Youth were taught. Neither did our Naples want; of which, when we come to treat of the Establishing of the Neapolitan Academy, we shall speak; Frederick the second, Emperor, was not the first who built it from the Foundation, but that City had always been, as the same Frederick calls it, Antiqua Mater, & abinus studii; for which Cause he was induc'd to renew its ancient Studies, and enlarge it to a more noble and magnificent Form, advancing the Neapolitan Academy above all others; and for that End order'd, that the Youth, as well of that Kingdom as those of Sicily, should go to Naples for learning Discipline, of which we shall discourse more at large when we come to treat of that Re-establishment. There were not wanting Schools in the other Greek Cities in these our Provinces; but those Schools, while Rome flourish'd, remain'd obscure, as soon as the Athenæum appear'd; and after Rome had spread its Laws over the whole Empire, the Western Provinces sent their Youth to that City, as their Mother, to be taught them; as those of the East sent theirs to Berytis. And these lesser Schools were entirely suppress'd, when Justinian gave the Privilege of Explaining the Laws to three Cities only, to wit, the two Romes, and Berytis; not to Alexandria nor Cæsarea, nor, in fine, to any other City of the two Empires.

WE shall not here mention the Academy of Constantinople, as being a long time after the Year 425. founded by Theodosius the Younger, and reduc'd into a Form, of which we shall give an Essay in the following Book of this History.

S E C T. III.

BEHOLD in what flourishing Condition these our Provinces were, before the Reign of Constantine, when every City studied to put in order her own Polity and Government, in Imitation of Rome, of which they boasted of being small Resemblances and Images: When they liv'd according to their own Laws; and when the Roman Jurisprudence, which was their Rule and Pattern, was arriv'd to its Height, and the greatest Esteem; if we either consider the Favour of the Princes, or the Wisdom of their Decrees, the Knowledge of the Civilians, the Majesty of the Academies, and the Learning of the Professors, or the Probity of the Magistrates. 'Tis well known, that some merely out of too great a Love for Novelty, and of being made remarkable by some Extravagancy, could not contain themselves from blaming the Roman Laws, as being too subtle and far-fetch'd, and often repugnant to good Sense, and the common Understanding of Men. Others again, have presum'd to examine into, and reject some of them, as contrary to Reason and Equity. Others have compos'd particular Treatises, which George Pasquius hath related¹; and among us the Cardinal de Luca hath attempted it likewise, in several long Discourses². But they might easily perceive how far they were misled, who with the weak and short Sight of their Understandings, have pretended to impugn a Truth, evident for so many Ages, and profess'd by the greatest Men who flourish'd when Mankind had reach'd to such an Elevation and Eminency, that the like was never known before, and we don't know that it shall ever arrive again to that Sublimity, which was wonderful as long as the Roman Empire lasted. The Romans gave us wise and just Laws, as by Experience they are known to be most useful, conformable to natural Equity, and adapted to civil Society, and human Commerce: If it were allow'd to every one to make himself Judge of the Laws, and by his own Judgment and Caprice to give Directions about what might be needful in these Matters, we should see every Man, by trusting to his own Understanding, maintaining his own Opinion, to be equal to that of any other; whence Disorders and Confusion, and at last, a deplorable Scepticism would be introduc'd among us. Solon being ask'd, If he had given the most just and wise Laws to the Athenians? answer'd, The best, having made them most suitable to their Customs, and fitted for their Advantage; forasmuch as the Justice and the Knowledge of the Laws depend not on abstracted and metaphysical Reasons, but on their being beneficial to the People, to Commerce and Civil Life, of which the Romans for many Ages gave sufficient Testimony; whence it came, that altho' the Empire was ruin'd, yet the Majesty and Use of their Laws was continu'd in the new Dominions that were establish'd in Europe. The Utile and Honestum are the Rule of Laws, and those will always be found just which prove the Utile and Honestum of the People; which deserves a Treatise by itself, but 'tis not to our Purpose. There are others who fill the World with Complaints against the Romans on account of the Multiplicity of so many Laws: That Complaint is not new, but very old, even since the Time of the Free-Commonwealth; so that *Cæsar*³ and Pompey thought of giving some Remedy to it, by reducing the Roman Jurisprudence to a certain Order, which could never be put in Practice by so famous Men, much less can it be expected to be done by others, being an Undertaking altogether impracticable and impossible. But these Complaints had been better bestow'd, had they been levell'd at the Depravity of the Manners of Men, their Ambition, and Dissoluteness, than at the Laws; for 'tis very certain that the Multiplicity of Vices are the Cause of the Multiplicity of Laws, and the one always produceth the other, whence *Arcefilaus*⁴ was wont to say, That where there are many Medicines, and many Physicians, there are always abundance of Diseases: So where the Laws abound, there is much Injustice; nevertheless there is not much Injustice, and many Vices, because there be many Laws, but there are many Laws because there are many Vices: For to rectify the corrupt Customs of Men, there was no other Remedy but that of the Laws. The Roman Empire had been ruin'd much sooner, if from Time to Time the Wisdom of some Prince had not given Remedies by means of the Laws. The Romans had always many domestick Examples before their Eyes, which taught them, that there was no Bridle so powerful against the Dissoluteness of Men, as the Laws. They well knew, that from the Beginning of their Commonwealth, nothing was more eagerly coveted by the licentious Roman Youth, than not to be govern'd by Laws, and that every Thing might be remitted to the King, and to his Determination; and that for no other Reason, but that which Livy reports with great Elegancy¹: Regem, said they, hominem esse, a quo impetres ubi jus, ubi injuria opus sit; esse gratiæ locum, esse beneficio, & irasci, & ignoscere posse: Inter amicum, & inimicum discrimen nosse. Leges, rem surdam, inexorabilem esse, salubriorem, melioremque inopi, quam potenti; nihil laxamenti nec veniæ habere, si modum excesseris: Periculosum esse, in tot humanis erroribus, sola innocentia vivere. Sentiments too licentious and hurtful, and directly opposite to that which Aristotle teacheth in his Politicks². Where there is a Commonwealth without Vices, 'tis certainly as wrong to load it with Laws, as it would be to apply Medicines to a sound Body. But if it be given to Riot and Luxury, and threatens Ruin, there's no other Remedy but to have recourse to the Laws. And it were much better in that Case, that the Commonwealth should abound in Laws, which foresee and oppose themselves to all Vice³, than to remit every Thing to the Determination of the Magistrates, whose Judgments are subject to Passions, and the Machinations and Snares of Pleadings.

'TIS certainly true, that the Corruption of Manners can't be sufficiently redress'd by the Laws; and in this Case, that grave Instruction of Bacon Lord Verulam⁴, can't be enough commended, which Princes ought always to have before their Eyes, who says, That their greatest Care and Thoughts ought not to be so much about redressing of Abuses and Corruptions by the Laws, as in watching over the Education of the Youth. All the Severity of the Laws should be employ'd about their Education, since by that Means the Number of Vices would be in a great measure lessen'd, and consequently the Number of the Laws. They should be chiefly intent about re-establishing and providing the Academies with good Statutes and Professors. Of late we have seen some Care taken to restore the Colleges for the Education of Youth, in which the Jesuits have been eminent. But now again they begin to fall off from their first Discipline, we see likewise the ancient Fervency abated, and all the good Institutions corrupted. These Things require a Censor rather than an Historian; therefore what we have hitherto furnished being sufficient for a Preparative to what is to follow, after having given an Account of the Ecclesiastical Polity of these Ages, we shall take a Step to the Reign of Constantine, from which this History takes its Beginning.

C H A P. XI.

Of the Ecclesiastical Polity in the Three first Centuries.

THE new Christian Religion, which from Jesus Christ our Lord, began in the Time of Octavius Augustus to spread itself amongst Men, made known unto us two Powers in this World, by whom it was necessary it should be govern'd, the Spiritual and the Temporal¹. The Spiritual in the Priesthood or Ecclesiastical State, which administers Divine and Sacred Things: The Temporal in the Empire or Monarchy, or the Political State, which governs Human and Prophane Things; each of them having its different Objects: The Princes because they are to take care of worldly Things; the Priests of Spiritual. Each having his own Power different and distinct; that of the Prince to punish or reward with corporal Pain; that of the Priests with Spiritual. In short, to each was given his own Power apart; hence, not without Reason, the Magistrate carries the Sword, and the Priests the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven.

IT was not so among the Heathens, who did not acknowledge these two Powers in the World as distinct and separate; but they conjoin'd them in one single Person; whence their Kings were sole Heads and Governors: And the Reason was, because they made Religion only serve for the Preservation of the State, and did not direct it, as we do, to another more sublime End. Thus among the Romans the High Priesthood continu'd a long Time in the very Person of the Emperors²; and altho' they had separate Colleges of Priests, to whom the Care of their Religion was committed, nevertheless, as they us'd it only for the Preservation of the State, consequently they were obliged to report their most serious Deliberations to the Prince as their Head; an Institution which was transmitted to them by their Forefathers, with whom, as Cicero says³, Qui rerum potiebantur, iidem auguria tenebant; ut enim sapere, sic divinare, regale ducebatur. Hence *Virgil*⁴ thus sings of King Annius.

Rex Annus, Rex idem hominum, Phœbique Sacerdos.

WE see the same Custom among the ancient Grecians, whom Homer representeth to us, where the Heroes, that is to say the Princes, were those who offer'd Sacrifice: Plato gives the same Account of the Athenians, and many of the Cities of Greece: Among the Ethiopians, as Diodorus writeth⁵, the Kings were the Priests: So likewise among the Egyptians as Plutarch hath it; and among the Spartans according to *Herodotus*⁵.

BUT among Christians, Religion is not directed for the Preservation of the State, and the Quiet of this World, but to a more sublime End, which regardeth Eternal Life, and respecteth God, and not Man; whence among us the Priesthood is accounted so much higher and nobler than the Empire, by how much Divine Things are superior to Human; and as the Soul is more noble than the Body and Temporal Things. But on the other hand, the Sword having been given by God to the Empire for governing Worldly Things, that Power hath become stronger in itself, that is to say in this World, than the Spiritual Power given by God to the Priesthood, to whom the Use of the material Sword is forbidden; since it hath for its Object only Spiritual and not Sensible Things, and the principal Effect of its Power is reserv'd to Heaven; as our gracious Redeemer testifieth, by saying, That his Kingdom is not of this World, and that if it were, his People would fight for him.

THESE two Powers being acknowledg'd amongst us as Proceeding from the same Principle, which is God, from whom all Power is deriv'd, and terminating in the same End, which is Beatitude, the true End of Man; 'tis necessary that they should have a Correspondence and Concord together¹, that is to say, a Harmony and Agreement compos'd of different Materials, by communicating mutually their Virtue and Energy; so as that the Empire may assist the Priesthood with its Force for maintaining the Honour of God; and the Priesthood on its side, may bind and unite the Affections of the People to the Obedience of the Prince; thus all the State will be happy and flourishing: On the contrary, if these two Powers disagree amongst themselves; and if the Priesthood by abusing the Devotion of the People, should incroach upon the Empire, or Political and Temporal Government; or if the Empire, by turning that Force against God, which he hath put into its Hands, should incroach upon the Priesthood; all will go into Disorder, Confusion, and Ruin.

IT is God, who hath put these two Powers in different Hands, and hath made them both Sovereign in their Kind, that the one might serve as a Counterpoise to the other, for fear that their unbounded Sovereignty might degenerate into Irregularity and Tyranny. As it happens when the Temporal Sovereignty infringeth the Laws of God, the Spiritual opposeth it immediately; and in like manner, the Temporal withstandeth the Spiritual², which is most acceptable to God when 'tis done in a lawful Way, and especially when 'tis done directly and purely for his Service and the Publick Good, and not for Self-interest, and the one incroaching upon the other.

AND since these two Powers of Necessity meet together in all Places, and at all Times, and ordinarily in different Persons; and besides they being Sovereign in their kind, the one quite independant of the other; Infinite Wisdom, for preventing the extreme Disorder which is occasion'd by their Disagreement, hath fix'd such firm Limits, and put such visible Partitions betwixt them, that whoever gives but the least way to his Reason, may easily perceive what belongeth to the one and the other; for what is more easily distinguish'd than Things Sacred from Prophane, and Spiritual from Temporal? There's no more requir'd, than to put in practice that beautiful Rule which our Saviour pronounc'd from his own Mouth, Reddite quæ sunt Cæsaris Cæsari, & quæ sunt Dei Deo. An Instruction short enough, but very elegant and clear; because, when the Care of Souls and Holy Things belongs to the Priesthood, the Monarch himself must submit in that which directly concerneth Religion, and the Worship of God, if he perceiveth that he hath a Soul, and would be number'd among the Sons of God and the Church: Manifest and famous is the Example of the Emperor Theodosius, who yielded to the Censure of a simple Archbishop, and perform'd the Publick Penance which was injoin'd him: The Example of David likewise testifieth it, *Qui & si regali unctione Sacerdotibus, & Prophetis præ erat in causis sæculi, tamen suberat eis in causis Dei*³.

AND reciprocally, since the Government of Temporal Things belongeth to Princes, and the Church being in the Commonwealth, as Optatus Milevitanus saith, and the Commonwealth not in the Church, it behoveth that all the Ecclesiasticks, and likewise the Prelates of the Church, obey the Secular Magistrate in Matters of Civil Polity⁴. Si omnis anima potestatibus subdita est ergo, & vestra (saith *S. Bernard*⁵ and Henry Archbishop of Sens) quis vos exceptit ab universitate? Certè, qui tentat excipere, tentat decipere; and S. Jo. Chrysostom explaining the Passage of S. Paul: Omnis anima potestatibus sublimioribus subdita est, saith he, *etiam si fueris Apostolus, Evangelista, Propheta, Sacerdos, Monachus, hoc vero pietatem non lædit*⁶.

In short, S. Gregory the Great, Pope, Agnoſco, ſaith he, Imperatorem a Deo conſeſſum, non militibus ſolum, ſed & ſacerdotibus dominari.

SEEING then the Diſtinction of theſe two Powers is ſo important, it is very neceſſary to give them different Names; that is to ſay, thoſe who have the Eccleſiaſtical Power, are call'd Paſtors and Prelates, and thoſe who poſſeſs the Temporal, are call'd Lords and Rulers; an Appellation forbidden to the Eccleſiaſticks from the very Mouth of our Saviour, who at two different times, that is, in the Demands of the Sons of Zebedee, and in the Diſpute which aroſe amongſt the Apoſtles about Precedency, a little before his Paſſion, repeated to them this Leſſon; Principes gentium dominantur eorum, vos autem non ſic, &c. A Leſſon which St. Peter hath collected in his firſt Epiſtle, ſaying to the Biſhops; Pascite, qui in vobis eſt, gregem Dei, non ut dominantes in Cleris, ſed forma facti gregis; that is to ſay, Eſtabliſh'd in the Form of a Flock, whoſe Shepherd is not the Lord and Proprietor, but the Miniſter and Governor only¹. So ſaith God; *Pasce oves meas, and not tuas*².

AND truly the Eccleſiaſtical Power being directed to Spiritual and Divine Things, which are not properly of this World, can't belong to Men in Property, nor direct Dominion, as worldly Things do, but only for Exerciſe and Adminiſtration; ſo that God (who is ſole Maſter and Lord of our Souls) committeth to them that ſupernatural Power, to exerciſe it viſibly in this World, in his Name and Authority, as his Deputies and Lieutenants, every one in his own Hierarchic Degree, juſt as in the Civil Polity, many Officers, being ſubordinate one to another, exerciſe the Power of their ſupreme Lord.

ALL this is ſaid only in order to explain the Propriety of the Terms of the Subject of this Work, not at all to diminish, in the leaſt, the Eccleſiaſtical Power, which, on the contrary, relating to God directly, ought to be eſteem'd much more worthy than that of the Princes of the Earth, who in the Beginning had not theirs, but by way of Office and Adminiſtration, the Sovereignty, or to ſpeak more properly, the perfect Liberty belong'd to the State as a collective Body: So in thoſe Days they were only call'd the Paſtores of the People, as they are termed by Homer; but the Object of their Power, which conſiſteth of worldly Things, being adapted to receive Dominion or Power in Property, they have, long ago, gain'd and obtain'd it in all Countries of the World; and there are a great many of them who have not only acquir'd the publick Dominion, but the private likewise, reducing their People to Slavery.

THERE can't be found more authentick Proofs of the Diſtinction betwixt theſe two Sorts of Powers, nor more remarkable Examples of changing the Power both as to Office and Exerciſe, into that of Property and direct Dominion, than that which happen'd to the People of God, when being tir'd with the Government of their Judges, who exerciſed a Sovereignty over them, by Office and Adminiſtration only, they would have a King, who from that time forth had the Sovereignty by direct Dominion; which much offended God, who ſaid to Samuel, the laſt of the Judges, They have not rejected thee, but me, that I may not reign any more over them; and a little after, *Such ſhall be the Right of the King, &c.*⁴; which ſignifies, that God himſelf was King of that People, and had over them the Property and Power, when they were govern'd by ſimple Judges and Officers⁵; but it ſhall be ſo no more, when they ſhall have a King, who ſhall change that Power into Property. An excellent Inſtruction for Eccleſiaſticks to leave the Property of the Spiritual Power to God, and to content themſelves with the Exerciſe of it, as his Vicegerents and Lieutenants, the higheſt and nobleſt Quality that can be upon Earth.

SUCH is the Diſtinction betwixt Spiritual and Temporal Power, which well demonſtrates, that the one doth not include and produce the other; neither are they ſuperior to one another, but that both are Sovereign or Subaltern, in their Right and in their Kind.

NOTWITHSTANDING, this Diſtinction hindreth not, but that the one, and the other, may reſide in the ſame Perſon, and ſometimes, which is more, on Account of the same Dignity. However, 'tis to be observ'd, that when it resideth in the same Dignity, it must be an Ecclesiastical Dignity, and not a Lordship or Temporal Office, seeing the Spiritual Power is more Noble than the Temporal: And as it can't depend on, nor be accessory to it, so neither can it be in the Person of a Laick, to whom ordinarily belongeth the Temporal Power; and above all, the Spiritual Power cannot be held by direct Dominion, nor convey'd by Succession, nor possess'd hereditarily as Temporal Dominions.

WHENCE it follows, by the bye, that it was repugnant to common Sense for the Kings or Queens of England to have assum'd to themselves the Supremacy of the Church of England, in the same manner as they assum'd the Secular Power of their Realm, as if the one depended on the other: This proceeded from the particular Spite which Henry VIII. had against the Pope, who would not approve of his Divorce; for which he was so offended, that he refus'd paying, any more, the Tribute which for a long time had been paid by England; and which is more, giving way to his unbridled Passion, he declar'd himself Head of the Church of England next to Jesus Christ, and oblig'd his Subjects to swear, That they acknowledg'd him to be supreme Lord, as well in Spiritual as Temporal Matters; a Solecism which appear'd plainly afterwards, when his Daughter, Queen Elizabeth, came to reign; forasmuch, as a Woman was then seen to be Head of the Church of England, and the Spiritual Sovereignty fallen to the Distaff.

NOW altho' these two Powers have been for some time in the same Persons among the People of God, yet it was in such a manner, that the Temporal was always accessory to the Priesthood; but afterwards, when the People would be govern'd by Kings, these Kings had not the Spiritual Power; and if at any Time they undertook it, they were severely punish'd by God, as is manifest by the History of *Hosea*². As for the Heathens, we have seen already, that in many Nations the Kings have been Priests, by subjecting Religion to the State; and they made use of it no otherwise, than so far as it was subservient to the State: But we being instructed in better Schools, have been taught to prefer Religion, which respecteth God and regardeth Eternal Life, to the State, which concerneth only Man and the Quiet of this World. But there's no Inconveniency nor Repugnancy in annexing the Temporal Power, and rendering it accessory and dependent on the Priesthood; as in the following Books of this History we shall observe in the Person of the Pope of Rome, and other Prelates of the Church; not as if it sprung from the Spiritual Sovereignty, and were one of its necessary Appurtenances, but as it hath been acquir'd, from Time to Time, by human Titles, by Concessions of Princes, and Lawful Prescriptions, not Apostolico jure, as St. Bernard saith³, Nec enim ille tibi dare, quod non habebat, potuit.

Behold these two Powers met in Sovereignities independent the one on the other, and acknowledging one only Source, which is God; distinct, by well fix'd Limits from the Mouth of our Saviour, in such a manner, that the one hath no occasion to interfere with the other.

The Ecclesiastical Polity of the first Three Ages in the East.

WE acknowledging then, by the Christian Religion, these two Powers in the World, it will be necessary, that we give an Account, how the Spiritual began to be administred among Men, and how by Degrees the Polity came to be establish'd in the Empire, and in these our Provinces, and the Ecclesiastical State; which in the succeeding Ages made one of the greatest Changes in the Political and Temporal State of this Kingdom.

IN these three first Ages of Man's Redemption, before that Constantine embrac'd the Christian Religion, no outward Ecclesiastical Polity could be thought on in the Empire with Stability. The Apostles and their Successors, being intent solely on preaching the Gospel, did not much mind the Establishing of it; and besides, were hindred by Persecutions, which constrain'd them privately and in Corners, to maintain the Exercise of their Religion among the Faithful.

OUR gracious Redeemer then, being to return to the Father, who sent him into this World to shew us a more secure Way of Salvation, after having given us so many good Rules, left on Earth his Lieutenants, to whom he communicated that Spiritual Power, to the End, that as his Vicegerents, they might maintain and publish every where his Religion. He did not make use of the Ministry of Angels, but was pleas'd to advance Mankind, neither did he make choice of the mighty Men of the Earth for these profound Mysteries, but the most vile and abject; being willing by that to give us another Mark of Distinction between these two Powers, that the one doth not regard Pedigree, nor other Honours, which the World puts a Value upon, but only the Spirit, not Blood, and other human Considerations. He left therefore that Power to the Apostles, his dear Disciples, who while he convers'd with us on Earth, follow'd him: He gave them in Charge to teach and preach his Law over all the World, and gave them Power to bind and to loose, as they saw meet; engaging his Word, that those whom they should loose on Earth should be loos'd in Heaven, and whom they should bind on Earth should be bound in Heaven.

THE Apostles, altho' they acknowledg'd St. Peter for their Head, in the Beginning, thought of nothing less than establishing an outward Ecclesiastical Polity, seeing they were intent on the Preaching of the Gospel only, and in bringing Mankind to the Belief of that Religion, which they were about to establish and propagate through all the Provinces of the World; they apply'd themselves to that only: For that end, they dispers'd themselves, and travell'd to different Places, whither Necessity or Occasion led them. The first Provinces they visited were those of the East, as being the nearest to Jerusalem and Palestine: They went to Antioch, Smyrna, Ephesus, Alexandria, and other Cities of the Eastern Provinces, in which they made wonderful Progress, bringing those People to the true Faith; in which they were but little diverted or hindred by the Imperial Officers, those Provinces being far from Rome, the Head and Seat of the Emperors, their Proceedings were not so narrowly look'd into; whence they were able to establish Religion in many Cities of these Provinces, and to unite the Faithful more closely in many Places, which they call'd Churches. But at first, as St. Hieronymus saith, they having founded Churches in the Cities, these were govern'd, with common Consent, by Presbyters, as an Aristocracy. Afterwards, the Number of the Faithful encreasing, and Confusions and Divisions arising by reason of the Multitude, to obviate Disorders, altho' the Government was continu'd with the Presbytery, they began to think of giving the Superintendency to one of the Priests, who should be their Head, whom they call'd Bishop, that is to say, Inspector, who being plac'd in a more high Degree, had the Inspection over all the Priests, and to whom belong'd the Care of the Church, governing it together with the Presbytery; so that the Government of the Church became mix'd of Monarchy and Aristocracy; whence *Peter de Marca*² took Occasion to say, That the Monarchical Government of the Church was temper'd with the Aristocratical.

SOME have endeavour'd to maintain, that in those early Times, the Government and Polity of the Church, was simply and purely Aristocratical in the Hands of the Priests only, yielding nothing more to the Bishops than to the Priests, giving them no Power nor Supremacy above the others: But the incomparable *Hugo Grotius*³, hath fully confuted that Error; and the contrary is clear from the Catalogue of so many Bishops, which we have from Irenæus, Eusebius, Socrates, Theodoretus, and others, by which it is manifest, that from the Time of the Apostles, the Bishops had the Superintendency of the Church; and being plac'd in a more eminent Degree, were above the Priests, as their Head. Thus, not to speak of the Bishops of Rome, as being a Thing so well known, in Alexandria, upon the Death of St. Mark the Evangelist, who had govern'd that Church, as St. Hieronymus ¹ relateth, the Priests had always one whom they chose for their Head, Et in Celsiori gradu collocatum Episcopum nominabant. St. Mark died in the Sixty Second Year of the Incarnation, and in the Eighth of the Emperor Nero ²: And after him, St. John the Apostle being yet alive, Anianus succeeded; to Anianus succeeded in the Government of that Church, Abilius, and to him Cerdo, and so from one to another the rest ³. In Antiochia, Evodius, Ignatius, &c. In Jerusalem, while St. John was yet alive, after the Death of St. James, the Bishops of that City were Simon, Iustus, &c. In Smyrna, Polycarpus was put over the Priests as their Bishop, by St. John, who govern'd that Church Eighty Six Years. Thus likewise the Church of Ephesus, altho' it was govern'd by the Priests, yet there was one of them who presided; and after Timothy, St. John himself, for some time, was Head of it; for which Reason he was call'd the Prince of the Clergy, and Angel of the Church; after that Titus and others succeeded; so that in the Council of Chalcedon ⁴, from the Mouth of Leontius Magnesians, we read, A Sancto Timotheo, usque nunc XXVII. Episcopi facti, omnes in Epheso ordinati sunt.

NEITHER ought it to seem strange, to say it en passant, that the Evangelists, whose Business it was to be going to and fro in the Provinces of the Empire, and to preach the Gospel, could have been Bishops in any City; since, as Hugo Grotius well informeth us ⁵, they likewise went to settle in some Places, where they perceiv'd, that their longer Abode would be of greater Advantage; and where they staid, they perform'd all the Offices of a good Bishop, by presiding in the Presbytery: For which Reason we read, that the same Apostles were Bishops of some Cities, because having remain'd long in them, they had govern'd their Churches, as all other Bishops did who had been ordain'd by them.

THUS, in Process of Time, the Christian Religion being spread over all the Provinces of the Empire, altho' the Apostles dy'd, the Bishops succeeded in their Places, who being above the Presbyters, govern'd the Churches; therefore we see Bishops appointed in the Cities, as St. Cyprian witnesseth; Jam quidem per omnes Provincias, & per urbes singulas constituti sunt Episcopi: whence it was firmly establish'd, that in the Government of the Churches, one of the Priests was to have Rule over the Rest, to whom the Care of the Church was to belong, as St. Hieronymus testifieth, In toto Orbe decretum est, ut unus de Presbyteris electis ceteris super poneretur, ad quem omnis cura Ecclesie pertineret ⁶.

A N D altho' St. Cyprian saith, That Bishops were appointed in every City; yet nevertheless 'tis known, that many Cities had none, but were govern'd and rul'd by the Presbytery only; since the Apostles did not appoint Bishops in all Churches, but left many of them to be govern'd by the Presbytery, when there were none amongst them worthy of being made Bishops, as St. Epiphanius ⁷ declareth; Presbyteris opus erat, & Diaconis, per hos enim duos Ecclesiastica compleri possunt; ubi vero non inventus est quis dignus Episcopatu, permansit locus sine Episcopo; ubi vero opus fuit, & erant digni Episcopatu, constituti sunt Episcopi. And these Churches which continu'd without Bishops, saith St. Hieronymus, Communi Presbyteriorum consilio gubernabantur. Thus Meroe, a City in Egypt, as Athanasius ⁸ writeth, even to his Time, had not had a Bishop, and was govern'd by the Presbytery only; and many Writers of those Times declare the same of many other Cities of the Empire.

SUCH was the Polity of the Ecclesiastical State in the first Ages; neither was there any other Hierarchy known, nor any other different Degrees, but that of Bishop, Priest, and Deacon, who took Care of the Oblations, and likewise of what belong'd to the Ministry of Holy Things. These made up one Body, of whom the Bishop was the Head, and the other Ministers, whether the higher or lower, were the Members, and the Council or Senate of the Bishop, who, together with him govern'd the Church. Whence S. Hieronymus ¹ reasoning about the Bishops, said, that they likewise had their Senate, that is the Congregation of Priests: And as S. Basil likewise said ²; and Ignatius writing to the Trallians affirm'd, That the Priests were the Bishops Counsellors and Assessors, and that they ought to look upon themselves as having succeeded in the Place of the Apostolical Senate; whence it was that S. Cyprian never treated of any Thing of Moment, without the Assistance and Advice of his Priests and Deacons, as may be gathered from his Letters ³.

SOME have believ'd that this Polity of giving the Superintendency to the Bishops, and a Superiority over the Priests, had been introduc'd likewise from the Example of the Heathens, who had different Degrees in their Priesthood; which was practis'd not only by the Greeks and Romans, but had been a very ancient Discipline of the Druids in Gallia, as Cæsar expresseth in his Commentaries ⁴: Druidibus preest unus, qui summam inter eos habet auctoritatem. The Burgundians had also their High-Priest, as Marcellinus ⁵ relateth; and in the Jewish Commonwealth, God Almighty approved of the same Custom likewise, when he put one of greater Authority over all the Priests.

BUT however probable it may be, that such an Order had been instituted in imitation of them, nevertheless, according to the Opinion of Grotius ⁶, it is more probable that such a Polity was introduc'd in imitation of the Jewish Synagogues, whereof the Churches founded by the Apostles seem to be Images and Resemblances; and indeed, we observe, that in many Places the Synagogues had no coercive Power, any more than the Church itself, all its Power being Spiritual: We likewise see, that the Apostles, while they were Preaching in Palestine and the neighbouring Provinces, found many Synagogues which had been well regulated from the Time of the Babylonish Dispersion; and these receiving the Faith of Christ, by the Preaching of the Apostles, because the Gospel was first preach'd to them, there was no Reason why they should change their Polity, and forsake that which the Experience of many Ages had approv'd of, and recommended; add to this, that the Work of the Apostles was more easy, because, when they were to plant a new Religion in the Gentile World, the Novelty of the Thing made no Noise, nor was taken Notice of by the Imperial Officers, who were little concern'd in the Matter, seeing there was no Change in the outward Polity, when the Synagogues were converted into Churches; and when Churches were founded elsewhere, altogether conformable to the Jewish Institutions, to which the Imperial Officers were no Strangers, little or no Innovation was observ'd, at least not so much as could give any Disturbance to the Civil State of the Empire.

AS in every Synagogue there was one, who was above the rest, whom they call'd the Ruler, in his Place they appointed a Bishop; they had Pastors, to whom the Priests succeeded; there were likewise Eleemosinaries, who were much the same with Deacons.

The Ecclesiastical Polity in the West, and in these our Provinces.

WHILST this new Religion was spreading in the East, and having made wonderful Progress in those Parts, it was resolv'd to establish it likewise in the West, some of the Apostles, and many of the Disciples for that end travell'd into these our Provinces. 'Tis said that St. Peter himself, their Head, leaving the See of Antioch, having appointed Evodius Bishop of that Church, sailed with many of his Disciples towards Italy, in order to go to Rome: That he landed first at Brundisium, dustum, from thence he went to *Otranto*¹, and then to Tarentum, in which City he preach'd the Faith of Christ, and converted a great many of the Citizens to the Faith, leaving Amasianus Bishop of the Place²; some will have it³, that he likewise visited Trani, Oria, Andria, and sail'd by the Adriatick to Sipontum; from thence he return'd, and coasting along our Shore arriv'd at Rbegium, in which Cities he planted the Christian Religion: Then departing from Rbegium with his Followers, sailing through the Tyrrhenian Sea, he arriv'd in ours, and beholding the pleasant Situation of the City of Naples, resolv'd to land and convert it to the true Faith: And they will have it, that he met at the Gate of the City a Lady call'd Candida, and with her, and her Brother Asprenus, wrought many Miracles, at which the Neapolitans being moved, they received Baptism from him, and before he departed for Rome, he appointed Asprenus Bishop of that City, who was the first. 'Tis also said, That in that Journey St. Peter himself went as far as Capua; and after having converted that City, he left there Priscus, one of the ancient Disciples of Christ, for Bishop, in whose House he caus'd to prepare Easter, and eat with his Disciples in the Parlour. And afterwards having gone to Atina, a City now destroyed, appointed Mark Bishop of it: And lastly, taking Journey for Rome, pass'd by Terracina, of which Place he ordain'd Epaphroditus Bishop. The People of Bari likewise pretend, that St. Peter was also in their City, as well as in Tarentum and *Otranto*⁴. Those of Beneventum, that he left with them Photinus their first Bishop⁵. Sessa pretends the same, and that he gave to them Simisus for their Bishop. In short, if one should mind such Stories, there is not a City in our Provinces that doth not pretend to have had their Bishops either from St. Peter or St. Paul, as Rbegium boasteth of Stephen its first Bishop, or from some one or other of the Seventy-two Disciples of Christ our Lord; or lastly, from the Disciples of the Apostles. Indeed, Pozuolo reckoneth its first Bishop Patrobas, one of the Seventy-two Disciples, and Disciple of St. Paul, of whom he maketh mention in his Epistle to the Romans, who being ordain'd Bishop by St. Peter, and arriving at Pozuolo, preach'd there the Christian Faith.

'TIS reported likewise, that St. Peter was no sooner arriv'd at Rome, than he was oblig'd to fly for it, because of the rigorous Edicts which the Emperor Claudius had put forth against the Jews, ordering them all out of *Rome*⁶. That he having return'd to Jerusalem, and ordain'd many other Bishops in the Cities of the East, came back a second Time to Italy, in order to go to Rome; and that in this second Voyage arriving in the Town of Resina, near Naples, by his Preaching he converted that People, and left with them Ampello to instruct them better in the Faith of Christ: Thence returning to Naples, was receiv'd by Asprenus and the Neapolitan Christians with infinite Marks of Kindness and Rejoicing, and founded a Church there; and that in this second Passage he visited many other Cities in Puglia. Thence going to Rome, he establish'd his Chair in that City, and ordain'd Linus Bishop of it, who having suffer'd Martyrdom, had for his Successor Clemens, to whom succeeded Cletus and Anacletus, and the other Bishops according to the Catalogue which we have of the Bishops of *Rome*⁷.

ON the other hand, there are some who pretend to throw to the Ground all these Accounts, and render them Fabulous; since they have undertaken with as great Temerity as Stubbornness, to maintain, that St. Peter never was in this our Country, but impudently have been so bold as to assert likewise, that he never was at Rome. The greatest Stickler on that Side is *Salmasius*⁸, who, contrary to what the ancient Fathers⁹ of the Church believ'd, and what hath been handed down to us by the ancient Tradition of our Forefathers, will maintain at any rate, that St. Peter never was at Rome; calling in Question, that which the Church hath always with Stedfastness and Constancy believ'd: Which gave occasion to John Owen ¹ fallly to believe, That that Point was still undecided.

An Petrus fuerit Romæ, sub iudice lis est?

BUT whatever may be in that Dispute, which we must leave altogether to the Ecclesiastical Writers, who have at large confuted that Error, 'tis sufficient for our Purpose, that it is incontestable, that either by St. Peter himself, or by the other Apostles, or their Disciples, or other Successors, the Christian Religion was introduc'd into these our Provinces, and many Churches founded in many Cities of them; for which End, many Bishops were ordain'd long before Constantine the Great embrac'd our Religion, that is to say, in the first three Ages of Man's Redemption: All which is made very clear, not only by the frequent Martyrdoms, which happen'd in our Provinces, but by the ancient Registers we have of the Bishops of many Cities. Naples reckoneth a great many before Constantine the Great; Asprius, Epatimitus, Maurus, Probus, Paulus, Agrippinus, Eustachius, Eusebius, Marcianus, Cosma, and others. Capua numbers also its own, Priscus, Sinotus, Rufus, Augustinus, Aristeus, Proterius, and Protus. Nola; Felix, Calionius Aurelianus, and Maximus. Pozzolo, Patrobas; Celsus, John. Cuma, Maxentius. Beneventum likewise reckoneth its own, amongst whom the famous Januarius, who suffer'd Martyrdom under Dioclesian. Atina boasteth of its Bishops from the Time of the Apostles, Mark, Fulgentius, and Hilarius. Sipontum; Bari, Otranto, Tarentum, Rhegium, Salernum; and other Cities of these our Provinces, had theirs before Constantine, of whom Ferdinandus Ugellus, in his laborious Work de Italia Sacra, hath given us a long Catalogue.

BUT as 'tis beyond all Dispute, that the Christian Religion was introduc'd into many Cities of these our Provinces in the first Ages, and that there was in each of them, a great Number of the Faithful, acknowledging the Bishops for their Moderators; so it can't be doubted, but the Exercise of that Religion was perform'd with much Caution, privately and in the most hidden Corners of their Houses, and often in the most unknown Caves, and farthest from the Resort of Men. Certainly our first Bishops in these Provinces being so near Rome, had greater Difficulty in maintaining this Religion amongst the Faithful, than those of the Eastern Provinces, as being at a greater Distance from Rome. The Roman Emperors were altogether intent on extinguishing this new Religion: They were uneasy at the very Name of a Christian, and to render them more detestable, they were branded as guilty of many Crimes and Villainies; that they were Murderers, adding, that they kill'd Children and fed upon their Flesh: That they were Incestuous, and that in their Night Assemblies they all mingled, and polluted themselves with execrable Lusts²: And those, who by their manifest Probity, to whom they could impute none of these Wickednesses, were made detestable to the Emperors, as Despisers of the Worship of their Gods; that they did not pay the Honour due to the Emperors; that they slighted the Roman Laws, and their Customs, and every thing else; did not invoke their Gods, nor vouchsafe to offer them Sacrifices; for which Cause they were call'd Atheists, Sacrilegious, Disturbers of the State and Customs, and an eternal Pestilence to Mankind and Nature; since by the Contempt they had for their Gods, they said, they provok'd them to Wrath and Revenge, by which they were the Occasion of many Mischiefs among Men and Nations; so much that with the Heathens it pass'd current and as a continual Quarrel, that the Christians were the Cause of all their Misfortunes; which wicked Opinion lasted in Rome to the Days of Alarick, when he took that City, attributing that Disgrace to the Wrath of their Gods, who for the Contempt they had them in and their Religion, reveng'd themselves after that manner upon the Romans; which moved St. Augustine to write his Books of the City of God, and Orosius to write his Orchestra, or History against the *Pagans*³.

FOR which Causes the Emperors began to persecute them; and the Persecution of Nero was the most terrible of all, who, by severe Edicts, condemn'd them to Death, as publick Enemies of the State and Mankind¹. Domitian follow'd his Footsteps. Trajan was not so cruel against them; for in returning Answer to Pliny, then Proconsul in Pontus and Bythinia, who being terrified by the great Number they grew to daily in these Provinces, wanted to know how he should punish them, he ordain'd, That they being accus'd and convicted, he should proceed against them with Severity; but if they were not accus'd, he should rather wink at them. By which, as Vossius observeth, the Clemency of Trajan the Heathen, was greater towards Christians, than that of Christians, not only towards the Mohometans, but even towards Christians themselves who are charg'd with Heresy, against whom the Inquisition, a Tribunal lately introduc'd, proceedeth with much Rigor, without being accus'd; of which Tribunal we shall have Occasion to treat more at large in another Place. Adrian, the Antonines, Severus, Maximinus, Decius, Valerianus, Dioclesian, Maximinianus, Galerius, and lastly Maxentius, were most cruel Enemies of the Christian Name; and if these Persecutions were cruel in the other Provinces of the Empire, they were much more so, without doubt, in our Campania, and the other Provinces which at present compose this Kingdom, as being nearer to Rome. The Officers by whom they were govern'd, in order to please the Inclinations of the Princes, and to be taken notice of as zealous for their Service, as being more narrowly observ'd, put their Edicts in Execution, with the more Rigour and Readiness: Whence it is, that with Reason, Campania, and these our Provinces, boast of so many Martyrs², and that all these first Bishops of their Cities, are now worshipp'd as Saints, as they, who in the Midst of such fierce Tempests, always confess'd the Faith of Christ, and being intrepid, did not value Slaughter nor Death. There are yet remaining the Vestiges of the Burying Place of Nola: The Memory of the Martyrdoms in Pozuolo, in the Time of Dioclesian, and many other Burying Places of Martyrs in several Parts of the other Provinces, which afterwards, when Constantine gave Peace to the Church, were discover'd by the Faithful, and made known; whence it was, that the neighbouring People out of Devotion, flocking to the Tombs of the Martyrs, there were so many Inhabitants near these Places, and new Towns and Castles built; And from this it was, that these new Towns in our Kingdom took their Names from these tutelar Saints³.

IN these troublesome Times, no outward Church Polity could be thought of in these our Provinces: The Faithful, for the most Part, absconded as Fugitives, and in such Confusion, that they could not but clandestinely perform the Exercise of their New Religion. The Bishops, with much Danger, attended only the Conversions, and that in Cities altogether Heathen, as need requir'd, they run sometimes to one City, sometimes to another; so that they could not apply themselves to the Political Government of their Churches.

FOR which Reasons, there could no Change or Alteration happen in the Polity of the Empire, and much less in these our Provinces, in such Times, on Account of the new Christian Religion. The Cities were all Heathen, the Religion which was publickly profess'd by the Magistrates, the Laws, Customs, and Rites, were all Heathen. The Christians were reputed as publick Enemies, Disturbers of the State, and, as such, excluded the Commonwealth: Their Meetings severely punish'd; they could not have separate Colleges; their Churches had no Revenues. All the Cities of these our Provinces, altho' there were many Christians who liv'd in them privately, and that the Number encreas'd daily, yet were Heathen, and Heathenism was publickly profess'd. Every City took Example from Rome, and many of the Roman Magistrates imitated the Religion of their Head; and it was not only the Municipal, the Colonial, and the Præfectural, but also the Confederated Cities, which had more Liberty.

NAPLES, as also all the other Cities of this Kingdom, were universally Heathen:

NAPLES, as is believ'd, did not become entirely Christian, from the first Preaching of the Gospel, which they say was by St. Peter. 'Tis very probable, that some Neapolitans embrac'd immediately the Faith of Christ, and with much Caution follow'd their Bishop Asprenus, living hiddenly in that Belief; but all the rest were Idolaters, and that Worship publicly profess'd. So that of all the Greek Cities in these our Provinces, Naples was certainly the most superstitious and most addicted to the Errors of the Heathens, and its old Religion. It had its publick Temples, in honour of various Deities: of Eumelus its Country God, of *Ebo*¹, who had for an Adjunct that of Clarissimus given him, or most resplendent God; they believ'd him the same as Apollo, and he was also call'd the God Mitra: They had Castor and Pollux, Diana, Ceres, and a great many other Deities. It had its Brotherhoods (as hath been already observ'd) not only dedicated to its Country Gods, but likewise to Heroes, and in private Temples built by them, Sacrifices were offer'd by the Families that met there. Innumerable were the Games also which they had for celebrating their Feasts with the greater Pomp and Solemnity, and so famous that they drew Spectators from the remotest Parts: the most renown'd of which were the Olympick Games, which they celebrated with so much Care and Skill, that they entic'd the Emperors themselves to be Spectators of them: Neither were the Feastings at the Temple of Ceres, near the Sea, less admir'd, from which that Goddess is call'd by Statius, Actia Ceres.

SOME vainly believe, that these Festivals and these Temples ceas'd, as soon as St. Peter preach'd the Gospel there; whereas 'tis manifest, that they were continu'd for a long time after. Statius, who wrote under Domitian, in his Sylvæ, and elsewhere, makes mention frequently of these Feasts and Games. Others have been yet more foolishly persuaded, that Learning was taught in the Academy, which, in Naples, was dedicated to Hercules, and that it was honour'd with Ulysses for a Scholar; as if in the midst of his so long and painful Wanderings, it could have enter'd into his Head to go to Naples in Quest of Learning. The Academy was instituted for exercising the Body in Coursing, Fencing, Wrestling, the Gymnici, Ludi, and Athletic Exercises: And that Academy was famous and remarkable for the rare and extreme Valour of the Wrestlers, that it not only drew to it Strangers from the most distant Countries, but (which is more remarkable) even the Emperors themselves, who went frequently to this City, and were delighted in seeing the Exercises, and in being seen performing them. That Academy was much esteem'd by Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and much more by Nero. Titus was much delighted with it, and it being thrown down by an Earthquake, he rebuilt it. Domitian, Trajan, Adrian, M. Aurelius the Philosopher, Commodus, Septimius, and Alexander Severus, and almost all the Emperors who preceded Constantine, honour'd it. Naples then, on Account of these Exercises, being so much frequented by these Emperors, the greatest Part of whom had been unmerciful, bitter, and cruel Persecutors of the Christian Religion; who can ever be persuaded, that this City, after St. Peter's passing through it in his going to Rome, had forsaken Heathenism, and publicly embrac'd the Christian Religion? Neither the Manners of the Neapolitans, who were most tenacious of the Worship of their Country Gods; nor the frequent Stay the Roman Emperors made in this City; nor the mortal Hatred they bore to the Christians, can make us believe it, but much rather prove the contrary, and what great Mistake it was to imagine there were never any Martyrs in

Naples, when 'tis indisputable : Neither can P. Carracciolo himself deny it, that there have been many and frequent Martyrdoms there ; and Cardinal Baronius ¹ speaking of St. Faustus and Fulita, gives an Account, that they suffer'd Martyrdom in Naples. Forasmuch as this City, whatever they may believe, that as a Confederated City, it was not subject to the Roman Edicts, was of it self Idolatrous, and consequently a most bitter Enemy to the Christians, and such were they who govern'd it. But by reason of the great Superstition of the Neapolitans, and the great Veneration for their Paternal Gods, even after Constantine the Great gave Peace to the Church, it was very difficult for a long time to get the false Worship so entirely abolish'd, as it was in other Cities of the Empire, and in Rome it self, before the Reigns of Arcadius and Honorius, most religious Princes, and resolute in exterminating Idolatry out of the Empire. And 'tis a very ill contriv'd Story, which gives an Account of the so many Churches and Altars erected in Naples by Constantine the Great, as shall be plainly shewn in the following Books of this History ; whence, with good Reason, Jordanus follow'd by Tutini ², believed, That the Temple in Naples, dedicated by Tiberius Julius Tarsus to Castor and Pollux, had been afterwards, by the Neapolitans, dedicated to the true God in Honour of St. Paul the Apostle, not in the Time of Constantine the Great, but of Theodosius the Emperor. Symmachus ³, who liv'd in the fourth Century, lets us see, that Naples continu'd Heathen many Years after Constantine had embrac'd the Christian Faith ; whence, for its Constancy in not having follow'd the Example of the other Cities, but having kept the ancient Religion, he praises and adorns it with the Title of Urbs Religiosa ; these are his Words ; Quamprimum Neapolim petiti Civium suorum visere studeo : Illic honori Urbis Religiosæ intervallum bidui deputabo. Dehinc si bene Dii juverint, Capuano itinere, venerabilem nobis Romam, Laremque petemus. Every Body knows that Symmachus was a fierce and cruel Enemy of the Christians, and consequently would by no Means have called it Urbs Religiosa, on Account of the Christian Religion ; but only because Heathenism was overturn'd every where else, he reckon'd Naples conspicuous and religious, because of the false Religion which it constantly retain'd and profess'd.

Camillus Pellegrinus ⁴ left to the Learned of Naples, the Care of solving the Difficulty which that Passage of Symmachus left them in ; for 'tis truly incompatible with the common Belief of the Neapolitans, that that City should become Christian from the first Preaching of St. Peter. But this difficult Passage was soon unriddled by our accurate Chioccarelli ⁵, (whom with good Reason P. Lafena used to call the Beagle, on Account of his diligent Searching) and he endeavour'd to surmount it, by giving various Meanings to the Word Religiosa, that is, he would have Symmachus to mean, not the Heathen, but the Christian Religion : An Interpretation, truly far from the Circumstances of these Times, and the Religion of the Author, to which he was as much addicted, as he was an implacable Enemy of the Christian. A bare-footed Carmelite Fryer ⁶ in our Time, hath undertaken that Dispute ; but his Pen was not equal to the Undertaking, and he came but badly off. But if we lov'd Truth above every thing else, and were free from the Passion of an affected Love for our Native Country, and would look on it impartially, we should very easily unriddle the Matter : We should see there was no Intricacy in it, in our Opinion, if we would but consider the Circumstances of that City so near to Rome, and which it was vain in imitating in all its Proceedings ; we should perceive, that these our Western Provinces did not shake off Idolatry before the Reigns of Arcadius and Honorius.

In the other Provinces, and especially in the East, the Ecclesiastical Polity could be better minded, and the Christian Religion profess'd with more Freedom, the Persecution not being so furious and cruel there ; but for all that, the Civil State suffer'd no Change nor Alteration ; nevertheless, being persecuted and interdicted, it could not be publickly kept up, much less profess'd.

Of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy and Synods.

THE Church knew no other Hierarchy, nor Dignities in these first three Ages, but those of Bishop, Priest, and Deacon. The Bishops, who had the Superintendency, and whom all the Orders of the Church obey'd, if, peradventure, any Division arose amongst the Faithful, they by their great Zeal and Charity, immediately made it up, and quieted their disturb'd Minds. The Charity of all was equal; in the first, by using their Pre-eminency with Moderation; and in the others, by obeying with an entire Resignation. If at any time they were to deliberate about any Affairs of Moment concerning Religion, to the end that they might maintain a fix'd Concord and Unanimity amongst all the Churches, and that there might be no jarring, the Bishops were us'd to communicate to one another what had fallen out, and by the Means of Messengers or Letters, which they called Formatae, they maintain'd a Correspondence; and thus being all united by a strict Tye, representing the Universal Church, they fortified themselves against all Divisions and Schisms which could ever arise¹.

WHEN any Thing fell out, and if the Persecution gave them any breathing, so as they could from different Cities meet in one, they conven'd in Synods for deciding the true Faith, for regulating the Polity and Manners of Christians, or for punishing the Guilty, and deliberating about any other Matter that happen'd; following in that, the Footsteps of the Apostles, and of St. Peter their Head, who having conven'd the Faithful in Jerusalem, held a Council, which was the first, and on that Account called the Council of Jerusalem, and which is inserted in the Acts of the Apostles by St. Luke².

IN the second Age, when Religion was more diffus'd, as well in the Eastern as Western Provinces, they held other Synods: The first were in Asia, Syria, and Palestine. In the West likewise they began in this Age, being held in Rome, and in Gallia, against the Heresy of Montanus and the Cataphrygians; and on Account of the Paschal Controversy³.

IN the third Age, they were more frequent in Rome against Novatus, and his Followers, but more in Asia and Africa.

Of the ECCLESIASTICAL REGULATIONS.

THE Church in the first Ages had no other Regulations, but those which were in the Holy Scriptures, neither were there any other Books known: Afterwards by the Councils that were held, there were other Regulations made, by which the Churches of these Provinces were govern'd.

THESE were only Regulations concerning the Discipline of the Church, it never having been deny'd to the Priesthood to take Cognizance of the Differences in Religion, and to make Regulations concerning their Discipline. It was allow'd to the Heathen Priests likewise to do the same, and it was the common Right, as well of the Romans as of the Greeks, that all lawful Communities should take Cognizance of their own Affairs, and make Regulations about them. Cajus our Civilian, speaking of such a Community and College, says, His autem potestatem facit lex, pactionem quam velint sibi ferre, dum ne quid ex publica Lege corrumpant: There is a Law of Solon mention'd, in which the same was establish'd amongst the Greeks ¹; John Doviât ², and Du Pin ³, a great Divine of Paris, taught, that the Church not only had such Authority by common Right, by which every Society ought to have some Form of Government, to keep it from Confusion and Disorders, and to establish Regulations; but that the Power of making Canons concerning Church Discipline, was also granted by Christ to the Apostles. 'Tis not to be doubted, but that our Saviour gave Authority to his Apostles, and their Successors, to govern the Faithful in all that concern'd Religion, as well to clear the Points of Faith, as concerning the Rule of Manners: And these were the first Foundations and Principles from whence the Canon Law hath its Origin, which for a long Tract of Years hath vied with the Civil Law, and, as 'tis manag'd by the Popes, dares not only compare with it, but it must entirely yield; so that in the same Dominion, against all the Laws of Government, two Bodies of different Laws are seen, encroaching upon one another; the Source, from whence flow'd so many Disputes about Jurisdiction, and so many Changes in the Political and Temporal State of the Empire, and of these our Provinces, as shall be distinctly shewn in the Course of this History.

THEREFORE in these first Ages, such Regulations had no Influence to cause any Alteration in the Polity of the Empire: They were solely confin'd to the Differences in Religious Matters, and to what concern'd the Government of the Churches, and their Discipline. As to the Civil Matters of the Empire, they did not interfere with them, leaving entirely the Government of the Commonwealth to the Prince, as formerly.

Of the Cognizance of CAUSES.

THE Church had likewise in these Times, as a Thing belonging to her Discipline, the Censure and Correction of the Manners of Christians. If any of the Faithful, by going out of the right Way, stumbled upon some Heresy, or by any publick or notorious Sin scandaliz'd others, he was first privately rebuk'd that he might reform, and if he did not amend, he was denounc'd to the Church, that is to say, to the Bishop, Presbytery, and the Believers, by whom he was a second time rebuk'd; and if, after all, he continu'd obstinate in his Error and Way of Living, he was banish'd their Communion, and reputed as the other Heathens and Publicans; depriving him of all that which the Church gives to her Faithful, and leaving him in the Civil Society with the other Heathens; and it was after true Repentance and a rigorous Penance, that he was again admitted into their Communion.

THAT Correction of Manners, during the popular State of Rome, resided in the Censors, for which they were call'd Magistri Morum, who had Power to put a Mark of Ignominy on all sorts of Persons for Causes, of which the Law took no notice, as Bodinus wisely and at large treateth. An Institution certainly very commendable, which being laid aside under the Emperors, was taken up by the first Christians, who, by the Means of this Censure, kept themselves in a singular Purity of Manners, as Pliny witnesseth of the Christians in his Time; and it is what Tertullian saith in his Apologeticks speaking of the Assembly of the Church; Ibidem, says he, exhortationes, castigationes, & Censura Divina; whence it is, that they call'd the Head of each Church Episcopon, which is to say, the Inspector of the Manners of his Church: For which Cause, Excommunications and other Punishments of the Church, are call'd to this Day Ecclesiastical Censures; a Matter which which would require much longer Reasoning, but we shall leave it to Bodin to make up what is wanting.

T H E R E was in those Times, a Custom introduc'd amongst Christians of submitting their Differences to the Judgment of the Church, that they might not be oblig'd to plead before the Heathen Judges, according to the Precept of St. Paul in the first to the Corinthians. So that we see in Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, and other Authors of those Times, That those who would not submit, but made Christians plead before the Heathen Magistrates, were look'd upon to be almost Heathens, or at least bad Christians: But those Decrees which the Bishops gave, were only arbitral Opinions, which did not bind the Parties but upon Honour; as when Persons of Consideration interpose in making up any Difference. In a word, they were not oblig'd to submit: Neither after Sentence were they tied to observe it, leaving them at Freedom to have their recourse to the Secular Magistrate.

T H E Church, in her Infancy, took Cognizance of these three Occurrences only, to wit, of Matters of Faith and Religion, of which she judg'd by Form of Polity: Of Scandal and lesser Faults, which she took under her Cognizance by way of Censure and Correction; and of the Differences among Christians, which they brought before her, which she decided by way of Arbitration and charitable Agreement. Whence it may be seen, that the Ecclesiasticks had not that compleat Power of trying Causes, which in the Law is call'd Jurisdiclio; but their Justice was call'd Notio, Judicium, Audientia, and never Jurisdiclio.

Of the Election of MINISTERS.

I T belong'd likewise to the Church Discipline to provide her with Ministers; and *Du Pin*¹ writes, That this Power was bestow'd by Christ on the Apostles, of providing Successors in their Churches, to wit, Bishops, Priests, and other Ministers. And indeed the Apostles, as may be gather'd from Sacred History², ordain'd Bishops in many Places, and left them to govern the Churches which they had founded: But afterwards, the Apostles being dead, when by the Death of any Bishop the Church became vacant, they proceeded to the Election of a Successor; and then they call'd the most neighbouring Bishops of the same Province, at least two or three, it being a difficult Matter to have numerous Councils in those Days, if it were not in the Intervals of Persecution, and sometimes the Sees remain'd a long time vacant; and these joyning with the Presbytery, and the faithful People of the City, proceeded to the Election³. The People propos'd the Persons they desir'd might be elected, and gave Testimony of the Life and Manners of each of them; and lastly, being united with the Clergy and the Bishops present, consented to the Election, and immediately the new Elect was consecrated by the Bishops. Sometimes the Clergy and the People had a greater or lesser Share in the Elections, seeing in some they only express'd their Desire, and gave Testimony of their Life and Manners; in others they join'd in the Election⁴, as happen'd in the Election of St. Fabian Bishop of Rome, who, as Eusebius reports, was chosen by the Voice of the People, who had seen a Dove sitting on his Head: Which when it fell out, and the Bishops thought it convenient, they approv'd of the Election, and ordain'd the Elect; and the Election and Consecration were perform'd at the same Time, and the same Bishops were Electors and Ordainers: Nothing more being requir'd; forasmuch as in those first three Ages, the Right of Metropolitans to ordain the Bishops of their Provinces was not yet declar'd by Canons, as it was afterwards in the fourth Age; of which we shall treat in the following Book, when we shall have Occasion to speak of the exterior Ecclesiastical Polity of the fourth and fifth Centuries.

IN short, this was the Ecclesiastical Discipline concerning the Election of Bishops in these three first Centuries, as may be learn'd from the Letters of St. Clement the Pope, and St. Cyprian, Writers in the third Century¹. The Election of Priests and Deacons belong'd to the Bishop, to whom the Ordination solely appertain'd, altho', in the Election, the Clergy and People had their Share.

Of TEMPORALITIES.

IN those early Times, there were not so much Wealth and Goods, as to make it worth while to seek the Administration and Distribution of them, nor yet to make Regulations about them. Neither had they fix'd Foundations, nor even the necessary Tythes settled¹. The common Goods of the Churches, consisted only of Moveables, Provisions for the Mouth, Cloathing, and ready Money, which the Faithful offer'd every Week, or Month, or when they pleas'd, there being no settled Rules nor Compulsion in these Offerings. As for Immoveables, the Persecutions did not allow them to acquire any, or at least to possess them any time. The Faithful willingly gave Oblations and First Fruits, for keeping of which there were Persons appointed, and, in our Saviour's Time, Judas had the Custody of them: But they had no other use for these Things, than only to supply them when they wanted Cloaths and Victuals, and all that was over and above was distributed amongst the Poor of the City.

THE Apostles, after our Saviour's Death, kept up the same Custom, and laid up in common all that they collected from the Faithful, who, in order to follow them, sold their Houses and Farms, offering to them the Price of them; and, as is said, put the Money to no other use, but for their own Necessities, and the Maintenance of those whom they appointed to preach the Gospel, and for relieving the Poor and Needy of the Places they pass'd through. And as the Number of the Faithful encreas'd, of course the Oblations were greater; and when they saw that they super-abounded, that they not only were sufficient for the Occasions of the Church of one City, but that there was still an Overplus, they were wont to distribute it amongst the other Churches of the same Provinces, and often to send it to Provinces more remote, as their Necessities requir'd: So we observe in the Scripture, that St. Paul, after having made many Collections in Macedonia, Achaia, Galatia, and Corinth, used to send a great Part of them to the Churches in Jerusalem; and after the Death of the Apostles, the same Custom was observ'd by the Bishops their Successors. Afterwards, it was thought more profitable and expedient, that the Faithful should not sell Possessions, to give the Price of them to the Churches; but that the Churches themselves should keep them, that with the Fruits of them, and the other Oblations, they might be enabled to provide for the Poor and their own Wants; and altho' the Administration belong'd solely to the Bishops, yet they being intent on more sublime Works, such as the Preaching of the Gospel, and Convulsion of the Gentiles, left the Care of disposing of the Money to the Deacons; but that did not alter the Method of distributing it, seeing one Portion of it went to the Priests and other Ministers of the Church, who for the most part lived together, and in common, and the Remainder was bestow'd upon the Poor of the Place.

IN Proceſs of Time, in the Pontificate of Simplicius, about the Year 467. there having been ſome Frauds diſcover'd in the Miniſters in the Diſtribution of theſe Revenues, it was ordain'd, That all that was collected from the Incomes and Oblations ſhould be divided into four Parts, one of which was for the Poor, another for the Priests and other Miniſters of the Church, the third for the Biſhop himſelf and the Strangers he uſed to entertain, and the fourth was ſpent in building publick Churches, and in making more ſumptuous Edifices (which began in the Time of Constantine the Great) and encreasing the Number of Ornaments and Holy Veſſels, and repairing the ſame. Neither was that Diſtribution always equal, ſeeing if the Poor were numerous in any City, their Portion was the greater, and if the Churches wanted but little Reparation, their Share was the leſs.

THIS, in ſhort, was the Eccleſiaſtical Polity in theſe three firſt Centuries of the Church, which being confin'd to it ſelf, had no Influence on the Polity of the Empire, and much leſs on the State of theſe Provinces, in which, by reaſon of the cruel Perſecutions, it was ſcarcely thought on. We ſhall behold it in a different Aſpect in the ſucceeding Ages, after Constantine gave it Peace ; but monſtrous enough, and in more ſtrange Forms ſhall we ſee it, in the Ages leſs diſtant from us, when it was not thought enough to have transformed in ſo many Shapes both the Civil and Temporal State of Princes, but it was likewise attempted to ſubject Empire altogether to the Priethood.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K II.

THE Beginning of the fourth Century of Man's Redemption, and the Course of the subsequent Years, brought about such strange Revolutions in the Roman Empire, that being monstrously deform'd in its Head and Members, assuming another Countenance and new Shapes, it was no more known to be the same it formerly had been. For all generous Customs being laid aside, and the Romans having given themselves up a Prey to Ease and Luxury; from robust and courageous, they became effeminate and feeble; from grave, severe and uncorrupted, full of Ambition and dissolute. By which means their military Discipline became enervated and decay'd; and those Arms which formerly had carried Terror and victorious Banners to the utmost Limits of the World, so despicable and unfit for War, that they were no longer able to keep under the Power of the very Nations, over whom they had so much and so often gloriously triumph'd; but, to their eternal Ignominy, yielded, and suffer'd themselves to be shamefully subdued, and the Empire in a short Time destroyed and miserably over-run. Pannonia, Rhetia, Mesia, Thracia, and Illyricum were subdued by the Huns: The two Gallias lost: Spain under the Power of the Vandals and Goths: Africa already possess'd by the Vandals: Britain by the Saxons: And Italy, the Queen of the Provinces, vanquish'd and overcome likewise by the Goths: And Rome itself sack'd and destroyed. Neither had the Romans better Fortune in process of Time in the East.

East. Syria, Phœnicia, Palestine, Egypt, Mesopotamia, Cyprus, Rhodes, Crete and Armenia were possess'd by the Saracens. Asia Minor lost, and at last all the Provinces of the Roman Empire subdued and overcome.

AS the Empire decay'd, so did Learning and all Discipline: The Jurisprudence began to lose its Lustre, and that Dignity, in which, for a Tract of so many Years, so many Civilians, the Favour of the Princes, the Wisdom of the Magistrates, the Learning of the Professors, and the Excellency of the Academies had maintain'd it. The Names of Papinianus, Paulus, and Africanus were no more heard of: The Oracles ceased, we shall never have any more Responsa given us by their Successors; who being of obscure Fame, undertook no other Charge, but to teach in the Academies, that which those great Souls had left by their illustrious Labours. And even of these (such lamentable and calamitous Times succeeding) scarcely a Trace or obscure Knowledge hath reach'd Posterity; which likewise would have been altogether lost, if the Wisdom of Valentinian III. opportunely with his Constitutions, had not restor'd them. And also the Knowledge of the Laws, which was only profess'd by the brightest Genius's of the City of Rome, was now basely manag'd and reduced to be the Employment of the vilest Men in the World.

THOSE prudent and wise Constitutions of the Princes, fram'd with so much Elegancy and Conciseness, were no more read with Admiration and Amazement; but from that Time forward, prolix and swelling ones, more becoming a Declaimer than a Prince, and not to be compared with the first, either for Eloquence, Gravity, or Civil Prudence.

THE Magistrates having lost that Rigour and Learning, took other Names, and with new Names, likewise new Customs; of Uncorrupted became Mercenary; of Wise and Grave, Ignorant and Inconstant; of Moderate, Ambitious; and finally, full of Extortion and so Licentious, that if the Prudence of Constantine, Valentinian, and some other Princes from Time to Time, had not repress'd their Venality and Ambition, by the means of many Edicts¹, which they publish'd for that End, grievous and enormous Disorders would have ensu'd.

THE Academies, by the Ignorance of the Professors, and the depraved Manners of the Youth, were already render'd useless and full of Irregularities. The Youth given up to Riot, intemperate Feasts, Games, Shews, Whores, and a thousand other Sorts of Wickedness, seldom frequented them; so that they would have been altogether laid aside, if the Care of Valentinian the Elder had not been ready to restore them with his XI. Academical Laws, which he directed to Olibrius Præfect of Rome, in the Year 370.

SO many and strange Changes, ought to be attributed not only to corrupt Discipline, and depraved Manners, but likewise to that new Division and new Form, which Constantine was pleased to make in the Empire. He was the first that put in practise that which Diosclesian had attempted formerly, to divide the Roman Empire into two principal Parts, and of one to make two Empires². Forasmuch as altho' sometimes there had been more than one Emperor who reign'd at the same time; nevertheless they had never made any Division amongst them; neither had ever the Empire or the Provinces, or the Legions been allotted by way of Heritage. Constantine was the first, as Eusebius says³, who divided the Roman Empire into two Parts, Quod quidem nunquam antea factum esse memoratur. For which Purpose he applied himself wholly to the founding of Constantinople in the East, in which he employed all his Magnificence and Power, that it might vie with Rome; and as the one was Head in the West, so the other might be in the East⁴. Therefore he divided the Empire into the Eastern and Western, assigning to each its Provinces. All these Ultramarine Provinces, from the Streights of the Hellepont, to the Mouth of the Nile, Egypt, Illyricum, Epirus, Achaia, Greece, Thessaly, Macedonia, Thrace, Crete, Cyprus, all Dacia, Mesia, and the other Provinces of that Tract, he put under the Eastern Empire, and Constantinople as its Head, and were divided into many Jurisdictions. To the Western Empire, and the City of Rome, he left Spain, Britain, the Gallia, Noricum, Pannonia, the Provinces of Germany, Dalmatia, all Africa and Italy; disposing them in such a manner, that two Emperors might govern the Empire, the one in the West, the other in the East. He divided likewise the Senate, and those Senators who were elected for the Provinces of the Western Empire, were to remain at Rome, and those for the Eastern at Constantinople; and divided the Consuls after the same manner. He gave to Constantinople as well as Rome, the Prefecture with the same Pre-eminencies and Privileges; and all the other Parts of the Empire were divided in different Manners. Which new Division we must here distinctly treat of, since it will not only serve for understanding the special Polity, and Temporal State of our Provinces, but also be of Use, for giving a more distinct Knowledge of the Ecclesiastical Polity, and how it came to be introduc'd into the Empire and our Kingdom, in the manner it now is.

Of the Disposition of the Empire under Constantine the Great.

CONSTANTINE, by the Example of his Predecessors, being jealous of the too great Power of the Præfecti Prætorio, who had often usurped the Empire, divided that Office into four Parts, by making four Prefectures, and dividing the Roman World into four Climates or Regions. These encompassed an immense Space of Heaven and Earth; and within their Limits were comprehended many Jurisdictions: These were the Oriental, the Illyrick, the Gallican, and the Italian, to which he gave four Restores, whom he call'd by the ancient Name, but by a new Administration, Præfecti ad Prætorium: We have put Italy in the last Place because we are to stop there.

The O R I E N T A L.

UNDER the Command of the Præfectus Prætorio of the Oriental, he put five Jurisdictions, which were, the Oriental, the Egyptian, the Asiatick, the Pontick, and the Thracian; which Jurisdictions, as is manifest from the Theodosian Code, and from the Acts of some ancient Councils, were made up of many Provinces¹ in those Days.

1. IN the Oriental Jurisdiction, the Head of which was the City of Antioch, there were XV. Provinces. I. Palestine the First, II. Palestine the Second, III. Phœnicia the First, IV. Syria, V. Cilicia, VI. Cyprus, VII. Arabia, VIII. Isauria, IX. Palestine the Healthy, X. Phœnicia of Libanus, XI. Eupbratenfis, XII. Syria the Healthy, XIII. Osdroena, XIV. Mesopotamia, XV. Cilicia the Second.

2. IN the Egyptian Jurisdiction, the Head of which was Alexandria, there were VI. Provinces. I. The Upper Lybia, II. The Lower Lybia, III. The Thebaide, IV. The Egyptick, V. The Arcadian, VI. The Augustianick.

3. IN the Asiatick whose Head was Ephesus, there were X. Provinces. I. Pamphylia, II. Hellespont, III. Lydia, IV. Pisidia, V. Lycaonia, VI. Phrygia Pacasiana, VII. Phrygia the Healthful, VIII. Lycia, IX. Caria, X. The Islands of Rhodes, Lesbos, and those of the Egean Sea.

4. THE Pontick had XI. Provinces, and its Head was Cæsarea, and these were, I. Paphlagonia, II. Galatia, III. Bythinia, IV. Honorides, V. Cappadocia the First, VI. Cappadocia the Second, VII. Pontus Polemoniatus, VIII. Helenopontus, IX. Armenia the First, X. Armenia the Second, XI. Galatia the Healthful.

5. THE Thracian, first had Heraclea for its Head, afterwards Constantinople, and was made up of six Provinces. I. Europe, II. Thracia, III. Emimontus, IV. Rhodore, V. Mesia the Second, VI. Scythia.

The ILLYRIK.

UNDER the Government of the Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum there were two Jurisdictions, the Macedonian and the Dacian.

1. THE Macedonian, the Head of which was Thessalonica, was compos'd of six Provinces. I. Achaia, II. Macedonia, III. Crete, IV. Thessaly, V. Epirus the Old, and Epirus the New, VI. A Part of Macedonia the Healthy.

2. THE Dacian of five. I. The Mediterranean Dacia, II. Dacia Ripensis, III. Mesia the First, IV. Dardania Prevalitana, and V. Part of Macedonia the Healthful.

The GALLICAN.

UNDER the Administration of the Præfectus Prætorio of the Galliæ, there were three Jurisdictions, the Gallican, the Spanish and British.

1. THE Gallican was made up of seventeen Provinces, and were I. The Vienensis, II. The Lugdunensis the First, III. Germania the First, IV. Germania the Second, V. Belgium the First, VI. Belgium the Second, VII. The Maritime Alps, VIII. The Appennine Alps, IX. Maxima Sequana, X. Aquitaine the First, XI. Aquitaine the Second, XII. Novem Populana, or Gascony, XIII. Narbonensis the First, XIV. Narbonensis the Second, XV. Lugdunensis the Second, XVI. Lugdunensis Turonia, XVII. Lugdunensis Senonica.

2. THE Spanish was compos'd of seven Provinces. I. Betica, II. Lusitania, III. Gallicia, IV. Terragonensis, V. Carthaginensis, VI. Tingitania, VII. The Baleares.

3. THAT of Britain of five. I. Maxima Cæsariensis, II. Valentia, III. Britannia Prima, IV. Britannia Secunda, V. Flavia Cæsariensis.

The ITALIAN.

LASTLY, under the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, there were three Jurisdictions; the Italian, the Illyrick, and the African. The Jurisdiction of Illyricum, of which Sirmium was the Head City, was compos'd of six Provinces. I. Pannonia Secunda, II. Savia, III. Dalmatia, IV. Pannonia Prima, V. Noricum Mediterraneum, VI. Noricum Ripense. The African of five. I. Africa, where Carthage stood, II. Bisacena, III. Mauritania Sitipbensis, IV. Mauritania Cæsariensis, V. Tripolitana.

ITALY was divided into seventeen Provinces, as they were distinguish'd under Adrian; and that Division continu'd as far down as Longinus's Time, whose Order, according to the Book of the Notitia of the Empire (which no-body doubts of its being very Ancient, and compos'd in the Time of Theodosius the Younger) is as followeth, I. Venetia, II. Emilia, III. Liguria, IV. Flaminia, and Picenum Anonarium, V. Tuscia and Umbria, VI. Picenum Suburbicarium, VII. Campania, VIII. Sicilia, IX. Puglia and Calabria, X. Lucania and the Bruttii, XI. Alpes Cottiae, XII. Rhetia Prima, XIII. Rhetia Secunda, XIV. Samnium, XV. Valeria, XVI. Sardinia, XVII. Corfica.

*PAUL IWARNIFRIDE*¹, Deacon in Aquileja ranketh them several ways; as for Example, Liguria, which is here in the third Place, and Emilia in the Second, he placeth in the Second and Tenth. But there is a greater Difference amongst them, since Paul, by dividing the Province of the Alps into two, calling the other the Appennine Alps, adds one more to their Number than is describ'd in the Notitia, where only the Alpes Cottiae are found. But he, as Camillus Pellegrinus saith², having made that for his own Pleasure, since he citeth in his own Favour, Aurelius Victor's way of Reasoning against those who did not count them two, and did not rather cite an Imperial Rescript, which would have been a proper Authority for supporting his Belief; so likewise for his own Pleasure he ought to have chang'd the abovesaid Order of ranking, which is of much less Consequence.

ALL these Provinces were not on the same Footing, altho' they all obey'd, and were under the Direction of the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, yet they had several other more immediate Administrators, to whom the Government of them was committed. They were first divided into two Lieutenancies, the one of Rome, and the other of Italy. In the Lieutenancy of Rome there were ten Provinces, Campania, Hetruria and Umbria, Picenum Suburbicarium, Sicilia, Puglia and Calabria, Lucania and the Brutii, Samnium, Sardinia, Corfica, and Valeria. In the Lieutenancy of Italy, the Head of which was *Milan*¹, there were seven Provinces, Liguria, Emilia, Flaminia, and Picenum Annonarium, Venetia, to which afterwards Istria was added, the Alpes Cottiaë, and both the Rhetiaë. The first were under the Government of the Lieutenant of Rome, whence they were call'd Provinciae Suburbicae. The second were under the Lieutenant of Italy, and therefore by some Writers simply call'd Provinces of Italy, distinguishing them from the others; which altho' they were inclosed between the Alps and the two Seas, and so a Part of Italy, (taking that Word in its large Signification) nevertheless, strictly speaking, the Provinces of Italy were those only that were under the Command of the Lieutenant of Italy, whose Seat was Milan. Thus we observe in the Acts of the Council of Sardica, which was celebrated in the Year 347; the Custom then being, that the Bishops who were at the Council, not only sign'd with the Name of their City, but likewise their Province, some of them sign'd after this manner: Januarius a Campania de Benevento. Maximus a Tuscia de Luca. Lucius ab Italia de Verona. Fortunatus ab Italia de Aquileja. Stercorius ab Apulia de Canusio. Securius ab Italia de Ravenna. Ursacius ab Italia de Brixia. Portasius ab Italia de Mediolano, &c. And the Reason was, because Verona, Aquileja, Ravenna, Brescia and Milan were of the Provinces which were under the Government of the Lieutenant of Italy, which could not be said of Beneventum, Lucca, and Canusium, which were in the Provinces of the Lieutenancy of Rome, and not in that of Italy.

THESE Provinces had likewise other more immediate Officers, to each of whom in particular, the Government of a Province was committed; but they were not all of the same Rank and Quality. Some were call'd Consular, because such was the Quality of their Commander: As Venetia, Emilia, Liguria, Flaminia and Picenum Annonarium, Toscana and Umbria, Picenum Suburbicarium, and our Campania. Others were call'd Correetorial, because they were govern'd by Correetores, and not by Consuls; such were Sicilia, Puglia and Calabria; Lucania and the Brutii. And lastly, some were call'd Præsidial, because they were under the Direction of Presidents; and these were the Alpes Cottiaë, the two Rhetias, and our Samnium, Valeria, Sardinia and Corfica. So the Chief Rulers of these Provinces were Præfecti Prætorii, the next Vicarii, and the last and more immediate were Consulares, Correetores and Præsides; of which Offices and Employments it will be necessary briefly to treat in this Place.

Of the Officers of the E M P I R E.

THE Præfetti ad Prætorium were those, on whom, next to Cæsar, all the chief Honours and prime Dignities of the Empire were conferr'd ¹: To them was given the Sword by the Emperor, as a Badge of their great Authority ²: Under whose Management and Government there were many Jurisdictions compos'd of many Provinces: They had under them the Vicarii, the Reſtores of the Provinces, the Conſulares, Correſtores, Præſides, and all the Magiſtrates of theſe Jurisdictions which were under their Care. They were to attend vigilantly, and to ſupply the Defects of theſe Magiſtrates ³, to admoniſh them, to inform them of the Laws; and, in a Word, to watch over all their Actions: Which Magiſtrates for their Part were to have recourſe unto the Præfetti, to report to them, and adviſe with them in dubious and difficult Matters. Moreover, it was lawful to appeal from all the foreſaid Tribunals to the Præfetti, who were to examine into the Cauſes of the Appeals, and to confirm or reſuſe the Sentences; and from the Decisions of the Præſetti Prætorio there was no room for Appealing but only by Retraction, which we now call Reclamation ⁴.

THE Emperors for the moſt part were wont to direct their Statutes to the Præſetti, that they might proclaim them in the Provinces under their Government: They had likewiſe under their Inſpection the Proconſuls, and they had many other Prerogatives, of which Codinus, Gottifredus, and James Guterus have learnedly writter ⁵. There were beſides theſe, two other Præſetti appointed for the Government of the two principal Cities of the World, to wit, Rome and Conſtantinople, under whoſe Power were the Præſetti Annonæ, who had the overſeeing of the Markets, and many other Magiſtrates, who were by various Employments appointed to take Care of, and govern theſe Cities, whom we have no occaſion to mention here.

AFTER the Præſetti the Proconſuls were next; an illuſtrious Dignity, and adorn'd with high Enſigns, the Ax, and the Faſces. In the Eaſt there were two of them, to wit, in Achaia and Aſia, and ſometimes there was a third in Paleſtine. In the Weſt there was only one, and that was in Africa.

THE Vicarii held the third Place, inferior to the Proconſuls, but much ſuperior and more eminent than the other Magiſtrates. Theſe, becauſe they repreſented the Office and Perſon of the Præſetti, were call'd in old Inſcriptions Propræſetti; and were ſet over whole Jurisdictions, and the Provinces of which they were compos'd. They were above Reſtores, and other inferior Magiſtrates. Their principal Care was to inſpect the Tributes and the Annonæ; to puniſh Deſerters and Vagabonds; and keep them till they acquainted the Prince of them ⁶. They not only judg'd ex Ordine, but often ex Appellatione, and ſometimes likewiſe ex Delegato ⁷. The Vicarii had Aſia, Pontica, Thracia the Eaſt, Macedonia, Africa, Spain, Gallia, and Britain. There was beſides, the Vicarius of the City of Rome, under whoſe Direction, as hath been ſaid, were ſome Provinces of Italy; on which account they were call'd Provinciae Suburbicariae. Italy also had its Vicarius, under whose Government were some other Provinces, whence they were properly said to be of Italy. And all these, as being of a high and eminent Degree, were call'd Judices Majores ¹.

T H E N follow'd the Officers of lower Degree, for which they were call'd Judices Minores; among these the Rectores of Provinces were the Chief, to whom the Government and Administration of some of them was given: These were under the Direction of the Propraefecti P. to whom Appeals could be made. They had Jus gladii; and their principal Charge was to determine Pleas both Civil and Criminal, either where the Goods or the Life of Men were concern'd; and to see that no Wrong or Detriment was done by the lesser Officers to their Provincials; and for that End, they were oblig'd at certain Times of the Year to make Circuits over all the Province, not only in the Cities, but likewise in all the Villages, to hear the Complaints of the Provincials, and diligently to enquire into the Insolencies and Disorders that had happened, and to redress them. To them was directed that Golden Edict, which punish'd Bribery and Extortion so severely in Magistrates, which we read in the Theodosian Code ².

I N the second Place were the Consulares, to whom the Government of one single Province was committed. These were of greater Dignity than the Correctores and the Præsides; and they had likewise for their Badge the Fasces, and were distinguish'd by the Title of Clarissimi. The Emperors were wont also to direct their Constitutions to the Consulares; and on that account they were of greater Dignity than the Correctoriales and the Præsidiales. Among others, Phœnicia had its Consularis, who had his Residence sometimes in Tyre, sometimes in Berytis, and sometimes in Damascus, to whom many Laws were directed by the Emperors. All the most noted Provinces of Italy were for the most part under the Government of the Consulares, such as Emilia, Liguria, Venetia, Picenum, Sicilia, Flaminia, and our Campania.

N E X T to the Consulares were the Correctores, to whom likewise was committed the Government of Provinces, under the Direction of the P. P. and were also dignified with the Title of Clarissimi. These were scarcely any thing inferior to the Consulares, therefore much above the Dignity of the Præsides: And also to them the Princes directed their Constitutions. Some Provinces of Italy were govern'd by Correctores, such as Toscany, whose Residence was in Florence ³: Puglia and Calabria, Lucania and the Bruttii, of which we shall hereafter treat more distinctly.

I N the last Place come the Præsides, to whom likewise the Government of Provinces was committed; they were also called Clarissimi, and had for Ensign the Banner, and were under the Command of the P. P. The other Provinces of Italy were under the Administration of the Præsides, such as Samnium, Valeria, the Alps, the two Rhetias, Sardinia, and Corfica; and seldom did the Emperors direct their Constitutions to them. James Guterus ⁴ ranketh them otherwise, putting the Præsides first, next the Consulares, after them the Correctores, and in the last Place the Rectores of Provinces, following in that Zeno ⁵ in one of his Constitutions, which we read in the Justinian Code. But we rather choose with Gotifredus ⁶ to follow the Order held by the Emperor Gratian in the Theodosian Code, where the Præsides are in the last Place.

C H A P. III.

Of the Officers to whom the Government of our Provinces was committed.

THAT which we now call the Kingdom of Naples, whether we regard the Disposition of Adrian, or that of Constantine, was divided into four Provinces only; so that Campania is not now altogether within its Bounds, but part of it is without them, and comprehendeth several Countries which now belong to the State of the Church of Rome. These Provinces were I. Campania, II. Puglia and Calabria, III. Lucania and the Brutii, IV. Sannium. Of which one was Consular; two Correctorial; and the other Præsidial. And all of them in the Vicariate of the City of Rome; for which reason they were all call'd Suburbicariæ.

IN the mean time, the Order of this Work requireth, that we should discourse severally of each of these Provinces; of the Magistrates to whom the Government of them was committed; of the Laws, and their Institution; that we may see what Form of Polity they had in the Time of Constantine, down to the last Emperors of the West.

S E C T. I.

Of CAMPANIA and its Consulares.

THAT Country, which, as Paul¹ Warnisfrides saith, for the Fertility and Pleasantness of the Fields which are about Capua, was call'd Campania, had of Old at different Times, sometimes more narrow, sometimes more spacious Bounds, than it hath at this Day. Once it was extended from the Precincts of Rome to the River Silaris in Lucania; it included Beneventum: On the other side it spread its Limits to Equo-Tutico, now call'd Ariano. It was therefore reputed one of the most famous and noted Provinces of Italy; and for the Largeness of its Extent, and the many and famous Cities which adorn'd it, but especially Capua its Head and Metropolis, it was renown'd and illustrious; therefore, for the Government and Administration of this Province there were no Correctores nor Præsides sent, but Consulares: A Magistrate, as is said, altho' inferior to the P. P. and the Vicarius of Rome, under whose Direction it was govern'd, nevertheless adorn'd with greater Prerogatives than the Correctores and the Præsides. Their Seat was at Capua: It was in such Esteem with the Emperors, that frequently they directed the Constitutions and Imperial Mandates to them.

CONSTANTINE the Great, after having defeated and kill'd Maxentius (who had caus'd himself to be proclaim'd Augustus in Rome, and had lorded it for six Years over Italy) triumphing in Rome and all Italy, and all the other Provinces of the West submitting themselves willingly to his Government, as the Galliæ, Spain, and Britain had done before them, while in the Year 313. he resided in that City, he began to repair the Damages which Italy had sustain'd, and to provide for its Necessities. He publish'd, for that End, many profitable and wholesome Decrees, which he directed to the People of Rome, and which we have to this Day in the Theodosian Code ¹; and from thence going to Milan, by Means of other Edicts, which he publish'd in that City, he re-establish'd the Affairs of Italy the best Way he could. Afterwards he went into Gallia and Pannonia, and having made Peace with Licinius, from thence he return'd to Italy, and in the Year 315, he staid some time in Aquileja, and from that went to Rome and Milan: And in the succeeding Years, after he had travell'd into Dacia and Gallia, he returned to Rome in the Year 319, where, for the four Years following, he was busied and intent, as much as in him lay, by various Edicts in restoring the Affairs of Rome and Italy to their ancient Form.

BUT afterwards passing into the East, and in the Year 325, having vanquish'd and kill'd Licinius, and being now Monarch of all the Empire, he began (as Pagi ², contrary to the common Belief, attempteth to prove) to lay the Foundation of New Rome; and although in the following Year 326, returning into Italy, by Aquileja, he went to Milan, and thence to Rome; nevertheless he afterwards left that City and never return'd, but remov'd his Court into the East for ever; where, in the Year 328, being desirous to finish the huge Bulk of Constantinople, he apply'd himself to it with all his Care and Industry, and there he spent the Remainder of his Life, being satisfied to look on the Affairs of these our Parts at a Distance. Hence arose all the Mischiefs in the West, which in Process of Time brought on the Destruction of Rome, and the Dissolution of the Empire: From thence so many Complaints of the Romans; which gave occasion to Porphyrius, in his Panegyrick on Constantine, conjuring him, to say,

Et reparata jugans mæsti divortia Mundi
Orbes junde pares: det Leges Roma volentes
Principe te in Populos.

For which Cause some have reputed him rather the Destroyer of ancient Rome than the Builder of the New. Having entrusted the Government of Italy to his Officers, all good Discipline began to decay; and he being at a Distance, they abused the great Power that was put in their Hands, and in a short Time the Strength and Vigour of these our Provinces began to decline. He left the Administration to the Præfectus Prætorio, to the Vicarii, and lastly to the Consulares, the Correctores, and the Præsides, to whom the Government of each Province was committed.

THE Præfectus Prætorio of Italy under that Prince, in the Year 321, was Menandrus: In the following Years, 334, 335, and 336, Felix was; who, from being Præses of Corfica in the Year 319, was in these Years advanc'd by Constantine to such a high Dignity. He had for his Successor in the same Year 336, Gregorius, of whom Optatus Milevitanus in his Books frequently maketh mention. Of the Vicarii of Rome who govern'd under Constantine, there is no other Memory, but of a certain Gennarus or Gennarinus ³, in the Year 320.

BUT as for the Consulares of this our Province of Campania, we are necessitated, from long Oblivion, where they have been bury'd to this Day, to subtract the Records of them.

THE first, of whom we have any Account, that govern'd under Constantine the Great immediately in our Campania, was Barbarius Pompejanus. He, as all the other Consulares of this Province did, kept his Residence in Capua, which was the Head of it and the Metropolis. Constantine the Great, in the Year 333. while he staid in Thracia, and properly in Apros, a Place not far distant from Constantinople, directed to him, at his Request, that so renown'd and famous Constitution ⁴, by which it was enjoyn'd to all Magistrates, to enquire narrowly into the Truth of the Supplications, contain'd in the Rescripts obtained from the Prince, so as

that

that they might not be put in Execution, if the Allegation of the Party was not conformable to Truth; with which Justinian was so well pleased, that he would have inserted it in his Code likewise¹; which the Popes since have also imitated, by inserting it in their Decretals².

THE other Consularis of this Province, who govern'd under the same Prince, was Mavortius Lollianus, from the Testimony which Julius Firmicius gives us³: To him, Firmicius, in the Reign of Constantine, dedicated his Books of Astronomy, extolling, in the Preface of the Work, the great Merits of such a great Personage⁴, who after having laid down the Badge of Consularis of Campania, was, by Constantine, rais'd to higher Honour, by giving him the Government of all the East, and lastly the Badge of an ordinary Consul; and Constantine being dead, he was afterwards in the Year 342, under Constans, again made Præfectus of the City of Rome; and under Constantius, his Brother, was likewise made Præfectus Prætorio of Italy. Ammianus Marcellinus maketh mention of him also, in which Author, in the Transactions of the Year 356, we likewise find his Elogy⁵.

WE have no Knowledge of any other Consulares of this Province during the Reign of Constantine: Neither do we read in the Theodosian Code, any other Constitutions of that Prince directed to any other Consulares of our Campania; yet there are not wanting in his other Edicts directed to the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, or to the Vicarius of Rome, to whom he not only enjoine the Care of the Jurisdictions committed to their Charge in general, but in many of his Laws, other special Provisions are made for this Province in particular.

IN the mean time, in the Month of May in the Year 337, this Prince died, whose magnanimous Enterprizes gave him the Surname of Great, and his Son Constans succeeded to the Empire of the West; to whom, by the Division made with his other Brothers, Africa, Illyricum, Macedonia, Græcia, and Italy belong'd, and consequently these our Provinces. On which Account, we read many Constitutions of this Prince in the Theodosian Code, concerning the Government of them, and particularly of Campania; and tho' we know not the particular Consularis who had this Province under Constans, yet we see his Laws, by which we perceive that he had the particular Care of it much at Heart. Of this Prince is that Law inserted in the abovesaid Code, under the Title de Salgamo, read and accepted in Capua, the Metropolis of this Province, proclaimed by him in the Year 340, for repressing the Insolency of the Soldiers, who, on Occasion of the War he had at that Time in Italy, with Constantine his Brother (who that same Year was vanquish'd and kill'd near Aquileja) were making Disturbance in Campania, and by their Misbehaviour and military Licentiousness, were robbing the People both of their Honour and Substance; and what Athanasius writeth in his Apology to *Constantius*⁶, is a strong Argument for making us believe, that Constans had made some Stay this Year in Capua.

BUT about the Year 350, Constans dying, ten Years after his Brother Constantine, his other Brother Constantius remain'd sole Emperor; by which, these our Provinces, with Italy, fell under his Empire. In whose Reign, in the Years 352 and 353, Merilius Larianus was Præfectus Prætorio of Italy; to whom succeeded Mavortius Lollianus in the same Year 353. In this and the following Years, Taurus was Consularis of our Campania, to whom Constantius directed many of his Constitutions. At the same Time, Volusianus govern'd as Vicarius of Rome, to whom likewise Constantius directed many of his Laws⁷. And altho' we know not who were Consulares of Campania under this Prince, neither do we read of their Names, nor any Edicts directed to them by Constantius, nevertheless there are many of his Constitutions directed to the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, by which he taketh particular Care of this Province. Indeed, in the Year 355, he directed one of his Constitutions to Mavortius Lollianus at that time P. P. of Italy, which, because it concern'd the Affairs of this Province, was read and proclaim'd in Capua, as the Subscription testifieth⁸. And it was this Prince, who, to remove all Debates about Jurisdiction, which often fell out between the Præfecti P. of Italy, and the Præfecti of Rome, concerning Appeals, divided the Provinces; and while he resided in Sirmium, an illustrious City in Pannonia, in the Year 357, he directed to Taurus P. P. of Italy, that famous Constitution¹, whereby he ordain'd, That all Appeals from Sicily, Sardinia, our Campania, Puglia, and Calabria, Lucania and the Brutii, Picenum, Emilia, Venetia, and the other Provinces of Italy, should be brought to Rome, not to be decided by the Præfectus of Rome, but by the Præfectus of Italy.

CONSTANTIUS govern'd the Empire eleven Years, having finish'd his Days in the Year 361, and Julianus succceeded him, to whom these our Provinces likewise fell. Mamertinus was P. P. of Italy under him, and Imerius Vicarius of Rome; to them Julianus, and particularly to the first, directed many Laws. *Symmachus*² sheweth plainly in the Tenth Book of his Epistles, who were the Consulares of Campania in the Reign of Julianus. Where he maketh appear, the Conjunction which was in those Days between the People of Pozzuolo and those of Terracina, who were both under the same Consularis: Symmachus saith, That Lupus being Consularis of Campania, under Julianus, perceiv'd well, and consider'd the distressed Circumstances of the Inhabitants of Terracina. They preserve the Memory of this Lupus to this Day in Capua, by an Inscription on Marble fix'd in the Wall of the Church belonging to the Carmelite Fryars, where we read these Words, altho' something defaced³.

FROM the same Epistle of Symmachus we likewise gather, that Lupus was succeeded in that Command by Campanus. The Memory of another Consularis of Campania is likewise preserv'd in Naples, call'd Posthumius Lampadius: The Marble may yet be seen lying on the Ground before the Church of the Rotunda; on which we read,

BUT in the Theodosian Code there is no Vestige, that either by Julianus or his Successor, there had been any Edict or Imperial Mandate directed to them.

JULIANUS dying in the Persian War in the Year 363. and likewise soon after him Jovianus; the Reign of that most religious Prince⁴ having been only eight Months, if we will believe *Zosimus*⁵ and Sozomenus, or Ten according to *Philostorgius*⁶; Valentinian was assum'd to the Empire, who gave his Brother Valens the Title of Augustus; by which means the Empire was divided betwixt them⁷.

VALENTINIAN kept the West intirely to himself, that is to say, all Illyricum, with Macedonia, Africa, the Gallia, Spain, Britain, and Italy; and left all the East to *Valens*⁸.

VALENTINIAN then, to whom Italy was subject, after having travell'd over the other Countries of his Empire, and having provided what was necessary for them, came into Italy, and first to Aquileja, where in the two Months of September and October only, in the Year 364. he publish'd ten Constitutions, and employ'd his Time in looking after the State and Government of Italy; and many Edicts were directed by that most prudent Prince⁹, as well to the Consularis of Campania, as to the Correctores of Lucania, the Brutii and Tuscany, and to Mamertinus at that Time Præfectus of Italy.

THERE govern'd in his Empire as Præfecti P. of Italy, Mamertinus, so much renown'd in the Works of Ammianus Marcellinus, Rufinus, Probus, and lastly Maximinus. In the Year 364, Severus was Vicarius of Rome, and in the Year 367.

Magnus, and in 372. Probus, and in 373. Simplicius. We read also of more Consulares of our Campania, to whom diverse Laws were directed.

IN the Year 364. Bulephorus was Consularis of Campania, to whom, while Valentinian resided in Altinum a Venetian City, there were two Constitutions directed, which we read in the Theodosian Code; the one under the Title Quibus equorum usus, the other under the Title Usus interd. By which the Exportation of Horses and Arms was severely prohibited, ordaining that no Person should export them without his Licence, in order to extirpate Theft and many other Disorders out of that Province. To the same Bulephorus, while he was Consularis of Campania, he directed in the following Year 365. that other Constitution which we read under the Title De cursu Publico?, while he stay'd in Milan. This Prince likewise made very proper Regulations, in order to exterminate the Robbers who greatly infested Campania, and to restore Peace and Tranquillity in this Province. The L. 1. de Pastis, and some other Constitutions were likewise his, by which he took Care of the Quiet of Italy, and particularly of the Provinces which compose the Kingdom of Naples. He, also in the same Year 365. while he was in Verona, made Provision for the common good of Avellina, a City within the Confines of this Province, commanding, by a particular Constitution¹, which we read in the Theodosian Code, the abolishing of all that had been done by the Judge Ordinary, in prejudice of that Community contrary to their ancient Custom.

FOELIX succeeded in this Year 365. as Consularis, to Bulephorus, to whom, the same Year, Valentinian being in Milan, directed that Constitution² which we read in C. Theod. under the Title Ad S. C. Claudianum; of which also, the Author of that ancient Consultation inserted by Cujacius amongst his own in cap. 10. maketh mention. And altho' that Author in place of Campania writeth Macedonia, nevertheless, as the most exact *Gotifredus*³ observeth, the Subscription which it beareth ought to convince us of the Mistake, by which it is clear, that it had been subscrib'd by Valentinian Emperor of the West, while he was in Milan, and consequently ought to belong to the West, and not to the East, where Macedonia is situated.

TO Felix, under the same Valentinian, Amphilochius succeeded in the Charge of Campania. To whom, in the Year 370. Valentinian being in Triers, directed that Law, which under the Title de Decurionibus, is yet seen in the Theodosian Code⁴.

VALENTINIAN govern'd the West, Italy and these our Provinces, with so much Prudence, that there was nothing more could be desired: He re-establish'd the Academy of Rome; and restored the Jurisprudence already much decay'd, and almost nothing left of its ancient Lustre and Renown: He suppress'd the Extortion and Venality of the Judges by various Edicts. A most religious Prince, to whom, next to Constantine the Great, the Christian Religion is much indebted; and Italy would have reaped much Benefit by him, if he had not been snatch'd from the World after only twelve Years Reign.

VALENTINIAN dying in the Year 374. six Days after, his Son Valentinian was made Emperor in Pannonia, who with Gratian his Brother divided the Empire of the West after this manner (the East being govern'd by Valens their Uncle) to Gratian belong'd the Galliae, Spain and Britain; and to Valentinian, Illyricum, Africa and *Italy*⁵.

UNDER Valentinian II. and Gratian, Maximinus, Antoninus, Hesperius, Probus, Sigarius, Ipatus, Flavianus, Principius, Eusignius and Pretestatus: Under Valentinian alone, Trisolius, Polemius, Tetianus, Apodemius, Dexter and Eusebius were Præfetti P. of Italy; and Potitus, Antidius, Ellenius and Orientius were Vicarii of *Rome*⁶.

BUT there is no Vestige remaining of those who were Consulares of Campania under this Emperor. Nevertheless there are many Constitutions of Valentinian II. who having reign'd eighteen Years, took great Care in providing for the Government of these Provinces, and of Italy in general. That Law⁷, which under the Title de Extra ordin. we read in Cod. Theod. is of this Prince, which in the Year 382. he directed to Segarius Præfectus P. of Italy, by which he taketh Care of Campania, Puglia and Calabria, Lucania and the Brutii, which were much troubled and afflicted in these Times.

VALENTINIAN II. died in Vienna in the Year 392, after having reign'd eighteen Years; and after him Theodosius the Great, Arcadius and Honorius his Sons succeeded. The West fell to Honorius, by which Italy and these our Provinces were subject to him. And Theodosius dying in the Year 395. Honorius then govern'd all the West, while Arcadius his elder Brother reign'd in the East. Many were the Præfecti P. of Italy under Honorius, who liv'd long, and commanded the Western Empire Thirty-one Years; and these were, Messala, Theodorus, Adrianus, Longinianus, Senator, Curtius, Theodorus II. Cecilianus, Jovius, Joannes, Palladius, Melittius, Liberius, Felix, Faustinus, Joannes, Selevius, Adrianus, Palladius, Joannes and Proculus. The Vicarii of Rome, who govern'd in the Time of Honorius, were Varus and *Benignus*¹; and of Consulares of Campania, we read under him only Gracchus, to whom, while Honorius resided in Milan, he directed in the Year 397, that Constitution which we read in the Theodosian Code under the Title *de Collegiatis*². Honorius likewise provided for this Province, in granting some Privileges concerning paying of Tributes, which is evident from that Constitution³ he directed to Dexter Præfectus P. of Italy. And we have many other Laws by which he governed these our Provinces, at the same time that Theodosius the younger Son of Arcadius reign'd in the East.

AT last Honorius dying in Ravenna in the Year 423. altho' Theodosius the Younger reign'd over both the Empires alone for a Year, nevertheless in the following Year 424. he made Valentinian III. Emperor of the West, to whom Italy with our Provinces were subjected. Under him Volusianus and Theodosius were Præfecti P. of Italy. And altho' we read not of any Constitutions of this Valentinianus directed to the Consulares of Campania, nevertheless he was a Prince, to whom not only Italy and these our Provinces owed a great deal, for his particular Care and provident Government of them, but likewise our Jurisprudence, which was heretofore much decayed, he restored in the West, at the same time that Theodosius his Colleague was wholly intent upon restoring it in the East; of which in a more proper Place we shall treat at large. These then were the Officers by whom in the Reign of Constantine the Great, to the End of that of Valentinian III. our Campania was govern'd. Therefore we observe some Marbles of ancient Buildings in the Cities of this Province, for good Deeds done by the Consulares of Campania, inscrib'd to them by the Inhabitants of Campania, Naples, Beneventum, and others, which may be seen in that laborious Work of Gruterus of the Inscriptions of the old Roman World; and in Capua and Naples, as we have shewed, their Memory is preserv'd to this Day. Capua was the Place of their Residence, as being in those Times the Head and Metropolis of Campania, as Athanasius calls it⁴, who speaking in his Epistola ad Solitarios of the Council of Sardica, and of the Legates sent by him, amongst whom was Vincentius Bishop of Capua, in order to induce the Emperor Constantius to allow the Bishops whom he had driven away, to return, saith, Missis a Sancto Concilio in Legationem Episcopis Vincentio Capuæ, quæ Metropolis est Campaniæ, &c. And for that Reason we see many Constitutions in the Theodosian Code, read and accepted in Capua, because the Consularis who resided in that City, was to publish them, and to take care they should be dispersed thro' the other Cities of that Province, that they might be known to all the Inhabitants.

Of Puglia and Calabria, and their Correctores.

AFTER Campania, Puglia and Calabria follow, in which is the Country of the Salentini, who being united together according to the Book of the Notitia of the two Empires, form the ninth Province of Italy, and according to the Reckoning of *Paulus Diaconus*¹, the Fifteenth. This large Province extendeth itself Eastward to the Adriatick Sea which confineth it, and towards the West and South its Bounds were Samnium, the Brutii and Lucania. Its most famous and flourishing Cities were Lucera, Sipontum, Canosa, Acerenza, Venosa, Brundisium and Tarentum, and in the West Point of Italy, which extendeth itself for fifty Miles, is Otranto, a commodious City, and fitted for any Commerce, and deservedly may be call'd its common Mart.

PUGLIA and Calabria then were under one Government. For Largeness and Extent this Province required to be govern'd by a Corrector, and not by a Præses, who was an inferior Officer. But who were the Correctores of this Province, or where they had their Residence, nothing can be affirmed for certain. There is not one Imperial Edict in the Theodosian Code, directed to these Correctores: Only in Venosa, a City of Puglia, among the ancient Monuments which are preserv'd, we read an Inscription on which a certain Emilius Restitutus Corrector of Puglia is mentioned in these Words:

LUCULLANORUM PROLE, ROMANA
AEMILIUS. RESTITUTIANUS
V. C. CORECTOR. APULIAE. ET. CALABRIAE
IN. HONOREM
SPLENDIDAE. CIVITATIS. VENUSINORUM
CONSECRAVIT

Symmachus ² likewise maketh mention of the Correctores of Puglia, whom he also improperly calleth Rectores. Sometimes instead of a Corrector, a Magistrate of equal Power was sent into the Provinces who was call'd Juridicus. Of whom two Inscriptions reported by Guterus ³ preserve the Memory; one of them we read thus:

HERCULI. CONSERVATORI
PRO. SALUTE. L. RAGONI
JURIDIC. PER. APULIAM
PRAEF. J. D.

The other which is in Rome,

C. SALIO. ARISTAENETO. C. V.
JURIDICO. PER. PICENUM. ET
APULIAM

WE meet frequently with many Laws in the Theodosian Code, by which there was particular Provision made for the Necessities of that Province. It was under (besides the Corrector who had the immediate Command of it) the Direction of the Præfectus P. of Italy, to whom, by way of Appeal, they had recourse; and tho' there be no Constitutions directed to the Correctores, yet there are not wanting of them directed to the Præfectus P. of Italy concerning the Government of the same. In the Reign of Valentinian the Elder, it was infested and troubled with Robbers; so that it behoved that most prudent Prince to make severe Laws for restraining and rooting them out; and for that end, directed his Constitution to Rufinus at that Time P. P. of Italy in Place of Mamertinus, whose Business it was to take Care of that Province, as well as the others of Italy, by which Constitution ⁴ a timely Remedy was procur'd for so great an Evil.

THERE is likewise in the same Code another Law of the same Valentinian, dated in Lucera in the Year 365. with this Subscription: VNI. KAL. Octobris. Dat. Luceriae ad Rufinum (in Locum Mamertim) P F. P. Italiae. James Gotofredus ⁵ suspecteth, that this Lucera is not that of Puglia, but the other situated in Gallia Circumpadana, betwixt Milan, Verona and Aqueleja, now call'd Luzara; but by what may be gathered from the Argument of that Law, and its relating to Pasturage, we have greater Ground to believe that it was this Lucera in Puglia, because of its fruitful and plain Fields, which the other never had, for feeding Herds of Cattle, and Flocks of Sheep, on which Account it was famous and remarkable among the Romans, and all Writers of Rural and Pastoral Matters, and also over all Europe. But be that as it will, it is most certain, that the other Emperors of the West, to whom the Government of Italy belong'd, took as great Care of this Province as of any other.

IN the Reign of Honorius, Puglia and Calabria were infested with Jews, who, by their living licentiously, were the Occasion of no small Confusion, and of great Detriment to the Christian Religion: At the same time, Theodorus, a most religious Man, was Præfectus P. of Italy, as vehement an Enemy to that Nation, as he was a Lover of the Christian Religion; insomuch, that he deserv'd that Esteem which St. Augustine had for his Person, by dedicating to him that Book of his, intitled, de Vita Beata, as he himself testifieth¹. For remedying so great an Evil, Theodorus order'd the Suppressing of such an insolent and licentious Life which the Jews led; for which End, he obtain'd from Honorius, that so Praiseworthy and never-enough to be extoll'd Constitution², with which he repressed their Arrogance, and subjected them to very hard Conditions.

HONORIUS likewise, in the Year 413, granted some Immunity and Indulgence in the Tribute, to this Province, as we read in one of his Constitutions³, of which we shall discourse in a more fit Place: There are not wanting other Constitutions relating to the Government and right Administration of so vast and considerable a Province by other Princes, directed to the Præfecti P. of Italy, of which we shall speak in a proper Place.

Of Lucania and the Brutii, and their Correctores.

LUCANIA extended her ample Bounds much farther of old than at present; beginning at the River Silaris, it did not only include what is now call'd the Basilicata, but on the other hand stretch'd it self as far as Salernum, so that this very City was within its Limits; since the Correctores of Lucania likewise were wont to reside there. To it the Brutii were join'd, in what concern'd the Administration, who reach'd beyond Rhegium to the Sicilian Streights at the furthest Point of Italy.

THE Lucanians and the Brutii were under the same Government. The Corrector that was sent by the Emperors for the Government of these Provinces, had an equal Command over both. His Dignity, altho' not so great as that of the Consulares, was much greater than that of the Præsides, and was only dependent upon, and subordinate to the Præfectus P. of Italy, and the Vicarius of Rome, to whom they could have recourse.

THEIR Residence was in the City of Rhegium, Head and Metropolis of that Province, although sometimes the Correctores us'd to remove it to Salernum in Lucania, as the Necessity of the Publick Affairs requir'd: whence it is, that in these two Cities, to this Day, are seen some Remains of Marble Stones, which had been inscrib'd to the Correctores: In Rhegium, in the Church of the Catholica, is to be read, altho' something worn out by Time, this Inscription:

CORRETTORI LUCANIÆ
ET BRITTIORUM INTE-
GRITATIS. CONSTANTIÆ
MODERATIONIS. ANTI-
STI. ORDO. POPULUSQUE
RHEGINUS.

AND in the City of Salernum, on an Arch which was formerly, where the Seat of the Portaretese is now, there were to be seen some Statues of Marble upon their Bases, on one of which were these Words ¹:

ANNIO. VITTORINO. V. C.
CORRECTORI. LUCANIE
ET. BRUTIORUM. OB
INSIGNEM. BENEVOLEN-
TIAM. EJUS. ORDO. POPU-
LUSQUE. SALERNITANUS.

THE Emperors were likewise wont to direct their Constitutions to these Correctores, which, for the Good of the Provinces, and quieting of any Disorders that might happen in them, they were oblig'd to publish; and this Province can boast, That the first Laws which were publish'd in Italy after the Defeat of Maxentius by Constantine the Great, were those which were sent to the Correctores of Lucania and the Brutii; so that there is an earlier Account of Correctores in this Province, than of the Consulares of Campania.

THE first who govern'd this Province, in the Beginning of the Reign of Constantine, was Claudius Plotianus, to whom, in the Year 313, a little after the Defeat of Maxentius, Constantine being in Triers, directed these two Constitutions, which we read in the Theodosian Code ², by which he put into a new Method, the Reports which the Judges, when they were doubtful, made to the Emperor in the Cases of private Men.

CLAUDIUS was succeeded by Mechilius Ilarianus in the Year 316, to whom Constantine, the same Year, sent that Law which we see in the Theodosian Code ³, under the Tit. de Decur. and which, by our Justinian, bearing the same Inscription of Ilarianus Corrector of Lucania, was inserted in his Code under the same Title ⁴. And to the same Corrector was directed the other Constitution of Constantine, which we read under the Title Ad L. Corn. de Faljo in the Theodosian Code ⁵.

OCTAVIANUS succeeded Ilarianus in the Year 319, in the Dignity of Corrector of Lucania, to whom, while he was residing in Rhegium, Constantine the Great directed the L. 1. de Filiis Milit. Apparit. which was read and accepted in Rhegium as the Seat of the Correctores ⁶.

BUT there is no Record so clear and remarkable, that lets us see in how great Esteem and eminent Degree the Correctores of Lucania were, as that famous and noted Constitution of Constantine, which we read in the Theodosian Code, under the Title de Episcopis, which he directed to this Octavianus Corrector of Lucania in the same Year 319; by which he exempted the Clergy from Civil Functions, that they might not be diverted from the dutiful Attendance on sacred Things. Constantine had indited such another Law in the same Words, and had directed it to Anulinus Proconsul of Africa seven Years before; and as Gotifredus accurately observeth, this Constitution was like that, but however not the same, which he afterwards sent to Octavianus: This famous Constitution was omitted by Justinian in his Code, because many such Laws are inserted in it; but Cardinal Baronius ⁷ relateth it punctually in the same Year 319.

THE RE is not the least mention of those who were Correctores of Lucania under the Empires of Constans, Constantius, and Julianus; we not being able to shew any Constitution directed to them by these Princes: But there are not wanting Edicts sent to the Præfetti P. of Italy, which demonstrate what Care they had of the Affairs of Italy, and of these Provinces in particular.

BUT we can give a particular Account of the Names of those who were Correctores of Lucania under Valentinianus. Artemius was the first, who is often mention'd in the History of Ammianus Marcellinus ⁸: To him, when Valentinianus was in Aquileja in the Year 364, he directed that Constitution which we read under the Title Privil. Apparit. Magistr. And from the Inscription of that Law we learn, that this Artemius frequently had his Residence in Salernum, since it was there read and accepted. To this same Artemius, while Valentinian was yet in Aquileja, were directed the Edicts, L. 6. de Privileg. eor. qui in Sacr. Palat. and L. 21. de Cursu Publico.

BUT the Dignity of the Correctores of Lucania, and of this Artemius, and the Value the Emperors had for them, appear in nothing more than in this Constitution¹, never enough to be extoll'd, which we read under the Title de Officio Reſtoris Provinciæ, which was directed by Valentinian I. from Aquileja in the Year 364. to Artemius. The most respectful and remarkable Titles that could be expected from any Prince, were profusely bestow'd on this Corrector of Lucania; Carissime nobis: Gravitas tua: Sublimitas tua, and such like, were the most frequent. To him was directed that Constitution, in which he urgeth the Integrity of Judges, and their Diligence in dispatching of Law-Suits: That they should hear and determine Causes, whether they concern'd Mens Lives or Estates, publickly, and in the View of all the World, not privately and in a Corner, where there was Opportunity for Sollicitations and Venality; and the Sentence being once pronounc'd, ought to be publish'd and read in the Hearing of all present, that every Body might know what the Judges did, whether they judg'd conformable to Law and Justice, or perversly for gratifying one of the Parties; whence it is, that in the Tribunals of this Kingdom, it always was, and continues to be a Custom to this Day, to read and publish the Sentences, altho', at present, 'tis become a meer Ceremony and Formality. Publick Shews and merry Entertainments were forbidden to Judges, that they might not be diverted from, or turn careless of the Publick and Private Benefit, and withdrawn from serious and grave Actions.

SYMMACHIUS govern'd Lucania and the Brutii, likewise under Valentinian I. who succeeded Artemius the Year following 365. That Constitution which we read² under the Title de Cursu Publico in the Theodosian Code, while that Prince was in Milan, was sent to Symmachus then Corrector of this Province. There is no Memory of any other Correctores of Lucania in that Code before this Time, neither under this nor any other of the Emperors his Successors; altho' there is a Constitution³ of Theodosius the Great, which goes likewise under the Name of Valentinian II. under the Title de contr. Erupt. accepted and publish'd in Rhegium in the Year 384. and another⁴ also accepted in Rhegium under the Title de Operibus Publicis; yet it ought not to be understood of Rhegium, which is situated among the Brutii; but as the most exact Gotifredus remarketh, of another Rhegium in the East, twelve Miles from Constantinople; which is evident, not only because Italy was not within the Empire of Theodosius the Great, but was comprehended in the Western, govern'd by Valentinian II.; but besides, these Laws were directed by Theodosius, the first to Cinegius, the other to Cæsarius, both of them Præfetti P. of the Eastern Empire, of which Theodosius was Emperor. And we must not omit, in this Place, to take Notice of the Custom of the Emperors of those Times, who, altho' the Roman Empire was divided amongst them, and that each of them govern'd his own Share, and did not concern himself with that of the other, yet nevertheless the Laws, which were publish'd in their Dominions, bore the Names of all the Emperors who then reign'd in the Empire, altho' they were made by one only⁵. In like manner 'tis to be observ'd in publick Monuments, that albeit the Work had been erected for one only, nevertheless it bore the Names of all the reigning Emperors. The Ignorance of which Custom hath been the Occasion of many gross Mistakes in abundance of Writers, and the Laws of one Prince have been ascribed to another; of which, as Occasion offers, we shall give Examples.

WE find in the same Theodosian Code, many other Constitutions of Princes, which, (altho' not directed to the Correctores of this Province, but either to the Præfetti of Italy, or to other Magistrates) shew what Care and Concern they had for the Lucanians and the Brutii. These People, as all the other of these Provinces, were oblig'd to carry Wine to Rome for the Provision of that City, but they being at such a Distance from it, were allow'd to pay Money in Place of the Wine ¹.

HONORIUS exempted them from Tribute and Customs, as may be seen in that his Constitution, which we read in the Theodosian Code ² under the Title de Indulg. Debit. So much for Lucania and the Brutii, and their Correñores.

SECT. IV.

Of SAMNIUM, and its Præsides.

SAMNIUM is ranked last; altho' a Province noted and famous enough with the ancient Romans, for the Boldness and Valour of its Inhabitants, and the Success of their Arms, that they boasted to have frequently beat the Romans themselves; nevertheless, it was not honour'd, in the latter Times, with any other Magistrates but Præsides, who were inferior in Dignity to all the other Governors of Provinces. Therefore it being only a Presidial Province, and because the Emperors seldom directed their Constitutions to Præsides, we have no Memory left us of them or their Names. Its Bounds are uncertain, and varied with the Times. Paulus Diaconus places it betwixt Campania, the Adriatick Sea, and Puglia, and once it comprehended much more than the Abbruzzi, the County of Molise, and the Valley of Beneventum, do at present. Its most renown'd Cities were Ijerna, Sepino, Tbeate now Cbieti, Venafrum, Telesia, Bosanum, Afidena, and Sannium, which gives the Name to the whole Province.

THIS Province, besides the Præsides, was under the Direction and Government of the Præfectus P. of Italy, and the Vicarius of Rome. Neither was it neglected by Valentinian the Elder, who hearing that it was infested with Robbers, in order to free it of them, sent for that Purpose to the said Præfectus of Italy that Constitution ¹, which we read yet in the Theodosian Code.

NEITHER was it neglected by Honorius, who in the Year 413, granted to this Province, being sadly oppress'd, a Release from Taxes, as by the Constitution of this Emperor ², directed to the said Præfectus of Italy, we read in the Theodosian Code. There are other Laws, by which the other Emperors took Care of the Affairs of this Province, directed to the Præfecti of Italy, under whose Charge it was.

C H A P. IV.

Of the first Invasion of the Westrogoths, in the Reign of Honorius.

THESE Provinces, during the Reigns of Constantine and his Successors, until that of Honorius, did not feel those Mischiefs and Calamities, which the other Provinces of the Empire had already groan'd under by the Invasion of the Goths. This People having come out of Scandinavia in the Reign of Constantine the Great, and even sooner, lived in common, altho' they fought under one Head, till such Time as they chose Hermanaricus for their King; but he dying, they divided amongst themselves, and in the Reign of the Emperor Valens, those who call'd themselves Westrogoths, elected Fridigernus for their Captain, and afterwards Athanasius for their King. Theodosius the Great, being a Lover of Peace, knew so well how to keep them within their Limits, that altho' he had not always a settled Peace with them, yet he reduc'd them to that Condition, that their King Athanasius being dead, and they not mindful of chusing another, all subjected themselves to the Roman Empire, and became one Body of Troops, and fought under Theodosius's Banner, and were his Confederates and Auxiliaries. But this Prince dying in the Year 395, and being succeeded in the Empire of the East by Arcadius his eldest Son; his other Son Honorius reigning in the West, these Princes, by their luxurious Way of Living, began to disturb the Commonwealth, and to deprive the Westrogoths, their Auxiliaries, of those Gifts and Pensions, which Theodosius their Father, for securing them to the Roman Empire and to his Banner, had largely bestow'd upon them: Which displeas'd the Westrogoths, who fearing, that by so long Peace their Valour and Strength might be weaken'd, determin'd to do now, what they had neglected in the Reign of Theodosius: they chose Alaricus for their King; a Man, who for his cholerick Temper had acquir'd, amongst his own People, the Surname of Bold; and being descended from the illustrious Stock of the Balti, was esteem'd the most sufficient to support the Royal Dignity, with Decency and Magnificence. They considering, that it had been more to their own Honour, and the Glory of their Nation, to have conquer'd Kingdoms by their own Arms, than to have lived idle and lazy in those of others, resolv'd to go in quest of new Countries in order to conquer them: For which end, having made up a sufficient Army the best way they could, and having conquer'd Pannonia, Noricum, and Rhetia, they enter'd Italy, which being destitute of Troops, and having enjoy'd long Quiet, they began with great speed to subdue, and halted at Ravenna, then the Seat of the Western Empire¹.

HONORIUS having already left Milan, in the Year 402, made Ravenna the Place of his Residence, which he design'd to make the Seat of the Empire, that he might the more easily be able to oppose the Incursions which Foreign Nations used to make on that side. But this Insult of the Westrogoths was so sudden and unexpected, that finding himself surpriz'd, and not able to draw his Armies together so quickly as was necessary for suppressing them, he was oblig'd immediately to hearken to a Treaty of Peace which Alaricus offer'd him; and altho' it was granted, that he and his Men might remain in Italy, nevertheless it was at last agreed upon, that the Goths should leave it, and in exchange take Aquitania and Spain, Provinces in a manner lost to Honorius, as being for the most part possess'd by Gisericus King of the Vandals. The Goths consented, and having left Italy, were wholly Intent on the Conquest of those Provinces. Italy suffer'd nothing by this first Invasion; but they were provok'd afterwards by the deceitful Blow they receiv'd from Stilico, who, near Polentia, a City of Liguria, while they thought of nothing less, attack'd them unexpectedly; and altho' they were dispers'd and overcome¹, nevertheless soon after taking Courage, and being again got together, and spurr'd on by the Treachery and Injury, return'd with Fury, and laying aside the design'd Undertaking, they put Stilico and his Army to flight, and return'd into Liguria: They went on destroying with it Æmia, Flaminia, and Tuscany, and every Thing that came in their Way, till they got to Rome, all the Neighbourhood of which they ranack'd and ravag'd: At last, having enter'd Rome, they only pillag'd it, Alaricus not allowing it to be burnt, or any Injury done to the Temples.

IT was not only Rome, and the abovesaid Provinces that suffer'd these Devastations and Mischiefs more than once, but soon after the same Calamity happen'd to the Provinces, which now make the Kingdom of Naples. Campania, Puglia, and Calabria, Lucania, the Brutii, and Samnium, had the same Fate. The Goths over-run every where, carrying Ruin and Destruction along with them, never halting till they came to the utmost Point of Italy, where being stopp'd by the Sicilian Straits, they fix'd their Residence amongst the Brutii; and while Alaricus was there preparing for new Expeditions against Sicily and Africa, the Fleet which he had design'd for that Purpose was Shipwreck'd in these Straits, which dismal Disappointment struck him so to the Heart, that he ended his Days, by an untimely Death, near to Cosenza, and, much lamented by his Followers, was buried in the Bottom of the River Busentum, with many rich Spoils brought from *Rome*².

THE Death of Alarick gave Occasion to the Affairs of Italy, and these our Provinces, under the Reign of the same Honorius, to become more settled and quiet; altho' *Ataulfus*³, who succeeded Alarick his Kinsman, return'd to Rome, and, after the manner of Locusts, destroy'd every thing in that City, that after so much Pillaging and Sacking had been left, and had so miserably ruin'd Italy, when Honorius was unable to resist him: Nevertheless, Ataulfus afterwards having married Galla Placidia, Sister to Honorius, such was the Power of the Love he had for that Princess, and the Tye of this new Alliance, that he made Peace with Honorius; and leaving Italy to its Liberty, he and his People return'd into Gallia, and made War upon the Franks and Burgundians who were infesting it; and this was the first Foundation of their Kingdom in those Countries: Forasmuch as after the Death of Ataulfus and Rigericus, Vallia succeeded, to whom Honorius assign'd Aquitain, with many Cities of the Province of Narbonne, and fixed his Residence in Toulouse, and took the Title of the King of the Westrogoths, that is to say, of the Western Goths, to distinguish themselves from the Ostrogoths, or the Eastern Goths, and afterwards Lorded it over Italy, as we shall shew anon.

ALARICK being dead, and Italy freed of the Goths, and Peace made with Ataulfus, Honorius, willing to repair the past Damages of these Provinces, in the Year 413, publish'd that Constitution⁴ which we read in the Theodosian Code. Campania, Tuscany, Picenum, Samnium, Puglia and Calabria, Lucania and the Brutii, were reduc'd to such a lamentable Condition, that Honorius, from Ravenna, then the Seat of the Western Empire, directed to John Præfetus P. of Italy, that Law, by which he exempted their Inhabitants entirely from paying any Tribute, but the fifth part of what they were used to pay, remitting all the rest.

NEITHER did Honorius take less Care of these Provinces in the succeeding Years, seeing, while he was still at Ravenna, he publish'd many Laws for the good Government of them. That was likewise his which was dated in *Ravenna*⁵, by which no Testament was of any Force after ten Years were expir'd, which we have yet in the Justinian Code. And in the Year 418. he anew exempted Campania, Picenum and Tuscany from Tribute ; so much was he intent on the Repairing the Affairs of Italy quickly.

BUT in the Year 423. he ended his Days in Ravenna ; upon which Theodosius the Younger, who had succeeded to his Father Arcadius ¹ in the Eastern Empire, when he had reign'd but a short Time alone, proclaim'd Valentinian III. Augustus and Emperor of the West, who was Son of Constantius and Placidia ; which Lady, after the Death of Ataulfus had been sent back to Honorius, and married to Constantius. Valentinian having gone to Ravenna, and from thence soon after to Rome, settled the Affairs of that City, and restored the Jurisprudence, which in his Time had lost much of its ancient Splendor ; while at the same Time Theodosius applied himself to the Re-establishing it in the Academy of Constantinople, and was intent on framing the new Code, which from him hath the Name of Theodosian.

SUCH then was the State of the Provinces which now form our Kingdom, from the Time of Constantine to Valentinian III. during which Time they were govern'd by those Emperors, to whom by the various Divisions of the Empire Italy did belong ; and these were Constantine the Great, Constans and Constantius his Sons, Julianus, Jovianus, Valentinian I. Valentinian II. Honorius and Valentinian III. They were likewise under the Direction and Government of the Præfecti of Italy, and the Vicarii of Rome. And besides had other more immediate Rulers : One Consularis, two Correctores, and one Præses, who residing in the Provinces committed to their Charge, more immediately govern'd them.

THEY were govern'd by the Roman Laws, and the Constitutions of these Princes, neither were there any other Laws heard of. Excepting some Cities in which there remain'd some Vestige of the ancient Laws of municipal and confederated Cities, who liv'd conformable to their own particular Institutions ; no other Laws but the Roman were acknowledged in any of the Provinces, to which these Cities had recourse as to the Fountain of all human and divine Laws, when their own Municipal failed them. Neither did that first Irruption, which the Westrogoths under Alarick, made into these our Provinces, disturb the Polity or the Roman Laws ; seeing that Prince, in the midst of Arms, not minding the Laws, did nothing but over-run the Countries ; and altho' he settled for some time amongst the Brutii, yet he did not introduce new Laws. As a little after him did his Successor Ataulfus, who at last made Peace with Honorius, and left Italy free to him, which he and Valentinian III. afterwards govern'd as the other Emperors of the West their Predecessors had done.

S E C T. I.

These Provinces were never yielded or given away to any Person.

IF the Writers of this Kingdom, and especially the Civilians, had but given the least Attention in treating of this Matter, surely they would not have fallen into such gross and manifest Mistakes, as they have stuffed their Works with : Neither would they have allow'd themselves so easily to believe that fabulous Donation of all Italy, which they suppose was made by Constantine in the Year 324, to Sylvester Pope of Rome, four Days after he had been baptiz'd by him. An Error so warmly espous'd by the Italian Authors, and especially our Professors, excepting Bartolus alone, that it hath been the Occasion of an infinite Number of Blunders, even in Matters of most pernicious Consequence : Some of them have gone so far as to put in Print, That after this Donation, the Emperors who succeeded Constantine, had no Title nor Right to these Provinces, as belonging to the Pope, and making S. Peter's Patrimony : From whence comes the Right of Investiture given since by the Popes to the several Princes ; adding, that ever since that Time our Kingdom has been disjoin'd from the Empire, and therefore never after subject to the Emperors of the West, and and much less to those of the East. Our Counsellor Mat. de Afflict. ¹ arriv'd to such a Pitch, that he did not scruple to say, That after that Donation, all the Constitutions publish'd by the Emperors who succeeded Constantine, for want of Power, had not the Force or Vigour of written Laws. The Regents ² of our Collateral C. themselves were not asham'd to write, that after that Donation, the Successors of Constantine had no Power of giving Laws to these Provinces; and that therefore we were to have recourse to the Canon and not the Civil Law. Therefore we ought not in this Place to rob Marinus Freccia ³ our Civilian, of his deserv'd Praise; he, among ours, was the first, by his Knowledge of History, that reproach'd our Writers with such a gross Error, as little did he excuse the Counsellor Afflictus, who was his Kinsman; neither did he pretend to vindicate him any other way, than by saying, Affinis meus Historicus non est.

BUT altho' these Writers may deserve some Excuse, and that we ought to impute their Mistakes and Errors to the Ignorance of the Age they liv'd in; nevertheless our Modern Writers deserve no Compassion, who after so many Reproofs, take Pleasure, as if they were hired, to keep their Eyes shut, for fear they should receive a little Light, that would disperse the Darkness in which they delight to live. And now a-days it hath been sufficiently demonstrated by so many famous and able ⁴ Men, That that forged Instrument of Donation was contriv'd in the eighth or ninth Century only, and foisted into the Decrees of Gratianus ⁵; whereas it was not mentioned in the Ancient, as S. Antoninus ⁶ and Cardinal Cusanus testify: So that before that Time it was never heard of: The only Dispute now amongst Writers is, who should be the Author, who first gave Body and Motion to this Chimera. Some contend that it hath been the Brat of some Greek Schismatick, who, in order to expose the Grandeur of the Church of Rome to the Emperors of the East, or to have occasion to rail at and vilify the Latin Church and the Popes, according to the Custom of that Nation, which is their bitter Enemy, thought that when such a Piece of Forgery came to be discover'd, it would discredit them, and render them odious to the World; in like manner also many strange and monstrous Facts were imputed to them, which exceeded their Power: And in Conformity to this, we shall see in the Progress of this History, the Greeks accusing Pope Gregory II. of having excommunicated the Emperor Leo, and depos'd him from the Empire, and order'd his Subjects not to pay him Tribute; and for that end absolv'd them from their Oaths, and a thousand other extravagant Stories, for no other Purpose but to render them insupportable, and Usurpers of the Rights of other People; altho' that afterwards those who were most addicted to the Court of Rome, took Advantage of what the Greeks had wrote for their own Ends, and applied it to other Purposes.

OTHERS, among whom is Peter de Marca ⁷, have written, That this Instrument was forg'd, not by any Greek or Schismatick, but by a Latin, and one who was faithful to the Pope: However, all agree that it was Fabulous, and are the more persuaded of it, by the many Copies which are found that differ so much from one another. One way we read this Donation in the Decree of Gratian ⁸; another way in the Translation from the Greek into the Latin, reported by Theodore Balsamo ⁹, and which is to be found in the Vatican Library: In different manners do the Popes Melchias, Nicolas II. and Leo IX. ¹⁰ themselves relate it. 'Tis express'd in other Terms by Peter Damian ¹¹, Mathew Balsar, Ivo de Chartres and Francis Bursattus ¹²; and differently reported by Albericus ¹³: In a Word, there are more than twelve Copies, each of them differing from one another.

BUT if such Writers were ignorant of the Acts of Constantine, and did not heed Eusebius; or the other Contemporary Writers, who have not so much as mention'd such a memorable Fact, but kept a profound Silence; at least the Theodosian Code alone, and the Constitutions of the same Constantine which we read in it, are enough to undeceive them. They would have it, that while Constantine was in Rome in the Spring of the Year 324. he was guilty of this extraordinary Prodigality in Favour of Silvester, four Days after his Baptism: But most certain it is, that Constantine was not in Rome during these supposed Months of the Year 324. but was busied in the East in the War against Licinius; which being ended by his Defeat, and a compleat Victory obtain'd, it is likewise known, that he having gone to Theffalonica, he remain'd there, and in the same Months exactly of the same Year 324. he did not remove from that City¹; which is clearly prov'd by two of his Constitutions which we read yet in the same Theodosian Code, which are in L. 4. under the Title de Naviculariis, which was publish'd by Constantine at the same Time while he was in Theffalonica, and directed to Elpidias, under the Consulship of Constantine III. and Crispus III. which bears this Date, Dat. VIII. Id. Mart. Theffalonicae, Crispo III. & Constantino III. Cofs. And by his other famous Constitution² whereby he prescribes a Rule concerning the Dispensing with the Age, as well of Males as of Females, which altho' a little defac'd and mangled, was inserted by Tribonianus in the *Justinian Code*³. Constantine made this Law following the same Year 324. being still in Theffalonica, as Zosimus relates⁴, dated thus: Dat. VI. Id. Aprilis Theffalonicae, Crispo III. & Constantine III. Cofs. as Gotofredus corrects it; and was directed to Lucer. Verinus, who was Præfect of the City of Rome that Year, which is clear from the Words of the Notitia of the Præfects of Rome, where we read Crispo III. & Constantine III. Cofs. Lucer. Verinus Præfectus Urbi: Whence it is that we read it but incorrectly in the Justinian Code: Ad Verinum P. Prætorio.

THESE Laws convince us not only of the Forgery of this Donation, but likewise of the Mistake of Constantine's having been baptiz'd by the Hands of Pope *Silvester*⁵. Neither ought others to make a Bustle about the Actions of this Pope, which are not receiv'd by Baronius himself, but reputed Fabulous: And that is certainly a Mistake, which is told among them, that in the same Year 324, Calpurnius was Præfect of Rome, when 'tis evident from the Dates of the foresaid Laws, that Lucer. Verinus was Præfect of that City. They ought rather to be convinc'd by the History of Eusebius of *Cæsarea*⁶, a grave and ingenuous Man, who flourish'd at the same Time, and describ'd the Actions of that Prince minutely; and if such great and remarkable Facts had truly been, 'tis not credible, that they could have been omitted and passed over by such a Man, in a History which was publish'd in a few Years after the Death of Constantine, and was in the Hands of every body; who, to the great Shame and Reproach of Eusebius, would have thrown so great Ignorance in his Teeth, and given him the Lye, for telling that Constantine was baptiz'd in Nicodemia about the latter End of his Life, and not in Rome.

BUT what is now doubtful amongst some, was not surely so amongst the ancient Writers both Greek and Latin. Theodoret, Sozomenus, Socrates, Photius, and other Greek Authors wrote⁷, that Constantine receiv'd Baptism not from the Hands of Pope Silvester in Rome, but in Nicodemia, when he was dying: And among the Latins, S. Ambrosius, S. Hieronymus, and the Council of Rimini had likewise the same Belief⁸. Whence it is that our most grave and learned Divines, and the most careful Ecclesiastick Writers, such as Cardinal de Perron, Spondanus, Petavius, Morinus, and the incomparable *Arnaldus*⁹, contrary to the Opinion of Baronius, thought what is commonly believ'd concerning the pretended Baptism of Constantine in Rome, by the Hands of Pope Silvester in the Year 324. four Days before the forg'd Donation, to be fabulous. Which ought to satisfy *Emanuel Schelstrat*¹⁰, instead of having recourse to that strange and unhappy Defence, that Constantine being already baptized in Rome, was by Eusebius re-baptiz'd in Nicomedia; seeing if it were even granted that Constantine in his latter Days did incline to the Doctrine of Arius and his Followers; yet the Arians were not wont in the Beginning of their Error to re-baptize the Catholicks, who went over to their Belief, as Christianus Lupus sufficiently proves: And it was long after that St. Augustine ¹ charg'd some Arians with such a Novelty, and wonder'd at it as a Thing new and extravagant, and upbraided them with it.

NEITHER ought it to seem strange (altho' it may be going a little out of our Way) that Constantine being so zealous a Christian as he was, in the following Year 325. would be present at the great Council of Nice, where he gave the last Proofs of his Piety, and perform'd so many pious and generous Actions in favour of his new Religion, being yet but a Catechumen. This will not appear strange if we distinguish the Time of his having embrac'd this Religion, from that of his Baptism; and do but consider the Custom that was then common amongst the Great Men, of delaying their Baptism till the Time of their Death.

CONSTANTINE not long after the Defeat of Maxentius, long enough before the Year 324. in which 'tis said he was baptiz'd in Rome, had embrac'd our Religion, giving manifest Signs of his Sincerity, and of his Love and Beneficence towards it. Before the Year 324. he had publish'd many Constitutions concerning the Immunity of the Clergy from Civil Offices, and for building of Churches, and the Destruction and throwing down of the Heathen Temples; and likewise, that his so famous Constitution ², by which he allow'd the Churches to purchase immoveable Goods, and gave Liberty to all Persons to leave to them by their Testaments whatever they pleas'd, whence sprung the Fountain of their Riches, and especially of the Church of Rome above all others, was not promulgated after, but three Years before his pretended Baptism in Rome. It ought not then to seem strange, if in the following Years, being yet a Catechumen, he should stedfastly continue to favour the Church, and to adorn her with so many Prerogatives and Honours.

THERE was likewise at that Time a Custom, as we have said, that the great and most illustrious Personages of the Empire, altho' they embraced this Religion; nevertheless, by a very bad Custom, were wont to delay Baptism until they were in great Danger of their Lives, and expos'd to some doubtful and dangerous Enterprize. Neither was this Custom left off during the Reigns of Constantine and his Sons, but lasted long after, even in the Reigns of his other Successors, altho' otherwise they were most religious Princes. So we read of Theodosius the Great, who tho' he embrac'd the Christian Religion, and gave evident Proofs of his Piety, yet he continu'd still a Catechumen, and would not be baptiz'd, until he fell grievously sick in Thessalonica in the Year 380. When he saw himself in Danger, he sent for the holy Bishop Acolius, by whom he was baptiz'd, whereby he not only got Health to his Soul, but to his Body likewise ³.

VALENTINIAN II. was a Prince, of whom it was always said, that as all the Mischief of his Reign was owing to Justina his Mother, so all that was Good was his, as was very evident after her Death; being yet a Catechumen, he would not be baptiz'd; but just as he was ready to enter into Battle with the Barbarians, he intreated St. Ambrose to come quickly and baptize him. But while this holy Bishop was crossing the Alps on his Way to Vienna, where this Prince then was, he heard of his dismal Death; for Arbogastus being discontented at his having taken the Command of the Army from him, corrupted some of his Officers, and the Eunuchs of the Palace, and caus'd him to be strangled in his Bed while he was asleep, in the Night of Saturday the 15th of May 392. being the Vigil of Pentecost. Which doleful Accident was bewail'd in a very learn'd and elegant Funeral Oration by the said Bishop ⁴, which he rehearsed at his magnificent and pompous Obsequies; in which he maintain'd, That Baptism having been desir'd, and with so much Fervency demanded by that Prince, had purified him from all the Stains of his Sins, and had carried him to the Enjoyment of the Pleasures of Eternal Life.

THE History of St. Ambrose himself is likewise very remarkable, who did not receive Baptism, until he was promoted to the Bishoprick of Milan. It is also said of the famous and renown'd Benévolus first Chancellor to the Empress Justina, that he might not have a Hand in that Edict, by which Liberty was given to the Arians, freely to profess their Error; he gave a generous and noble Denial, and retired from Court; and besides, demanded Baptism presently, which, according to the Custom of the great Men, he had delayed to the last. We could here give a great many such Examples, both from sacred and profane History. And 'tis probable, that our *Torquatus*¹ meant this Custom, which it seems was likewise in Ethiopia in the Reign of Senapus, when, speaking of Clarinda, he mentions that her Baptism had been deferr'd.

I T was thought, that delaying Baptism to the last Moments of Life, was in order to shun the very rigorous publick Penance, which the Church in those Days imposed on penitent Christians; and that by putting it off to the last, they were made more sure of eternal Salvation; seeing any Person was thought fit to administer that Sacrament, even an Infidel, a Neophyte, or any silly Woman, and the Matter of it being always at hand, which is Water, and the Form of it soon perform'd and easy, consisting of few and simple Words, it seldom or never happen'd to the most unfortunate of Men to be so suddenly struck dead, as that they could not have Time to be sprinkled with so healthful a Water, which, in an Instant, by the infinite Merits of Jesus Christ, wash'd away all the Filthiness contracted in this mortal Life, and carried them certainly to the Felicities of another Immortal and Eternal.

BUT it was afterwards observ'd, that such a bad Custom gave occasion to Men to lead a licentious Life, and to be prone to all Irregularities and Wickedness; and Experience making it evident, that many dy'd as they had liv'd; and that Death might seize on them so suddenly, that they might want these Helps, of which the dismal Accident that befel Valentinian was a terrible Example; therefore the Fathers of the Church began to declaim against such a pernicious Custom: Whence Basilus and his Brother Gregory of *Nissa*² in the same Century, did all that in them lay, to abolish such a dangerous Custom; and St. Ambrose, who succeeded them, after having bewail'd the Misfortune of it, apply'd himself strenuously, and did all he could to eradicate it, by often inveighing most vigorously against such an Abuse³; so that at last it was banish'd out of the Church, and never more suffer'd; whence the contrary is commendably practis'd to this Day.

BUT to return to our Subject, these our Provinces were not subjected, nor given to any Person by Constantine; but were rul'd and govern'd by the same Prince, after the Year 324, in the same Manner as before, and to the Day of his Death he took Care of them, by committing the Government of them to the Præfetti P. of Italy, to the Consulares, Correctores, and the Præsides, and he establish'd many Laws, which he directed to them for their right Administration. As soon as Constantine had dispatch'd the Council of Nice, and the Affairs of the East, he return'd the Year following 326, by Pannonia into Italy, and settled in Aquileja, where, in the Month of April of that Year, he publish'd some Constitutions⁴; from thence he went to Milan, where he publish'd others⁵ in the Month of July; and finally, in the same Month, came for the last Time to Rome, where he remain'd a long Time with his Mother Helena, who, in the same Year 326, in the Month of August, dy'd in the Arms of her Son and Grand Children, and was bury'd there⁶. This very same Year, many Laws were publish'd by *Constantine*⁷ in Rome concerning the Annona of the said City; and many Things were establish'd for the Necessities of these Provinces by this Prince, until he return'd to the East, where he gave himself up entirely to the Re-establishing of the new Empire and Constantinople.

BUT in the mean time, the Affairs of the West, and these our Provinces, were not neglected, being committed to the Charge of the Præfetti P. of Italy, and more immediately to the Consulares, Correctores, and Præsides, so that they were govern'd by Constantine and his Successors down to Valentinian III. as we have shewn; so far was it from any other Person's having any Right or Superiority whatsoever over them.

THE REFOR E the Story of Naples ought to be look'd on as a Romance, which is thus related, That it being at that Time within the Limits of Campania, and subject to the Consulares of that Province, was excepted out of that Donation only, it having pleas'd Constantine to keep it to himself, upon this gracious Account, That he having occasion to make many and frequent Voyages to the Eastern Transmarine Countries, he was willing to reserve one City, in which, as he pass'd, he might stop a little to refresh himself after the Fatigue and Hurry of a Journey. The Accounts of the Journeys of this Prince, in Company with Pope Silvester, to Naples, are more ridiculous; and that which deserves yet more to be laugh'd at is, that they two having embark'd in the Port of this City, went together to Nice, the Metropolis of Bythinia, where they were present at that great Council: and Constantine returning to Italy in the Year 326, staid some time in Naples, where he was receiv'd a-new by the Neapolitan Republick, with the greatest Marks of Esteem and Gladness; and that he built so many Churches, with a hundred other trifling Stories with which they have swell'd their Volumes: So that those who consider such fabulous Stories, and that this Prince, in his returning to Italy, pass'd no other way but thro' Pannonia, and that if he intended to go from Rome to the Eastern Parts by Sea Voyages, he had the Via Appia ready and free, which was continu'd to Brundisium, where he could embark with the greatest Ease: In like manner, *P. Caracciolo*¹ would make us believe, that Brundisium was the Place where St. Peter landed, being moved by no other Reason to believe it, but because it was the most ready Road for those who by Sea went from Rome to the East, or from thence to Rome; for which Reasons, 'tis to be doubted whether Constantine ever saw Naples, so far from his having staid there and built so many Churches, as if he had had no other Business to do there but to build Churches²; whereas 'tis evident, that any Vestige of Grecian Structure that is now remaining in any Church of this City, hath no Marks of having been built in the Time of Constantine the Great, but of later Times, during the Reigns of the other Constantines, Emperors of the East, towards the very last Times of the Grecians, when the Neapolitan Dukedom was subject to the Grecian Emperors; of which we shall have a more proper Occasion to speak: And P. Caracciolo himself³ cannot deny, that many Churches which are attributed to Constantine the Great, were erected in Naples in much later Times; altho' he be persuaded, that this Emperor was in Naples with his Mother Helena, and believ'd, that that of St. Restituta, and the other of the Holy Apostles, were built by him; which he can't prove by any contemporary Authors, but has recourse to Tradition, Anastasius, and other later Writers⁴.

Of New Laws, and New Jurisprudence, under CONSTANTINE, and his Successors.

THE new Disposition of the Empire under Constantine, as it produc'd many Changes in the Civil State of its Provinces, so likewise was it the Occasion of various Alterations in the Roman Jurisprudence. It began to take a new Form and Appearance, after he began to make new Laws, endeavouring all he could to cancel the old, and to introduce new Customs into the Empire; whence it was, that Julianus used to call him Novator, and a Disturber of the ancient Laws and Customs¹. He alter'd the Manner of Judging, and abolish'd the ancient Forms, and introduc'd a new Way of Proceeding. The Magistrates took other Titles: and if at any time they retain'd the Old, yet their Jurisdiction was different, and their Business not the same: New Dignities were introduc'd, and those not only of the Officers of the Palace, but likewise of the Military were chang'd, and the Precedency among them alter'd; whence came the new Names and Titles belonging to their Offices and Authority, which we read in the Theodosian Code ¹.

BUT the most powerful Occasion which wrought so great a Change in the ancient Roman Jurisprudence, was the venerable Christian Religion, which Constantine embracing with so great Ardency, it inclined him, and made him so desirous of establishing new Laws, which, according to the Maxims of this new Religion, were to be somewhat contrary and different from those of the Gentiles. First of all, he was Intent on changing the Roman Customs, and their ancient Religion; for which End, he publish'd many Edicts directed to the Roman People, and to the Præfects of that City; and he apply'd himself to nothing else all those four Years that he staid in Rome, which was from the Year 319, to the Year 322: He prohibited in Rome, which was the City most addicted to the Superstitions of the ancient Religion, the Soothsayers from privately foretelling future Events, altho' he allow'd of it in publick. He forbid Masters to take Advantage of the Power they had over their Servants, but that they should treat them moderately, and with the utmost Discretion ²; according to the Principles of the New Religion; for which the Fathers of the Church extoll'd him, amongst whom was Lactantius, who taught, that Servants ought to be treated like Brothers by their Masters. He introduc'd into the Church new Methods of Enfranchising, in order to make the Acquisition of their Liberty more easy ³. He made a new System concerning Divorces, Contracts of Marriage, and Matrimony ⁴: he suppress'd the Levity of Divorces, and confirm'd, with a more firm Knot, the Sanctity of Contracts and Marriage. He abolish'd the Penalty of Celibacy ⁵, and took off other heavy Yokes which the ancient Roman Laws had impos'd upon the Necks of Men ⁶.

ACCORDING to the Dictates of this new Religion, he was severe against the Ravishers of Virgins, and those, who, despising the Sanctity of Marriage, were delighted in roaming after Lust ⁷. He restrain'd Concubinage, against which Lactantius had already so much written and declaim'd ⁸. He forbid all manner of Work on the Lord's Day, and, according to the new Rites of the Church, he made other Days holy which were not so formerly ⁹. By whatsoever Forms or Words the Enfranchisings should be made in the Churches, he would have those that were manumitted to enjoy full Liberty ¹⁰. He gave Permission to all Persons, freely to leave by their Testaments whatsoever they pleas'd to the Churches ¹¹: and besides, that he might take a commendable Care and Protection of the Church and her Canons, he concern'd himself in the Controversies which arose among the Fathers, which was more than perhaps suited with his Imperial Dignity; by which their Contentions became to be more taken notice of, and added Fuel to their Discords and Strifes, which would not have been, had their Disputes been left entirely to themselves, who were the most proper Persons for deciding them: Neither would the Church have been so set on Fire as it was soon after, by the Firebrands of the Arians, who so much abus'd her; but, perhaps, it would have continued in the same Purity and Simplicity, in which it had been maintain'd for the first three Centuries, and in which Christ our Redeemer left it.

HE thought, that the Government and outward Polity of the Church belong'd to him: Therefore he made many Laws concerning the same; forbidding those that were rich, and those that were fit for the Administration of publick Offices, to take Orders, allowing none but Men of small Fortunes and of mean Condition to take them ¹²; and, furthermore, he made other Provisions concerning the Ministers and Goods of the Churches: Whence it came, that the Emperors, his Successors in the Empire, and of the same Religion, following his Footsteps, added divers other Constitutions concerning the outward Polity of the Church, and the Persons of Bishops and Clerks, and the Administration and Government of their Goods. And however *Sozomenus*¹ hath written of Valentinian I. that he meddled little in these Matters, imposing nothing upon the Priests, neither changing what was either Good or Bad in Church Affairs, nevertheless we read in the Theodosian Code, some of his Constitutions relating to the Polity, and particularly to the Election of Clerks, and other Ministers of the Church. But all his Successors have since added very many Constitutions, such as Valentinian II. Theodosius, Gratianus, Arcadius, Honorius, and the rest; so that in the Reign of Theodosius the Younger, an entire Book of these Laws was compos'd, which is the last of his Code: Wherefore we see the Roman Jurisprudence, in that Part which relates to the Divine and Pontifical Law, quite different from that of the first, and altogether new. Which Institution being continu'd afterwards by the other Emperors, and particularly by our Justinian, it came at last to the Emperors of the East, who abusing their Power, in the last Ages of the Empire, reduc'd the Matter to such a State, that Religion was entirely subjected to the Will of the Prince; for which Reason it was wisely adverted to by worthy Men², That it was a great Mistake in those, who, to set just Bounds betwixt the Priesthood and the Empire, and the Power of the one and the other, were guided by the new Constitutions of these last Emperors, as by a sure Rule; but we shall have Occasion to handle that Matter largely, when we come to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity.

THIS Zeal then for our Religion, which was directly opposite to that ancient one of the Gentiles, being imprinted in the Heart of a Prince, whom both the Empires obey'd, was able to change the Customs, Laws, and Institutions of Men. This not only made him think of Building new Temples, and throwing down the old, but also of changing and abolishing whatever of their Laws seem'd to him either too superstitious, or exceeding subtle: of which, his many Constitutions publish'd for that purpose, and which we read in the *Theodosian Code*³, are clear Testimonies. And Constantine his Son, who succeeded him in the Empire, follow'd his Footsteps, and in many Things departed from the ancient Institutions, and especially in religious Matters, as is manifest by his many Constitutions which we read in the same Code⁴.

WHENCE it was, that the Character Constantine left behind him, was so different among the Christians, from what it was among the Gentiles. The Christians extoll'd him for those Facts; from which *Nazarus*⁵ took occasion to sound his Praise, in the Panegyric Oration which he made in the Year 321. thus: Novæ leges, regendis moribus, & frangendis vitiis Constitutæ, veterum calumniosæ am- biages recisæ, captandæ Simplicitatis lequeos perdiderant. *Isidore*⁶ in his Book de Originibus, says likewise, that the new Laws were begun by Constantine: And *Prosper Aquitanicus*⁷ calls the Authors of such Laws, lawful Princes, because they were publish'd by Christian Princes.

BUT the Gentiles, who very unwillingly suffered these Changes, reproach'd bitterly both him and his Son Constantine. Wherefore Gregorius and Hermogenianus, both Heathen Civilians, who flourish'd under Constantine and his Sons, fearing, lest by these new Constitutions of the Christian Princes, the Heathen Jurisprudence should be lost, applied themselves to the Compiling of their Codes, in which they united together the Laws of the Heathen Emperors, beginning from Adrian down to Diocletian, in order, as much as possible, to preserve the Ancient. From whence it came to pass, that Julian the Nephew of Constantine the Great, having assum'd the Empire, and publickly renounc'd the Christian Religion, and embrac'd the Heathen, apply'd all his Might (although he did not make use of the Weapons of Cruelty as the Heathen Emperors his Predecessors had done) to restore the Worship of the ancient Religion, and the old Laws, and to overthrow Christianity; for which End he was altogether bent on abolishing whatever Constantine had done, calling him, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports¹, Novator, and Disturber of the ancient Laws and Customs: Julianum, memoriam Constantini ut Novatoris, turbatorisque Priscarum legum, & moris Antiquitus recepti, Vexasse: therefore we read many of his Laws to this Day in the Theodosian Code; by which it is clear, that he had his Mind bent on nothing else but the abolishing Constantine's Laws, and restoring the Ancient. For thus he writes, *Amputata Constitutione Constantini patrum mei, &c. Antiquum jus, cum omni firmitate Servetur*², and elsewhere³: Patrum mei Constantini Constitutionem jubemus aboleri, &c. Vetus igitur jus revocamus. And this Prince having added many Constitutions to the Civil Law according to the ancient Discipline; and above all, having provided for the Dispatch of Law-Suits, and likewise in a great measure taken off the Taxes which his Predecessors had laid on, and given clear Proofs of his Vigilancy, his military Valour, and many other Virtues, did not only acquire the Character of a wise and prudent Prince among the Gentiles, as *Libanius*⁴ for that same, extols and magnifies him in a Funeral Oration which he made on him; but likewise these Encomiums are reported by Zonera, and, which will seem more strange, by Writers also of these our latter Times; among whom Michael de Montaigne is the Chief⁵, who besides his defending his Apostacy and his other Misdeeds, which are commonly imputed to him, loads him with excessive Praises, and extols him to the Heavens.

BUT the Reign of this Prince having lasted only two Years, for he was kill'd by the Parthians, in the 31st Year of his Age, and succeeded in the West by Valentinian the Elder, and by Valens his Brother in the East, Princes who had the Christian Religion as much at Heart, as Constantine ever had; therefore all that Julian had done against it, became of no Force, since it was likewise maintain'd by the Princes their Successors, altho' it was abused and corrupted by the Pestiferous Heresy of Arrius, which having seiz'd on the Heads of the Empire, spread itself over all the Christian World, and likewise got footing in barbarous Nations; and these Princes having trod in the same Footsteps with Constantine, and added their own to his Laws, gave that Aspect and Frame to the Jurisprudence which we now see in the Theodosian Code.

Of the Civilians, and their Books, and of the Academy of R O M E.

ALTHO' the Roman Jurisprudence, by the new Division of the Empire, by the new Disposition of the Officers, and by the new Polity and Religion introduc'd into it, had a quite different Aspect, and new Forms: Nevertheless it is not to be doubted, but that the Cause of its Change and Decay was owing in a great measure to the Loss of the ancient Discipline, and the want of good Education in the Youth: No sooner was the Discipline and Education lost, than the Youth were seen wallowing in Luxury, feasting and living delicately, gaming and whoring, exactly as

as *Ammianus Marcellinus*¹ laments that Age; therefore it was not to be expected that it could produce those uncorrupted and grave Magistrates, those wise and prudent Civilians, the Africani, the Marcelli, the Papiniani, the Pauli, and many others so excellent and renown'd, as flourish'd in the preceding Age. The Business of the Civilians, who in the Reigns of Constantine and his Sons, succeeded to these bright Men (amongst whom there was a certain Innocentius so much celebrated by Eunapius and one Anatolius, and some others of obscure Names) was nothing else but teaching and explaining in the Academies, what these shining Ornaments had written, and in Collecting, Commenting upon, and rendering their Books in a better Reading. The Use of Interpreting and Expounding being laid aside, and the Employment of the Civilians reduc'd to two Things only, to wit, teaching in the Academies, and haranguing in the Courts for their Clients, which by degrees they did for Money, contrary to the ancient Law Cincia, the Employment in those Times became so contemptible, that at last it was the Business of the emancipated Slaves. Wherefore *Mamertinus*² used to lament the lost Dignity of the Jurisprudence; even before Julian, and to grieve bitterly, by saying, Juriscivilis Scientia, quæ Manlios, Scævolas Servios in amplissimum gradum dignitatis extulerat, libertorum artificium dicebatur. We read in *Photius*³, that Asterius Bishop of Amasca, who liv'd about the Year 400. related, that he had been a Disciple of a certain Scita, a Servant bought from a Citizen of Antioch, who publicly profess'd the Jurisprudence; whereas the Practice of Orators, or those who had the Charge of Law-Suits, who were the Pleading Advocates, was so honourable among the ancient Romans, that the Roman Senators, and other great Men put their Sons to it: It was the first Step in the popular State to raise them to great Employments; because by pleading Gratis, as they did, they oblig'd a great many People, and consequently gain'd a number of Clients, by which means they acquir'd great Respect and Authority among the People, which was the sure way to get in to great Offices. Besides that those who were good at making Speeches had a great Advantage in the Assemblies of the People, who are willingly led by the Ears; whence it is that in popular States, the Advocates are those who generally have the greatest Power and Authority: But under the Emperors the Authority of the Advocates was much diminish'd, as the Author of the Dialogue de Oratoribus, which is attributed to Tacitus, says. For which Cause the Popular Favour was of no use in attaining great Employments; for since they could not be rewarded but by Money, it was then they became so Mercenary; but the Emperors being unwilling to debase them altogether, put them on a Level with the Military, allowing them all those fine Privileges which the Soldiery enjoy'd, and others besides, especially, that after they had follow'd their Employment for twenty Years, they became Counts⁴. If such debasing had only reach'd the Lawyers, it would have been more tolerable, but it likewise penetrated into the Academies and the Tribunals.

THE Academy of Rome by Ignorance, the Baseness of the Professors, and the Riotousness of the Scholars, was reduc'd to such a lamentable Condition, that Valentinian the Elder, to hinder it from being quite extinguish'd, was oblig'd in the Year 370. while he was at Triers, to publish a very long Constitution, which he directed to Olibrius Prefect of the City of Rome, in which he establish'd XI. Academical Laws, and remedied a great many Abuses which had crept into it.

FIRST of all, he oblig'd the Scholars who came from the different Provinces of the Empire to study at Rome, to bring with them Certificates from the Rectores, or the Consulares, Correctores, or Præsides of the Province from whence they came; in which Certificates they were to declare their Country, their Birth and their Merit, the Quality of their Forefathers, and their Pedigree.

SECONDLY, he order'd, That as soon as they arriv'd in Rome they should present these Certificates to the Censors.

THIRDLY, That these Officers should immediately inquire of the Scholars what Professions they were to apply themselves to, whether to the Roman or Grecian Eloquence; or if they would follow more profound Studies, such as Philosophy or the Jurisprudence.

FOURTHLY, That the said Officers should take Care to provide Lodgings for the Students remote from Places of evil Fame.

FIFTHLY, That they should take Notice of their Conduct, and prevent their keeping bad Company, which is very dangerous for Youth.

SIXTHLY, Valentinian inhibited the Scholars from too often frequenting publick Shews, by which he put a Stop to that Abuse, which Ammianus Marcellinus complain'd of being introduc'd by the Youth, who spent their Time in continual Luxury, Amours, and publick Shews, which corrupted their Manners, and made them neglect their Studies.

SEVENTHLY, He likewise forbid their unseasonable and frequent Feastings, at which they used to spend a great Part of the Day and Night in gormandizing and luxurious Discourses.

EIGHTHLY, That those Students, who contrary to these Laws led a licentious Life, and carry'd themselves unworthily, should be severely punish'd, by being publicly beaten, and afterwards chased out of the City, and sent to their Countries.

NINTHLY, He fix'd a Time for their Studies, making the twentieth Year of their Age the Term of them, which in the Reign of Dioclesian was the Twenty-fifth; and that they were to employ five Years in more serious Studies: Such as the Jurisprudence in particular, which likewise our Justinian appointed.

TENTHLY, He ordain'd, That the Names of the Students should be written in a Book every Month, what they were, and from whence they came, that it might be known how long they had been in Rome, as also what Time they had studied, which we now call Matriculation or Enrolling.

ELEVENTHLY, He ordered, That the said College Book should be sent to him every Year, that he might know what Students were enroll'd in it; to the End, that according to the Merit and Qualifications of every one, he might reward them, and make Use of them in the Government of the Commonwealth.

SO much had that provident Prince at Heart the Education of Youth, and the Reformation of that Academy, that having restor'd it by these Laws, in the succeeding Years he order'd a great Number of Youth both from Africa and France, and other Western Provinces, to come to Rome to learn good Literature, and the Civil Laws of that City, which on that account was call'd the Dwelling-House of the Laws.

THUS was the Ruin of the Jurisprudence in the Academy repair'd by Valentinian in the best manner he could; but the Havock made in the Courts and Tribunals by the Judges and Advocates was most lamentable. The Insufficiency of the Magistrates, and their rapacious Greediness and Ambition; the Ignorance likewise of the Advocates, and, most of all, their Knavery and Tricks, had put all the Constitutions of the Princes, and the Books of the Civilians in the utmost Confusion.

WHEN there was any Imperial Constitution cited for deciding any Law-Plea, the only Recourse was to the Gregorian and Hermogenian Codes, on which they solely depended; for the rest there was nothing but Disorder and Confusion. Because Constantine and his Successors had publish'd many Constitutions of various Kinds, belonging to different Provinces of the two Empires, and very often contrary to one another, directed as Necessity requir'd, to various Magistrates; of which there was no distinct Knowledge, and many of them had been bury'd, until they were collected into one certain Volume by Theodosius the Younger, who likewise divided them; whence every-body cited that Constitution which seem'd to them most favourable for the gaining their Cause¹.

NO less was the Confusion and Disorder of the Books of the so famous and renown'd Civilians. The Knowledge of them was very confus'd and uncertain: Such Sentences as by the Pleadings in the Courts had acquir'd the Force of a Law, and which the Judges were oblig'd to follow, had escap'd their Memories, they cited indifferently, and often recited opposite Responsa; the Contrariety of which was then so great, that Justinian with all his Might could not get rid of it in his Collection. To this Confusion, we may add another considerable Disadvantage, which was, that these Codes which were then made use of, (Printing not having been found out as yet in Europe) by the Carelessness of the Booksellers and Antiquaries, were very Incorrect, and full of Errors.

FOR remedying so many Disadvantages, which for a long Time had reduc'd the Jurisprudence to that lamentable Condition, Valentinian III. appear'd in the West, and Theodosius the Younger in the East. It was these Princes, who aiming at the same End, united in their Labours and Endeavours, each of them undertaking to cure for his own Part such grievous Mischiefs: Valentinian employ'd all his Thoughts in remedying the Disorders which had ensu'd from the doubtful Authority of the Constitutions of the Princes, and the Variety of the Books of the Civilians; Theodosius employ'd his on a more noble Undertaking, in setting about the framing of a new Code, and the re-establishing of the Academy of Constantinople.

VALENTINIAN therefore in the Year 426. while he was in Ravenna, whither he had transferr'd the Seat of the Empire, sent to the Senate of Rome a long and prolix Oration; in which, among many other Things, he particularly recommended the rectifying of these Disorders: Part of which Oration we read in the Theodosian Code, under the Title de Responsis Prudentum, and a Part of it in the *Justinian*¹, altho' it is not to be seen there now, under the Title de Legibus. In that Part which was in the Justinian Code there was a Rule laid down, how to know what Imperial Constitutions and Rescripts should be read in Judgment, and quoted in deciding of Law-Suits, and which of them ought to have Force and Vigour with the Judges: What Laws ought equally to be observ'd by all, as general ones, excepting those Rescripts which were issu'd at the Request of private Persons on particular Occasions: That all the Rescripts of Princes, which were produc'd in Judgment, were not to have the Force of Laws; nor those, which, contrary to the Intent of the Law, had been extorted by the Pleaders; nor those others in which Subreption and Obreption were contain'd, all which he order'd the Judges to reject².

IN the other Part of his Oration which was approved of by Theodosius, and inserted in his Code, he takes particular Care of the Books of the ancient Civilians, which in that Age, wanting all Method and Order, occasion'd great Confusion

FIRST of all he would have intire Credit given to the Writings of these five Civilians, to wit, Papinianus, Paulus, Cajus, Ulpianus, and Modestinus; and that they were to be quoted and read in Judgment, and to have Force and Authority with the Judges in deciding of Causes. II. That the Opinions and Treatises of Scævola, Sabinus, Julianus, Marcellus, and of the other Civilians, who had been inserted or extoll'd in the Works of these Five, should have the same Force. The Writings of these ancient Civilians were still in being in the East, and also in the Kingdom of Thoulouse: In latter Times they were dispers'd amongst the Goths, as the Interpreter testifies in that Constitution of Valentinian. They were preserv'd in the East to the Reign of Justinian, who made use of them in the Composing his Pandects. III. He gave Caution and a Rule after what manner the Judges were securely to make Use of the Writings of these Civilians in deciding of Causes, and how the Barristers were to cite them, that is to say, that those which had not been mended, and were incorrect, would be found corrected in the Codes; for which Corrections, not only of the Books of the Jurisprudence, but of all other Professions, it was the Custom of that Age, to choose the most learned Men, and the most exact Grammarians of the Times; whose Care and Study was nothing else, but to reduce to a perfect Reading, by comparing with the exactest and most correct Texts, the Writings which were in the Hands of the Professors. As in like manner for correcting the Copies of Livy, and more especially the Holy Scriptures, where Errors were most pernicious, the most knowing Men were employ'd. As Suidas witnesseth of Lucian; and Irenæus conjures his Bookseller, per Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, & gloriosum ejus adventum, quo judicaturus est vivos & mortuos, ut conferat postquam transcripserit, & emendet ad exemplar unde descripsit. Aponius, Hieronymus, and Augustine had the same Anxiety who did not mind rich and costly Books, but all their Care was to have them exact and correct³. So that in those Days, they were most careful of that Work, as reckoning it of the greatest Importance; since the Decision of many Controversies in the Church, and an infinite Number of Causes in the Courts, depended upon it.

BESIDES Valentinian determin'd, as we have already said, that when different and opposite Opinions, to those of these ancient and famous Civilians, were quoted in the Courts, the greatest Number of the Authors was to carry it; that is to say, their Opinions were to be number'd, and not weigh'd, by which the Judges were to be determin'd, from which Justinian differ'd afterwards; but if it happen'd that the Number on both Sides was equal, he ordain'd, that the Side on which Papinian was, should prevail: Which Pre-eminence in Papinian ought not to seem strange, he being reputed in all Ages the most renowned of all others; since in the Time of our Grandfathers, 'tis said, that the same Prerogative was granted by Royal Decree in Spain and Portugal to Bartolus, if we may trust Jo. Baptista de Gazalupis, who reports it ¹. That of St. Jo. Chrysostom in his Interpretation of the Holy Scriptures, was greater, since by an ancient Custom introduc'd into the Eastern Church, his Interpretation was to be preferr'd to that of all the other Fathers of the Church, how different soever they should be: And in the West his Interpretations were likewise of great Weight, of which Hieronymus and Augustine are famous Witnesses. Moreover Valentinian ordain'd, That in case, both as to Authority and Number, the Opinions quoted should be equal, then all was to be referr'd to the prudent Award of the Judge, who was to weigh the Opinions in a just Ballance by himself, and to stick to that which he should think most just and conform to Equity.

LASTLY, he refuted the Notes made by Paulus and Ulpianus on the Works of Papinian their Master, and they were to be of no Authority in the Courts: And in this likewise Justinian afterwards differ'd, who did not altogether refute them, but intermix'd many of them, and particularly those of Paulus, in his Digests: Nevertheless Valentinian ordain'd that the Opinions of Paulus should always be regarded, and be of Authority and Force. And it was this Constitution of Valentinian, and such others as were publish'd at that Time, that Justinian meant, when he said, that it had been ordain'd, that the Opinions of the Civilians should have such Authority, as that it should not be lawful for the Judges to depart from them, as we have already observ'd in the First Book of this History.

SO provident was Valentinian III. that these continual Disorders and Confusions might be remov'd from the Courts of Justice, which the little Knowledge of the Constitutions of the Princes, and the Books of the Civilians, had occasion'd in them; whence the Jurisprudence in the West was restor'd, as much as was possible, to some Dignity and Renown.

Of the ACADEMY of CONSTANTINOPLE.

BUT greater were the Endeavours of Theodosius the Younger, for restoring the Jurisprudence in the East: He began to repair it in the Academies twelve Years before he compiled his new Code. Constantine the Great, from the Year 332, in order to provide the City of Constantinople with whatsoever was rare and excellent, and to make it rival Rome in every Thing, had apply'd himself with Might and Main, to invite to it many Professors of Literature. Constantius, his Son, about the Year 354, adorn'd it with a famous Library, for which Themistius runs so far out in his Praise. Valens, in the Year 372, increas'd it greatly, so that for keeping of it he had seven Antiquaries, four Grecian and three Latin, who were to take Care to set the Books in order, and repair those that had been worn with Age, and he appointed other Servants besides for looking after it. Nevertheless, till the Reign of Theodosius the Younger, none thought of establishing an Academy in that City, that could be compared to that of Rome. It was Theodosius then, who, in the Year 425, first settled an Academy there; and he appointed the Place for it, to be the Capitol in the eighth Region, at a Distance from the Sea, an inland Place, adorn'd with many Portico's built on Purpose, for which it was call'd Capitolii Auditorium. And that it might abound in Professors and Scholars, and maintain the same Dignity and Grandeur which he intended to endow it with, he order'd the Professors not to teach in their Cells, but in the Auditorium, as was formerly practis'd in Rome. He appointed many Professors for this Academy, according to the Sciences that were to be learn'd; and they all amounted to the Number of Thirty One. For the Roman Eloquence, three Orators and ten Grammarians: For the Grecian Eloquence, five Sophistæ and also ten Grammarians; so that there were Twenty Eight partly Grammarians and partly Orators and Sophistæ, for instructing the Youth in these Sciences. Besides he establish'd three, for those who would imploy themselves in more profound Studies, one for Philosophy, and two for the Jurisprudence, who were to teach the Civil Law¹. In the Reign of the same Theodosius, Leontius, a famous Civilian, explain'd the Laws there, who was the first among the Lawyers who had the Honour and Rank of Count Palatine; there were not wanting afterwards, other noted Professors who made it famous and renown'd. In the Time of Justinian, Theophilus and Cratinus profess'd the Jurisprudence there, who, being call'd by him, assisted him in the Framing the Digests². Neither was the Concourse of Youth less in this Academy for learning the Civil Law, than in that of Rome in the West, or Berytis in the East. And it was even greater, when Justinian forbid the Explaining of the Laws to all other Academies, such as that of Alexandria and Cæsarea, allowing it to none other, except, in the East, to those of Berytis and Constantinople, and in the West to that of Rome.

Of the Constitutions of the Princes, out of which the Theodosian Code was Formed.

IT did not satisfy Theodosius his having restor'd the decaying Jurisprudence in such a manner, and having set it to rights again, after such a Method in the Academies; There were besides very few, as Theodosius himself says¹, Qui Juris civilis Scientia ditarentur, & soliditatem veræ Doctrinæ receperint. The immense Quantity of Books², and the great Bulk of so many Imperial Constitutions, disagreeing among themselves, kept them likewise in profound Obscurity and Darkness. Theodosius at last was wholly intent on removing those Obscurities; for which end, he set about the Composing of a new Code, rejecting the so many time-serving Constitutions of the Princes, issu'd out according to the Occasion of the Times, the so many useless ones clashing one with another; he collected into one Volume those only, which he believ'd were sufficient for whatever could occur in the Tribunals for the deciding of Causes.

IN the Year 438, as the most prudent Gotifredus sufficiently proves, and not in the Year 435, as Cironius suppos'd, and others believ'd, being deceiv'd by the erroneous Subscription of the Novella of Theodosius ¹, this Code was compil'd and publish'd by this Prince : For the framing of which he chose eight notable and noble Civilians, and, as he declares, of known Fidelity and famous for Learning, and such, in fine, as were able to vie with the Ancients. The first who had the greatest Hand in it, was Antiochus, formerly Præfectus P. and Exconsul, of whom we often find honourable mention in Marcellinus, Suidas, and Theodoretus. There was Maximinus, Vir illustris, as Theodosius himself calls him ², Exquestor nostri palatii, eminens omni genere Literarum. There was Martirius, Vir Illustris, Comes, & Quæstor nostræ Clementiæ fide interpretes. There were Sperantius, Apollodorus, and Theodorus, Viri Spectabiles, Comites Sacri Nostri Consistorii. There was Ephigenius, Vir Spectabilis, Comes, & Magister memoriæ; and lastly Procopius, Vir Spectabilis, Comes ex Magistro Libellorum, jure omnibus veteribus comparandi: All of them adorn'd with the highest Dignities, and most expert in the Law Learning.

Their Employment in this Work was to collect the Constitutions of many Princes which were hidden and buried in Obscurity, and to unite them into one Body; and being collected, to correct and purge them of their Dross and Errors: and, lastly, with the greatest Brevity, to abridge them.

Without all doubt, the Number of the Constitutions of Christian Princes, which from Constantine the Great down to these Times, had been diffus'd and spread abroad through both the Empires, was very great; whence it was, that these Compilers, even after they had curtail'd them, could not collect and join them together in less than Sixteen Books. Forasmuch as if we consider the Number of Years, there are no less than One Hundred and Twenty Six, from the Reign of Constantine in 312, to the Year 438. If we consider the Number of Emperors whose Constitutions are collected in this Code, their Number is no less than Sixteen; to wit, Constantine the Great, his three Sons Constantine, Constantius, and Constans; Julian, Jovian, Valentinian, Valens, Gratian, Valentinian the Younger, Theodosius the Great, Arcadius, Honorius, Theodosius the Younger, Constantius, and Valentinian III. If we consider the various Sorts of Constitutions, we find there not only the Edicts, but likewise the various Rescripts, the many Epistles directed to Magistrates, the Orations to the Senate, the Pragmaticks, the Acts and Decrees made in the Princes Councils, and lastly the many Mandates directed to the Rectores of Provinces, and other Officers.

CERTAINLY there was no Part either of Publick or Private Right but what was transferred into this Code, as is manifest from the Argument of its Books, and the Number of the Titles. Of the Constitutions of the Princes concerning private Right, such as Contracts, Testaments, Stipulations, Pactions, Heritage, and all other Things belonging thereto, five Books were compos'd. As for what concern'd publick Right, nothing is wanting; here are set down the Functions of all Magistrates, the Notitia of Dignities, and a Rule for Military Affairs: The Employments of the Officers are appointed; Criminal Accusations are settled; the Laws of the Exchequer are declar'd; the Annona and Tributes are put in Order; Care is taken of the Common Good of the Cities, Professors, Publick Shews, Publick Works, Ornaments, and, in a word, nothing is omitted that could in the least contribute to the Publick Peace and Tranquillity. Neither were the Laws concerning the Church neglected, but a whole Book of the various Constitutions belonging to it was compos'd, in which divers Ecclesiastical Affairs concerning Religion are determin'd; so that there is no Part of Private, Publick, or Divine Right, but what is comprehended in this Code.

THE Names of the Princes who pronounc'd them, the Place, the Time, the Persons to whom they were directed, are carefully set down, that the Authors might not be depriv'd of the Honour, and to shun all Confusion and Disorder.

NEVERTHELESS the Work did not prove so exact and compleat, but that there are many Defects and Errors in it; of which the careful Gotifredus hath made a long Catalogue ³, which we need not here recount; but we ought not to pass over in Silence that grievous one, not to be pardon'd in Theodosius a Christian Prince, his having inserted in it many wicked Laws, quite contrary to his Religion; whose Purpose was to have collected only the Constitutions of the Christian

Princes, beginning with those of Constantine the Great: For which Cause Prosperus Aquitanus calls this Code, a Book in which the Laws of lawful Princes are collected, calling the Christian Princes only lawful, of whose Constitutions it was solely compos'd. Besides, his Design and End in composing it was, That it might serve in the Courts of Justice, and be quoted in daily Conversation, and, according to its Laws, Matters might be determined, in a Time when the Christian Religion was already fix'd in its Throne. How then can he be pardon'd, for having foisted into it so many Constitutions of Julian the Apostate, quite contrary to many of those of the Christian Princes, and more than that, to give him the Title of Divus? How could he insert in it these Constitutions, which in his Time had been branded with an evident Mark of Impiety and Superstition, as the L. 1. de Paganis of Constantine the Great, in which the publick consulting the Aruspices, is allow'd; and another of Valentinian the Elder, in which, besides the Use of the Aruspicina, the Profession of any Religion is allow'd? Laws altho' tolerable, when by cruel Necessity they were pronounc'd by those Princes, yet he ought not to have put them in a Code, which was to be made use of in after Ages, and when the Christian Religion had taken so deep Root in the Hearts of Men. Who can endure, that the L. 4. & 6. of Julian de Sepulchris Violatis, should be in it, which are full of Superstition and Heathenism? Who can bear the L. ult. of Valentinian the Younger, plac'd under the Title de Fide Catholica, by which he confirms the Conventicle of the Arminians; he gave more Vigour and Force to the pestilent Heresy of Arius, than the Authors themselves and their greatest Abettors and Sticklers could have given? Surely that Offence ought to have affected his Mind, by that generous, and at the same time holy Refusal of Benevolus, who being first Chancellor of the Empress Justina, who was the only Promoter of this Law, would by no means sign it; and was contented rather to live privately at Home on his Paternal Estate, than to remain at Court in high Esteem, a Complice of so unworthy a Deed. In the last Place, who can bear his having inserted the Laws publish'd by Arcadius, manifestly against the Catholics, and against Chrysostom and his Johannisti?

THE Compilers of the Justinian Code, did not demean themselves after that manner, who rejected all these Constitutions, as we shall shew, when we come to speak of the Composing of it, which was in the Sixth Century of Man's Redemption.

Of the Use and Authority of this Code in the West, and in these our Provinces.

THE Theodosian Code being then compil'd in the Year 438, and publish'd by Authority, was quickly receiv'd, as well in the East as the West. In the East it immediately had Force, because no sooner was it publish'd by Theodosius, its Author, than he set forth his Novellæ directed to Florentius, Præfectus P. of the East, which bears the Title de Theodosiani Codicis Autoritate, by which he declared, from that Time forth, That it should not be Lawful for any Person to make use of the Constitutions of other Princes in the Courts of Justice, but those which were contain'd in this Code; charging them moreover, that by the Means of publick Edicts, they should make known to all the People, and all the Provinces, such his Prohibition, and to inform them of the Publication and the Authority which he gave to that Volume.

IT had the same good Luck in the West, altho' Theodosius, who only govern'd in the East, could not give it the same Authority in these Western Parts, as he gave it in his own Empire; nevertheless, having before communicated his Design to Valentinian his Collegue, they, by Concert, directed all their Actions to the same End; therefore it was no sooner receiv'd in the East, than Valentinian gave it all Authority and Force in the West. Besides, this Prince had before sent to Theodosius, and those who had been chosen for the framing of this Code, a Register of all the Constitutions publish'd in the West, by the Princes his Predecessors, who had reign'd there¹; and, together with it, a Collection also of his own Constitutions, which he had publish'd through all the Year 425, whilst he sometimes resided in Aquileja, sometimes in Rome, and lastly in Ravenna, whither he had remov'd his Seat; and among these, likewise his famous Oration, which contributed much to the Design of Theodosius, by which he had repair'd the Confusion occasion'd by so many Constitutions and Books of the Civilians, which Oration was inserted in this Code by Theodosius, that is to say, that part of it only which treats of the Books of the Civilians, thinking that the other part of it, which treats of the Constitutions of Princes, would be superfluous; forasmuch as he had been more exact and minute in this his own Code on that Subject.

FOR which Reason, Valentinian gave to this Code, the same Sanction in the West, as Theodosius had given it in the East; altho' he made no special Constitution for that Purpose, yet it is not to be doubted: Since that ten Years after, in which Time Theodosius had publish'd many others of his Novellæ, and which were publish'd in another Volume apart, Valentinian, by his express *Novella*², which is amongst the Theodosian, confirm'd likewise these, adding this Reason, Ut sicut uterque Orbis individuis Ordinationibus regitur, iisdem quoque legibus temperetur. Besides the Respect and Obligations which Valentinian ow'd to Theodosius, were always too great, having given him the Title of Augustus, and afterwards became his Son-in-law; whence it was, that Valentinian us'd to call him Father, and Theodosius him, Son: Thus, in the same Novella, making mention of this Code, as already receiv'd in his Empire, with these Marks of Esteem he speaks of him; Gloriosissimus Principum Dominus Theodosius Clementiæ meæ Pater, Leges a se post Codicem Numinis sui Latas, nuper ad nos, sicut repetitis Constitutionibus carverat, prosequente Sacra Præceptione direxit. Such was the Veneration which Valentinian had for this Code, that in his Novellæ, which from time to time, down to the Year 452, a little before his Death, he publish'd, he often, in Confirmation of his Edicts, and to give them more Authority, made use of the Laws that were inserted in the Theodosian Code: So in the *Novella*³ 10. of the Year 451, and in the Novella 12. de Episcopali Judicio of the Year 452, and in the other, under the Tit. de Honoratis, &c. 45, we see, that he made use of the Laws of Honorius, Arcadius, and Gratianus, which were inserted in this Code by Theodosius.

BUT what will seem strange, is, that this Code had much much more Success in the West than in the East; since in the East it lasted only Ninety Years, that is to say, to the Time of Justinian, who making himself Author of a new Code, abolish'd and cancell'd this; but in the West it had much better Fortune with those Nations, which were call'd Barbarians: since with the Ostrogoths in Italy, the Westrogoths in the Galliæ and Spain, and with the Burgundians, French, and Longobards, it was had in such Esteem and Honour, that conformable to the Laws contain'd in it, they were pleas'd not only to govern the People whom they subdued, but likewise their own, as in the Progress of this History in the following Books, we shall treat more particularly. And lastly in our Days, and those of our Grandfathers, for the Exposition and Clearing up of this Code, it was thought, that it deserv'd to have the most worthy and sublime Genius's who flourish'd in these two last Ages, to employ their Labours, when it rose up again from under the long Darkness in which it had lain, by the Industry of Jo. Sicardus, who, in Doviat's Opinion⁴, was the first who brought it to the Light of the World in Basil, altho' very much mangled and maimed: Afterwards being put into a better Form by *Johannes Tillius*⁵ at Paris in the Year 1540, (who from being Proto-Notary of the Parliament of Paris, and who had a Hand in forming the Process of the famous Case of the Prince of Conde, was afterwards made Bishop of Meaux) the Learning and Care likewise of the incomparable Cujacius was thought well bestow'd on so great a Work; and last of all, the most laborious Jacobus Gotifredus applied his whole self, and all his Knowledge and Exactness, in making Commentaries on it, which can never be sufficiently prais'd, as being the highest Pitch of the most sublime Erudition, who dying soon after his long and obstinate Toil, had not the Pleasure to survive that incomparable Work, worthy of immortal and eternal Remembrance.

SUCH were the Vicissitudes of the Roman Jurisprudence from the Time of Constantine the Great to the Reign of Theodosius the Younger, and Valentinian III. his Collegue. These were the Laws by which both the Empires were govern'd. These were the Books which were made use of, from which the Laws were taken and cited for determining Law-Suits in the Courts of Justice, and teaching in the Academies; to wit, the Books of the Civilians Papinianus, Paulus, Cajus, Ulpianus, and Modestinus, which were the chief: The Treatises of Scevola, Sabinus, Julianus, Marcellus, with those of other famous Civilians taken from the Writings of the above-mention'd Five, had all Authority and Force. The Notes Paulus and Ulpianus made on the Book of Papinianus, were at that time rejected by Valentinian, altho' afterwards receiv'd and admitted by Justinian; but the Sense of Paulus of all the others, was most esteem'd, and of chief Authority and Force.

OF the Constitutions of the Princes, the two Codes, the Gregorian and the Hermogenian, in which were contain'd the Laws of the Heathen Princes from Adrian down to Dioclesian, were in full Force, altho' they had been compiled for private Study, by these two Civilians, without publick Commission: The Constitutions of the Princes collected there, were avowedly quoted in the Courts of Justice and Consultations: They were made use of, as we have shewn in the first Book, by St. Augustine ¹, he having cited a Constitution of Antoninus register'd in the Gregorian Code: The Author of the Collation of the Mosaical Laws with the Roman, made use of them, who, according to Gotifredus, flourish'd towards the End of the Sixth Century, in the Time of Cassiodorus; likewise the Author of that ancient Consultation, which we now read amongst those of Cujacius, made use of them: And afterwards also Tribonianus and Papinianus, and other Writers of lower Times, took the Advantage of the Compend of them: And lastly, the Theodosian Code, with the Novellæ newly publish'd by that Prince, and Valentinian his Collegue, were of more Force and Authority.

THESE then were the Books, in which in that Age was contain'd all the Civil Law of the Romans, by which the Tribunals, the Academies, the Professors, the Baristers, the Magistrates, and the Judges, were directed in Judging, Writing, and Teaching. Hitherto these Provinces, which now make our Kingdom, had never known any foreign Laws. Only the venerable Name of the Roman Laws was understood and reverenc'd, and according to the Dictates thereof, they were govern'd and manag'd, until they were a-new infested by those same Nations, which in those very Times had begun to disturb them; and altho' they durst not abuse the Roman Laws, but on the contrary honour'd them, yet nevertheless, amongst so many Revolutions of Affairs, they could not remain intire and firm, but were polluted, and seem'd to be on the Brink of Ruin, as shall be shewn in the following Books of this History.

C H A P. VIII.

Of the exterior Ecclesiastical Polity, from the Reign of the Emperor Constantine the Great, to that of Valentinian III.

AFTER Constantine the Great had embrac'd the Christian Religion, and settled the Church at her ease, she was seen in greater outward Splendor, and in a more ample and noble Hierarchy. The Bishops, who in those first Three Ages, in the midst of Persecutions, govern'd the Churches in the Cities of the Empire; now when that Religion might be profess'd publicly by every Body, and that they began to erect Temples and Altars for keeping up the Worship of it, were seen, according to the Bigness of the Cities in which they govern'd the Churches, dispos'd in various and different Degrees, and plac'd in greater Eminency. Whereupon the Titles of Metropolitans, Primates, Exarchs or Patriarchs, answerable to those of the Secular Magistrates, and according to the Extent of the Provinces which they govern'd, came in Fashion.

PETER de Marca Archbishop of Paris ¹, Christian Lupus Doctor of Louvain, Emanuel Schelstrat a Divine of Antwerp, Leo Allacius, and others, with a great deal of Flourish, endeavour to maintain that the Dignity of Metropolitan, as also the Patriarchal, owe their Beginnings to the Apostles, and were instituted by them. But Lewis Ellies Du Pin ² an eminent Divine of Paris, disproves their Errors at large, by confuting the Arguments taken from the Archbishop of Paris: He demonstrates very strongly, and proves very clearly, that such Dignities were neither instituted by Christ nor his Apostles; but in those Times when Constantine gave Peace to the Church, they began to be instituted: According to the Disposition of the Provinces of the Empire, and the State of the Metropolitan Cities of each of them, this new Polity, and this new Hierarchy was introduc'd into the Church.

THE manner after which it was done, was so natural and peculiar, that it would have been strange if it had been done otherwise. We have already observed from the Description of the Provinces of the Empire made under Constantine, that the Dioceses being made up of several Provinces, had some chief City or Metropolis, on which the rest of the same Province depended; to which, for Civil Matters and other Affairs, as is usual, all the People of the Province resorted. The Church being founded in the Empire, as Optatus Milevitanus says, and not the Empire in the Church, so soon therefore as she was in Peace, she took the same Polity in Ecclesiastical Matters; she adapted herself to the same Disposition of the Provinces, and to the same Conditions of the Cities which she found: So when any Bishop was to be Ordain'd or Depos'd, or any Division or Disorder happen'd in the Church; when any Business was to be advis'd which concern'd the other Churches of the Province, the Apostles not being at Hand, to whom formerly they had recourse in such Cases, there was a Necessity of having recourse to the Bishop of the Metropolis, or chief City of the Province. Thus by Custom and piece-meal did this Polity begin to be introduc'd; whence the Disposition of the Churches was made after the Model of the Empire, and the Metropolitan Cities of the Empire became the Metropolitans of the Church, and the Bishops who presided in them, acquir'd a Power over the whole Provinces, as well of Ordaining or Deposing of the Bishops of the lesser Cities, and of making up of their Dissentions, as of calling of Synods, and over their other necessary Affairs; but this Power was not absolute, since without the Advice of the Bishops of the same Province they could do nothing: This Custom was confirm'd in the Fourth, and likewise in the following Centuries, by many Canons which were made in some Councils; whence all the Church was disposed and divided after the Model of the Civil Polity.

THIS Division and Hierarchy of the Church, conformable to the Polity of the Empire will appear more clear and distinct, if we consider the Division of the Dioceses and the Provinces, which we have describ'd in this Book under the Empire of Constantine: There we shall see the Empire divided into four Parts, to wit, the East, Illyricum, the Gallia, and Italy, to the Government of which as many Moderators were appointed.

The E A S T.

THE East was divided into five Dioceses, each of which comprehended several Provinces, the East, Egypt, Asia, Pontus, and Thracia.

THE Diocese of the East had for its chief City, Head of all the rest, Antioch in Syria; whence it was very fit, that this City in the Ecclesiastical Polity should be the Head of all the rest; and that the Bishop who govern'd this See, should be advanc'd likewise above all the other Bishops of the Churches of all those Provinces of which that Diocese was composed. There was yet another Prerogative to be added, which was, that St. Peter, the Chief of the Apostles, founded the Church in Antioch, and there first preach'd the Gospel, altho' he was pleas'd afterwards to remove his Chair to Rome.

THE Provinces which made up the Diocese of the East, were at first no more than Ten, to wit, Palestine, Syria, Pbœnicia, Arabia, Cilicia, Isauria, Mesopotamia, Osdroena, Euphrates, and Cyprus; but afterwards their Number increas'd to Fifteen; because Palestine was divided into three Provinces, Syria into two, Cilicia into two, and Pbœnicia likewise into two. Now we shall see in each of these Provinces their Metropolitans according to the Polity of the Empire.

PALESTINE, as it was at first divided, own'd no other City for its Metropolis, but Cæsarea; whence its Bishop acquir'd the Rights of Metropolitan over the other Bishops of the lesser Cities: And being afterwards divided into more Provinces, it had in the one for Metropolis the City of Scythopolis, and in the other that of Jerusalem; but altho' there were three Provinces made out of one, yet by this new Division, and the Addition of two other Metropolitans, it did not derogate from the Rights of Metropolitan of the Bishop of Cæsarea. But the Bishops of Scythopolis and Jerusalem continu'd, as they were formerly, Suffragans to the Metropolitan of Cæsarea: And when the great Council was held in Nice, altho' there were many Honours and Prerogatives allow'd to the holy City of Jerusalem, yet these Fathers would by no means, on that account, lessen the Prerogatives of the Metropolitan of Cæsarea, Metropoli propria dignitate servata, says the seventh Canon of that Council; and for no other Reason, but that the Province of Palestine being but one, and Cæsarea its ancient Metropolis; and that Bishop being already possessed of all the Rights of Metropolitan, it was not just, that by that new Division he should lose them, or that they should be diminish'd: Neither was it till long after that the Church of Jerusalem was adorn'd with the Patriarchal Dignity, as we shall see anon.

THE other Province of this Diocese was Syria, which had Antioch for its Metropolis, and likewise Head of all the Diocese; but afterwards it was divided into two, and besides Antioch, it acknowledg'd the other, which was Apamea.

CILICIA was also divided into two Provinces; it own'd likewise two Metropolis's Tarsus and Anazarbus.

PHOENICIA, as it was divided into two Provinces acknowledg'd likewise two Metropolis's, Tyrus and Damascus. There was also in Pbœnicia the City Berytis, famous all the World over, as we have shewn in the First Book, on account of the famous Academy erected there. In the Reign of Theodosius the Younger, Eustatius Bishop of that City, obtain'd a Rescript from that Prince, by which Berytis was advanc'd to be a Metropolis; for which Cause Eustatius, in a Council which was then held at Constantinople, asked, That his City being made a Metropolis, if in consequence consequence of that, he ought to make a new Division of the Churches of that Province, and if some of those, which before belong'd to the Metropolitan of Tyre, were to be subject to his new Metropolis? Photius, who was at that time Bishop of Tyre, discovering the Inclinations of Theodosius, out of cruel Necessity was oblig'd to approve of the Division. But the Emperor Theodosius being dead, and succeeded in the Empire of the East by Martianus, the Bishop Photius complain'd of the Wrong done him to the new Emperor, desiring, that those Churches which had been taken from his City, their ancient Metropolis, might be restor'd to it again. Martianus caus'd the Case to be re-examin'd in the Council of Chalcedonia; and it appear'd to these Fathers, that such an Affair ought not to be decided according to the new Disposition of Theodosius, and the new Constitutions of Princes, but according to the Tenor of the ancient Canons: And having read in the Assembly the Canon of the Council of Nice, by which it was ordain'd, That there should be only one Metropolitan in each Province, it was decided in favour of the Bishop of Tyre, and all the Churches of that Province were restor'd to his See; since according to the ancient Disposition of the Provinces of the Diocess of the East, Phœnicia was one Province, and acknowledg'd but one Metropolitan.

THUS when Bishops intended to incroach upon the Rights of their Metropolitan, they were wont to apply to the Emperors, and to obtain a Division of the Province, that their City might be rais'd to be a Metropolis, in order to their appropriating to themselves the Rights of Metropolitan over those Churches which were taken from the more ancient. Indeed the Emperor Valens, out of Hatred to Basil, divided Cappadocia into two Parts, and by so doing with the other Provinces, the Division likewise of the Church follow'd, as Nazarius testifies; because that in the succeeding Times the Rigour of the Council of Nice was not observ'd, which, we may say, was only observ'd in the Case of Photius Bishop of Tyre, since afterwards as the Cities were advanc'd by the Emperors to be Metropolis's, and the Provinces divided, generally the Ecclesiastical Polity was likewise alter'd; as by the same Council of Chalcedonia it was allow'd in these Words of Can. 17. Sin autem etiam aliqua Civitas ab Imperatoria auctoritate innovata fuerit Civiles, & Publicas formas, Ecclesiasticarum quoque Parochiarum ordo consequatur. Whence it came to pass afterwards, that as the Disposition and Polity of the Empire were chang'd, in like manner so many Changes were seen in the Ecclesiastical State, as shall be clearly shewn in the Course of this History.

AFTER the same manner the other Provinces likewise of this Diocess of the East, such as Arabia, Isauria, Mesopotamia, Ostroëna, Euphrates and Cyprus, according to the Disposition and Polity of the Empire, acknowledg'd their Metropolitans, who were so call'd, because they presid'd in the Churches of the principal Cities of the Provinces, and consequently they enjoy'd some Rights and Prerogatives, which the other Bishops that were over the other Churches of the lesser Cities of the Province had not. They ordain'd the Bishops elected by the Churches of the Province; they conven'd the Provincial Councils, and had the Superintendency and Care, that the Faith and Discipline should be observ'd in the Province, which were the Rights and Privileges of the Metropolitans by which they were distinguish'd from the other Bishops: And thus, after the Council of Nice, the Title of Metropolitan was understood by all the other Councils that succeeded, and all the Ecclesiastical Writers of the fourth and fifth Centuries.

IT is likewise true, that there were some Bishops who had only the Title of Metropolitan, and were so call'd for Honour's sake, not because they had any of those Rights or Prerogatives: So the Bishop of Nice obtain'd the Title of Metropolitan out of Honour only, and took the Place of all the other Bishops of that Province, but was still under the Metropolitan of Nicomedia, whose Suffragan he was; so likewise were the Bishops of Chalcedon and Berytis. And according to that Institution in our Time and in our Kingdom we see many Bishops, as that of Nazaret, of Lanciano and Rossano, and in Sardinia, the Bishop of Arborensis or Oristagni, who out of Honour enjoy the Title of Metropolitan, altho' they have no Province or Suffragan Bishop.

THE Title of Archbishop is not of Power, as the Metropolitan; but only of Dignity; and at first it was only given to the most remarkable Bishops, and but very seldom. Neither was it known in the three first Ages, nor do we read of such a Title: We begin to hear of it in the fourth Century, first in Athanasius, and afterwards in other Writers, and but seldom. In the fifth Century it was more used, and it began to be given to the Bishops of Rome, to those of Antioch, Alexandria, Constantinople, Jerusalem, Ephesus, and Thessalonica. In the Sixth it was given likewise to the Bishops of Tyre and Apamea, and some others: S. Gregory the Great afterwards gave that Title to the Bishops of Corinth, Cagliari, and Ravenna; and in the eighth Century it was given to these and other renown'd Metropolitans, such as Nicopolis, Solona, Aquileja, Carthage and other Cities. But in latter Times, and the Ages less distant from us, all the Metropolitans assum'd that Title promiscuously; thus it was given to simple Bishops, who were not Metropolitans: Whence it was, that among the Greeks in the latter Times, there were more Archbishops than Metropolitans, because it was easy for simple Bishops to assume to themselves that specious Title, but not so easy to subject other Churches to them. And for the same Reason it is that we see many Archbishops in our Kingdom without Suffragans: Of which we shall treat more fully, when we come to discourse of the Ecclesiastical Polity of these latter Times.

THUS we see the Metropolitans of the Provinces of the Diocess of the East, according to the Disposition of the Metropolitan Cities of the Empire. Thus likewise we shall see in that Diocess its Exarch, or rather Patriarch, who was the Bishop of Antioch, because presiding in that City which was Head of the whole Diocess, he presided likewise over all the Metropolitans of those Provinces, of which that Diocess was compos'd; and had the Patriarchal Rights and Privileges, which were, to ordain the Metropolitans, to call Diocesan Synods, and to have the Superintendency and Care that the Faith and Discipline should be kept up in the whole Diocess. At first they were properly call'd Exarchs, because they were set over the principal Cities of the Diocess, and had several Provinces under them: Whence, in the Canons of the Council of Chalcedon, on account of that Division of the Provinces and the Diocesses, the Exarchs are distinguish'd from the Metropolitans: Thus Philalethes Bishop of Cæsarea, and Theodorus Bishop of Ephesus, were call'd Exarchs, because the First had under him the Diocess of Pontus, and the Second that of Asia. 'Tis true, that this Title was sometimes given likewise to simple Metropolitans; and the Greeks in latter Times gave it profusely to many Metropolitans, such as to that of Amira, Sardica, Nicomedia, Nicea, Chalcedon, Larissa, and others. Nevertheless the proper Signification of the Word Exarcha, imports nothing else but a Bishop who presided over the whole Diocess, as the Metropolitan did over the Province. Some of these Exarchs were likewise call'd Patriarchs, which Title, in process of Time, was restricted to five only in the East, amongst which that of Antioch was one.

THE Bounds of the Exarchate of Antioch did not extend further than the Confines of the Diocess of the East; since the other neighbouring Provinces were within the Limits of the other Diocesses, and belong'd to other Exarchs. So the Diocess of Egypt, as we shall see anon, was under the Exarch of Alexandria, and the other Diocesses of the East, such as the Asian, the Pontick, and the Thracian; were not in that Exarchate; so that in the Council of Constantinople, the Care of these three Diocesses was committed to their proper Bishops. Neither do we read, that when the Bishop of Constantinople invaded these three Diocesses, and subjected them to his Patriarchate, as we shall shortly see, that the Bishop of Antioch contended for them as belonging to him.

THE second Diocess was Egypt, which was under the Care of the Præfectus Prætorio of the East; the principal City of this Diocess was the famous and renown'd Alexandria: Whence its Bishop so rais'd himself and his Church, that next to that of Rome, it had the first Place; besides another Prerogative it had, which was, that St. Mark the Evangelist was the first Bishop of that See.

THIS Diocess at first was divided only into three Provinces, Egypt strictly taken, Lybia, and Pentapolis: Whence in the sixth Canon of the Council of Nice we read, Amiqua consuetudo servetur per Ægyptum, Lybiam, & Pentapolim, ita ut Alexandrinus Episcopus eorum omnium habeat potestatem. Lybia was afterwards divided into two Provinces, the Upper and the Lower; the Arcadian, the Theban, and the Augustamnican were added: And lastly, the Diocess of Egypt was divided into ten Provinces, by which as many Metropolitan Cities sprung up; whence came ten Metropolitans, equal to the Number of Provinces. These were put under the Bishop of Alexandria as their Exarch, and Head of the Diocess, over which he exercised all the Exarchal Rights and Privileges. The Bounds of his Exarchate did not reach further than the Diocesis of Egypt, which comprehended these ten Provinces. Neither did he ever concern himself with Western Africa, as the most accurate Du Pin proves¹: Whence they were in a prodigious Error, who reckon'd that all Africa, as a Third Part of the World, had been subjected to the Patriarchate of Alexandria. This Exarchate, as also that of Alexandria, acquir'd afterwards the Title of Patriarchate, and was one of the Five most renown'd in the fifth and sixth Centuries, as we shall shew anon.

Exarchal

THE third Diocesis subjected to the Præfectus P. of the East, was Asia, in which one Province, strictly call'd Asia, was Proconsular; and Ephesus was the Metropolis of this Province, as also Head of the whole Diocesis. The other Provinces, such as Pamphilia, Hellepontus, Lydia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Lycia, Caria, and Phrygia, which was divided into two, the Pacatiata, and the Salutaris, were subject to the Vicarius of Asia, each of which had its Metropolitan; besides there was a Metropolitan in the Island of Rhodes, and another in that of Lesbos.

THE Asian Diocesis became one of the Autocephalæ, as never having been subject either to the Patriarch of Alexandria, or that of Antioch. It acknowledg'd only the Bishop of Ephesus as Primate, because of his being plac'd in the principal City over all the Diocesis; on which account Theodore Bishop of Ephesus, was call'd Exarch, as all the rest were who govern'd that Church; since their Power reach'd not only over one Province, but over all the Diocesis of Asia. But these Exarchs could never attain to the Title of Patriarch, because by Degrees the Patriarch of Constantinople, not only restricted their Power, but altogether subjected this intire Diocesis to his Patriarchate.

THE fourth was the Diocesis of Pontus, the principal City of which was Cæsarea in Cappadocia. At first this Diocesis was only compos'd of six Provinces, which were Cappadocia, Galatia, Armenia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, and Bythinia; each of which afterwards, except Bythinia, was divided into Two; and thus from Six, their Number increas'd to Eleven, which had as many Metropolitans. In this Diocesis was the City of Nice, which both in a Civil and Ecclesiastical Sense, was by the Emperors Valentinian and Valens rais'd to the Dignity of a Metropolis. The Bishop of Nicomedia oppos'd this Advancement, his being the Metropolitan City of that Province, pretending, That it ought not to prejudge him in the Rights and Privileges of his Metropolitan Church; because these Princes had granted that Prerogative to Nice, not with a Design to take away another Man's Rights; by which the Metropolitan of Nicomedia preserv'd the Privileges of his Church, and Nice enjoy'd only the Honour and Title, but not the Rights and Privileges of a Metropolitan. Over all which Metropolitans the Bishop of Cæsarea, which was the chief City of that Diocesis, presided. On which account he was likewise call'd Exarch, as were those of Antioch, Alexandria, and Ephesus; but he could not attain to the Honour of Patriarchate as the two First did, because his Diocesis, with that of Asia, were afterwards subjected to the Patriarchate of Constantinople.

THE fifth and last Diocesis, which was commanded by the Præfectus P. of the East, was Thracia, the Head of which was Heraclea. It was made up of six Provinces, Europa, Thracia, Rhodope, Eminontus, Mesia, and Scythia; each of which had its own Metropolitan; But many and strange were the Alterations in this Diocesis afterwards, as well in the Civil as Ecclesiastical State. At first it acknowledg'd the Bishop of Heraclea for Exarch, as Head of the Diocesis, and who had the Bishop of Byzantium for Suffragan; but after it pleas'd Constantine to aggrandize this City so much, having made it the Head of another Empire, he call'd it likewise after his own Name, no more Byzantium, but Constantinople; the Bishop of this City was exalted above all the rest, keeping pace with the Polity of the Empire, and not only was not content with the Privileges of Metropolitan or Exarch, in suppressing that of Heraclea; but being adorn'd with the Honour of Patriarch also, he pretended afterwards to extend his Authority beyond the Bounds of his Patriarchate, and likewise to incroach upon the Provinces of the Patriarchate of Rome, as shall be shewn afterwards.

SUCH in short, in the Times succeeding Constantine, was the Polity of the Ecclesiastical State in the Præfecture of the East, altogether conformable and adapted to that of the Empire.

I L L Y R I C U M.

LET us take a View of the Ecclesiastical Polity in those Diocesses which were under the Government of the Præfektus P. of Illyricum, that is to say, in Macedonia and Dacia. The Diocess of Macedonia, which consisted of six Provinces, to wit, Achaia, Macedonia, Creta, Thessalia, Old Epirus, and New Epirus, had for its chief City Thessaly, whose Bishop, as Head of the Diocess, govern'd the other Provinces, and exercis'd his Exarchal Authority over their Metropolitans. The Diocess of Dacia was made up of five Provinces, to wit, Dacia Mediterranea and Ripensis, Mesia Prima, Dardania, and Part of Macedonia Salutaris. We shall have a more proper Opportunity to treat of the Polity of these Diocesses, when we come to the Patriarchate of Rome; for what hath been related of the Polity of the Ecclesiastical State of the East, as to the Conformity it had with that of the Empire, may suffice: Let us return to the West, where we shall stop in Italy, and examine it more narrowly in these our Provinces, that we may know what Innovations have been, and what Changes it hath occasion'd to their Political and Temporal State.

The G A L L I Æ.

BUT first we must observe, what hath been taken Notice of by the most nice Searchers into Ecclesiastical Matters, which is, that the Polity of the Church is more exactly conformable to that of the Empire in the East, and Illyricum, than in the West, and in these our Provinces. There is scarcely the smallest Difference of any Moment to be observ'd in the East; but in the West there are many. In the Gallia there are considerable, and likewise in Italy there are some perceiv'd, but many more in Western Africa, where the Ecclesiastical Metropolis's agree in nothing with the Civil.

THE Gallia, according to the above mention'd Description, which were under the Command of this Præfektus, were divided into three Diocesses: Gallia, which was made up of seventeen Provinces; Spain of Seven, and Britain of Five.

THERE's no doubt but that at first Gallia had its Churches dispos'd according to the Disposition of the Provinces of which the Diocess was compos'd, so that every Ecclesiastical Metropolis was conformable to the Civil; and that in these early Times Gallia acknowledg'd no Primate or Exarch, as the Diocesses of the East did, but the Bishops with their Metropolitans govern'd the Gallican Church. And the Reason was, because in Gallia there was not one City so noted and eminent above all the rest, on which they were to have a Dependance, as there were in other Parts of the World: But afterwards many of those Cities contended for the Right of Primacy. In the Province of Narbonne there was a great Dispute between the Bishops of Vienne and Arles, of which *Du Pin*¹ treats at large. In Aquitaine, long after, another Dispute arose between the Bishops of Burges and Bordeaux, which may be seen in *Alteferra*². In latter Times in the West, these Bishops who were Metropolitans of any of the most noted Cities, claim'd many Prerogatives over the other Metropolitans, and call'd themselves Primates, altho' at first that Title was indifferently bestow'd on all Metropolitans: So in France, the Metropolitan of Lyons is call'd Primate, and possesses a great many more Prerogatives than the other Metropolitans.

IN those early Times Spain had some Ecclesiastical Polity according to that of the Empire; but afterwards the Political Government changing, all was chang'd with it; and as one City, either on account of the Residence of the Prince, or any other Cause, was rais'd above the rest of several Provinces, so the Bishop of that Church, not content with the Rights of Metropolitan, claim'd many Prerogatives over the rest, and call'd himself Primate: Thus Spain has now for Primate the Archbishop of Toledo; and France the Archbishop of Lyons.

ALTHO' Britain at first had some Ecclesiastical Polity conformable to the Civil of the Empire, yet being afterwards possess'd by the Saxons, it lost it altogether; so that there remain'd no Vestige of the ancient Polity, neither in the Civil nor Ecclesiastick State.

I T A L Y.

WE have reserv'd to this last Place the Præfecture of Italy, since we are to stop in it according to our Intention, in order to know more minutely the Ecclesiastical Polity of these our Provinces in those Times.

UNDER the Præfect of Italy, as we have seen, there were three Diocesses, Illyricum, Africa, and Italy: It doth not belong to this Place to speak of the first Two; but of Italy, where we may see the most famous Patriarchate in the World instituted, it will be necessary, that we discourse at large: What ought to be esteem'd one of the greatest Honours of this Diocess, is, that when all the other Patriarchates, and that of Constantinople itself, which also attempted to usurp its Rights, are now demolish'd, the Patriarchate of Rome only stands its Ground; and has annex'd to it the Prerogatives of the Chief and Head of all the Churches of the Catholick World, and of all the Patriarchs that ever were: And our Italy and Rome can justly boast, of being the principal Seat of Religion, as it was of Empire.

UNDER the Præfect of Italy, as we have said, there were two Vicariates, the Vicariate of Rome, and that of Italy. In the Vicariate of Rome, there were ten Provinces. All the Four of which our Kingdom is compos'd, to wit, Campania, Puglia and Calabria, Lucania, and the Brutii: and Samnium belong'd to the Vicariate of that City: Hetruria and Umbria were likewise comprehended in it; as also Picenum Suburbicarium, Sicilia, Sardinia, Corfica and Valeria.

UNDER the Vicariate of Italy, whose Head was the City of Milan, there were seven Provinces, to wit, Liguria, Emilia, Flaminia, or Picenum Annonarium, Venetia, to which afterwards Istria was added, the Alpes Cottiae, and both the Rhætiae.

THE Division of Italy into two Vicariates imports, That the Ecclesiastical Polity of Italy did not answer to that of the East; since it was not every Province of Italy which had a Metropolis, that likewise had a Metropolitan, as in the East, but the Cities, as at first had their simple Bishops; and those were not Suffragans to any Metropolitan, but either to the Bishop of Rome or Milan: Those of the Vicariate of Rome to the Bishop of that City, and those of the Vicariate of Italy to the Bishop of *Milan*¹.

THE Provinces which belong'd to the Vicariate of the City of Rome, as Sirmundus very well proves², for that very Reason were call'd Suburbicarian: Whence the Suburbicarian Churches were those which were comprehended in the Vicariate of Rome. Gotifredus and Salmasius are of another Opinion; they confine the Suburbicarian Provinces and Churches to too narrow Bounds, and pretend that they extended a hundred Miles round Rome, and no further, and were under the Direction of the Præfect of the City of Rome. Others have run into another Extremes, and under the Name of Suburbicarian Provinces, understood the universal Empire of Rome, or at least all the West, as Emanuel Schelstrat and Leo Allatius, with great Flourishes, have endeavour'd to prove³.

BUT *Lewis Du Pin*⁴ could not approve of the Opinion of Sirmundus as right, and rejecting the contrary Opinions of the other two; upon strong and solid Grounds he affirms, the Suburbicarian Provinces and Churches, to have been those which were under the Command of the Vicarius of Rome, and were comprehended in that Vicariate.

FOR this Reason it was, that since the Polity of the Church kept pace with that of the Empire, the Bishop of Rome exercis'd the Prerogatives of Metropolitan over all those Provinces. He could not properly be call'd Exarch, because the intire Diocess of Italy was not under his Direction; those being call'd Exarchs in the East, who had the Charge of intire Diocesses: But the Diocesses of Italy being divided into Vicariates, he could not extend his Authority further than his own Vicariate, neither in Italy, nor out of it. For out of these Suburbicarian Provinces, the Metropolitans of each Province ordain'd all the Bishops, and they themselves were ordain'd by the Bishop of the Province⁵: And if it at any Time we read, that the Roman Pontiff in those Days conven'd numerous Synods from all the Provinces of the West, it was not only by his Authority of Metropolitan, but by reason of the Primacy which he had over all the Churches of the Catholick World; which in process of Time (these two Authorities being jumbled together) extended the Roman Patriarchate to what we have seen it since, when not content with the Suburbicarian Provinces, he subjected Illyricum, whither he sent his Vicarii: And soon after he not only extended his Authority over all the Provinces of Italy, but likewise over the Gallia and Spain; so that he acquir'd the Title of Patriarch of all the West, as we shall see anon.

BUT in the Reign of Constantine, and down to that of Valentinian III. the Power which he exercis'd by usual Right, extended no further than over the Suburbicarian Provinces¹: And therefore it likewise fell out, that the Roman Pontiff exercised his Authority over these Provinces, with greater and more full Power, than the Exarchs of the East did over the Provinces of their Diocess; forasmuch as the Ordination of Bishops not only of the Metropolitan Cities, but likewise of all the other Bishops of these Provinces belong'd to him: Whereas in the East, the Exarchs left the Ordination of these Bishops to their Metropolitans.

THE Title of Patriarch was given to the Exarchs of the East long before it was given to the Roman Pontiff. If we regard the Antiquity of the Church, that Title of Patriarch was at first given in the East as an Encomium, even to simple Bishops²: Afterwards it was confin'd to the Exarchs who had the Charge of intire Diocesses; for which Cause, among the Greeks all the Exarchs got the Title of Patriarch. But in the West among the Latins, the first who was so call'd, was the Roman Pontiff; and it was the Greeks themselves who first gave him that Encomium, but not before the Reign of Valentinian III. At this Time Leo R. P. was by the Greeks and by Martianus himself Emperor of the East, call'd Patriarch; and neither the Latins themselves nor the Greeks gave him such a Title before, as the most exact Du Pin remarks: And *Sirmondus*³ cannot bring Authorities against Claudius Salmasius on that Subject, more ancient than the Emperors Anastasius and Justinus, who had call'd Ormisda Bishop of Rome Patriarch.

FOR which Reason we read not of any Metropolitan in our Provinces: And altho' after Constantine, the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy was in greater Splendor, yet the Cities of our Provinces had only Bishops, as at first, acknowledging none other but the Bishop of Rome for their Metropolitan. Which did not happen to the Provinces of the East; in which, as we have shewn, each Province had its Metropolitan, who exercis'd the Rights of Metropolitan over the Bishops of that Province: With us the Polity was different; for altho' the Province of Campania had its Metropolitan City, which was Capua, its Bishop did not on that Account pretend to any Superiority over the other Bishops of the same Province, by making them his Suffragans: And it is of much later Date, and properly in the Year 968, that the Church of Capua was made a Metropolis, and that its Bishop acquir'd the Rights of Metropolitan over many Bishops of that Province his Suffragans. Puglia likewise and Calabria did not acknowledge their Metropolitans for a long Time after. And if it be not valid what the Patriarch of Constantinople did with respect to these Churches of that Province, to wit, Bari, Brundisium, Otranto, Canoza, Tarentum, S. Severina, and other Cities of the same, their Claim will not be allow'd them until the following Centuries; and Sipontum was made a Metropolis later, by Benedict IX. in the Year 1034. The same is to be observ'd in the Provinces of Lucania and the Bruttii, where Rhegium and Salernum, according to the Polity of the Empire, were the Metropolitan Cities of the said Provinces in those Times, and had only Bishops; and Rhegium had its Metropolitan afterwards, by the Favour of the Patriarch of Constantinople, as Salernum had by that of Benedict the Vth in the Year 984; and so of the rest, which we see now in that Province. Samnium was much later made a Metropolis: Beneventum was advanc'd to that Honour in the Year 969, a Year after Capua; and all the Metropolitans which we see now in such great Numbers in all these our Provinces, have a later Origin, which we shall clearly make appear in the Course of this History.

IN the Reign of Constantine, down to that of Valentinian III. of which we are now treating, the Churches of these our Provinces, as Suburbicariae, had for Metropolitan only the Pontiff of Rome; to him only belong'd the Ordination of Bishops⁴: And when any City wanted a Bishop, the Clergy and People elected a Successor, then they sent to acquaint the Roman Pontiff, that he might be ordain'd¹; who frequently, either made the Elect come to Rome, or sent his Delagation to others for ordaining him; and it was afterwards introduc'd, that when there was any Contest about the Election, he decided it, or it was ended by Compromise: Which Custom we see continu'd in the Time of Gregory the Great, concerning which, there are yet remaining many Provisions in the Register of his Letters, which he sent for the Election of the Bishops of Capua, Naples, Cuma, and Misenum in *Campania*²; and in Samnium, of the Bishops of the Aprutii. And in Sicily, as a Suburbicarian Province, we likewise see the same Authority exercis'd by the Roman Pontiffs in the Election of Bishops, as is manifest from the Letters of Leo and *Gregory the Great*³.

SUCH in short, was the Ecclesiastical Polity of these our Provinces in the fourth and fifth Centuries: They had as at first, only Bishops, neither did they acknowledge any Metropolitan over their Cities; only the Roman Pontiffs exercis'd the Rights of Metropolitan over them, and had special Regard and Concern for them. For which Reason, neither the Arian nor Pelegian Heresies had ever any footing in them⁴. Neither had the Patriarchs of Constantinople commenc'd their Pretension of subjecting these Provinces to their Patriarchate, as they attempted afterwards in the Time of Leo Isauricus, and of Pope Gregory II. and which they effected some time after; of which we shall have occasion to discourse in another Place. Neither was there any other Hierarchy known in these our Provinces to that Time, but that of Deacons, Priests, Bishops, and Metropolitan, which was the Bishop of Rome, both Head and Chief of all the Churches of the Catholick World. Some have likewise mention'd at this Time, the Institution of Subdeacons, Acolyts, Exorcists, Readers, and Doorkeepers; as also other Ministers, which have no manner of relation to the Hierarchical Order, but only were intrusted with the Keeping and Care of the Temporalities of the Church: Of whom we shall have occasion to speak elsewhere.

Of M O N K S.

ALTHO' the Solitarii had already been taken Notice of in the East, in their Language call'd Monachi; yet these were only Secular Men, without Character or Degree, who for the most part led their Lives in the Solitudes and Desarts of Egypt: As soon as Peace was given to the Church by the Emperor Constantine, that Virtue, which in the three first preceding Ages was practis'd in the Christian Societies in the Midst of Persecutions, began to slacken; and seeing there was no more Danger in being a Christian, many made Profession of being such, without being well converted, or perswaded of the Contempt of Pleasures, of Riches, or of the Hope of Heaven. So they who were inclin'd to practise a Christian Life in a greater Purity, found it most secure in seperating themselves from the World, and living in Solitude¹.

THE first Monks that we read of, were divided and distinguish'd into two Orders, to wit, the Solitarii, and the Cænobitæ: The First were also call'd Eremitæ, Monachi, Monazontæ, and Anachoretæ. Some derive the Origin of Monachism from the Therapeutæ, who believ'd that there was a particular Society of Christians establish'd by St. Mark, in the Neighbourhood of Alexandria; whose Lives Philo describes.

But altho' Eusebius believ'd that the Therapeutæ were Christians, and had ascrib'd unto them the Name of Ascetæ, nevertheless 'tis very unlikely that they were reputed Christians, and Disciples of St. Mark, since altho' their Lives; as Philo describes them, approach'd very near to those of Christians, yet the many Things which he adds concerning their Rites and Customs, such as the Observation of the Sabbath, the Table on which they offer'd Bread, Salt, and Hyssop, in Honour of the Holy Table, which was within the Porch of the Temple, and a Thousand other Customs, which were no ways agreeable to those of the ancient Christians, convince us, and demonstrate, that they were Jews and not Christians. The Name of Ascetæ, which Eusebius ascribes to them, ought not to make them pass for Monks, since the Word Ascetæ is a general Term, which signifies those who lead a Life more Austere and Religious than others; therefore we cannot conclude, that he believ'd the Ascetæ were Monks.

HOWEVER that may be, 'tis certain, that in the fourth Century those Monks multiply'd in such a manner, that there was not a Province in the East that was not full of them. The Diocess of the East, of which Antioch was the Head, abounded with them. In Egypt their Number was infinite. In Africa and in Syria they had them in Plenty. And in the West they had likewise penetrated within the Limits of the Bishoprick of Rome, our Campania, and the neighbouring Provinces, as is clear from a Constitution of Valentinian the Elder in the Year 370. directed to Damasus Bishop of Rome ¹; Palladius likewise reports ², that in these our Provinces, as well in Campania as the neighbouring Places, towards the End of the fourth Century, many led Hermitical and Solitary Lives; and P. Caracciolus ³ says, that many were seen not only in Campania, but also in Samnium and Lucania.

THESE liv'd solitarily and in the Desarts, and there led Lives altogether devout, free from all worldly Care, and the Conversation of Men. They built poor little Cells for their Habitations, and spent the Day in Labour, in making of Mats, Baskets, and other easy Work; and their Labour serv'd not only for their Sustenance, but likewise for Alms. The Heathens reckon'd their Life idle and lazy; for which they were bitterly calumniated by their Writers ⁴, accusing them of defiling themselves with filthy Lust, and abominable Vices. They had no certain Rules, neither were they tied by any Vows: Their quiet Life drew many to the Woods, so that Abuses began soon to creep in; because many, for avoiding the Expences of the Court, and other Charges of the Commonwealth, and in order to lead a Life altogether idle, and to shun all other Obligation, under the feign'd Pretence of Religion, left the Cities, and went to associate themselves with the Solitarii; so that it behov'd Valens to forbid these Retreats, and order them to return to the Cities, to bear the Charges according to their Duty ⁵.

BUT the Solitarii, not long after, degenerating from their Institution, too often frequented the Cities, and meddled in Secular Affairs: There was neither Process before the Tribunals, nor Dealings, or any Business whatsoever on the Publick Market-Place, into which they did not thrust themselves; and their Boldness increasing more and more, they were the Cause of many Disorders and Tumults which often happen'd in the Cities; of which we read many Instances in Eunapius ⁶, Chrysostome, Theodorete, Zosimus, Libanius, Ambrosius, Basilus, Isidorus, Pelusiota, Hieronymus, and others: So that the Judges, and the other Magistrates, were oblig'd to have recourse to the Emperor Theodosius the Great, that he would be pleas'd to remedy so great Disorders which were so pernicious to the Commonwealth: Upon which that Prince put forth a Law, by which he ordain'd, That they should not leave their Solitudes, nor ever come to the Cities; but before twenty Months were ended, the same Theodosius, out of Favour to the same Solitarii, revok'd that Law ⁷.

THEY had for their chief Standard-Bearer in Thebais, Paul, on which account he was call'd chief Hermite: In Palestine, Hilarion; and in the Desarts of Egypt, Hieronymus, who by so living, design'd to imitate Elias, and John the Fore-runner of Christ, they render'd themselves very famous and remarkable by their Austerity.

THE others were call'd Cænobitæ, or Religious, because they had prescrib'd to themselves certain Rules of Life, and liv'd in Common. These have their Origin from the Esseni, who were a Sect of the Jews distinct from the Therapeutæ, and their Manner of Living differ'd much from that of the others; so that these led a Life altogether Contemplative and very Devout, of which *Philo.*¹ in Eusebins, gives a long Account, describing it in every Thing like unto that of our Religious.

THEIR chief Leader in Thebais was Anthony. In Greece, Basil, who oblig'd them to take three Vows, which we now call essential to Religion; to wit, Obedience for subduing the Pride of the Mind; Chastity with regard to the Motions of our Bodies; and Poverty, by a total Abhorrence of the Goods of Fortune.

S. BENEDICT introduc'd it into Italy, and, properly speaking, into our Campania; but that fell out in the sixth Century under the Reign of Totila, of which in the following Books we shall have an Opportunity to discourse more at large, as of a Plant that throve too much in this our Soil, and extended its Branches, and spread its Buds into many remote Countries.

S. PACOMIUS compleated the Monastick Order, by gathering together many Monasteries into one; giving a Rule, and founding Monasteries for Virgins, who made a Vow of Virginity, and after a certain Time receiv'd the Veil with Solemnity. Thus a Monastick Life in both the Sexes being grown more common, Monasteries were establish'd, not only near to the great Cities, but likewise within them; in which Monasteries the Monks liv'd in Solitude, in the midst of a Multitude, according to their Rule, under the Direction of an Abbot, or Archimandrite: And Monachism made its way from the East to the West, about the End of the fourth Century.

FROM these Cænobitæ in the following Ages there sprouted an infinite Number of other Orders under different Rules, which may be seen in *Polydore Virgil*², of which we shall give an Account in the Progress of this History.

S. AUGUSTINE, besides, introduc'd another Order into Africa: He was Author of the Canons Regular, having put his Priests of the Church of Hippon into a religious Life. He neither call'd them Monks nor Religious, but Canons, that is to say, restricted to certain Rules, which made up partly a Clerical, and partly a Monastick Life; and it was call'd an Apostolick Life, with intent to renew the common Life of the Apostles: They were tied by the foresaid three Vows, and were in a Cloister³.

AFTERWARDS the Mendicants started up, who, to the other three Vows, added a fourth of Begging, that is to say, of living on Alms. Then follow'd the Brother Knights, such as were those of St. John of Jerusalem, the Teutonicks, the Templars, who were extirpated by Clement the Vth; the Commendators of S. Anthony, the Knights Sword-Bearers of Christ, of S. Lazarus, and others, all mention'd by Polydore Virgil; who were call'd Brethren Knights, or Religious Knights, to distinguish them from the Knights Laicks, who were Noble, of whom we shall treat in the following Books of this History.

WE shall give a short Relation of the Times when these new Orders of Religious appear'd: Whence we shall see not without Astonishment, how in these our Provinces, in the Course of Time, they have been able to produce so many and so various Orders, and to found so many and magnificent Monasteries, that now they possess the greatest Part of the Commonwealth, and our Substance, making such a considerable Body, that it has been able to change the Civil and Temporal State of our Kingdom.

IN these Ages, from Constantine down to Valentinian III. of which we are treating, they occasion'd no Alteration in the Politick State; for altho' many Solitarii had already fix'd themselves in the Bishoprick of Rome, by the Favour of the foresaid Constitution of Valentinian the Elder; and had likewise penetrated into these our Provinces, where, being confin'd to solitary Places, they led their Lives; yet they created no Mischief or Trouble to the State, neither were they minded, nor had in any Esteem, nor did the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy suffer any thing by them.

BEFORE St. Benedict, 'tis certain, that the Cænobitæ were very rare, and their Monasteries as scarce, and of no account; for what is told of the Monastery erected in Naples by Severus Bishop of that City, who flourish'd in the Year 375. under the Name of S. Martin, the said Saint being still alive¹; and of the other of S. Gaudiosus, which they pretend was founded by S. Gaudiosus himself, Bishop of Bitbynia, in the Year 438; who, to shun the Persecution of Gizericus King of Africa, fled to *Naples*²: Tho' it was built about the Year 770. by Stephen II. Bishop of that City³; and of some others founded in other Cities of these our Provinces carried back to these Times, is altogether fabulous and ill contriv'd, and not worth confuting⁴.

The first Collection of C A N O N S.

THE Regulations, which, by degrees, after Constantine had given Peace to the Church, begun to be establish'd by the Ecclesiastical State; altho' they were always multiplying during the Space of an Age and a half, to the Reigns of Theodosius the Younger and Valentinian III. nevertheless gave no Jealousy in those Days to the Emperors; forasmuch as at that Time it was never call'd in question, and was a Thing a thousand Times confess'd, and never deny'd by the Ecclesiasticks themselves, that the Princes, by their Authority, and the Protection they vouchsafed the Church, could laudably inspect, and take care of the very Canonical Discipline, and correct what might be of Detriment, or bring Disorder to the State; of which the whole Sixteenth Book of the Theodosian Code, compil'd on purpose for the Benefit of the Persons and Goods of the Ecclesiasticks, gives an ample and clear Testimony.

ON the other hand, as we have said in the first Book, the Power of making Canons concerning Church Discipline, belong'd to the Church, she having, by the Piety of Constantine, already acquir'd greater Splendor, and a more ample and numerous Hierarchy, and consequently had the more need of new Regulations for her good Government, and preventing Disorders, which Multitude always occasions: Therefore, besides the Books of the Old and New Testaments, and some Canons establish'd in divers Synods held in the first three Centuries, there were more afterwards formed in the more general Councils, which were held for that End; for the Church being in Peace, by the Favour of Constantine, it was more easy, for many Churches united together, to communicate and treat on what regarded the Discipline; since, in all other external Affairs, the Ecclesiasticks obey'd the Magistrates, and observ'd the Civil Laws.

FROM this Time, and no sooner, did Canons take their rise, of which afterwards there were many Collections made; for tho' some have believ'd, that from the very Infancy of Christianity there had been some Regulations made by the Apostles, which even to this Day we see collected to the Number of Eighty-Five, under the Title of Canones Apostolorum: Nevertheless, neither the Opinion of *Turrianus*¹, who reckon'd them all to be the Work of the Apostles; nor that of Baronius and Bellarmino, who believ'd that only Fifty of these Canons were Apostolick, have been embrac'd by learned Criticks, who generally take them to be a Collection of ancient Canons, and properly of the Canons made in the Councils that met before that of Nice, and which, without entering into a Dispute, may be seen in *William Beverige*², Gabriel d' Aubespine, Lewis Du Pin, and others; and, which is more remarkable, Pope Gelasius declares them Apocryphal in Can. Sancta Romana, Dist. 15.

THE same is said of the Book of the Apostolical Constitutions, falsely attributed to St. Clement, on Account of the great Authority of this holy Pope; whether it was at first forged under the Name of Clement, or afterwards may have been corrupted by Hereticks, 'tis certain it carries no Authority with it in Matters of Religion, there having been divers Things added to it at different Times; for altho' the intire Discipline be laid down in it, at least of the Eastern Church, yet Men of the best Judgment conclude, that it cannot be more ancient than the third Century¹: And tho' we ought to believe, that before this Time there had been divers Councils assembled by the Ecclesiasticks, according to the various Occurrences in the Purity of the Christian Doctrine, and the Soundness of Discipline, as far as the Persecution of the Heathens, which was in a manner continual, and the Unhappiness of the Times, permitted them; nevertheless, the true Canons of those are lost, and all the others so much boasted of, are Apocryphal, and especially the Acts of the Council of Simueffa, by the Apostacy of Pope Marcellinus, and the Decree, that the chief See cannot be judged by any Person, are certainly Things altogether Apocryphal, which *Baronius*², by the Authority of St. Augustine, demonstrates to be a Forgery of the Donatists; and *Cironius*³ proves, That the Accusation against Marcellinus was never true, whatever P. *Caracciolus*⁴ may say on the Subject.

FINALLY, as to the Epistles of the chief Pontiffs, altho' some of them be as old as the first and second Centuries; nevertheless, excepting two Letters of St. Clement to the Corinthians, which are rather Ascetick than Decretal, 'tis now the constant Opinion of the most diligent and accurate Criticks, I don't say among the Protestants, such as Blondel and Salmasius, but among the most godly Catholics, such as Thomasin, Pagi, and others, that all the Decretals, which we read as written by the Roman Pontiffs before Pope Siriacius, who died in the Year 398, and which we find collected by Isidore Mercator, who appear'd in the World towards the End of the Reign of Charles the Great, are truly spurious and forg'd, and contriv'd by that Impostor to please himself; De hac Isidori Impostura, says *Thomasinus*⁵, inter doctos jam convenit.

THE first Canons then, whence so many Collections began, are those which we find of the Councils of the fourth Century. The first Councils among the Oecumenical, were that of Nice in Bythinia, assembled by the Order of Constantine in the Year 325, and that of Constantinople by the Command of Theodosius the Great, in the Year 381. The most ancient of the Provincial Councils (altho' the Chronologers fix the Epocha of them variously, not being able to point out the Year with any Certainty) were that of Gangra in Paphlagonia, of Neocæsarea in Pontus, of Ancyra in Galatia, of Antioch in Syria, and of Laodicea in Phrygia, besides a great many others held in Africa, in Spain, and elsewhere, less famous.

AFTER this Time, to wit, towards the End of the fourth Century, about the Year 385, the first Collection of Canons was publish'd by the Labour of a certain Bishop of Ephesus nam'd Stephen, as *Peter de Marca*⁶, on the Faith of Christophanus Justellus, attests. In it are contain'd a Hundred and Sixty Five Canons taken from these Seven Councils, two General and five Provincial of the Eastern Church lately mention'd, to wit, twenty from the Council of Nice, twenty-four from that of Ancyra, fourteen from that of Neocæsarea, twenty from that of Gangra, twenty-five from that of Antioch, fifty-nine from that of Laodicea, and three from that of *Constantinople*⁷. And 'tis to be observ'd, that the first Canons concerning the Ecclesiastick Polity and Discipline, were establish'd in the Council of Ancyra, which was celebrated in the Year 314; since in the other more ancient Councils, there was nothing treated of but Matters concerning the Tenets and Doctrine of the Church. Whether that Collection had been made by Stephen for his own Diversion, or by the Authority of any Council of the East, cannot be certainly determin'd: However 'tis certain, that it was so much applauded, and so universally receiv'd, that the Council of Chalcedon referr'd to it, and order'd, that the Canons should be read from it, approving of it in these Words; *Regulas a Sanctis Patribus in unaquaque Synodo usque nunc prolatas teneri Statuimus*¹. And because these Canons were all written in Greek, there was a Latin Translation of it made for the Use of the Western Churches, the Author of which is uncertain. Neither did the Roman Church, nor the Churches of these our Provinces make use of any other Collection, but of this so translated, till the sixth Century, that the Collection of Dionysius Exiguus appear'd; and the Gallican and German Churches continu'd to make use of it to the ninth Century: it had for Title, according to Justellus; Codex Canonum Ecclesiæ Universæ; and, according to Florens, this other, Collectio Canonum Orientalium.

NEVERTHELESS, in Process of Time, in a second Collection or Addition, the Author of which *Doviat*² believes to be the same Bishop Stephen, made after the Year 451, there were added all the Seven Canons of the first Council of Constantinople, of which there were only three in the first eight Canons of the Council of Ephesus, and twenty-nine of that of Chalcedon, all of them general; so that all this Collection was compos'd of two hundred and six Canons. Some time after, the Canons of the Council of Sardica were added, and fifty of the eighty-nine Canons which are called Apostolical, and sixty-eight Canons of St. Basil; and the Author of this new Addition or Collection, *Doviat*³ believes to have been Theodoret Bishop of Cyrrus. It is then manifest, that to the Reign of Valentinian III. neither the Eastern nor Western Church knew any other Regulations, but those which were collected into this Code.

AND 'tis worthy of Observation, that the Church, to this time, had no judicial Power and Jurisdiction, those Regulations being only obligatory by the meer Dint of Religion, not by coercive Power; neither were Transgressors punish'd with Temporal Punishments, but with Censures and other Spiritual Chastisements, which the Church could impose: Whence it was, that the Fathers of the Church, when they had finish'd a Council, wherein many Canons had been establish'd, in order to their being observ'd by every body, being doubtful, that by the Circumstances of these troublesome and seditious Times, which were full of Factions, and particularly amongst the Ecclesiasticks themselves, who often, notwithstanding the Decisions of the Council, would continue obstinate in their Errors, were used to have recourse to the Emperors, by whose Authority the general Council had been call'd, That they would be pleas'd to Ratify what had been establish'd in the Council, and to command that it should be observ'd by all. Thus, says *Eusebius*⁴, did the Fathers of the Council of Nice, who obtain'd the Confirmation of their Decrees from Constantine the Great. And the Fathers of the first Council of Constantinople, had recourse to the Emperor Theodosius the Great, for confirming the Canons of it⁵. And the Emperor Martianus publish'd an Edict, by which he confirm'd all that had been done in the Council of Chalcedon, with its Canons⁶: and, generally, all the other Emperors, when they would have them to be effectually observ'd, used, by Means of their Constitutions, to command that they should be observ'd, and gave them the Force of Laws, by inserting them in their Constitutions, and publishing them with their Laws, which is clear from the Theodosian Code, from the Collection of Joannes Scholasticus, from the Nomocanons of Photius, and from what the other Princes of the East, and Justinian the Emperor order'd concerning them, which will be better known when we come to treat of the Actions of this Prince.

Of the Cognizance of CAUSES.

THE Ecclesiastical State then, altho' it had been settled in such Splendor by Constantine, and had acquir'd a most excellent external Polity, and had increas'd its Regulations, yet, nevertheless, in those Days, and down to the Reign of Justinian the Emperor, it had not gone beyond the Bounds of its Spiritual Power, in what concern'd the Cognizance of Causes: It was yet confin'd to the Cognizance of the Affairs of Religion and Faith, wherein it judg'd by way of Polity; of the Reformation of Manners, wherein it determin'd by way of Censure; and of the Differences amongst Christians, wherein it decided in form of Arbitration and charitable Reconciliation.

THE Church had not yet acquir'd Justitia Contentiosa, nor Jurisdiction, neither had she a Court of Justice, nor Territories in the Manner and with the Power she possesses them at this Time over all Christendom; since these depend not upon the Keys, neither are they properly of Divine Right, but rather of Human and Positive, proceeding chiefly from the Concessions or Permissions of Temporal Princes, as we shall shew clearly in the Progress of this History.

THERE is a great Difference betwixt the Keys and the Sword, as also betwixt the Keys of Heaven, and Law Pleas which belong to Magistrates: And Divines are agreed, that the Delivery of the Keys, and the Power of Binding and Loosing given by Christ Jesus our Lord to his Apostles, import only the Conferring of the Sacraments, and the most important Effect of Excommunication, which is the only Penalty the Ecclesiasticks can as yet impose on themselves and the Laicks, besides injoining of Penance; but all that depends on penitential Justice, if we may so term it, and not purely on litigious¹; or rather on Censure and Correction, than on absolute Jurisdiction. The Sword implies a precise and formal Constraint, which depends properly on the Temporal Power of the Princes of the Earth, who, as St. Paul says, carry the Sword for Punishing the Wicked, and the Security of the Good. And really our Souls, over which the Ecclesiastical Power properly extends, are not capable of a precise Constraint, but only of being stirred up, which is properly Persuasion: Whence it is, that all the Fathers of the Church, *Chrysostom*², Lactantius, Cassiodorus, Bernardus, and others, loudly protested, That the Power had not been given to them of hindering Men from committing Faults by the Authority of Decrees; Non est nobis data talis potestas, ut auctoritate Sententiæ cobibeamus homines a delictis, says *St. Chrysostom*³; all their Power consisted only in exhorting, persuading, and praying, but not in commanding. For which Cause it was thought necessary, that likewise the Princes of the World should exercise their Power in the Church, that what the Priests could not perform by their Sermons and Exhortations, the Secular Power might do by Terror and Force⁴.

THIS in the Hands of the Princes of the Earth then that God has intrusted Justice; Deus judicium suum Regi dedit, says the Psalmist: and the People of Israel asking a King from God, said, Constituere nobis Regem, qui judicet nos, sicut ceteræ Nationes habent. And when God gave to King Solomon the Choice of what he would have, he ask'd, Cor intelligens, ut Populum suum judicare posset; a Demand which was acceptable to God: Whence St. Hieronymus says, that *Regum proprium Officium est facere judicium & justitiam*⁵. In short, in all the Sacred History, Justice is always attributed to Kings, and never to Priests, at least as Priests: Our Saviour himself being intreated by a certain Man to make a Division of an Inheritance betwixt him and his Brother, answer'd; Homo quis me constituit judicem, aut divisorem super vos? And as to the Apostles, St. Bernard Epist. ad Eugen. says, Stetisse Apostolos lego judicandos, judicantes sedisse non lego. Neither had Priests, in these first three Ages, that ample litigious Jurisdiction which they have at present, excepting the three above-mention'd Cognizances, as we have shewn in the first Book.

A S little had they it in the fourth and fifth Centuries; forasmuch as altho' the Empire was govern'd by Christian Emperors, excepting only in Ecclesiastical Causes, the Priests themselves were judged by the Secular Magistrates², as well in Civil as Criminal Causes, and were look'd upon likewise as Members of the Civil Society; and no Immunity was allow'd them, or any Exemption whatsoever, neither by Divine Right, nor, to this Day, by the Laws of any Prince; consequently they ought to be judged by the Secular Magistrates in Secular Causes. And indeed the Bishops, accusing one another in the Council of Nice, carried their Accusations before Constantine, that he might judge them; altho' that Prince was pleas'd, for ending all Disputes, to throw them all in the Fire. Constantine himself judged the Cause of Cecilian, and Atbanasius being accus'd of the Crime of High Treason, was by his Sentence condemn'd to Banishment. Constantius, his Son, order'd, that the Cause of Stephen Bishop of Antioch, should be tried in his Palace³; and being convicted, was, by his Order, depos'd by the Bishops. Valentinian condemn'd Cronopius, a Bishop, in a Fine, and banish'd Ursicinus and his Associates, as Disturbers of the publick Tranquillity⁴. Priscillianus and Instantius were condemn'd for their Crimes and Obscenities by the Secular Judges, as Severus testifies. The Secular Magistrates likewise judg'd in the Causes of Felix Aptungitanus, of Cecilianus, and of the *Donatists*⁵: And the Bishops of Italy had recourse to Gratian and Valentinian, intreating they would be pleas'd to judge Damasus whom they accused.

NEITHER was there any Alteration in Civil Causes in these Centuries; it being evident, that when the contending Parties were not willing to acquiesce to the Judgment of the Bishops, who were wont to be requir'd as Arbitrators to make up Matters, but would, by all means, plead and have a positive Sentence, they were to have recourse to the Rectores of the Provinces, and other Secular Magistrates, and to inform them of the Awards, and set forth their Cases and Exceptions, as the Theodosian and Justinian Codes clearly make appear⁶; and when they were cited before any of these Tribunals, they were to give Bail *Judicio Sisti*⁷.

IN the extravagant and apocryphal Title de Episcopali Judicio, which was put in a suspicious Place, to wit, in the very End of the Theodosian Code, we read of a Constitution⁸ of Theodosius, Valentinian, and Arcadius, by which it seems as if the Cognizance of Causes amongst Ecclesiasticks had been given to the Bishops, and likewise that they were not oblig'd to plead any where else, but before themselves: But altho' that Law may be suspected of Forgery, as Gotifredus demonstrates at length, and all the Learned take for granted, yet the Priests can reap no Benefit from it, since in exprefs and precise Words, there's nothing treated of in that Law but Ecclesiastical Causes, the Cognizance of which the Church always had by way of Polity; these are the Words of it; Quantumque ad Causas Ecclesiasticas pertinet. *Gratian*⁹, who did not like this, left it out altogether, and by his Decree, dismember'd the Law, and chang'd its Sense; this was not a new Thing in this Compiler, as we shall find elsewhere on other Occasions. *Anselm*¹⁰, on this Law, was guilty of the like Artifice, if not greater in Matters of more Importance, which appear'd afterwards.

THE Ecclesiasticks alledge some other Constitutions of the same Kind, and many Canons against a Truth so well known ; but Du Pin ¹, a great Divine of Paris, answers them at length and to the purpose, and better than any Person whatsoever, demonstrates, that the Clergy, as well in Matters Civil and Politick, as in Criminal Causes, were not, by Divine Right, exempted from the Secular Power, nor from Tribute, nor Punishment ; but in Process of Time, by the Favour of the Emperors and Princes, they did acquire Immunity in some Cases ; which shall be clearly shewn in the Course of this History.

THUS it is, that the Church, to this Time, had not acquir'd that complete Judicial Power, which the Laws call Jurisdiction, over her Priests, and much less over Laicks ; neither had she as yet what the Civilians call Jus Terrendi ², and consequently no complete Jurisdiction, nor a distinct coercive Power ; neither were her Judges Magistrates, who could pronounce these three essential Words, Do, Dico, Abdic ; for which Reason she could not, by her own Authority, imprison her Ecclesiasticks, as in France to this Day it cannot be done without imploring the Assistance of the Secular Power ³. And because by Custom it was at first tolerated, and afterwards introduc'd, that the Ecclesiastical Judge could imprison those who were within the Limits of his Auditorium, so call'd in those Days, which Boniface VIII. quickly raised higher by a Decretal which he publish'd, giving Power to the Bishops of placing their Auditoria where-ever they thought fit, and consequently to imprison every where ; which Deed, because it could not be conceal'd, was the Occasion, that the said Decretal in many Places was not observ'd ; and in France, as Lemetre testifies ⁴, the contrary is practis'd : In fine, the Ecclesiasticks had no Prison before Eugen. I. his Time, according to Volateranus ⁵.

BESIDES, 'tis certain, that in these Ages, the Church had no Power of inflicting Corporal Punishments, of Banishment, much less of Mutilation of Members, or of Death : and in the more heinous Crimes of Heresy, it belong'd to the Princes to punish the Delinquents with Temporal Punishment, and for keeping their Dominions in Peace and Tranquillity, and purging them of those seditious People, who disturb'd the Quiet of the Commonwealth, they establish'd many Edicts, wherein they set down the Penalties and Punishments due to their Crimes : of which Laws, the Books of the Theodosian and Justinian Codes are full. Neither could the Judges of the Church in those Days condemn in pecuniary Mulcts ⁶ ; and the Reason was, because she had no coercive Power ⁷, and, according to the Roman Laws, the Magistrates only, who had full coercive Power, could impose Fines ⁸ ; but afterwards, altho' the Church had neither coercive Power nor Exchequer, yet she took upon her to do it, and applied the Fine to some pious Use, giving it to Monks, Prisoners, or for building of Churches ; concerning which we shall have a new Motive for Reasoning.

IT cannot then be doubted, but that all that the Church has at this Time of complete Jurisdiction, depends on the Favour and Concession of Princes. Some have believ'd, that these Concessions begun from Constantine the Great, who gave her Peace and Increase : They believ'd, that this Prince, by one of his extravagant Constitutions, which we see inserted in the End of the Theodosian Code ⁹, had establish'd, that the guilty Person, or the Plaintiff, either as to the whole or any part of the Cause, could demand to have it referr'd to the Bishop ; and that it could not be deny'd him, altho' the contrary Party should thwart and contradict it : And lastly, that no Appeal should be made from the Bishop's Sentence, and that presently without delay, and notwithstanding any Impediment, the Ordinary Magistrates were to put it in Execution ; which if true, the Temporal Jurisdiction would be altogether useless, or at least would only serve for executing the Commands of the Ecclesiasticks.

T H E R E was a Time, when this truly extravagant Constitution was reputed genuine, by a Part of it being foisted into the Capitularia of Charles the Great ¹, and likewise into the Breviaria of the Theodosian Code; and John Selden ², because he found it in an ancient Manuscript of William the Monk of Malmesbury, believ'd it to be truly Constantine's.

O T H E R S did not attribute it to Constantine, but to Theodosius the Younger, such as Innocentius ³, Gratianus ⁴, Ivo, Anselmus, Palermitanus, and the other Compilers of Decrees, being induc'd so to do, by seeing, in the Frontispiece of some Manuscript Codes, this Inscription; Arcad. Honor. & Theodos.

B U T 'tis made manifest by able and grave Writers, to have been forg'd and contriv'd, just so as the Donation of the same Constantine had been ⁵. Gotifredus ⁶ has demonstrated the Falsity of it by a hundred Proofs, so that one must want Eyes to be able to doubt of it: 'Tis added to the Theodosian Code in a suspicious Place, to wit, in the very End of it, intitled thus, Hic titulus deerrabat a Codice Theodosiano; it has neither Consul nor Date, and, quite contrary to many other Constitutions, inserted in the same Code: 'Tis not put in the Justinian Code, neither is there any mention made of it by the Writers of the Ecclesiastical History.

T H O S E who attribute it to Theodosius have mistaken it very widely, whose true Law ⁷ follows this forg'd Constitution; forasmuch as that this true Law is quite in Opposition to it, in which it is determin'd, that Bishops ought not to take cognizance but of Matters of Religion; and that all other Processes of the Ecclesiasticks should be determin'd and judg'd by the ordinary Judges: And 'tis not to be thought, that Theodosius would have inserted in his Code a Law quite contrary to one of his own. Besides the Laws of the other Emperors reported in this Code, altho' made in Favour of the Church, yet they don't attribute such Justice to her, and especially the Novella ⁸ of Valentinian III. is directly contrary, which says, that according to the Laws of the Emperors, the Church hath no Jurisdiction, and according to the Theodosian Code she cannot take Cognizance but in Matters of Religion.

B U T besides the true Laws of Theodosius above-mention'd, we see in the Reigns of Arcadius and Honorius, that the Church only had her primitive Right of judging by way of Arbitration, and even that was disputed with her, whence they publish'd a Law for continuing that with her, of which these are the Words: Si qui ex consensu apud sacre legis Antistitem litigare vcluerint, non vetentur, sed experientur illius, in civili dumtaxat negotio, more arbitri sponte reddentis judicium ⁹. And the Practice of the Church in those Ages was, that the Bishops were employ'd as Arbitrators in agreeing of Law-Pleas, which were brought before them by the Consent of Parties, as Basil ¹⁰ witnesseth; as also Gregorius Neocæsariensis, Ambrosius, Augustinus, and the Writers of the Ecclesiastical History Socrates and Nicephorus ¹¹. Which continu'd a long Time even to the Reign of Justinian, who was the first that augmented the Power of Cognizance in the Bishops by his Novellæ, as we shall see in the sixth Century: Since in the End of the Reign of Valentinian III. where we now are, it is certain, that the Bishops had neither Court of Justice, nor coercive Power; neither could they meddle in any other Causes, but in what concern'd Religion, neither with respect to the Clergy nor Laicks, as Valentinian himself assures us by a most remarkable Novella ¹², of which these are the principal Words; Quoniam cunctis Episcopos forum legibus non habere, nec de aliis causis, quam de Religione posse cognoscere, ut Theodosianum Corpus ostendit; aliter eos judices esse non patimur, nisi voluntas iurgantium sub vinculo compromissi procedat, quod si alteruter nolit, sive Laicus, sive Clericus sit, agent Publicis legibus, & jure communi; adding that the Clergy could be cited before the Secular Judge; which was certainly the Law and the Practice before Justinian, as may be seen in many Laws of his Code ¹³: And this only Privilege was given to the Ecclesiasticks, that they were not oblig'd to go from Home or their Place of Abode to plead ; and in the Provinces they could not be summon'd before any other Judge but the Rector of the Province, as at Constantinople before the Præfæctus Prætorio.

THUS it is, that as to what belong'd to the Cognizance of Causes which the Church had, nothing was alter'd in these Times of what had been practis'd in the first Three Centuries : Neither had the Bishops of these our Provinces, a Court of Justice nor coercive Power, neither was there any Alteration made in these Matters, nor in the Political and Temporal Affairs of the Ecclesiastical State to this Time ; but were restricted to the Cognizance of Religious Causes, which were judged by way of Polity, and to the two other Occurrences above-mention'd : All the Jurisdiction and Power being in the Civil Magistrates, to whom, as well Priest as Laick had their recourse both in Civil and Criminal Causes, without any Exception.

BUT altho' the Civil State suffer'd no Alteration by these Matters ; nevertheless it was not without some Disorders in these very Times, occasion'd by the Acquisition of Temporal Possessions, which, ever and anon, by the Piety of the Faithful, or rather the too great Avarice of the Clergy, were given to the Ecclesiasticks and the Churches.

S E C T. IV.

Of T E M P O R A L I T I E S.

WHOEVER names Religion, names Riches, says our Scipio Ammiratus ¹, who was a Canon in Florence ; and the Reason is ready, which he adds, Because Religion being an Account which is kept with God Almighty alone ; and Mortals standing in need of a great many Things from Him, are either thanking Him for the good Things receiv'd, or the Evil they have escap'd, or praying that such Things may not befall them, and that other Things may prosper well ; it necessarily follows, that out of Gratitude we should be careful to bestow a Part of our Riches, not on him, who being Lord of the Universe, hath no need of any Thing from us, but on his Temples and their Priests. As soon as Constantine had given Peace to the Church, and our Religion could be profess'd openly every where, Temporal Riches began to increase. Before Constantine, our Churches being reputed a kind of unlawful Assemblies, could not acquire any thing by Legacies, no more than the Community of the Jews and other Societies, which had no Right so to do ².

THESE Bodies were deem'd uncertain, so of course the Legacies left to them could not take Effect. In the Time of S. Mark ³ there was a Senatus Consultum made, by which there was Liberty given of leaving to Colleges, and other Communities, whatever People pleased ⁴ : By which the former Rigour was relax'd ; and altho' our Churches, as unlawful Societies, could not be comprehended within the Meaning of the Senatus Consultum ; for all that, we see, that in the third Century, whether it was by Allowance or Connivance, they began to have Possessions. But no sooner had Constantine in the Year 312. embrac'd the Christian Religion, making it not only lawful, but our Colleges venerable and commendable, than the Churches abounded with Temporal Riches. And that there might arise no doubt about that Matter, and that he might excite the Liberality of the Faithful in leaving Legacies to them, he publish'd an Edict in the Year 321. which he directed to the People of Rome ; by which he gave all Persons liberty to leave by Testament whatever they pleased to the Churches, and especially to that of Rome ⁵. Thus Constantine deserv'd so well of the Christian Religion, by enriching our Churches ; and not only after this manner, but likewise order'd, that all the Possessions which belong'd to them, and which in the Reigns of Dioclesian and Maximianus, had been taken from them, should be restor'd to them again; for which end he publish'd another Edict mention'd by Eusebius ¹. Moreover he ordain'd, that the Estates of the Martyrs, if they had not left Heirs, should be given to the Churches, as the Author of his Life affirms ².

BUT as this Prince, by the new Disposition which he gave to the Empire, was reputed rather a Destroyer of the Ancient, than the Maker of a new One; So likewise he was thought by many, to have done harm rather than good to the Church, by enriching her so much; since in process of Time the Ecclesiasticks by their Covetousness of Riches, brought Matters to such a pass, that besides neglecting their own Duty, they thought of nothing else but of pilling and robbing the Inheritance of the Dead, and were the Cause of many Abuses and great Disorders, which were brought upon the Commonwealth upon that Account: So that the Princes who succeeded Constantine were oblig'd to put a Stop to so great Licentiousness.

S. Jo. Chrysostom in his Time deplor'd these Abuses, and lamented, that from the Riches of the Churches there arose two Evils; the one, that the Laicks left off giving of Alms; the other, that Ecclesiasticks neglected their own Duty, which is the Care of Souls, and became Solicitors, Stewards, Toll-Masters, exercising Things unbecoming their Vocation.

FIFTY Years were not yet expir'd, from the Time that Constantine publish'd these Laws, when by the Avarice of the Ecclesiasticks, always watchful to take Advantage of the Simplicity of the Women, Valentinian the Elder was forc'd in the Year 370. perhaps at the Request, as some have suspected, of Damasus Bishop of Rome, to put forth a Law ³, by which he prohibited the Priests and the Monks, under severe Penalties, to take either by Testament, or any other Deed amongst the Living, the Goods of Widows, Virgins, or any other Woman whatsoever, forbidding them to converse with them, as they were in use to do too freely; against which Custom Ambrosius and Hieronymus likewise declaim'd: And this Law, besides its being directed to Damasus, was also proclaim'd in all the Churches of Rome, that it might be inviolably observ'd. Valentinian extended this his Constitution to the Bishops and Virgins consecrated to God, whom with the other Clergy and Monks, he forbade to make such Acquisitions ⁴.

TWENTY Years after, on the same Account, Theodosius the Great was forc'd to publish another such Law ⁵, by which it was forbidden the Diaconesses, on account of their overmuch Conversation which they had with the Ecclesiasticks, to leave their Goods to the Monks or the Clergy on any pretence whatsoever; besides this Prince likewise prohibited the same Diaconesses to make the Churches, or even the Poor, their Heirs, which Valentinian durst not do: Altho' Theodosius two Months after revok'd in Part his Law, allowing the Diaconesses ⁶ the Power of leaving their Moveables to whom they pleas'd: Albeit the Emperor Martianus in his Novella ⁷ reckon'd that Theodosius had wholly revok'd his Law, as at last he was willing to do himself; concerning which see Gotifredus his excellent Commentaries ⁸.

THE Fathers of the Church in those Days did not complain of these Laws, nor of the Power which the Princes had of making them; neither did it ever enter into their Thoughts, that the Immunity or Liberty of the Church suffer'd thereby; such Language was never heard or known in those Times, but were only griev'd for the Causes which produc'd such Effects, and which mov'd these Emperors to make them, to wit themselves, and the too great Avarice of the Ecclesiasticks that had occasion'd them: Behold how S. Ambrose speaks of it ⁹, Nobis etiam privatae Successionis emolumenta recentibus legibus denegantur, & nemo conqueritur. Non enim putamus injuriam, quia dispendium non dolemus, &c. S. Hieronymus speaks more clearly ¹⁰ writing to Nepotianus: Pudet dicere, Sacerdotes Idolorum, Alimi, & Aurigæ, & Scortæ hæreditates capiunt, solis Clericis, ac Monachis hac lege prohibetur: & non prohibetur a Persecutoribus, sed a principibus

Christianis. Nec de lege conqueror, sed doleo cur meruerimus hanc legem. Caute-rium bonum est, sed quo mihi Vultus, ut indigeam Cauterio? Provida, securaque legis cautio: Et tamen nec sic refrænatur avaritia, per fidei commissa legibus illudimus, &c. Thus it was, that in these Times it belong'd to the Jurisdiction and was in the Power of Princes to remedy those Abuses, and to give Liberty to, or put a Restraint upon the Acquisition of the Temporal Goods of the Church, as they saw convenient for the Good of their State. Which in the Ages less distant from us all over Europe by other Princes was commendably, and without any Imputation of In-discretion, imitated. Thus Charles the Great, of Glorious Memory, practis'd in Saxony; and in England, Edward I. and III. and *Henry the Vth*¹. The same was observ'd in France by *S. Lewis*², which is a Thing very remarkable; and afterwards successively confirm'd by Philip III. Philip the Fair, Charles the Fair, Charles
V. Francis I. Henry II. Charles IX. and Henry III. And we have a Decree in *Papinian*³, by which the Parliament of Paris inhibited the Carthusians and the Celestins from making any new Acquisitions. In Spain, James King of Arragon made the like Laws in the Kingdoms subject to that Crown; the same was practis'd in Castile, Portugal, and all the other Kingdoms of Spain, which Narbona and Lewis Molina testify⁴; and in several Places of Germany and Flanders, the like Statutes were observ'd. In Holland, Count William III. by his Edict in the Year 1328. strictly prohibited the same⁵. And it was done in Italy, Venice, and *Milan*⁶:
Neither is there any Province in Europe in which the Princes did not claim it as belonging to them, and in their Power to make such Laws within their own Dominions.

THE Churches in the Provinces, of which our Kingdom of Naples is compos'd, if we consider the Time that pass'd betwixt the Reign of Constantine, and that of Valentinian III. which all that time were still building by the Bishops in Naples and the other Cities, made no considerable Acquisitions: And by looking on them it may clearly be perceiv'd, that they can alledge no other Title, but what they owe to the Concessions made them by the Longobard or Norman Princes, who were more profuse than the rest; or lastly, by the Princes of Suevia or Anjou. The Monasteries began to be considerable by their Acquisitions, in the Beginning of the Reign of the Longobards; and altho' S. Benedict in the Reign of Totila, was the first who brought them into Italy; nevertheless that of Monte Casino in Campania was not much enrich'd, until the Time of the Longobard Kings: But in Process of Time the Number of Churches and Monasteries multiplied in such a manner in these our Provinces, and their Acquisitions were so excessive, that there was neither City nor Castle, small or great, that was not swallow'd up by them. Such Excess in the Time of the Emperor Frederick II. was suppress'd by a Law, which at this Day is to be seen in our Constitutions⁷; by which, imitating, as he says, the Footsteps of his Predecessors, perhaps meaning the Emperors; or, which is more likely, the Norman Kings his Predecessors, whose Constitution on that Head is now lost; he prohibited immoveable Estates to be acquir'd by the Church. But in the Time of the Princes of Anjou, other Maxims were introduc'd among us, which taught, that Princes could not remedy those Abuses: For which Cause the Constitution of Frederick, was reputed impious and injurious to the Churches, and the former Disorders prevail'd; and if Things had been confin'd within these Bounds, it might have been tolerable; but afterwards the Churches and the Monasteries were seen to abound in so great Lordships and Riches, and in such Numbers, that it would have cost but a very little more trouble, to have swallow'd up that small Residue, which continues in the Possession of the Laicks: But of this we shall speak more opportunely in the following Books; what hath been said hitherto of the Ecclesiastical Polity of these our Provinces during the Fourth and the half of the Fifth Century, may suffice.

CIVIL HISTORY

Of the KINGDOM of

N A P L E S

B O O K III.

THE fundry Civil Commotions, the great Changes in the State, and the Vicissitude of the Roman Jurisprudence, which fell out betwixt the Death of Valentinian III, and the Reign of the Emperor Justin II. shall be the Subject of this Book. We shall relate the Events of a Century, in which Italy, and these our Provinces, that make up at present the Kingdom of Naples, saw new Lords, strange People, and new Laws. Hitherto they knew no other Magistrates nor other Laws, but those of the Romans: henceforward they shall see themselves mixed with those of Foreign Nations, who, altho'

Barbarians, deserve nevertheless to be commended, not only on Account of their many and remarkable Vertues, but likewise because they were so obsequious to the Roman Laws, and honoured them so much, that they not only durst not revile them, but with extreme Moderation, contrary to the Laws of Victory, by which the Vanquish'd become subject to the Laws of the Victor, retain'd them. Therefore the Reader must not expect, that being to treat in this and the following Books, of the Goths, Longobards, and Normans, who have all the same Origin, I ought, as many have done, to treat them as inhuman, fierce, and cruel, and to term their Laws impious, unjust, and rude, as they are, for the most part, reputed by our Writers. In the Exploits of their Princes, Piety, Justice, and

Temperance

Temperance will shine no less than Fortitude and Magnanimity ; and their Laws and Customs, altho' they cannot be compar'd to those of the ancient Romans, ought not however to be thought to come short of those of later Times, while the Empire was declining, when the Condition of a Roman became more vile and abject, than that of those who were reputed Barbarians and Strangers.

BEING first of all to treat of the Goths, it is not to my Purpose to trace them back to their Origin, or to enquire from what part of the North they broke out, to over-run these our Countries. There are not wanting Writers, who have given Account of their Origin, their Progress, and their Conquests over various Regions of Europe ; and the last was the incomparable Hugo Grotius ¹, who treats of it with so much Exactness and Dignity, that he eclipses all others: Nevertheless, it will be very necessary to distinguish, with Perspicuity, the Eastern Goths from the Western ; since some of our Authors, by doing it confusedly and not distinctly, have likewise confounded their Laws and Customs, by ascribing to one, that which belonged to the other, as shall be clearly shewn in the Course of this Book.

THE Origin of their Name is not very obscure: For their Hospitality and Courtesy to Strangers, they were very famous and renown'd ; even before they had embrac'd the Christian Religion, amongst the Germans they acquir'd the Appellation of Good ; Boni, says Grotius ², Germanis sunt Goten, aut Guten: Whence it came, that afterwards they were call'd Goti by all the other Nations of Europe. They were divided according to the Situations of the Countries which they inhabited, into Eastern Goths or Ostrogothi, and into Western or Westrogothi, which the Latins corruptly call'd Visigothi. Those who inhabited the Countries which lay more to the East, towards the Euxine Sea, as far as the River Tyras, and who afterwards, by the Permission of the Emperors of the East, had Pannonia, Thracia, and lastly Illyricum for their Habitations, were call'd Ostrogothi ; and were govern'd by Princes of the House of Amali no less ancient than Illustrious, whence Theodericus Ostrogothus, who govern'd these our Provinces, deriv'd his Pedigree. The others, whose Countries lay towards the West, and who, in the Reign of Honorius, govern'd Aquitaine and Narbonne, and afterwards many Provinces of Spain, were called Westrogothi ; those were commanded by Princes of the House of the Balti ; a Family likewise illustrious, but inferior to that of the Amali, who bragg'd of its Nobility: Toulouse was their Seat, the Capital of the Province, which Country, on Account of their Residence, is since call'd Gascony, which in their Language signifies the Country of the Western Goths ³, altho' others say, that it had the Name of Gascony from a People of Spain, who having passed the Pyrenean Mountains, possessed that Province.

Of the Western G O T H S, and their L A W S.

TH E Westrogoth Princes, of the Family of the Balti, under the Empire of Honorius, having been firmly establish'd in Aquitaine and many other Cities of Narbonne by this Prince, fix'd their Residence in Toulouse, whence they were afterwards call'd Kings of Toulouse. They, with all their Might, endeavour'd to extend their Dominion over the other Provinces of Gallia and Spain, which were ill used and oppressed by the Vandals. Vallia, who succeeded Rigericus, Successor of Ataulfus, as we have said in the preceding Book, triumph'd frequently and successfully over them in Spain, and gave them many terrible and memorable Routs. Vallia, after having gain'd so many Victories over the Vandals, died in Toulouse in the Year of Christ 428, and Theodoricus succeeded him in the Kingdom¹. Writers differ about the Name of this Prince; *Gregory of Tours*² calls him Teudus; Isidore, Teudoridus; Idacius, Theodorus; but we, according to *Jornandes*³, the more ancient Writer, and the most accurate in the Affairs of the Goths, with *Alteserra*⁴, shall call him Theodoricus. This Prince reign'd in Aquitaine twenty three Years, a valiant and excellent Captain, who, in the Fields of Chalon, fighting against Attila, gave signal Proofs of his Valour: he was grievously wounded in this Battle, and being thrown from his Horse was sadly bruised, and died soon after. He left behind him six Sons, Torrismond, Theodorick the Younger, Frederick, Evarick, Rotemerus, and Aimerick, and one Daughter, whom he gave in Marriage to Hunnerick Son of Gizerick King of the Vandals.

Torrismond succeeded in the Kingdom, who, altho' he was in the Battle against Attila with his Father, and had been wounded in it, no sooner heard of the Death of his Father, than he immediately returned to Toulouse, where, with universal Acclamation, he was set on the Throne⁵. The Reign of this Prince was of short Duration, and if we may believe Isidore, it was only of one Year; for, by the Means of Theodorick and Frederick his Brothers, who were uneasy under his Government, he was cruelly murdered⁶.

Theodorick the Younger, his Brother, succeeded him in the Kingdom: A Prince, according to *Sidonius Apollinaris*⁷, indued with noble and excellent Virtues; and altho' the Genius of the Westrogoths was ill suited to the Roman Laws, contrary to that of the Ostrogoths, who had them always in great Esteem and Veneration, yet nevertheless Theodorick II. was a great Lover of them, and prized them exceedingly.

TH E Westrogoths, on Account of the continual Wars which they had with the Romans, were not a little averse to the Roman Laws; so much, that Claudian speaking of their Times, said⁸, Mærent captivæ pellito iudice Leges. Ataulfus their King, as we have said, succeeded to Alarick I. who by the Fierceness of his Temper, had already determin'd to extirpate them altogether; but being soften'd by the continual Persuasions and Exhortations of his so much beloved Wife Placidia, he was dissuaded from it, and changed his Mind; and tho' his Goths did not bear it patiently, yet he confessed, as Orosius testifies, That without these Laws, the Commonwealth could not be rightly maintain'd, so that he could not find in his Heart to abolish them altogether; Neque Gothos, says he, ullo modo parere legibus posse, propter effrenatam Barbariem, neque Reip. interdici leges oportere, sine quibus Resp. non est Respublica: Whence he tells us¹, that this Prince, in the Year 412, by a publick Edict, commanded his Subjects to observe the Roman Laws together with the Customs of the Goths. *Godastus*² relates, the Edict among the Imperial Constitutions, but we see it conceiv'd in the same Words of Orosius, and many Things added in it, which are not in that Author.

BUT the Study of the Roman Laws was in such Esteem with Theodorick the Younger, of whom we are treating, that *Sidonius Apollinaris*³, introducing him in his Verses speaking with Avitus, makes him say thus;

- - - - - Mibi Romula dudum
Per te jura Placent.

And elsewhere⁴ he call; this Theodorick, - - - - - Romanæ column, salusque gentis. And Claudian, speaking of this Prince, as Grotius observes⁵, says, Vindicet Arctæus Violatas ad-vena leges. The Westrogoths, neither in this King's Reign, nor in those of his Predecessors, had their own written Laws, neither did they take care to form them.

But Theodorick dying in the thirteenth Year of his Reign, Evaricus having serv'd him in the same manner that he had serv'd Torismond, succeeded him in the Kingdom. He was the first who gave written Laws to the Goths, as Isidore assures us⁶; Sub hoc Rege Gotbi Legum instituta scriptis habere ceperunt, nam antea tantum moribus & consuetudine tenebantur; for which, *Sidonius*⁷, in an Epistle directed to the Emperor Leo, extols Evaricus as a wise Prince, and Author of the Laws; Modo per promotæ limitem sortis, ut populus sub armis, sic frænat arma sub legibus.

IN the Reign of this Prince, the Roman Laws began to be under a Cloud, not in Italy, but in Aquitaine, Narbonne, and in some Provinces of Spain; for those new Laws, which were call'd Theodoricianæ, by the Means of the Goths, being propos'd to the People of the Provinces, it happen'd that the Theodosianæ were not so much valued; and the Knavery of the Roman Officers themselves, concurr'd not a little to make them be despis'd, and particularly of Seronatus at that time Præfect of the Gallia, who, by favouring the Party of the Goths, and betraying his own Prince, set himself in Opposition to the Romans; insomuch, that *Sidonius*⁸ call'd him the Catiline of that Age. This Man was pernicious to the Romans themselves, not only by the great Losses occasion'd by his Villainy to the Empire of the West in Gallia, but much more by his contemning and slighting the Theodosian Laws, and by extolling those of the Goths. We read also in Sidonius the Complaints of the Provincials against this Man; Exultans Gotbis, insultans Romanis, illudens Præfektis, colludensque numerariis, Leges Theodosianas calcans, Theodoricianasque proponens, veteres culpas, nova tributa perquirir: Whence we may see the Condition of the Romans at that time, who by the Extortion of this pestiferous Person, who loaded them with excessive and exorbitant Tributes, were reduced to that Pass, that, as was said in the first Book, the People of the Provinces chose rather the Servitude of the Goths than the Freedom of the Romans; whence *Salvianus*⁹, speaking of them, said; Passim, vel ad Gothos, vel ad Bagaudas, vel ad alios ubique dominantes barbaros migrant, & commigrasse non pœnitet; malunt enim sub specie captivitatis vivere liberi, quam sub specie libertatis esse captivi. Itaque nomen Circium Romanorum aliquando non solum magno æstimatum, sed magno emptum, nunc ultro repudiatur, ac fugitur, nec vile tantum, sed etiam abominabile penè habetur. Paulus Orosius likewise attests ¹, that the People of the Provinces chose to live rather amongst the Barbarians than amongst the Romans: Qui malint inter barbaros pauperem libertatem, quam inter Romanos tributariam sollicitudinem sustinere. From whence Isidore ² concludes, Unde & hujusque Romani, qui in Regno Gothorum consistunt, adeo amplectuntur, ut melius sit illis cum Gothis Pauperes vivere, quam inter Romanos potentes esse, & grave jugum, tributi portare. But so great Villainy in Seronatus did not go long unpunish'd, he being dragg'd along the Streets of Rome, was beheaded; thus did he undergo the Punishment of so great Wickedness.

THE Laws call'd Theodorianæ were establish'd by Evarick, not because he acknowledg'd the two Theodoricks abovemention'd for the Authors of them, as Baronius believ'd ³, who makes Theodorick the Younger, Predecessor of Evarick, Author of them; for in their Times this Nation had no written Laws. Much less were they so call'd, because Theodorick the Ostrogoth, King of Italy, had been the Author of them, as others were persuaded: Because this Prince, as we shall shew anon, had very different Sentiments concerning the Care of the Roman Laws, and reign'd a long Time in Italy, after Sidonius Apollinaris was dead, who could not call these Laws Theodorianæ, because this Theodorick was Author of them. Theodorick Ostrogoth, as shall be told, reign'd in Italy in the Reign of Anastasius Emperor of the East in the Years 493 and 500. when Sidonius Apollinaris was dead, which is clear from Gregory of Tours ⁴; so that Cujacius is accus'd deservedly of an Error by Cironius ⁵, for making Theodorick King of Italy Author of these Laws.

SIRMONDUS and Dadinus Alteserra ⁶ wisely said, that these Laws were call'd Theodorianæ, by way of Allusion or Paranomasia, in opposition to the Theodosianæ; that as the Romans valued themselves on the Theodosianæ, so the Goths having their own Laws, tho' different in Sense, yet the same in Sound, would have them call'd Theodorianæ: But as Cironius observes ⁷, this Paranomasia would be too insipid, if Evarick had not likewise been call'd Theodorick; whence the most learn'd Savaron ⁸ upon that Place of Sidonius Apollinaris, demonstrates very clearly that the true Name of this Prince had been Theodorick: Grotius afterwards in his Nomenclature lets us see, that this King was also call'd Evarick, because he was the first among the Gothic Kings who made Laws; Evarix says he, alias Evaricus. Evarich, legibus Pollens. In glossis lex Evva.

Of the ALARICK Code.

THE Roman Laws underwent these Abuses in the Reign of Evarick, yet many more by the Villainy of Seronatus; but such a Wretch being dispatch'd out of the World, and Evarick dying afterwards in the Year 484. they sprung up afresh, and recover'd their ancient Vigour; for the Sentiments of Alarick Son of Evarick, who succeeded him in the Kingdom, were quite different; forasmuch as the People of the Provinces, who took it ill that they were depress'd, found that Access to Alarick, which they never had had to the Father. This Prince gave Ear to the Grievances of the Aquitaniens, and his other Subjects, who, to their great Prejudice, having been depriv'd of the Roman Laws under which they had been born and brought up, could not be easily reconcil'd to the Theodorianæ. Besides he knew with what esteem they had been receiv'd by Theodorick the Ostrogoth, who reign'd in Italy now in his Time, whose Daughter Theodelusia he had married; for which Cause his Son was call'd after Theodorick, which may be seen in Cassiodore, in that affectionate Letter he wrote wrote him ¹: He was therefore resolv'd in the Twenty-second Year of his Reign to comply with him; for which end having chosen the most prudent Men, and the most famous Civilians who flourish'd in his Time, over whom he set Gojaricus ², just so as the Emperor Justinian had done by Trebonianus in the Compiling of the Pandects, and his own Code; he enjoyn'd them, that from the Constitutions of the Theodosian Code, and the Opinions of the various Civilians dispers'd in different Books, they should form a new Code. And that he might not lessen the Majesty of his own Empire, as if he should seem to stand in need of the foreign Laws of other Princes, for governing the People subject to him, he order'd that this new Code should be publish'd in his Name, and that the Laws contain'd in it should receive from him their Force and Vigour, that his Subjects might be bound to obey them.

THE most esteem'd and famous Books, in which in these Times the Civil Law of the Romans was comprehended, if we regard the Constitutions of Princes, were the Gregorian and Hermogenian Codes, and that of Theodosius with his Novellæ, and among the Volumes of the Civilians, the Opinions of Paulus, and the Institutions of Cajus, were in greatest Vogue at this time; therefore by the Labour of these able Men ³, from the Constitutions of these Codes, from the Body of the Novellæ, and from the Opinions of these Civilians, was this new epitomiz'd Code compil'd; whence therefore it was also, by the Writers of this and the following Age, call'd the Breviary of the Theodosian Code, which according to the Computation of Gotifredus ⁴ was finish'd in the Year 506. Which Compilation is owing to Gojaricus and his Collegues, and not to Anianus Chancellor to Alarick, as John Tilly and Cujacius thought, who perhaps were deceiv'd by what Sigebertus wrote ⁵. Anianus had no hand in the Composing of it, but only by the Order of Alarick it was publish'd and subscrib'd by him, in Ayre in Gascony, in the Council of both the Orders ⁶, that is to say, of the Ecclesiasticks and the Nobility; for at this Time the third Order was of no consequence nor Authority whatsoever in France ⁷. Which Publication and Subscription of Anianus is manifest from the Communitorium of Alarick directed to Count Timotheus, which is plac'd before the Theodosian Code, in which we read these Words ⁸: Anianus vir spectabilis, ex praecepto D. N. gloriosissimi Alarici Regis, hunc Codicem de Theodosianis legibus, atque sententiis Juris, vel diversis libris electum, Aduis Anno XXII. eo Regnante edidit, atque subscripsit.

SOME for the same Consideration have believ'd, that at the same time Anianus had compos'd the Notes on the Opinions of Paulus, and the Institutions of Cajus, as Decianus ⁹ and Arthur Duck ¹⁰, by a manifest Error have written; for in that Breviary, besides the Laws pick'd out of the Theodosian Code, there were likewise put the Opinions of these Civilians by the abovemention'd Compilers, and not by Anianus. And these Interpretations, which are observ'd in the Theodosian Code, ought not to be ascrib'd to Anianus but to them, as Gotifredus most carefully observes in the Prolegomena of that Code ¹¹. And 'tis also worthy of Observation, that these Notes, and the Interpretations having been join'd to this Code, occasion'd a Mistake in the Writers of the following Ages; that when they quoted the Laws of this Code, they often quoted for Constitutions of it, one of these Interpretations, or Notes of Paulus the Civilian, as hath been taken Notice of by Savaron ¹² on Sidonius Apollinaris. Thus we see Ivo of Chartres ¹³, who flourish'd in the Year 1092. often quotes for Laws of this Code, the Interpretations of Paulus the Civilian: Gratian ¹⁴ afterwards in his Decree makes many such Mistakes, as hath been observ'd by Gotifredus ¹⁵ and others.

Of the Translation of the Royal Seat of the Westgoths from Thoulouse in France, to Toledo in Spain.

THIS was the alternate Fortune which the Roman Jurisprudence suffer'd by the Westgoth Kings of Thoulouse, who rul'd in Aquitaine and many Places of Gallia, besides the Provinces of Spain. But such is the Vicissitude of human Things, that Alarick, who after Three and twenty Years Reign, had so well establish'd his Kingdom in France, that he had no Reason to think he was to be the last King of Thoulouse, was depriv'd both of his Kingdom and Life, and with him the Dominion of the Goths in Gallia was extinguish'd. Clovis King of France, whether out of Zeal for Religion, or for Reasons of State, was much vex'd to have Alarick for a Companion in the Empire of the *Galliæ*¹. Alarick was truly Arian, as all the Goths were: And Clovis burning with Zeal for the Catholick Religion which he had lately embrac'd, resolv'd to make War against him, and to drive him out of Gallia: Thus did this Prince, as we read in *Gregory of Tours*², speak to his Soldiers, Valde molestè fero, quod hi Arianæ partem teneant Galliarum, eamus cum Dei adjutorio, & superatis redigamus Terram in ditionem nostram: And having assembled his Armies, he attack'd the Frontiers of the Goths, and in the Fields of Vique came to a fierce Engagement, where Alarick being thrown off his Horse, Clovis kill'd him with his own Hand. The Goths being in the utmost Consternation by the Death of their King, were dispers'd, and almost quite destroy'd. Clovis triumph'd, and took many Cities and Castles; Theodorick his Son retiring to the inner Parts of Aquitaine, all these Cities submitted to him: Clovis enter'd Thoulouse, which had been the Seat of the Goths for a long time, with triumphal Pomp, where he took all Alarick's Treasure. Thus ended the Dominion of the Goths in Aquitaine; and at the same Time, we may see the Hand of the Lord, how he transfers Kingdoms from one Nation to another.

CLOVIS having conquer'd all Aquitaine and Thoulouse, Spain, and a Part of the Province of Narbonne remain'd under the Empire of the Goths; for the latter of which there was for a long time War betwixt the Goths and French: And tho' the French at last became Masters of it, yet in the French Narbonne, as Grotius says³, the Gothish Blood is not quite extinct, neither is there wanting of the Lineage of the Balti, the Family of the Baux, being still extant there, who derive their Origin from none else, but from these Goths; and they possess yet in that Province, a Part of the Principality of Orange. Another Branch of this same Family was transplanted from France into our Kingdom of Naples, who with us are call'd Baucio or Balzo, which possess'd the Principality of Altamura, the Dukedom of Andria, and the County of Avellino; for which we shall seek no better Voucher, than Grotius himself; these are his Words, Aliaque ejusdem familiæ propago in Regno Neapolitano Principatum Altamuræ, Ducatum Andriæ, Comitatum Avellinæ, virtutis non degenerantis monumenta tenuit.

THE Westgoths being driven from Thoulouse and France, fix'd their Royal Seat in Toledo in Spain. There they possess'd the Kingdom a long Time, until the astonishing and terrible Irruption of the Saracens. Gesalarick held it, and after him Theodorick the Ostrogoth King of Italy, who being desirous of returning to Italy, left it to Amalarick his Nephew. Teudius likewise kept it under Justinian the Emperor, little less than 18 Years; and after him Teudiscelus one single Year; Agila five; Atanagildus fourteen; and after his Death, which happen'd in Toledo, *Liuba*⁴.

Leovigildus his Brother succeeded him in the Kingdom, a Prince of a deep Reach, and who was altogether intent on Inlarging the Bounds of his Empire. He conquer'd the Cantabrians, who are the People of Biscay, and the Navarrians, he subdu'd Amaya and many other rebel Cities; for which he was call'd the Conqueror, having conquer'd a great Part of Spain: Nam antea Gens Gothorum (as Isidore says ¹) angustis finibus arctabatur. But all his Virtues were eclips'd by his Persecution of the Catholics, and the Fierceness and Cruelty of his Temper, not pardoning even Hermenegildus his own Son.

Of the new Code of the Laws of the Westrogoths.

THE Roman Laws were not in great Esteem with all these Princes, and much less with Leovigildus, who being of the same Sentiments with Evarick, would add some others to his own Gothick Laws; and what of these he thought were out of Order, or superfluous, he mended or left out, or put in better Method: In legibus quoque (says Isidore ¹) ea quæ ab Evarico inconditè constituta videbantur, correxit, plurimas leges prætermittas adjiciens pluresque superfluas auferens. This Prince likewise increased his Revenue very much; and after eighteen Years Reign, dy'd in Toledo his Royal Seat, in the Year 586.

HIS Successors had the same Opinion of the Roman Laws: Reccaredus his Son (who was the first that forsook Arianism, and embrac'd the Catholick Religion, for which he was call'd the Catholick King, a Surname afterwards taken by Alphonfus and Ferdinand, Kings of Arragon, and their Successors) Liuba II. Witterick, Gundemare, Sisebutus, Reccaredus II. Suintilla, Sifinandus, Cintila, Tulca, Cbindesvindus, all Catholick and Religious Princes, adding their own Laws to those of their Predecessors, in process of Time this new Code sprung up, and was call'd the Laws of the Westrogoths ². Of the Laws contain'd in it, some bear the Names of the Authors in the Front, such as King Gundemare's, and so of the rest who reign'd after Evarick and Leovigild: Others are under the Title of ancient Law, which may be ascrib'd to Evarick, or rather Leovigild, who corrected and increas'd his Laws. The Authority of this Code was so great, that it eclips'd the Splendor of the Roman Laws altogether in these Provinces; for Cbindesvind ³ King of the Westrogoths, who succeeded Tulca, publish'd an Edict by which he banish'd the Roman Laws intirely out of his Kingdom, and ordain'd, that only this Code should be observ'd, under a vain and stupid Pretext, because they requir'd a too subtile Interpretation. These are the Words of the Edict ⁴, Alienæ gentis legibus ad exercitium utilitatis imbui, & permittimus, & optamus; ad negotiorum vero discussionem, & resultamus, & prohibemus. Quamvis enim eloquiis polleant, tamen difficultatibus hærent: adeo cum sufficiat ad justitiæ plenitudinem; & præsentatio rationum, & competentium ordo verborum, quæ Codicis hujus series agnoscitur continere, nolumus, sive Romanis legibus, sive alienis institutionibus a modo amplius convexari. This Constitution by the Mistake of Benedict Levita, having been registred amongst the Capitularies of Charles the Great, made Gonsalez believe ⁵, that Charles had been the first who banish'd the Use of the Roman Laws from the Courts of Justice. Reciswind his Son, who succeeded him in the Kingdom, renew'd the Injunctions of his Father, and order'd, that no other Laws but what were contain'd in that Code should be obey'd, whether they were Roman or Theodosian, or of any other foreign Nations. Nullus, says he, prorsus ex omnibus

NEVERTHELESS 'tis true, that this Code, in Emulation of that of Justinian, was compil'd and divided into twelve Books. The Compilers had the Theodosian Code likewise by them, and that of Alarick, as is clear from the Constitutions which we read in it ³. Besides they made use of the Justinian Code in computing ⁴ the Degrees of Consanguinity in the same Order, and almost in the same Words, which Justinian made use of in the Books of his Institutions; and which is more remarkable, it was written in pure Latin, and not in that insipid and barbarous Stile, which other Nations used; from which Cujacius ⁵ concludes, that the Goths were the most polish'd of all other Nations: And such was the Authority of this Code, that it not only had Force and Stability amongst the Westrogoths, but also among other Nations, such as the Burgundians and Saxons. In the Council of Toledo, its Constitutions are often quoted, and honourable mention made of them; so that the Roman and Gothish Laws were blended in such manner, that not only in this Age, but also in the following, they were observ'd, as well by the Goths as the Saracens ⁶, who after the Year 715, having over-run Spain, retain'd them; neither did they introduce new Laws, excepting some few concerning Criminal Matters, such as blaspheming their false Prophet Mahomet; and at last, these being driven out, they were retain'd by the Kings of Spain themselves, as Grotius ⁷, from the Testimony of Roderick, writes, till the Reign of Alphonfus IX or X, who, the Gothish Laws being almost wore out by disuse, introduc'd the Roman into Spain, which he caus'd to be translated into the Spanish Language by Peter Lopez and Bartholomew of Arienza, and publish'd them, which to this Day are in Force ⁸.

WE owe this Code of the Laws of the Westrogoths, to the Care of Peter Pitheus, who was the first that communicated them to Jacobus Cujacius, for which Favour he own'd himself much beholden: Take his own Words for it ⁹; Gothorum sive Wisigothorum Reges, qui Hispaniam & Galiciam Toletu Sede Regia tenuerunt, ediderunt XII. Constitutionum libros, æmulatione Codicis Justiniani, quorum auctoritate utimur sepe libenter, quod sint in eis omnia fere petita ex Jure Civili, & Sermonem Latino conscripta, non illo insulso cæterarum gentium, quem nunquam legimus ingratis: ut gens illa maxime, quæ consedit in Hispania plane cultior cæteris, hoc argumento fuisse videatur. Communicavit autem mihi ultro Petrus Pitheus, quem ego hominem, & si amore, & perpetuo quodam judicio meo dilexi semper vix jam ex ephebo profatus fore, ut probitate, & eruditione æqualium suorum, nemini cederet: tamen pro singulari isto beneficio, maximam modo animi benevolentiam, & summa, ac singularem studia omnia me ei debere confiteor, idemque erit erga eum animus bonorum omnium, si, quod vehementer exopto eos libros in publicum conferre maturaverit. What Cujacius wished so much for, Pitheus had already done; for not long after, he allow'd it to be put to the Press, as he says, writing to Edward Moleus; Imo etiam, ne quid Orienti Occidens de eadem gente invideret, legis Wisigothorum libros XII. ut tandem aliquando ederentur, concessi ¹⁰. To the same Person we are likewise indebted for the Edict of Theodorick the Ostrogoth, King of Italy, of which we shall speak by and by.

Altho' Spain was afterwards invaded by the Saracens, the Name and Blood of the Goths were not quite extinguish'd, neither were their Laws. The greatest Part of the Nobility of that Kingdom, bragg'd very justly, not only of their Blood, but also of their Names; and indeed, as Grotius ¹¹ observes, Ferdinand, Frederick, Roderick, Herman, and such like Names, are all Gothish, and the Spaniards still retain them.

The Kings of Spain themselves boast, and will have it believ'd, that they are descended of Pelagius Son of Favilla, come of Kingly Race, who upon the Invasion of the Saracens, gathering together the Remains of their People in Austria, maintain'd himself there, altho' with a slender Fortune, yet with a Royal Title, hoping, that some time his Posterity might recover the Kingdoms of their Forefathers, as it fell out afterwards; Ad hunc, as Mariana says, Hispaniæ Reges nunquam intercisa serie, cum semper, aut parentibus filii, aut fratres fratribus successerint, clarissimum genus referunt. Frouliba, Wife of Pelagius, was a Goth, and her Son-in-law Adelphonsus was likewise a Goth of the Blood of Reccared. They were then of the Royal Race of the Balti. The Kings of Spain, who in the Space of seven hundred Years, with unwearied and continual Fatigues, had purg'd Spain of the Arabick Inundation, at last extended their Dominion not only over a great Part of Europe, Africa, and Asia, but subjected a new and unknown World, and likewise for a long Series of Years govern'd these our Provinces, which at this Day compose the Kingdom of Naples.

WE have thought fit to enlarge somewhat on the Race and Succession of these Westrogoth Princes, and the alternate Fortune the Roman Jurisprudence had amongst them in France and Spain, that we might speak separately of what happen'd among the Ostrogoths in Italy; not only by adding the Origin of the Kings of Spain, by whom, in the Ages less remote from us, our Kingdom hath been govern'd; but also by distinguishing the Vicissitudes of the Roman Jurisprudence amongst these two Nations, who had not the same, but altogether opposite and different Sentiments of it. And it was the more necessary, because Writers jumble the Laws of the one with the other; not minding the Series and Genealogy of these Princes, and the various Habitations they had, by which they confound the one with the other, and believe, that this Code had likewise Authority in Italy among the Ostrogoths, in ascribing to the Ostrogoth Princes what the Westrogoths did: Into which Error we are surpriz'd that the careful Arthur Duck should have fallen¹.

CHAP. V.

Of the Eastern GOTH S, and their E D I C T S.

OF the Ostrogoth Princes of the illustrious House of Amali, Jornandes hath given a long Series in his Histories¹: Before Hermanarick he reckons Six, Amalus, Isarna, Ostrogota, who flourish'd during the Empire of Philip, Cniva, Ararick, and Geperick. Hermanarick was he, who extended the Bounds of his Kingdom further than all the rest, and subjected many Nations. He was a Prince of very great Courage, but much more fortunate: His Death was a great Loss to the Ostrogoths, for it occasion'd the Westrogoths to separate themselves, and in the Reign of Valens the Emperor, to choose Fridigern for their Captain, and afterwards Atanarick for their King, and after him, in the Reign of Honorius, Alarick, the Series of whose Successors, who reign'd first in France, and afterwards in Spain, we have above related. Winitarius, of the same Race of the Amali, succeeded Hermanarick; but tho' he retain'd the same Princely Ensigns, nevertheless, the Ostrogoths continued subject to the Huns, because of their residing in their Country. Wherefore Winitarius, not patiently bearing the Government of the Huns, by degrees, withdrew himself from under their Yoke, until he made himself Master of the Person of Box their King, his Sons, and of seventy of the principal Lords of his Kingdom; and for a terrible Example to the rest, he crucified them all, and for many Days left their Bodies hanging to be gazed on; but he enjoy'd the Freedom of the Government he had purchas'd, but one Year only, for King Balambrus declared War against him, and was in the first and second Battels defeated with a great Slaughter of the Huns, but in the third, Winitarius was kill'd by the Stroke of a Dart that pierced his Head, and which Balambrus himself threw at him.

THE Ostrogoths, in Confusion and Consternation on the Death of their Prince, submitted to the Government of Balambrus; but this Prince having married Waldamarca, Niece of Winitarius, they receiv'd many honourable Conditions of Peace; so that altho' they continued subject to the Huns, yet by their Direction and Permission, they never failed to chuse their own King, who govern'd them. Therefore after the Death of Winitarius, Unimondus, Son of the late famous and powerful King Hermanarick, was chosen. To him succeeded Torrismondus his Son, a valiant and worthy Youth, who often gain'd great Victories over the Gepides; whose Memory was so dear to the Ostrogoths, that, after his Death, they continu'd forty Years without a King; after which time they chose Walamirus. Walamirus was the Son of Wandalarius, descended from a Brother of Hermanarick, and therefore Cousin German to *Torrismond*¹. This King had three Sons, Walamirus, Theodemirus, and Widemirus, in whom the illustrious Family of the Amali was preserv'd. Walamirus was assumed to the Kingdom: and such was the Love and Gratitude amongst these Brothers, that they mutually assisted one another, in order to keep Peace in the Kingdom. Nevertheless they were subject to Attila King of the Huns, whose Commands they were obliged to obey; neither durst they refuse to fight often against the Westrogoths, their Kinsmen, thus bearing the Necessity of Subjection, under which they were.

BUT the Dominion of the Huns in the Eastern Parts, on the Death of their gallant and invincible King Attila, fail'd in a lamentable manner; for this Prince, by his many Wives, had a prodigious Number of Sons, who all fighting and contending for the Succession, intirely lost it; for Adarick King of the Gepides, taking Advantage of their Contentions, made a miserable Slaughter of them, and dispers'd them in such a manner, that the other Nations who were subject to the Huns, by such prosperous Success, were able to throw off the Yoke of their Servitude, and, together with the Gepides, had recourse to Martianus, who then govern'd in the East; begging, that he would be pleased to distribute those Countries among them, which they by their own Valour had withdrawn from under the Tyranny of the Huns.

MARTIANUS had succeeded to Theodosius the Younger in the Empire of the East in the Year 450, who most willingly taking them under his Protection, made Peace with them, assigning to the Gepides all Dacia, which had been the Seat of the Huns, from whom they had recover'd it. The Goths having observ'd, that the Gepides were not to be easily conquer'd, in order to have no Dispute with them, chose rather to have some other Countries of the Roman Empire assigned them, which was granted; so that they settled in Pannonia. The Bounds of Pannonia at this time were, towards the East the Upper Mesia, towards the South Dalmatia, towards the West Noricum, and on the North the Danube: A Province adorned with many Cities, among which Sirmium was the chief, where the Emperors used frequently to reside.

THE Ostrogoths then having transferr'd their Seat into Pannonia, liv'd a long time under the Dominion of Walamire their King, and Theodomire and Widemire his Brothers; who, altho' they were divided as to Places, which they shared amongst themselves, yet nevertheless they were, in Councils and Deliberations strictly united; so that Pannonia seem'd to be ruled and governed by one single Person only¹. These Brothers often repell'd the Forces which the Sons of Attila brought against them, who accounted them Deserters from their Dominion, for which Cause they often attack'd them, until they were defeated by Walamire, and confin'd to Scythia. At that same joyful Time, when the Victory was obtain'd over the Sons of Attila, Theodomire had his Son Theodorick born to him, who from his very Cradle gave great Expectations. By his noble Manners and excellent Virtues, being much in favour with the Emperor Zeno, he had the good Luck for many Years, with Royal Title, to rule Italy and these our Provinces.

THE Peace, in the mean time, betwixt Martianus the Emperor, and Walamire and his Brothers, continu'd firm and secure; but they being offended, that at the Imperial Court in Constantinople, a certain Theodorick, the Son of a veteran Soldier, tho' a Goth, but not of the Race of Amali, had gain'd the Hearts of every Body, and that the Emperor had themselves in no Esteem, and with-held the Pensions which the Empire used to pay them; immediately took up Arms against the Empire, and turn'd all Things topsy-turvey in Dalmatia and Illyricum. Immediately the Emperor chang'd his Mind; and in order to make them his Friends, sent Ambassadors to settle a more firm and lasting Peace, offering them not only those Pensions, which for the Time past had been deny'd them, but likewise all they could claim to that Time, obliging himself also to keep up a Correspondence with them for the Time to come, provided they would keep themselves within their own Bounds, and not make War against the Empire. The Conditions were agreed to; but the Emperor for the greater Security, would have the Infant Theodorick, Son of Theodomire, for Hostage. The affectionate Father would not consent to it, not being able to suffer such a dear Pledge to be taken from him; but at last being perswaded by the Intreaties of his Brother Walamire, he agreed to it: So there was settled betwixt the Goths and the Romans a firm and stable Peace, of which Theodorick was the Pledge, and was carried to Constantinople, and put in the Hands of the Emperor Leo, who had succeeded to Martian in the East, who lov'd the Child because of his Comeliness and gentle Manners, more than he did his own Son.

THE Goths then having made such a firm Peace with the Romans, turn'd their Arms against several Nations who border'd with them; but while Walamire was fighting gallantly against the Scythians, he was thrown off his Horse and kill'd. Therefore the Goths, in order to revenge the Death of their King, fought so boldly, that they subdu'd them altogether. Theodomire made War likewise against the Suevi and the Germans, whom he cruelly butcher'd and dispers'd, and had almost extinguisht them: And whilst he was returning triumphantly to Pannonia his Seat, his Son Theodorick, who had been given in Hostage, return'd from Constantinople loaded with Presents, being dismiss'd by the Emperor Leo, that he might enjoy full Liberty in his paternal Soil.

THEODORICK being return'd into Pannonia, and scarcely out of his Childhood, not as yet eighteen Years old complete, began to give Signs of incredible Valour: Having, without his Father's Knowledge, gathered together many Troops of those who were most affectionate to him, being very near Six thousand, he pass'd the Danube, and waged War against Babai King of Sarmatia, who a little before, had triumph'd over Camundus a Roman Captain, whom he defeated and kill'd; having got a compleat Victory over him, he likewise surpriz'd the City Semandria, which had been possess'd by the Sarmatians; but did not restore it to the Romans, but subjected it to his own Kingdom.

WHILST the Goths were thus preying upon their Neighbours, and the Desire of enlarging their Bounds, and to go in quest of more commodious Habitations in other Parts grew the greater; Widemire was making himself ready with his People to pass into Italy, which he did, but he had scarcely arriv'd there, when all his Designs were blasted by unexpected Death: He was succeeded in the Kingdom by his Son, who was likewise call'd Widemire, and who being advis'd by Glicerius, who then reign'd in the West, from Italy directed his March into Gallia, and join'd himself to the Westrogoths his Kinsmen, with whom he was able to clear Gallia and Spain, of many Nations wherewith they were infested, and to defend those Provinces against the Invasion of the Vandals.

ON the other Hand, Theodomire his Uncle, with Theodorick his Son, being spurr'd on by Gezerick King of the Vandals, march'd with their Army towards

Dalmatia and Illyricum, took Neissa the Capital City of that Province, and afterwards Ulpianum, and all the other Places, tho' reckon'd inaccessible; he subjected Heraclea and Larissa, Cities of Thessaly, to his Dominion: He went further, and pretended to take Thessalonica: Clarianus a Patrician and Roman Captain, was Governor of that City, who being so unexpectedly catch'd napping by Theodomire, and considering that his Forces were not sufficient to resist him, sent him Ambassadors with many Presents, desiring that he would give over Thoughts of besieging that City. The Conditions of Peace were soon agreed to, by leaving to the Goths all those Places which had surrender'd to them, to wit, Ceropellas, Europus, Mediana, Petina, Bereus, and the other Countries of Illyricum, where the Goths with their King, laid down their Arms, and took their Rest. Not long after Theodomire became grievously sick, and having conven'd the Goths, and appointed Theodorick his Son for their King, and his Successor, ended his Days lamented by all ¹.

Of Theodorick the Ostrogoth, King of Italy.

WHILST Italy, by the Death of Valentinian III. which fell out in the Year 455 ¹, and the Change of so many Princes and Emperors was all in a Convulsion, and miserably afflicted; Maximus, Author of the infamous Assassination, caus'd himself to be proclaim'd Emperor of the West, and marry'd Eudoxia Wife of Valentinian, and Daughter of Theodosius; but having discover'd that he had been the Author of the Death of her first Husband, she call'd from Africa Genferick King of the Vandals, who with a powerful Army came into Italy, and enter'd Rome, which he destroy'd and plunder'd; and while Maximus was making his Escape, he was stoned and tore to pieces by the People. After Genferick had over-run many Provinces, he retir'd with a Design to leave Italy, and return to Africa: He over-run our Campania, laying it all waste and in Confusion, took Capua and Nola, and destroy'd and pillag'd many Cities of this Province; from thence he return'd to Carthage. Avitus during these Commotions by the Favour of the Westrogoths caused himself to be proclaim'd Emperor in France, but he very soon quitted the Purple; for the Emperor Martianus, who, as we have said, had succeeded to Theodosius the Younger in the Empire of the East, hearing of the Death of Maximus, solicited the Senate and the Soldiers to make Majorianus Emperor, which was done in the Year 457. Majorianus not long after, was murder'd by the Means of Severus, who intruded himself into the Empire; but the third Year was not over, when he was put to Death by Ricomerus, who fix'd Antemius in his Place; he likewise had the Favour of Leo, who in the Year 457. by the Death of Martianus, had succeeded in the Empire of the East. But Ricomerus having afterwards declar'd against Antemius, he was likewise put to Death in the Year 472. and Olibrius put in his Room, who reign'd only eight Months; and Glicerius, more by his own Strength, and the Assistance of the Westrogoths, than by a free Election, was declared Emperor in Ravenna. But his Empire scarcely lasted one Year, when Julius Nepos, in the Year 474. caus'd him to be depos'd, and took the Title of Emperor himself: Orestes being appointed by him General of his Armies, rebell'd against him, and caus'd Augustulus his Son to be declar'd Emperor in Ravenna.

FOREIGN Princes seeing so much Confusion and Disorder among the Romans, thought fit to take Advantage of it, as Evarick the Westrogoth, and many more had already done; but during the Reign of Augustulus Disorders growing more and more, the Heruli and the Thuringi, under Odoacre their Captain, being likewise invited by the Friends of Nepos, at last made themselves Masters of Italy: Orestes was put to Death, and Augustulus, depriv'd of the Empire, was banish'd to Naples, where he was confin'd in the Castle of Lucullus, which is now call'd Ovo ¹. Thus was the Empire of the Romans in the West, extinguish'd in Augustulus in the Year 476. which made Jornandes say, Sic quoque Hesperium Romanæ gentis Imperium, quod Septingentesimo vigesimo tertio urbis conditæ anno, primus Augustulum Octavianus Augustus tenere cæpit, cum hoc Augustulo periit, anno decessorum, prædecessorumque Regni quingentesimo sexto; Gothorum debinc Regibus, Romam, Italiamque tenentibus. In his Person also ended the Title of Emperor of the West, because Odoacre having made himself Master of Italy, took no other Quality upon him than that of King.

ODOACRE held the Kingdom of Italy, according to Jornandes, little less than fourteen Years ², till the Year 489, when Theodorick the Ostrogoth expell'd him, and confin'd him to Ravenna, where he was closely besieg'd. Neither Italy, nor these our Provinces, ever had more miserable Times, than those from the Death of Valentinian III. to the Reign of Theodorick; if we will but consider what Detriment the Change of Princes or Government brings upon a Commonwealth or Kingdom, we may easily imagine how much these our Provinces suffer'd in such Times by the Change of so many Princes and Emperors. All was in Disorder, all in Confusion, and every Thing turn'd topsy-turvy; the Laws were contemned, and Justice yet more. The Emperors, who were so often made and unmade, thought of nothing less: Only some Novellæ of Martianus, Majorianus, Severus, and Antemius, have reach'd us, which were collected by Gotifredus, which we see printed at the End of his Theodosian Code. But Theodorick having taken upon himself the Government of the Kingdom, deserv'd much Commendation, for he was the first who put an end to so great Calamities; so that in the Space of little less than Thirty-eight Years that he reign'd in Italy, he restor'd it to such Grandeur, that the late Misfortunes and Desolations were no more perceiv'd; forasmuch as he governing it according to the Institutions and Laws of the Romans, restor'd it to its ancient Splendor and Majesty. For which Cause it becomes us to give a particular Account of the Achievements of this mighty Prince, to whom these our Provinces which now compose the Kingdom of Naples, are much indebted.

THEODORICK after the Death of Theodoric his Father, having succeeded him in his Paternal Kingdom, reign'd in Illyricum, where the Ostrogoths, as we have said, after their Conquests, laid down their Arms and settled themselves. At this Time Zeno reign'd in the East, who in the Year 474. had succeeded to the Emperor Leo: Zeno understanding that Theodorick had been chosen King of the Ostrogoths, and fearing that by his too great Power he might disturb his Empire, thought it convenient to recall him to Constantinople; where he receiv'd him with incredible Marks of Esteem, and first of all caus'd him to be enroll'd amongst the prime Lords of his Court; not long after he adopted him for his Son, and created him Consul Ordinarius, the most eminent Dignity in the World at that Time: But that would not serve him, he likewise caus'd to be erected before the Porch of the Imperial Palace, an Equestrian Statue, in Honour of so worthy a Personage. But whilst this Prince was enjoying all these Advantages in Constantinople, and all the Honours which could be heap'd upon him by Imperial Hands; yet for all that his generous Soul could not bear to see his own People, who were trifling away their Time, abas'd with Idleness, Poverty and Straits in Illyricum, and himself idly enjoying these Pleasures, leading an indolent and lazy Life: Rouz'd by such powerful Motives, he resolv'd upon more generous Undertakings; and having waited on the Emperor Zeno, as Jornandes relates ³, he spake thus to him.

“ Altho' by your Generosity and Grandeur, there be nothing wanting either to me “ or my Goths, who are under your Command; nevertheless be pleas'd to hear the “ Wishes and Desires of my Heart, which I am going freely to unfold to you. The

THIS so magnanimous a Resolution of Theodorick’s, altho’ it much displeas’d the Emperor Zeno, who could not easily bear his Absence, nevertheless being unwilling to ruffle him, by opposing it, and considering with himself, that it were better, that his Goths, who were impatient of Rest, should employ their Arms elsewhere, and not disturb the Eastern Parts, he approv’d of it, and granted him all that he demanded; and loading him with most rich Presents, dismiss’d him, recommending to him above all Things, the Senate and People of Rome, for whom he was to have all the Esteem and Regard that was possible. Theodorick leaving Constantinople full of the greatest Hopes, return’d to his Goths, and order’d Matters so, that many follow’d him; and by the straight Way, passing through Pannonia, he led his Army towards Italy. From thence entering the Confines of Venice, he pitch’d his Camp at the Bridge of Lisonzo, not far from Aquileja.

IN the mean Time Messengers had gone before to acquaint Odoacre of his March, who hearing that Theodorick was encamp’d at this Bridge, march’d his Army against him. But Theodorick getting to the Fields of Verona before him, offer’d him Battle, where they had a very sharp Engagement, in which Theodorick made a cruel Slaughter of the Enemy; whereupon entring boldly into Italy, and crossing the Po, he encamp’d his Army near to Ravenna; and during the Siege of this Imperial City, there happen’d a general Revolt. Odoacre who was within, did all he could to defend it, and frequently by Sallies in the Night-time, disturb’d the Gothish Army; and by fighting in this manner, sometimes with Loss, sometimes with Advantage, the third Year of the Siege drew on: But Odoacre strove in vain, for Theodorick was proclaim’d King and Lord over all Italy, and all Things both Publick and Private succeeded according to his Wishes. In this Condition Odoacre perceiving that all was lost, and seeing himself only possess’d of Ravenna, and that already Provisions were wanting, resolv’d to surrender; therefore he sent Ambassadors to Theodorick desiring Peace: Which was granted him; but afterwards fearing lest Odoacre by Treachery should endeavour to regain the Kingdom, he caus’d him to be put to Death.

DURING these fortunate Successes, Theodorick gave a distinct Information of all that pass’d to the Emperor Zeno, advising him that he only wanted Ravenna to be intire Master of Italy; at which Zeno was mightily pleas’d, so that by his Imperial Decree he confirm’d him Emperor of Italy; and by his Advice, Theodorick laying aside the Gothish Habit, put on, not the Imperial Diadem, but the Kingly Ensigns and Mantle, and was proclaim’d King of the Goths and *Romans*¹. Afterwards in the second Year of the Empire of Anastasius, who succeeded Zeno, he took Ravenna, and in the Year 493. he fix’d his Royal Seat in this City, as his Predecessors had done.

IF there ever was a Prince in the World, in whose Favour, in the Acquiring of his Kingdoms, so many just Titles concurr’d, certainly Theodorick deserves to be reckon’d such with respect to the Kingdom of Italy. In his Time the Empire of the West, by the Death of Augustulus, was altogether at an End and extinct: Spain was in Possession of the Vandals, the Westrogoths, and the Suevi; Gallia was in the Hands of the French, and the Burgundians; Germany under the Dominion of the Alamanni, and other more unciviliz’d and barbarous Nations. The Emperors of the East not able to defend Italy, it was left a Prey to the most barbarous Nations:

Giseric King of the Vandals destroy'd and plunder'd it: Odoacre invaded it, and made it groan under his Tyranny; Theodorick came to set it at Liberty, and at his own Charges, in the Midst of infinite Dangers, by the Valour of his Arms, and with the Troops of his own Nation, subdu'd the Tyrant, drove him out, and kill'd him. All the People receiv'd him for their King and Lord with loud Acclamations, and long'd for his Government. If there was any who had any Claim of Right to Italy, it was the Emperor of the East, but Theodorick having been sent by him, acquir'd it, and drove out the Invader. Having conquer'd it with his own Troops, the Empire was confirm'd to him by Zeno, by whose Counsel and Authority he cloath'd himself with the Royal Ensigns, and was declar'd King of Italy, Zeno transferring to his Person the most supreme Rights, reserving nothing to himself. For which we shall seek no other Vouchers but the Greeks themselves; we shall say nothing of Jornandes, who being a Goth, may be suspected by some; neither shall we mention Ennodius that holy Bishop of Pavia, who for the Justice of his Reign, made a panegyric Oration¹ on him; I will make use of *Procopius*² a Greek by Nation, who in his History, as he is very complaisant to his own Greeks, so he is no great Flatterer of the Goths: Thus he writes of the Facts according to the Translation of Grotius, At Zeno Imperator, gnarus rebus uti, ut dabant tempora, Theodorico bertator est, ut in Italiam iret, Odoacroque devicto, sibi ipse ac Gothis pararet Occidentis regnum. Quippe satius homini in Senatum allesto, Romæ, atque Italis imperare, invasore pulso, quam arma in Imperatorem cum periculo experiri. For which reason the unfortunate Goths, when, in the Reign of Teja their last King, they were oblig'd by Justinian to abandon Italy, having recourse to the French for Assistance; among other Things which they insisted on to move them to come to their Relief, told them, that what the Romans did to them now, would be what they would meet with in their turn; for now that their Power was at a very low Ebb, under specious Pretexts they made War upon them, by alledging, that Theodorick invaded Italy, which belong'd to the Romans: Cum tamen, said they, as *Agathias*³ has it, Theodoricus non ipsis nolentibus, sed Zenonis quondam Imperatoris concessu venisset in Italiam, neque eam Romanis abstulisset, qui pridem eam amiserant, sed depulso Odoacro invasore peregrino, belli jure quævisset quæcunque ille possederat.

AND the Emperor Zeno being dead, Anastasius, who succeeded him in the Empire of the East, was of the same Opinion with his Predecessor, owning him for a just and lawful Prince; for tho' in the Anonymus Valesianus we read, as 'tis related by Pagi in his Dissertatione bypatica de Consulibus, that the Goths, Odoacre being dead in the Year 493. Sibi confirmaverunt Theodoricum Regem, non expectantes jussionem novi Principis (meaning Anastasius, who had then succeeded Zeno) which, as *Pagi*⁴ observes, was unknown before that Time: Nevertheless we see in the Letters of Cassiodorus, that Anastasius approved of that which the Goths had done by their own Authority; so that while he lived he maintain'd a firm and lasting Friendship with Theodorick, exhorting him always to love the Senate, to use the Laws of the Roman Princes his Predecessors, and endeavour to maintain a settled and secure Peace in Italy during his Reign; of which Theodorick assur'd him: as may be seen in his Letters, which we read in Cassiodore, directed to *Anastasius*⁵.

JUSTINIAN himself, who drove the Goths out of Italy, could not but acknowledge the Reign of Theodorick, and the other Kings of Italy, his Successors, both just and lawful; for after he had conquer'd it, by means of the two illustrious Captains Belisarius and Narſes, he abolish'd all the Acts, Concessions, and Privileges of Totila, whom he reputed an Invader and Tyrant, but did not so by those of this Prince and his Successors⁶.

INDEED tho' Theodorick was not pleas'd to assume the Title of Emperor, yet he was held for such by all his People; and Procopius himself says, that he wanted nothing of that Decorum which belong'd to an Emperor; on the contrary, Cassiodore thinks, that this Title was as due to him as to any of the most shining Emperors of Rome; and really this Prince, whether it was out of Respect to the Emperors of the East, or whether it was because Odoacre took no other Quality but that of King, or whether it was that this strange Nation, reckon'd the Title of King more advantageous and strong, as denoting a Sovereignty altogether independent and free, than that of Emperor; he never took upon him the Title of Emperor of the West, as Charles the Great did afterwards. And even, whether we regard the Extent of his Dominions, or the eminent Virtues with which he was adorn'd, he would no less have deserv'd that Honour than Charles the Great. He possess'd Italy, with all its Provinces, and likewise Sicily. Neither was it this Part of Europe only that was under his Government; he held Rhetia, Noricum, Dalmatia, with Liburnia, Istria, and Part of Suevia; that Part of Pannonia, where Sigetinez, and Sirmium are situated, some Part of Gallia, for which he was often at War with the French; and lastly, as Tutor to Amalarick his Nephew he govern'd Spain; so that Jornandes said¹: Nec fuit in parte Occidua gens, quæ Theodorico, dum viveret, aut amicitia, ut subjectione non deservivit.

THE Custom of Anointing, and being crown'd by the Hands of the Bishops of the Metropolitan Cities, was not as yet introduc'd into the West. They had begun already in the East to practise this Ceremony; and in these very Times we read, that Leo the Thracian, after having been chosen Emperor by the Senate of Constantinople, was crown'd by Anatolius Patriarch of that City. If this Custom had been found introduc'd into Italy, and if it had pleas'd Theodorick to have gone to Rome, and caus'd himself to be crown'd Emperor by Pope Gelasius, as Charles the Great did by Pope Leo III. it would certainly have been said now, that the Empire of the West had been transferr'd from the Romans to the Goths, by the Authority of the Roman Apostolick See.

The Roman Laws retained by Theodorick in Italy, and his Edicts conformable to the same.

BUT altho' this Prince was not pleas'd to assume the Title of Emperor of the West, nevertheless he govern'd Italy and these our Provinces, not as a Foreign Prince, but in the same manner as all the other Emperors had done. He retain'd the same Laws, the same Magistrates, the same Polity, and the same Distribution of the Provinces. First he divided the Ostrogoths amongst the fortified Places, with their Captains, that in Time of War they might command them, and in Time of Peace govern them, and, except as to Military Discipline, he gave to the Romans all Honours. In the first Place he commanded, That the Roman Laws should be retain'd, inviolably observ'd, and have the same Force which they had under the other Emperors of the West; so much did he reverence and respect them, that he often speaks of them in Cassiodore thus; Jura veterum ad nostram cupimus reverentiam custodiri; and elsewhere, Delectamur Jure Romano vivere; and in other Places, *Reverenda Legum antiquitas, &c.*¹ So that the Roman Pontiffs were exceedingly pleas'd with Theodorick, because, like a wise and prudent Prince, he had retain'd the Roman Law in Italy. Thus Gelasius, as Gotifredus relates it², or according to *Alteserra*³, Symmachus his Successor, congratulated Theodorick; Certe est magnificentiæ vestræ, leges Romanorum Principum, quas in negotiis hominum custodiendas esse præcepit, multo magis circa beati Petri Apostoli sedem pro suæ felicitatis augmento, velle servari. For which Cause, in the first five Books of Cassiodore, which are compos'd of the Letters and Edicts of Theodorick, we see nothing so much recommended to the Judges and Magistrates, as the due Observance of, and Respect for the Roman Laws: and very many Constitutions of the Theodosian Code, and many Novellæ of Theodosius, Valentinian, and Majorianus, are quoted in these Books; of which the most exact Gotifredus in his Prolegomena to that Code, hath compos'd a long Catalogue ¹.

NEITHER had this Prince any other Notion, but of supporting the Kingdom of Italy with these same Laws, and the same Spirit and Union with which Honorius, Valentinian III. and the other Emperors of the West had govern'd it. Thus he explains himself to Anastasius Emperor of the East, on that Head; Quia peti vos credimus inter utrasque Respublicas, quarum semper unum Corpus sub antiquis Principibus fuisse declaratur, aliquid discordiæ permanere; quas non solum oportet inter se otiosa dilectione conjungi, verum etiam decet mutuis viribus adjuvari. Romani Regni unum velle, una semper opinio sit ²: For which Cause, no new Laws were introduced into Italy by Theodorick, because he believ'd the Roman were sufficient, by which it had been long govern'd. And altho' we have at this Day one of his Edicts ³, consisting of One Hundred and Fifty-four Heads (which we owe to the Care of Peter Pitheus, who caus'd it to be printed) however, excepting some Heads, which are branded for Gotbish Rigor, such as LVI, LXI, and some others, all the rest are taken out of the Roman Laws, as Theodorick himself confesses in the End of it; Nec cujuslibet dignitatis, aut substantiæ, aut potentiæ, aut cinguli, vel honoris persona, contra hæc, quæ salubriter Statuta sunt, quolibet modo credat esse veniendum, quæ ex Novellis legibus, ac veteris juris Sanctionibus pro aliqua parte collegimus. There is scarcely any Head of the foresaid Edict, which appoints any thing that is not to be found in the Roman Laws; so that Theodorick, for corroborating his Orders or Prohibitions, often refers to them. Thus in the XXIVth Head, Secundum legum veterum constituta; and in the XXVIth, Secundum leges; and in the XXXVIth, Legum censuram, and elsewhere.

BUT what was commendable in this Prince was, that he would likewise have these Laws common not only to the Romans, but also to the Goths themselves who lived amongst the Romans, as is manifest by this his Edict, leaving to the Goths few of their own Laws, which were rather their own Customs, as being more used to them, than written Laws: But in Matters of Moment, such as Succession, Testaments, Adoptions, Contracts, Penalties, Crimes, and, in short, in all that concern'd Publick or Private Right, the Roman Laws were common to all. Neither when a Goth had any Dispute with a Roman, or a Roman with a Goth, would he allow the Judges to have regard to any other Laws for deciding their Controversies, as Theodorick, in his Rescript to a certain Januarius President of our Samnium, expressly order'd; Intra itaque Provinciam Samni, si quod Negotium Romano cum Gotbis est, aut Gotbo emerferit aliquod cum Romanis, Legum consideratione definias; nec permittimus discreto Jure vivere, quos uno voto volumus vindicare ⁴. Only when the Dispute was betwixt Goth and Goth, he would have it decided by their own Judge, whom he appointed in each City, according to his own Edicts, which altho', as is said, they contain'd something of Gotbish Discipline, however they did not differ much from the Roman Laws; but from that the Romans were exempted, since their Judges could only determine betwixt Goth and Goth: But it fell out, that a Roman had likewise any Concern, either as Plaintiff or Defendant, be that as it wou'd, they were to have recourse to the Roman Magistrate: And in this Manner was the Formula of the Comitia conceiv'd by Theodorick, which he gave to those whom he chose as Judges of the Goths in each Province, related by Cassiodore in his Seventh Book, amongst his many other Formule ⁵.

S E C T. III.

The same Polity, and Magistrates retain'd by Theodorick in Italy.

AS Theodorick took great Care to retain the Roman Laws in Italy, so his Study for preserving the same Form of Government, was certainly no less, as well in what concern'd the Distribution of the Provinces, as of the Magistrates and Dignities. He having found the Imperial Seat translated to Ravenna, by Honorius and Valentinian his Predecessors, who had not fix'd it there by Chance, and to be far from Rome, but to be near at hand, and ready to put a Stop to the Irruptions of the Barbarians, who in that Part broke in upon the Borders of Italy; he likewise resided there. Therefore the Complaints of the Romans were unjust and unreasonable, when they complain'd of him for having fix'd his Residence in Ravenna and not in Rome: For he left Tokens of his Love to that famous City, by adorning it with publick and fair Monuments of his Grandeur and Royal Spirit, and, out of his Magnificence, surrounding it with strong and secure Walls. His Love and Respect for the Roman Senate was no less, as the so many affectionate Letters directed by him to that Body, full of Esteem and Respect, which we read in Cassiodore, do testify. In Ravenna then, did he fix his Royal Residence, as his Predecessors had done; from whence he ruled Italy and these our Provinces, which now make the Kingdom of Naples, by the same Magistrates by whom they had been govern'd, during the Time of the Roman Emperors.

ALTHO' under his Government a few Alterations were made of some of the Magistrates and Officers of the Palace and Kingdom, without any Change of Titles or Dignities; nevertheless, he retain'd very many of them, tho' not altogether with Power and Jurisdiction, like those of the Romans, yet they were much the same in effect. He retain'd the Senators, Consuls, Patricians, Præfectus Prætorio, Præfects of the City, and Quæstors. He retain'd the Consulares, Correctores, Præsides, and many others. Some little Difference there was in the lesser Officers, it being the Custom of the Goths to send to every little City, Comites, and particular Judges, for the Administration of the Government and Justice, and to create some other Officers, whose Titles are not known in the Notitia of the Dignities of the Empire.

BUT if we will follow the Opinion of the most accurate Hugo Grotius in this Variety of Magistrates introduc'd by the Goths, we must say, they were much more to be commended in that, than the Romans themselves, because says he, the Romans had many Titles of Dignity altogether vain and groundless: *Multa apud Romanos ejusmodi inani sono Constantia, Vacantium, Honorariorum, &c.*¹ On the contrary, the Goths had quite different Sentiments, as we read in *Cassiodore*²: Grata sunt omnino nomina, quæ designant protinus actiones, quando tota ambiguitas audiendi tollitur ubi in Vocabulo concluditur, quid geratur. Besides Grotius consider'd, that the Romans sent a Consularis, or a Præses to every Province, who was to have the Government and Care of all the Cities and Castles of that Province, many of which were at a great Distance from his Place of Residence; whence it fell out, that it not being in the Power of the Præses to be present in every Place, the People were put to immense Charges, being oblig'd to have recourse to him from the most remote Parts. The Goths went another way to work; tho' every Province had its Consularis, Corrector, and Præses: Nevertheless not only to the more principal Cities, but likewise to every little Castle, Comites, or other inferior Magistrates were sent, who were faithful, uncorrupted, and approved of by the Consent of the People, in order to distribute Justice, and take Care of the Tributes and other Affairs of those Places.

SO that this Disposition of Magistrates, which to this Day is observ'd in our Kingdom, of sending Governors and Judges to every City, is not owing to the Romans, but to the Goths.

AND if the like Strictness and Care were practis'd in our Time, which in that of Theodorick was used in the choice of such Magistrates, that is to say, in sending Men of known Integrity and Learning, and acceptable to the People, and allowing no Appeals to other distant Tribunals, but when the Weightiness of the Matters, and the manifest Injustice requir'd it, certainly these our Provinces would be freed of an infinite Number of Law-Suits, and heavy Expences which now they labour under. On which account many Writers extol the Government of the Eastern People, and those of Africa; and with respect to our common Law-Suits we used to envy them, because that not only in the Cities, but in every little Castle, they have their Judges always ready and prepar'd, and Law Pleas are no sooner begun, but they are immediately determin'd, and seldom, or never, admit of Appeals; because the People, having their Magistrates in due Veneration, soon rest satisfied with their Decrees, and suffer more willingly, that the Goods in Dispute be taken from them, than to go to distant Courts of Justice to complain, with greater Charges, and Uncertainty of gaining the Cause, and often in fear of losing it; and they reckon it to be more for their Advantage to have ready and quick Injustice, than languishing and slow Justice. Wherefore *Clenardus*¹ having left Europe, and taken up his Residence in Africa, in the Kingdom of Fez, used to write to many of his Friends in Europe, that he did not envy them the Magnificence and Grandeur of so many fine Cities, because he was no more obliged to go to Courts of Justice to be toss'd up and down amongst so many wicked People, full of Cavils; for where he was, there was no occasion for prattling Lawyers: But if there happen'd any Dispute among those Africans, the Judge was always ready to decide it, and they never went home before it was determin'd. But that, as Matters stand, is rather to be wish'd for than expected; for the Disease is in the Root: Besides, that in the Election of Magistrates, these Qualifications are no more to be expected, which perhaps in those Times, which we now call Barbarous, were punctually requir'd: And what was then a Remedy, would now become deadly Poison; seeing from the Time of Alphonfus I. King of Arragon, the Disease was spread, by granting to the Barons of the Kingdom all Jurisdiction and Command. And at present there are more Governments depend on them, than on the King, and the greatest Part of the Kingdom is govern'd by them prima instantia; wherefore it were expedient to lay aside the Custom of having recourse to superior Tribunals, which we observe at present: Seeing the Design of Charles VIII. King of France, while he govern'd this Kingdom, of taking from the Barons all Jurisdiction and Command, and rendring them like those of France and other Countries of *Europe*², could not be put in Practice.

BUT to return to where we left off: The Goths, as they are represented to us in the Books of Cassiodore, were very wary in the Choice of their Magistrates, and no less in the Election of the greater Officers, than in that of the lesser, which they sent to each City, in which they were very careful; whence we read in Cassiodore of so many new Officers, such as Chancellors, Canonicarii, Comites, and Referendarii; and the so many set Forms, by which so many and different Dignities were conferr'd on Subjects of known Goodness and Learning. *Petrus Pantinus*³ wrote a Book, not despicable, of the Dignities of the Gothish Court: But as *Grotius*⁴ has observ'd, he might have saved himself that Labour, because they are all to be found in the sixth and seventh Book of Cassiodore, where they are all represented and describ'd.

S E C T. IV.

The same Disposition of the Provinces retain'd by King Theodorick.

THIS Prince retain'd the same Division of the Provinces of which Italy was made up under the Empire of Constantine, and his Successors: They were in Number the same as in Adrian's Time; to wit, Seventeen: Neither was that which we now call the Kingdom of Naples, divided into more Provinces than four; they were the same under the Dominion of Theodorick, I. Campania, II. Calabria with Puglia, III. Lucania and the Brutii, IV. Samnium. For the Government of Campania, Consulares were sent as formerly; to the other two Calabria and Lucania, Correctores; and to Samnium, Præsides.

Of CAMPANIA and its Consulares.

THE first Consularis of Campania, which we find in the five Books of *Cassiodore*¹, was a certain John, to whom Theodorick sent a Letter, in which he so much recommends Justice, and the Care of the Publick Welfare, honouring him with this Title Viro Senatori, and the Inscription is thus: Joanni V. S. Consulari Campaniæ, Theod. Rex. To the same John, Theodorick directed that his Edict, which we read also in *Cassiodore*², by which he most severely prohibited that most wicked Custom, which had been introduc'd into Campania and Samnium, that the Creditor, without publick Authority, but at his own Hand, seiz'd on the Goods of the Debtor for a Pledge, neither did he restore them till he was paid the Debt; and very frequently the Goods, not of his Debtor, but of his Friend, Neighbour, or Relation, were seiz'd, which in Italy are call'd Reprisals: Which Custom was severely forbidden, and the Penalty of losing the Debt was imposed, and restoring the double, in case the Reprisal had been made, not on a Debtor, but on a Friend or Relation. The Emperor Zeno had done the same in the East, by such another Constitution of his³: Therefore Theodorick, who design'd to govern Italy by the same Maxims, would imitate him: Justinian afterwards renew'd it in his *Novellæ*⁴. Neither would Theodorick ever allow such Violence to be practis'd in his Kingdom; but that Creditors, as the Roman Laws likewise prescrib'd, should try their Rights by the legal Way of publick Judgment.

THIS Prince finding himself exhausted by the Wars which he had had for some Time with the French, had occasion to provide his Armies with all Sorts of Victuals out of this Province; on which Occasion we see another of his Edicts⁵, ordering the Masters of Ships in Campania, to carry those Provisions into Gallia. He design'd to have impos'd other Burthens on it, but Boetius Severinus begging an Ease for that Province⁶, and laying before him the many Miseries, Afflictions and Desolations, which it had suffer'd by the Invasion of the Vandals; Theodorick most graciously granted it Indulgence, neither would he lay any more new Burthens on it; on the contrary, the Inhabitants of Campania, and particularly the Neapolitans and Nolans, having suffer'd great Damage, at that Time by the Irruption of Vesuvius, he likewise freed them of their ordinary Tributes, which we see in Cassiodore by another of his Edicts⁷; in which the roaring Noise, the terrible Clouds, and the Torrents of Fire which this Mountain uses to vomit forth, are ingeniously and lively describ'd. Cassiodore is admirable at such Descriptions; but what is unpardonable in him, is, that besides his making use of some bold Hyperboles, and some Metaphors immoderately licentious, he brings in Theodorick speaking after such a manner, that 'tis not possible to know, whether he intended to make Laws, and provide for the Necessities of his Provinces, which was his Scope, or act the Part of a Declaimer, for he often introduces him speaking at such a strange rate, that it would not be sufferable, even in the most high-foaring Panegyrist of our Times.

CAMPANIA had truly suffer'd insupportable Damages, when Genferick, with a powerful Army from Africa, invaded Italy. It was cruelly used at that Time by the Vandals; the Country was laid waste, and Capua, the Metropolis, barbarously pillaged, and almost quite destroy'd. Nola underwent the same Calamities, and many other Cities. Naples, by reason of its Situation, was safe from the Fury of those Barbarians. A City at that Time, tho' little, yet well defended by the Valour of its Citizens, its Situation, and more by the strong Walls which surrounded it. And by this alternate Fortune which happen'd to them, it fell out afterwards that many Cities of these our Provinces, from Great became Small, and from Small Great; whence it likewise came to pass, that Capua, and many Cities of this Province, being ruin'd, Naples by Degrees began to raise itself above all the rest; and in the Time of the Greeks and Longobards, became the Head of a great Dukedom.

IN the Reign of Theodorick, we do not read of any other City of this Province, that was so well pleased with the Government of this Prince as Naples; nor any that by their Devotion and obliging Behaviour towards him, gave so many and conspicuous Marks of their Fidelity and Respect. No sooner had he mounted the Throne, than the Neapolitans erected his Statue in their largest Market-Place; the same, which afterwards was the ominous Prefage of the unfortunate End of the Government of the Goths in Italy; for, as *Procopius*¹ relates, the Neapolitans having rais'd this Statue, made with wonderful Art of small Pebbles of various Colours, and so well join'd together, that they represented the Image of this Prince to the Life, while he was yet alive the Head of this Statue fell of itself, and the joining of the Pebbles giving way, it broke to pieces; and not long after, the Death of this Prince was heard of in Naples, and that Athalarick his Nephew had succeeded him. In the eighth Year of this Prince's Reign, on a sudden that which compos'd the Belly likewise gave way, and fell to pieces, and at the same Time the News of the Death of Athalarick was brought. Not long after, that of which the Genitals were made dropp'd off, when the Account of the Death of Amalasunta, the Daughter of Theodorick came. But when at last the Goths besieg'd Rome, in order to retake it, all the Materials of which the Thighs and Feet were form'd, fell to the Ground, nothing remaining where the Statue had been plac'd: From which Event the Romans conjectur'd, that the Army of the Emperor of the East would be Victorious; interpreting the Feet of Theodorick to denote the Goths whom he had govern'd: And this vain and ridiculous Prefage, was of such Weight among the Vulgar, who are generally more moved by such Things, than by any fine Speech of a Captain, and animated them so, that it gave them no small Hopes of Victory. And what contributed likewise to it, was, some Sibylline Verses, put forth by some Roman Senators, very well adapted for imposing upon the People; the Sense of which, as Procopius well consider'd, before the Event of the Things, was not to be conceiv'd in the least by human Understanding; because they were so disorder'd and confus'd, and truly Enthusiastical, that skipping from the Misfortunes that were to befall Africa, to those of Persia; from thence, after mentioning the Romans, they immediately speak of the Affyrians; and returning to the Romans again, they lastly sing of the Calamities of Britain: And afterwards when they had seen the Event, they publish'd a thousand favourable Interpretations, fancying they had discover'd the Sense of the obscure and fantastical Verses.

BUT let us return to our Subject; Naples was very faithful and devoted to Theodorick; and on the other hand, that Prince treated the Neapolitans with no less Marks of Love and Gratitude; and it was no small Mark of Respect, that amongst the Forms of the Comitivæ of the first Order, which Theodorick used to give to those to whom he committed the Government of some famous City, we read yet in *Cassiodore*² that which was appointed for Naples; for this Author relates only the Forms which were given to Persons appointed to govern the greater, but not the lesser Cities. We only read those of Syracuse, Ravenna, Rome and other conspicuous Places:

² Cassiod. lib. 6. cap. 24.

As for the other smaller Cities, there's a general one only, which we read serves for them all; and the Comitiva, which were given for the Government of these, were not of the first, but of the second Order, as is clear from the Form itself in Cassiodore ¹. Neither are the Prerogatives of this City forgot in the Comitiva (or if we may name it in the Language of the present Times, the Schedule or Patent) nor its Pleasures, its Excellency, its extensive Commerce, its large Authority and Jurisdiction which he grants it; nor the Majesty of its Tribunal, it is call'd ², Urbs ornata multitudine Civium, abundans marinis, terrenisque deliciis: Ut dulcissimam vitam te ibidem invenisse dijudices, si nullis amaritudinibus miscearis: Prætoria tua Officia replent, militum turba custodit. Conscondis gemmatum Tribunal, sed tot testes pateris, quot te agmina circumdare cognoscis. Præterea littora, usque ad præfinitum locum data jussione custodis. Tuæ voluntati parent præregrina commercia. Præstas ementibus de pretio suo, & gratiæ tuæ proficis, quod avidus mercator acquirit. Sed inter hæc præclara fastigia, Optimum esse judicem decet, &c. Neither are the Expressions of this Prince less affectionate, in the Letter which he usually sent by the Person he had appointed to be Governor, recommending him to the City of Naples; for the Form of which we are indebted to Cassiodore ³; neither must it be forgotten, that Theodorick allow'd the Neapolitans the same Form of Government they had in the Time of the Romans, that is to say, a Court or Senate, as formerly, wherein the Affairs of that City, with respect to the Annonæ, the Repairing of the Streets, and other Matters concerning the Government of it, was taken Care of; he only took from the Decuriones, the Power of electing Magistrates, and gave it to the Governor, or Comes whom he sent thither. This City had likewise its Chancellor, whose Charge or Function is describ'd by Cassiodore in the eleventh and twelfth Books of his Works ⁴.

Of Puglia, and Calabria, and their Correctores.

AS Theodorick did not make any Alteration in Campania among the chief Magistrates, leaving the Consulares in it, as it had under the Romans; so he was pleas'd not to change them in the Provinces of Puglia and Calabria: Neither did he divide Puglia from Calabria, as to the Government, nor did these Provinces change their Names, as they did in after-times: They were govern'd by one Moderator, altho' he sent particular Comites, or Governors to each City, according to the commendable Custom of the Goths.

THE first Moderator of Puglia and Calabria, which we meet with in the first five Books of Cassiodore, was a certain Festus or Faustus, as others read; we see a Letter directed by Theodorick to him ⁵, by which he grants to the publick Dealers, an Exemption from Toll and Customs; and 'tis worthy of Observation, with what graceful and comely Titles he treats this Minister.

Theodorick took particular Care of this Province and its Fields, and made many wholesom Regulations concerning it, as may be observ'd in many Places of Cassiodore ⁶. Amongst the most conspicuous Cities of Puglia, Sipontum was once one, of which there's scarcely any Vestige to be seen at this Day: a City so ancient, so noble, and powerful, that the Sipontines, in after-times, were able to make War with the Neapolitans and the Greeks, of which we shall speak in its Place. This City was not exempted from the common Calamities, which Italy suffer'd from the Irruption of the Vandals, and the Tyranny of Odoacre; its Citizens, in the three last Years of the War, which Odoacre maintain'd with Theodorick, because they had submitted to this Prince, were cruelly treated by Odoacre, and their Fields destroy'd, insomuch that the Merchants being reduc'd to great Extremities, had recourse to the Clemency of Theodorick, desiring to be free of Tribute, and to have some Indulgence from their Creditors; it was compassionately granted by this Prince, that for two Years they should be exempted from Tribute, and not molested by their Creditors, as appears by another Letter directed to the foresaid Faustus

Moderator of this Province, or as others will have it to Atemidorus, which we see in Senator ¹.

Of Lucania and the Brutii, and their Correctores.

THE Provinces of Lucania and the Brutii are next, in the Government of which Theodorick likewise alter'd nothing. They kept their Correctores, neither were the Brutii divided from Lucania, but continued under one Moderator as formerly. Rbegium was their Seat; whence it is, that in Cassiodore ², the Citizens of this City are recommended to Anastafius, Chancellor of Lucania and the Brutii, and the Origin of the Name of Rbegium is describ'd; Rbegienses Cives, ultimi Brutiorum, quos a Sicilia Corpore violens quondam maris impetus segregavit, unde Civitas eorum nomen accepit; divisio enim prius Græca lingua vocitatur, &c.

IT ought not to be look'd upon as a small Honour to this Province in the Reign of Theodorick, that it had Cassiodore himself for Corrector, who was the chief Personage of this Age, on whom Theodorick profusely heap'd all sort of Honours, which with his Royal Hands he could dispense. In the Beginning of his Reign, the Affairs of Sicily, by reason of the new Government, being yet doubtful, Cassiodore was pitch'd upon for the Government of that Island; where having given sufficient Proofs of his excellent Talents, he was sent to Lucania and the Brutii to be Corrector of this Province; not long after, he was made Præfectus Prætorio; and lastly was advanc'd to the supreme Honour of Patriciate by Theodorick ³, which is clear from the Form which Cassiodore has inserted in his Book ⁴; from which without doubt may be gather'd, as Barrius, Fornerius, Romeus, and many other Authors have written ⁵, that Brutium, and properly Squillace, was the native Country of such a noble Genius; and we ought to give the due Praise to his Soil for having produc'd such a noble Plant, and it may be likewise concluded from the Words of Theodorick; Sed non eo præconiorum sine contenti, Brutiorum, & Lucaniæ tibi dedimus mores regendos: nè bonum, quod peregrina Provincia (meaning Sicily) meruisset, genitalis soli fortuna nesciret.

AFTER Cassiodore, under the same Prince, Venantius was Corrector of Lucania and the Brutii, to whom Theodorick wrote that Letter, in which he charges him with the Collection of the Tributes of this Province; thus we read it in Cassiodore ⁶, Venantio viro Senatori Correctori Lucaniæ, & Brutiorum, Theod. Rex. There's honourable mention made of this same Venantius by Theodorick in this his Edict ⁷ directed to Adeodatus, where we read; Viri Spectabilis Venantii Lucaniæ & Brutiorum Præfulis ⁸; and of the Corrector of this Province we likewise read, in Cassiodore, these Words, Corrector Lucaniæ, Brutiorumque. Lucania and Brutium had their Chancellor likewise, as may be seen in Cassiodore ⁹.

THE Masters of Ships of Lucania, as well as those of Campania, were, by Theodorick, likewise order'd to transport Provisions to France, as we read in Senator ¹⁰. Neither was this Province neglected by Athalarick his Nephew. He took special Care, that a Fair which was held in these Times, and to which a great Number of the People of the other Provinces went, and a great Festival, which was celebrated on St. Cyprian's Day, should not be disturb'd; which gave Occasion to Cassiodore ¹¹, as elsewhere ¹² he did the Fountain of Aretbusa in the Territory of Squillace, to describe the wonderful Fountain Marcilianus which was in Lucania, and in the Description of it, according to his wonted Stile, he makes use of all his bold Strokes and Hyperboles; and, which is more, puts them in the Mouth of a Prince who had no other Scope, but by severe Edicts to forbid the disturbing of such a Solemnity by perverse and wicked Men.

Of Samnium, and its Præfides.

IN the last Place is Samnium, a Province ; as by the Romans, so by Theodorick honour'd with no other but a Præfes. We read in Cassiodore ¹, that Theodorick, at the Desire of the Samnites, sent a certain Januarius, or as others read it ² Sunbivadus, to be Moderator or Judge of this Province ; enjoyning him, that if any Controversy should fall out in it betwixt the Romans and the Goths, or betwixt the Goths and the Romans, to decide it by the Roman Laws ; being unwilling to allow, that the Romans should live with the Goths under various and different Laws, whose Words we have quoted already upon another Occasion. This Province had likewise its Chancellor, as is clear from Cassiodore ³ ; and Theodorick makes mention of Samnium elsewhere ⁴ ; so that there is not a Province of those which now make the Kingdom of Naples, which Theodorick did not carefully provide for, giving them just and necessary Means for their good Government, which we see in the Records that are now remaining of this Prince ; for all which, among other Writers, we are indebted to Cassiodore.

The same Codes retain'd, and the same Conditions of Persons and Inheritances.

FROM whence we may clearly perceive, that our Provinces, when the Roman Empire of the West was extinct, altho' they came under the Dominion of the Goths, yet did not suffer those Changes which usually happen under the new Government of Foreign Nations. There were no new Laws introduced into them, but they retain'd the Roman ; and the Common Law of our Inhabitants was that of the Romans, which is now contain'd in the Gregorian and Hermogenian Codes, and above all in the Theodosian ; and in the Body of the Novellæ of this Emperor, Valentinian, Martian, Majoran, Severus, and Antemius, his Successors : And full Authority and Force was given to the Books of those Civilians whom Valentinian made Choice of.

T H E R E was no new Form of Government introduced, and the same Officers were continu'd ; neither was the Variation of Magistrates so great, but the most conspicuous and sublime Dignities were preserv'd : For it was the Notion of Theodorick, and afterwards of his Successor Atbalarick, to govern Italy, and these our Provinces with the same Spirit and Form by which the Empire was govern'd under the Emperors ; and it is the firm Opinion of our Writers, that the Affairs of Italy, under his Reign, were more quiet and peaceable than in the Reigns of the last Emperors of the West, and that he was the first who banish'd so many Mischiefs and Disorders.

W H E N C E it came to pass, that altho' these our Provinces passed from the Romans under the Dominion of the Goths, nevertheless the People did not become liable to the same Servitude that those of other Provinces of the Roman Empire, conquer'd by other Nations, underwent. Thus Gallia, when it was vanquish'd by the French, was treated as a conquer'd Country ; it being certain, that they made themselves Masters both of the People and Lands of it, that is to say, they made themselves perfect Lords, as well of the publick Dominion, as of the Property and private Inheritance¹ ; and, as to the Persons, they made the Natives of the Country Slaves, not by intire Slavery, but such as the Romans call'd Censiti, or Ascriptitii, or Colonies condemn'd to the Plough¹. The Goths did not treat Italy, Sicily, and these our Provinces after that manner, but left the Condition of the Persons untouch'd; for they were not govern'd by a Foreign Prince, but by a King who valued himself upon living after the Roman manner, and keeping the same Laws and Institutions which the Romans had: Altho' there were in many Villages of our Provinces some of those Ascriptitii and Censiti (as there were likewise Slaves, because in the Time of the Goths the Use of them had not been abolish'd²) or their Off-spring, in the same manner as they were under the Romans, of whom there are many Vestiges in the Theodosian and Justinian Codes, whom the succeeding Ages call'd Angari and *Paraganri*³; which is confirm'd by an Event, related by Hugo Falcandus, in Sicily, in the Time of William II. which was this; The Citizens of Caccamus having complain'd to the King against John Lavardin a Frenchman, who had oppress'd them by exacting the Half of their Income, according to the Custom of France, as he said; and these Complaints being reported to the Chancellor Stephen Partius, likewise a Frenchman, who gave no Redress; his Enemies incensed all the Sicilians against him, who cried out, That they were free, and were not to be treated after the Custom of France; Ut universi populi Siciliae redditus annuos, & exactiones, solvere cogereantur juxta Galliae consuetudinem, quæ Cives liberos non habet.

A N D as for the Inheritance, and the Lands of Gallia, the victorious French confiscated them all, the State assuming to itself both the one and the other Dominion of them⁴. And excepting those Lands which were reserv'd for the King's Demains, they distributed all the rest to the principal Chiefs and Captains of their own Nation; giving to one a Province, with the Title of a Dukedom; to another a Frontier Country, with the Title of Marquisate; to some a City with its adjoining Territories, with the Title of County; others got Castles and Villages with some Lands about them, with the Title of Barony, or Lordship of the Manor, according to every one's Merit, and the Number of Soldiers which they had under their Command; for they were given both to themselves and their Soldiers. The Goths did not so in Italy, and in these our Provinces; for they left the Lands to the Possessors, neither did they disturb any Persons in their private Estates and Heritages; and the Provinces and Cities were govern'd by the same Officers, as formerly they had been under the Empire of Valentinian, and the other Emperors of the West his Predecessors. Neither in Italy, nor in these our Provinces was the Custom of Feodal Tenures, Dukedoms, or Counties introduc'd, except in the Kingdom of the Longobards, of which we shall treat in the fourth Book of this History.

S E C T. VI.

Of the eminent Virtues of Theodorick, and his Death.

THEODORICK was truly endow'd with all those rare and noble Virtues that ever adorn'd a most excellent Prince. For his Piety and Worship of the true God, he was extoll'd, with immense Praise, by Ennodius the Catholick Bishop of Pavia: And altho' he was well instructed in the Christian Religion, yet his Doctors had confounded and stain'd it with the pestilent Heresy of Arius, wherewith he and all the Goths were infected. This Fault is not to be laid to the Charge of the Goths, but of the Romans themselves, and especially of the Emperor Valens, who sent Arian

Arian Doctors to instruct this Nation in the Christian Religion ; so that Salvianus ¹, that holy Bishop of Marseilles, call'd this Misfortune of theirs, not a Fault of the Goths, but of the Roman Magistracy ; and this holy Bishop testifies, That they reckon'd this Error of theirs but as a greater Honour done to God ; and for this their pious Belief and Motive, the Goths ought not to be reputed unworthy of the Catholick Faith ; and if we compare their Works with those of the Catholics, they will be found to exceed them very far in Goodness and Justice, in Veneration of Churches, in Faith, Hope, and Charity : Whence it is, that Socrates ², the Writer of the Ecclesiastical History, gives the Title of Martyrs to many Goths, who were kill'd by the Pagans for their Religion, as those, who with a single and devout Heart were dedicated to Christ their Redeemer. And if the Goths fell into this Error by the Fault of another, that Blot was wash'd away and recompens'd by the Merit of Riccardus, who purg'd all Spain from Arianism with their Blood.

AND it was a singular Piety of the Goths, and especially of Theodorick, his forbearing all Violence against his Subjects with respect to Religion ; and altho' they were tainted with the Arian Tenets, yet for all that, he did not hinder his People to profess the Faith of the great Council of Nice ³ ; for all the Time that Theodorick reign'd over Italy and these our Provinces, he not only allow'd his Subjects to profess the Catholick Religion, without any Molestation, but likewise permitted the Goths themselves, if they had a mind to quit Arianism and embrace the Faith of Nice, freely to do it.

THE Piety of this Prince will be the more resplendent, if we consider, that altho' he did not profess the Catholick Faith, yet he had so much Care and Concern for it, that he would not allow any to be chosen for the Government of the Church, but Bishops of known Probity and Learning, and such he lov'd and respected ; of which Athalarick his Nephew gives full Testimony, as we have it in Cassiodore ⁴ ; Oportebat enim arbitrio boni Principis obediri, qui sapienti deliberatione pertractans, quamvis in aliena Religione, talem visus est Pontificem elegisse, ut agnoscatis illum hoc optasse, præcipuè, quatenus bonis Sacerdotibus Ecclesiarum omnium Religio pullularet.

WHENCE it was, as Paul Warnefrid and Zonara relate ⁵, that this great Schism having arose in the Roman Church in his Time, it was soon extinguish'd by his calling a Council, and Things restor'd to a firm and quiet Peace. We read likewise most severe Edicts of this Prince, and also of Athalarick his Nephew, by which all those Ordinations of Bishops were severely prohibited, which, out of Ambition or by the Power of Money, were made, annulling them altogether, and reckoning them of no Force or Effect ⁶ ; of which we shall discourse more at large when we come to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity of this Century. And besides we read of Theodorick, that altho' he profess'd another Religion, he would have the Catholick Bishops offer up Prayers for him to God, which he often thought availed him : For which Cause it ought not to seem strange, as Grotius says, that Silverius, a Roman Catholick Bishop, had been suspected by the Greeks, as if he had been more willing and desirous of the Dominion of the Goths in Italy, than of the Greeks themselves.

AND 'tis to the Piety of this Prince we are indebted, that these our Provinces, which now make up the Kingdom of Naples, altho' they were under the Dominion of the Arian Goths little less than Seventy Years, yet were never molested with that pestilent Heresy, but retain'd the Catholick Faith as pure and untainted as their Fore-fathers had embraced it, and that afterwards they were able to stand their Ground against the frequent Incurfions of the Saracens, who in the following Time invaded them, and made War with them : Forasmuch as Theodorick was pleas'd not only to leave it as he had found it, but to favour it, and to be its Keeper and Defender ; by whose Example Athalarick, and the other Goths his Successors were moved to act so, that during their Dominion it was neither molested, nor in the least polluted.

WE have no occasion to enlarge on the Justice, Humanity, Faith, and all the other most valuable and noble Virtues of this Prince, seeing Cassiodore in his Books has given us such a lively Idea of so polite, just, and clement a Reign, that Grotius upon good Grounds says ¹: Planèque si quis cultissimi, clementissimique Imperii formam conspiciere voluerit, ei ego legendus censeam Regum Ostrogothorum Epistolas, quas Cassiodorus collectas edidit; so that the Goths with good Reason could boast of this Praise to Belisarius ²: Neither was it without Reason, that Theodorick himself said; Æquitati fave: eminentiam animi virtute defende, ut inter Nationum consuetudinem perversam, Gothorum possis demonstrare justitiam: And elsewhere; Imitami certe Gothos nostros, qui foris prælia, intus norunt exercere justitiam. And the Study and Care of this Prince was so great in governing his Subjects with exact and perfect Justice, that he said to them, He would demean himself so towards them, that they should be sorry they were not sooner under the Empire of the Goths. Procopius, tho' a Greek, could not forbear extolling these his Royal and Super-excellent Virtues: He was the Preserver of the Laws; just in appointing the Prices of the Annæ; exact in settling the Weights and Measures; and in imposing of Tributes his Equity was wonderful, and often on just Occasions was ready to remit them: If his Soldiers on a March at any time wrong'd the Country People, Theodorick used to send Money to the Bishops to reimburse them of their Damages: If there was occasion for Materials for Building of Ships, or Fortifying his Camps, he immediately paid the Value of them: He was most liberal to the Poor; and the greatest Part of his Royal Employment was in relieving and taking Care of the Orphans and Widows, of which Cassiodore hath given us clear Evidence.

THE Moderation of this Prince, from the above-related Facts, is sufficiently evident; and it being in his Power to subject the Vanquish'd to the Laws of the Conqueror, yet he allow'd them to enjoy the Laws under which they were born and brought up. He allow'd, that under his Reign Rome should be govern'd by the same Roman Senate: That the Romans should be judg'd by Romans; the Goths and Romans, by Goth and Roman: That they should retain that Religion which they had suck'd in with their Milk ³, he was most averse from introducing Novelties, they being always pernicious to the Commonwealth, and the Occasion of great Disorders.

HIS Temperance was call'd by Ennodius a Sacerdotal Modesty; and, according to the Custom of his Nation, he was most sparing of his Food, and much more sober in his Cloathing. In his Reign, the Goths were most continent and chaste, neither were there Snares laid for Womens Virtue; Quæ Romani polluerant fornicatione, says Salvianus ⁴, mundant Barbari castitate: And elsewhere; Impudicitiam nos diligimus, Gotbi execrantur, puritatem nos fugimus, illi amant. They liv'd on very simple Food, such as Bread, Milk, Cheese, Butter, Flesh, and frequently raw, only a little macerated with Salt. For Brevity's sake, I pass over his Royal Virtues. To this Day in Rome and Ravenna, the Monuments of his Magnificence in Buildings, Aqueducts, and other splendid Works are admir'd. His Valour, Fortitude, great Spirit, and Genius, always ready for noble and hard Enterprizes, are sufficiently known by the Course of his gallant Atchievements from his Childhood upwards. A Prince most expert both in War and Peace; for in the one he was always Victorious, and in the other doing Good to the Cities and his People: and his Power arriv'd to that Pitch, that he could keep within their Bounds, without the Tumult of War, but only with his own Authority, all the barbarous Kings who had any Footing in the Empire; and for restoring Italy to its ancient Peace and Tranquillity, he built many Cities and Fortresses along the Point of the Adriatick Sea and the Alps, as Barriers against the Incursions of new Barbarians: So that 'tis the constant Opinion of all Writers, that by his Power and Goodness, he not only freed Rome and Italy, but all the other Parts of the Western Empire, from the continual Skirmishes which for so many Years, by so many Inundations of Barbarians they had endur'd, and reduc'd them to good Order and a happy State.

⁴ Salvian. loc. cit.

I KNOW there are some who believe, that all these Virtues of Theodorick were sullied by his Treachery towards Odoacre, and at last putting him to Death; and in the latter End of his Days, by some Cruelties occasion'd by suspected Persons in his Kingdom, and for having put to Death Symmachus and Boetius his Son-in-law, who were Senators and rais'd to the Consulship: Men of most noble Blood, most accomplish'd in the Study of Philosophy, most Religious, and for Piety and Learning most remarkable.

BUT if these Facts were attentively consider'd, Reasons of State will excuse the first; and as for his Cruelty to Symmachus and Boetius, we ought to blame Theodorick for the self same thing, for which his own Domesticks blamed him; Id illi injuriæ, as Procopius says, in subditos primum, ac postremum fuit, quod non adhibita, ut solebat, inquisitione de viris tantis Statuerat. Theodorick only failed in this, that Symmachus and Boetius out of Envy, having been charg'd with plotting against his Life and Kingdom, without making great Inquiry in so serious a Matter, which requir'd the utmost Circumspection, he condemn'd them to Death; as for the rest, as Grotius well observes ¹, Actum ibi, non de Religione, quæ Boethio satis Platonica fuit, sed de Imperii Statu. Certainly Theodorick was not induced by slight Motives, but for Reasons of State, not Religion, as some believe. We have seen very well, what the Sentiments of this Prince were, concerning Liberty of Conscience as to Religious Matters, and sticking to what Religion each one best pleas'd. It could not be Boetius his Case, whose Religion was more Platonick than Christian: And if we may believe Procopius, Theodorick, a little before he died, was heartily sorry for his Fault with the most intense Grief of Mind; for whilst he was at Supper one Night, a Fish with a prodigious big Head being put on the Table, the Image of Symmachus came so lively in his Mind, that he fancy'd the Head of the Fish was that of Symmachus, and that with a cruel and horrible Countenance, it threaten'd to be reveng'd of him for his Death; so that being frighted by such an ominous Sight, there run a Coldness through his Veins which oblig'd him to lie down, and to be cover'd with Heaps of Bed-cloaths; and having told Elpidius his Physician what had happen'd to him; In Symmachum, ac Boethium quod peccaverat, deflevit: pœnitentiæque, ac doloris magnitudine, non multo post obiit, as Procopius relates.

Jornandes says nothing of this strange Adventure, but makes him die of old Age, by telling, that Theodorick postquam ad senium pervenisset, & se in brevi ab hac luce egressurum cognosceret, caus'd the Goths to be conven'd before him, with the principal Lords of the Kingdom, and in their Presence appointed Athalarick, Son of Amalasuntha his own Daughter, his Successor, his Father Eutarick being dead, who was likewise of the illustrious Race of the Amali; and being but ten Years old, he was educated under the Care of his Mother. He did not neglect to recommend to them the Fidelity which they ow'd to the King his Nephew: He recommended to them likewise Love and Respect to the Senate and People of Rome; and above all he charg'd them to cultivate the Friendship and Favour of the Emperor of the East, with whom they were to maintain a firm and settled Peace and Confederacy: Which Advice Amalasuntha having religiously observ'd, the Affairs of the Goths went on prosperously enough, while her Son Athalarick liv'd; for, during the Space of eight Years that they reign'd, they maintain'd the Kingdom in a firm and settled Peace. Such was the Death of this illustrious Prince, which fell out in the Year 526, after having reign'd little less than Thirty-eight Years, and restor'd to Italy and these our Provinces, their ancient Peace and Tranquillity.

Of ATHALARICK, King of ITALY.

DURING the Minority of Athalarick, Amalasuntha his Mother took upon her the Government of the Kingdom: A Princess adorn'd with many Virtues, who was equal in Wisdom to the wisest Kings of the Earth: She govern'd the Kingdom, and the Nonage of her Son with so much Prudence, that it seem'd little inferior to that of Theodorick her Father. He was no sooner dead, than being mindful of his Advice, she caus'd Athalarick to write to the Emperor Justinus I. (who having succeeded to Anastasius, govern'd at that Time in the East) affectionate and respectful Letters, for preserving Concord, which Theodorick had enjoin'd to be done. She caus'd other Letters to be written to the Senate and People of Rome, most affectionate and full of Esteem, which we yet read in *Cassiodore*¹.

SHE kept up the same Form, and Institution of Government which Theodorick had done; neither did she allow any Thing to be alter'd during the Reign of her Son; retaining the same Laws², the same Magistrates, the same Disposition of the Provinces, and the same Administration. All her Study was to have the young Prince brought up after the Manner of the Romans, and instructed in good Literature and Virtue; for which purpose he had many Masters for teaching him. But the Goths, and the great Men of the Court, having soon forgotten the Counsels of Theodorick, took it ill, that Amalasuntha should cause the Prince to be brought up after that manner, crying out, That they would have a King that should be bred amongst Arms as his Predecessors had been. At last she was oblig'd to leave him to their Management, which was so fatal to this poor Prince; that falling into all sorts of Lewdness, he languish'd in such a manner, that it soon brought him to his Grave; for having scarcely reign'd eight Years, he ended his Days in the Year 534, which was the Beginning of the Misfortunes and Ruin of the Goths in Italy, and of the Confusions and so many Revolutions which afterwards fell out: In the mean time, Justinus had rais'd his Nephew Justinianus to the Empire of the East, who, for his so many famous Atchievements shall be the Subject of the following Chapter.

Of the Emperor JUSTINIAN, and his LAWS.

WHILE Amalasuntha, by her Prudence, was maintaining the same Peace and Tranquillity in Italy, in which Theodorick had left it; and the Reign of Athalarick, as being uniform with that of his Grandfather, prov'd most gracious to the People, at the Request of the Constantinopolitans, Justin made his Nephew Justinian his Collegue and Emperor, on the first Day of April in the Year of our Salvation 527.

And Justin dying four Months after, he begun to rule the Empire of the East alone¹. This was that Justinian, who for his notable Atchievements, acquir'd the Surname of Great; under whom the Empire recover'd Vigour and Strength, not only in Time of Peace, but of War, by reason of the famous Civilians who flourish'd in his Days; and by the Valour of Belisarius and Narses, his illustrious Captains. His first great Enterprizes were those which he undertook in Time of Peace. In the first Year of his Reign he employ'd himself in giving a more noble Form to the Roman Jurisprudence; and envying no less the Glory of Theodosius the Younger, than of Valentinian III. which they had acquir'd, the one by composing the famous Theodosian Code, and the other by the Care he took of the Books of the Civilians; he would not only imitate them, but excel them in such manner, that being compar'd together, his should eclipse and smother their Fame; and that neither in the East, nor in the West, their notable Deeds should be any more remember'd.

S E C T. I.

Of the first JUSTINIAN Code.

IN the first Year of his Empire, in the Month of February in the Year 528. he put forth an Edict, directed to the Senate of Constantinople, for the Compiling of a new Code. He chose for this Work the most famous Men in his Time of three Orders, of Magistrates, Professors, and Advocates: Of the Order of Magistrates, Joannes, Leontius, Phocas, Basilides, Tomasus, Tribonianus, and Constantine: Of Professors Theophilus was chosen; and of the Lawyers Dioscorius and Presentinus, and over them all Tribonianus was put as their Head.

THE Form which he prescrib'd to them, was to collect from the three Codes, the Gregorian, Hermogenian, and Theodosian, the Constitutions of the Princes contain'd in them; and besides these, to add the others, which Theodosius the Younger, and the other Emperors his Successors, down to himself, had from time to time publish'd, and likewise those which he himself had put forth; all which they were to join together in one Volume. He moreover prescrib'd to them the Order and Method, that is to say, to retrench what they found Useless and Superfluous in them, to leave out the Prefaces, to expunge altogether those that clash'd with one another, to curtail, change, and correct them, and to render their Meaning more clear; and to place them according to the Order of the Time, and the Matter of which they treated. They were not to neglect to put to each Constitution the Names of the Emperors who publish'd them, the Place, the Time, and the Persons to whom they were directed: All this was in Emulation of Theodosius, as is manifest from the Edict of Justinian, which we read under the Tit. de novo Cod. faciendo.

THESE famous Civilians employ'd their Labours little more than a Year in the Compiling of this new Code; so that in the Beginning of the third Year of his Reign, and properly in April in the Year following 529. it was compleated, and publish'd: And by another Edict under the Tit. de Justiniano Cod. confirmando, he ordain'd that this Code should solely have Authority in the Courts of Justice; that the Judges should make use of it, and the Advocates, in their Pleadings at the Bar, should quote no other Laws but what were contain'd in it: He entirely prohibited the first three Codes, which he stripp'd of all Authority, and they were never any more to be quoted in the Courts; so that the Theodosian Code was eclips'd in the East. However it was not so in the West, and particularly in Italy, where, during the Dominion of the Gotbs, that of Justinian was not receiv'd; therefore the Theodosian Code had better Success in the West, than in the East, by the Means of Justinian.

THE Constitutions which were collected together into this new Code, and divided into twelve Books, being taken out of the three first Codes, began from Adrian down to Justinian, and contain'd the Laws of 54 Emperors. Whence it is, that some Constitutions quoted by the Civilians in the Pandects, are to be found in this new Code, that are not in the Theodosian, which begun from Constantine the Great, but are to be found in the Gregorian and Hermogenian Codes, from which this last was taken.

S E C T. II.

Of the Pandects and Institutions.

JUSTINIAN in order to excel Theodosius in Fame, was not contented with the Code alone; but took in hand a more noble Undertaking: that is to say, of collecting and joining together the Memorials of all the ancient Jurisprudence, and of disposing them in order; and as he had done with the Constitution of the Princes which reign'd from Adrian down to himself, so he intended to do with the Responsa of the ancient Civilians; the Notes which they had made on the Roman Laws, and especially on the Edictum perpetuum; their Treatises; their methodical Books; and, in a Word, with all their Commentaries; the Works of which were so ample and numerous, that they were reckon'd to be 2000 Volumes. Justinian in the fourth Year of his Reign, put forth another Edict¹, directed to Tribonianus, wherein he gave Orders to him, and sixteen others his Collegues, to set about such a hard and difficult Task. The greatest Wits of the Age were chosen, which truly such a crabbed Work requir'd. Besides Tribonianus, Theophilus, and Cratinus, famous Professors of the Law in the Academy of Constantinople, were elected; Dorotheus, and Anatolius, likewise Professors in the Academy of Berytis: Of the Order of Magistrates Constantine; and of the Order of Advocates, eleven were chosen, to wit, Stephanus, Menna, Prosdocius, Eutolmius, Timotheus, Leonides, Leontius, Plato, Jacobus, Constantius, and *Joannes*².

WHILE they were all intent upon this great Work, which in the Space of three Years they finish'd, Justinian was pleas'd to order Tribonianus, Theophilus, and Dorotheus, to compile for the Benefit of the Youth, the Institutions or Elements, and Principles of the Law, because the Youth, setting out at first in this plain and simple Path, might afterwards advance to the Study of the Pandects, that were already preparing : Which was soon perform'd by these three excellent Civilians; after the Example of the Ancients, to wit, Cajus, Ulpianus, and Florentinus; and altho' the Composition of the Digests had been first order'd : Nevertheless the Institutions were publish'd a Month before the Pandects, for the foresaid Purpose, to wit, in November 533. in the seventh Year of his Empire. They divided these Elements into four Books, Ninety-nine Titles, and if we should also number the Principles of them, into Eight hundred and sixteen Paragraphs. A Work, in the Opinion of the incomparable Cujacius, most perfect and most elegant, which ought not to be loaded with so large Commentaries, as is practis'd in our Days; but it should be always at hand, and with the help of small Notes, in the simplest manner explain'd to the Youth, which was the Opinion of those who compos'd it, and of Justinian who order'd it.

THESE Elements being publish'd, the great Work of the Pandects was quickly finish'd, which a Month after, in the Month of December in the same Year 533. were publish'd over all the East and Illyricum. They no sooner appear'd than they got two Names, the one Latin Digesta, the other Greek Pandectæ, both of them taken from the ancient Civilians: They were call'd Digesta, because in the Books which they contain, the Opinions of the ancient Civilians were plac'd in a certain Order, and dispos'd of, as much as was possible, under each Title, according to the Method and Series of the perpetual Edict: They were likewise call'd Pandectæ, as comprehending all the ancient Jurisprudence¹.

WHENCE, from what Civilians, and what Books of theirs the Digesta were compos'd, is a Thing easily to be gathered from the Catalogue of the ancient Civilians, and from their Works, which we see at this Time prefix'd to the Florentine Pandects. There we see 37 Authors, most famous Civilians, often commended by us; for in the first Book, we made mention of the Civilians, who liv'd from the Reign of Augustus to that of Constantine the Great: Besides these, there's honourable mention made of many others, who deserve to be named and praised for their Works; and they ought to be explain'd and illustrated with just Commentaries, and lasting Notes. In which we ought not to rob Jacobus Labittus of his deserv'd Praise, who with great Care and Accuracy compos'd an Index of the Laws, which are in the Pandects; in each of which, besides designing the Author, he goes on distinctly to mark, from what Book, or Treatise of these ancient Civilians, it had been taken, picking out the Laws which are scatter'd here and there through the whole Body of the Digests, and then placing each of them under that Treatise, or Book of the Civilian from which it had been taken. A Labour as ingenious as useful for the right Understanding of the true Sense of them; it being a wonderful Thing to see, how the one is cleared up by the other, when they are dispos'd under the Books from which they were taken; which Light could never have been expected if they were read so dispers'd. And this Author fully demonstrates by many Examples, how much the use of this Index conduces to the true Interpretation of the Laws; and how much he was commended by Cujacius his Master, who encourag'd him to prosecute this excellent Work, and cause it to be printed: Cujacius confirm'd by his own Example, what had been demonstrated by Labittus, by putting in Practice, and bringing to bear, what he had taught; whence we see that this incomparable Civilian, in Commenting upon the Laws of the Pandects, takes another Method, and goes not the same way to work, as had been practis'd by the other Commentators; that is to say, by separating the Laws, those which were Africanus's, and taken from his Books, he puts together, and disposes them under proper Titles; then in this order comments on them, as he did likewise on Papinianus, Paulus, Scevola, and some other Civilians; the admirable Use of which, and of what great Advantage it is, Antonius Augustinus very well knew, who compil'd such another Index, and likewise all those who understand our Jurisprudence fully know the Benefit of it.

IN the mean time Tribonianus and his Collegues, were pleas'd to divide this great Work of the Digests into seven principal Parts, to distinguish it into fifty Books, and to distribute it into 430 Titles. If we will look on the Florentine Pandects, which are preserv'd with great Care in Florence, in the Library of the Medici, we shall see them divided into two large Volumes: Altho' *Crispin*² reports, that anciently all the 50 Books made but one Volume; but those which are now in the Hands of every Body, have been variously divided according to the different Editions. Of the many which we observe at this Time, and particularly those of our latest Times, which are infinite, there are three that are most esteem'd, and receiv'd into the Academies and Tribunals of Europe. The first Edition, that is to say, the Vulgar and less correct, is that which Accursius and the other ancient Glossators made use of. The second is call'd the Norican, or the Nuremberg, and is that which Gregorius Aloandrus caus'd to be printed in the Year 1531. The Third is call'd the Florentine or Pisan, which we owe to Franciscus Taurellus, who in the Year 1553. caused it to be printed from the Library of the Medici.

THE common Division of this Work into three Volumes, is much more ancient than some believe; since from the Time of Pilcus, Bulgarus, and Azo, it was divided in such manner for the greater Conveniency¹, it being so bulky, when comprehended in one Volume, it could not be read or manag'd but with great Difficulty. How afterwards the Name was given to each Volume, to the first the ancient Digest, the second Infortiatum, and to the third the New, they all three coming forth at the same Time, is very hard to account for. For the First's being call'd the Old, and the Last the New, it would not seem strange; but that the Middlemost should, by a foreign Vocabule, be call'd Infortiatum, is what hath employ'd the Pens of many Writers, who have stoop'd too low by meddling with such a poor Subject.

SOME have believ'd that it was call'd Infortiatum, from the Greek Word φορτίον, which in Latin signifies Onus, because this Volume contains the most obligatory Laws, such as the Restitution of Portions, of Guardianships, Heritages, Aliments, the performing of Deeds of Trust, and others². The Conjecture of *Bernardus Walterus*³ is more tolerable, who says, it's call'd so corruptly, by the Fault of the Writers, who, instead of Infarcitum, as being plac'd in the Middle betwixt the Old and New, have call'd it Infortiatum. But above all the rest, that of Alciatus seems to be the best, who reckon'd it a barbarous and insipid Word⁴; or the other which lastly was communicated to *John Doviatus*⁵ by Claud Chappellaine, Doctor of the Sorbonne, and King's Professor of the Hebrew Language in Paris: He supposes it to be deriv'd from the Chaldean Fortbiata, which Word is taken by the Rabbins to signify Testament; or a Man's last Will; whence it may have happen'd, that some Body either jestingly, or for Novelty's sake, who instead of Testament, had call'd it Infortiatum, and from thence transferr'd the Word to this Volume of Digests, wherein Testaments are treated of, gave it that Name: But, be that as it will, for surely the Riches of Greece are not hidden under it, let us return to our Subject: 'Tis most certain, that the Digests of Justinian, tho' publish'd and dispers'd over all the East, and committed to the Prefects of the East, of Illyricum and Lybia, in order to make them known to all the People subject to their Jurisdictions, as is clear from the Preface which Justinian prefix'd to the Digests, and from other Laws⁶; yet they could not at that Time penetrate into Italy, and these our Provinces, as being under a foreign Prince, and subject as yet to the Dominion of the Goths; so that they could not be planted in our Soil, and acquire that Authority and that Force, which afterwards in the Course of many Ages they happily obtain'd, and grew into so great Esteem and Reputation, as we see them in at this Day.

Of Justinian's Second Code de Repetita Prælectione.

THIS truly Royal Work being finish'd, this excellent Prince for all that did not stop there; he having been told, that in the Compiling of the Digests it was observ'd, that many Controversies remain'd yet undecided, and that it was necessary they should be determin'd by his Imperial Authority; and moreover he having in the mean Time, after the first Code was publish'd, proclaim'd his other Constitutions, which were scatter'd up and down, and not confin'd to any Volume; and it having been likewise observ'd, that many Things were wanting in the Code already made, he order'd that in the following Year, which was the eighth of his Reign, and properly the Year 534. this Code should be mended and revised, and another made out of it, more compleat and perfect¹. In the mean Time he thought on five of those, who had been employ'd in the making of the Digests, to wit, Tribonianus, Dorotheus, and three other Advocates, Menna, Constantius, and Joannes: These according to the Order prescrib'd to them by Justinian, which we read in his Code², took away from the first these Constitutions, which they thought useleſs and superfluous, and also those which had been corrected or annull'd by later Constitutions.
the

T H E R E was the Space of five Years betwixt the first Code and the Second, and in that Time many Constitutions had been establish'd by Justinian. In the Consulship of Decius, after the Publication of the first Code, some were publish'd by Justinian, amongst which that was famous enough which we read under the *Tit. de bon. quæ lib.*³, wherein it was generally establish'd, that what the Son acquir'd, and not ex paterna substantia, was his own Property, and the Father had only the Use of it, contrary to what was appointed by the ancient and middle Jurisprudence. Afterwards in the Consulship of Lampadius and Orestes, almost all the fifty Decisions which it pleas'd Justinian to establish, for removing all the Controversies and Doubts of the ancient Civilians, were publish'd⁴; many of which we have under the Tit. de usufr. as the l. 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16; since the 17th, altho' it be one of the 50 Decisions, was made in the following Year, after the Consulship of Lampadius. In this Consulship, not only almost all these Decisions were publish'd, but also some other Constitutions were made, such as the l. 7. which we read under the Tit. de bon. quæ lib. whereby it was ordain'd, that the Father should not have the Use of Goods given to the Son by the Prince, or the Emperors; and that excellent one, to wit, L. un. C. de rei ux. act. It was in this Year 530. which was the fourth of the Empire of Justinian, that this other Constitution was publish'd, which we read under the Tit. de vet. Jur. enucl.; where, as is said, Justinian commanded Tribonianus, and the sixteen other Civilians, to compose the Digests.

I N the following Year, after the Consulship of Lampadius, and the fifth of the Empire of Justinian, many were proclaim'd, such as the L. 2. de Constit. pecun. whereby the Actio receptitia was repeal'd; the L. 2. C. Com. de Legat. whereby the Difference betwixt Legatees, and particular Trustees was taken away; the L. 2. C. de indic. viduit. by which the Law Julia Miscella was abolish'd; the L. 3. C. de Edict. D. Hadrian. toll. by which the Edict of Adrian, for the twentieth Part of the Heritage was struck out and cancell'd; and the L. 4. C. de liber. præd. by which the Difference of Sex in Disinheriting was abolish'd. In this same Year were likewise put forth these noble Constitutions, to wit, L. si quis argentum 35 C. de donat. the L. ult. C. de Jur. delib. the L. ult. C. qui pot. in pign. and some others.

I N the second Year after the Consulship of Lampadius and Orestes, was publish'd the L. 2. Cod. de vet. Jur. enucl. and in the following 533. the seventh of his Empire, were publish'd the Institutions, as is said, and the Pandects a Month after. These two Years are remarkable because there were no Consuls.

W H E R E U P O N the Compilers of this new Code added all these Constitutions, which, according to *Balduinus*⁵ and *Ritterfusus*⁶, exceeded 200 in Number, and were publish'd after the first Code, in the Space of five Years, which likewise may be seen in Aloandrus in the Catalogue of Consuls join'd to his Code, on which *Franciscus Raguellius*⁷ made particular Commentaries; as did also Edmundus Merilius, upon the 50 Decisions⁸. By which the System of divers Matters relating to our Jurisprudence was alter'd, and particularly the Doctrine of Peculium, Legatees, and many others were varied: Whence it follows, as *Balduinus*⁹ and *Ritterfusus*¹⁰ have likewise observ'd, that 'tis a great Mistake to believe, that only the 50 Decisions were added to this new Code; and that excepting these Decisions, the Pandects differ'd in nothing else from this Code de Repetita Prælectione.

THESE Constitutions then of the Princes being put into this better Form, in this new Code, in which also were inserted some Constitutions of the Successors of Theodosius, Valentinian, Martin, Leo, Antemius, Zeno, Anastasius, and Justin, Justinian ordered, that the first Code should be no more of any Authority or Force; but that this Second, which, after the Example of the Ancients, he call'd de Repetita Prælectione, should solely be of Force and Vigour in the Tribunal and Judgments; neither from any others but from it, could the Constitutions be quoted in the Courts of Justice, annulling all the others which were scatter'd up and down: Whence it is, that some very pertinently have observ'd, that those Constitutions of Zeno, or other Emperors, which we don't find inserted in this Code, were of no Force, and which we only owe to the Care and Learning of some Writer, who had dug them out of the Darkness in which they had been buried, and restored them to the Light of the World; for many of which we are indebted to Contius, Jacobus, Cujacius, Dionysius, and Jacobus Gotifredus, and other learned Men; the Use of which will be, not to use them, as the Constitutions of Princes, which have lawful Authority, but only to draw from them some Light for the better Understanding those that were received, and those which by ancient Custom have acquired with us the Force of Laws in our Courts of Justice; altho' the Constitution of Zeno which he made concerning Buildings, and the Prospect of the Sea, is defended by many as lawful and of Authority, that is to say, because we see it confirmed by Justinian in his Novellæ; and in the Code is declared not to be local in Constantinople only, but to comprehend all the other Provinces of the Empire¹.

JUSTINIAN was so strict in not admitting any other Constitutions, but those which were gathered together, and united in this Code, that he would have all the others, which upon any emergent Occasion, should come forth for the future, to be collected into a distinct Volume, to which he gave the Name not of Code, but of Novellæ Constitutiones, and that they should form another Body distinct from his Code: Whence, altho' the Name of Codex, generally speaking, may be given to every Book, A caudicibus arborum deducto Vocabulo; nevertheless our Civilians call'd only that Book a Code by Antonomasia, wherein the Constitutions of the Princes were collected after a certain Order, because, as *Gotifredus*² observes from Cujacius, the Constitutions and Rescripts of the Princes used to be written in Codices and Pugillares, which were Tables of Wood, and also of Copper and Ebony, which were kept in the Cabinet, or Chancery of the Prince for Preservation; whence we read, that Theodosius the Younger, when he caused his Code to be compiled, sent to ask of Valentinian III. the Constitutions made by him for the West, which were kept in his Cabinets, in order to join them to his own, and those of his Predecessors for composing this Code. On the contrary, the Responsa of the Learned, from which the Digests were compiled, used to be written on Parchment, and not on Wood or Copper.

THE first Code then being abolish'd, and the Memory of it altogether extinguish'd, all Authority was given to the Second, which is that we now have, and which all the Tribunals, and Academies of Europe make use of, as every body sees it, divided into twelve Books, and distinguish'd into 776 Titles. Its Constitutions were all dictated in the Latin Tongue, and contain the Constitutions of 54 Emperors, beginning at Adrian down to Justinian, as is manifest from the Catalogues which Aloandrus and Dionysius prefixed to their Codes. We are indebted to the Industry and Care of Jacobus Labittus, and Antonius Augustinus, for the Index of the Laws publish'd by each Emperor, which is no less useful to those who study our Jurisprudence, than that which they composed of the Responsa of the Civilians in the Pandects.

SOME have blam'd Justinian, who was so Catholick a Prince, for having caus'd to be inserted in this Code, many Constitutions not becoming his Piety and Religion. Our Matthew de Afflictis, by falling into this Error, wrote, that he had caus'd to be inserted many impious Laws in the three last Books; but he was handsomely rebuk'd for it by Valenzuola. Others said, that Justinian did ill in putting the Laws of Valens against the Solitarii into his Code, and Amaja durst not defend him: But 'tis clearly seen that that Law was not made against the true Solitarii, but against those, who under pretence of Religion affected to be such, by joining with them in order to shun the Charges of the Court. Some others blame him, because he made many Laws concerning Usury and Divorces, and yet allowed of them; but *Godelinus*¹, *Leotardus*², and others vindicate him. Others because he inserted many Laws concerning the outward Ecclesiastical Polity; but they are to be excused, because they did not advert to the Circumstances of the Times in which they were publish'd, but according to the Maxims of the Ages in which they wrote, thought it did not suit with the Authority of the Prince to establish them; which will be better seen, when we come to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity of that Century.

Of the NOVELLÆ of JUSTINIAN.

ALTHO' Justinian had made sufficient Provision for the Study of the Jurisprudence, by these three commendable Works, to wit, the Institutions, the Digests, and the Code; nevertheless, as in the Course of Years, according to the various Affairs and new Emergencies, it was necessary to provide a-new, and put forth new Constitutions: These not long after grew to that Bulk, that it behoved him to join them together in another Volume, which was call'd the Novellæ Constitutiones. These were put forth from time to time by Justinian, not in the Latin Language, as the others contain'd in the Code, but almost all in the Greek¹, excepting the Nov. 9, 11, 23, 62, 143, 150, which were written in Latin²; in which truly there are many Things amiss as to the Elegancy, Brevity, Gravity, and Doctrine; and forasmuch as the Constitutions of the Princes, from Constantine the Great down to him, yield to the Constitutions of the more ancient Emperors, from Adrian to Constantine, so much these Novellæ of Justinian come short of the Brevity and Elegancy of the latter; so that 'tis always going retrograde, from worse to worse, the Reading of which gives much Disgust, they being Loquacious, Bombast, void of the Brevity, Gravity, and Elegancy of the first: But what is of the greatest Import, is to observe in them a certain Inconstancy and Fickleness that's inexcusable, changing and varying that which a little before was establish'd, and what just now pleas'd, soon after is chang'd and cancell'd; which has induced many to believe, that so much Inconstancy proceeded from the Womanish Levity of Theodora the Wife of Justinian, who was often meddling with such Matters; and the Avarice of Tribonianus, who for Money often chang'd and varied the Laws at his Pleasure³.

OF these Novellæ only Ninety-six were known by our ancient Glossators, altho' Julian, Professor of Law in the Academy of Constantinople a little after Justinian, compendiz'd and translated them from the Greek into the Latin Tongue, to the Number of One Hundred and Twenty-five. In later Times, Aloandrus found some others, and increas'd their Number to One Hundred and Sixty-five: Jacobus Cujacius added other three, so that their Number at present amounts to One Hundred and Sixty-eight⁴.

BUT we must observe, that in joining these Novellæ together, the Order of Time has not been exactly observ'd; for we perceive a great many of these which were publish'd towards the End of the Empire of Justinian, put before those which were publish'd sooner, and on the contrary, those which were first publish'd placed last. Thus in the Ninth Year of the Empire of Justinian, in the Consulship of Belisarius, when they began to be establish'd, the following Novellæ were publish'd ; 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18 ; and also in the same Year, the 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 32, 42, 51, 102, 103, 107, 110, 116, 118, and 157. In the following Year, after the Consulship of Belisarius, the 19, 20, 21, 22, 31, 38, 39, 40, 43, 45, 122 : And the next Year, the Eleventh of his Empire, were made the Novellæ 41, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 58, 59, 60, 61, and many others.

IN the Consulship of Joannes, and Twelfth Year of the Empire of Justinian, were publish'd the Novellæ 63, 64, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 76 ; as in the Year after 78, 79, 80, 81, 83, 97, 99, 101, 133, 162 ; and in the following, in the Consulship of Justinus, the 98th.

IN the Consulship of Basilus, and the Fifteenth Year of the Empire of Justinian, were proclaim'd the Novellæ 108, 109, 111, 113, 115, 117, 119, 120, 121, 123, 124, 125, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 134, 135, 136, 137, 145, 146, 147, 153. In the following Years nothing was publish'd by Justinian ; but in the Thirty-second Year, the last of his Empire, was put forth the Novella 141, whence it ought to be reputed the last of all, as being made in the Year 558.

THESE Novellæ, together with thirteen Edicts publish'd from Time to Time by Justinian, were collect'd and joyn'd together in one Volume, not by Justinian's Order¹, but after his Death, by private Industry and Care, as Cujacius and Antonius Augustinus shew us, without observing any other Order than as above set down. All the Business then of the Interpreters was to divide them into nine Collationes, which after the Manner of Books, each contains many Titles ; and was call'd afterwards, in the Days of Bulgarus, Authenticum, either because these Constitutions, as being publish'd after the Laws of the Code, were of more Authority and Weight ; or, which is more probable, like to the Latin Epitome made by Julian, this Work, as containing the intire Novellæ, as they were publish'd by Justinian, ought to be reputed the Original and Authentick².

WE have three Latin Versions of these Novellæ : The first ancient, of which Bulgarus is said to be the Author ; but *Cujacius*³ and others don't allow of it ; The second was made by Aloandrus ; and the third by Henricus Agileus. Authors don't agree neither in the Name, nor in the Age of this ancient Interpreter ; some have believ'd him either more Ancient or Contemporary with St. Gregory the Great, because this Pope quoted and transcrib'd many Passages of these Novellæ into his Books, of which Opinion Balduinus was also⁴ : But *Antonius Augustinus*⁵, follow'd by Rittershusius, reports, That in the Days of Irnerius and Bulgarus, the Greek Volume of these Novellæ was found by the Labour of a certain Monk, who translated it into Latin : He was call'd Bergonto Pisanus, of whom 'tis likewise said, that he translated into Latin these Greek Clauses, which we find in the Books of the Digests.

THE Translation made by Aloandrus happen'd thus : There was kept in Florence a Manuscript Volume of the Greek Novellæ, from which that of Bologna had been copied. Aloandrus made use of this last, and he was the first who caus'd the Greek Novellæ to be printed, after he had translated them into Latin. The first Edition came forth in the Year 1531, to the Honour of the Senate of Nuremberg, who was at the Charges of it. Henricus Scrimgerus, many Years after, having found in Venice another Manuscript Copy more exact, which belong'd to Cardinal Bessarion, from this new Copy he made up a great deal of what was wanting in the Edition of Nuremberg, and caus'd it to be printed in Greek ; from which Henricus Agileus made a third Translation, who also translated the Novellæ of Leo ; and Contius likewise translated some others into the Latin Tongue.

WERNEUS, or, as we call him, Irnerius, to the great Advantage of the Studious, abridg'd them, and to each of the Laws of the Code, which had been corrected from the Novellæ, or that treated on the same Subject, join'd the Epitome of them ; by which it might be known, what had been alter'd on that Subject by these latest Constitutions of Justinian, therefore they got the Name of Authenticæ, which ought to be carefully compar'd with the Originals from whence they were taken, because sometimes they differ widely from them; and *Georgius Ritterfufius*¹, the Son of Conradus, reckons Seventy Places which don't agree with the Originals.

AND 'tis likewise to be observ'd, that this Volume of the Novellæ differs chiefly in three Things from the Code. The first, that the Code comprehends the Constitutions of many Princes, beginning with Adrian down to Justinian; and the Novellæ are only Constitutions of Justinian alone. The second, that the Laws of the Code were almost all dictated in the Latin Language, and the Novellæ in the Greek. The third, that in the Code, the Constitutions are subdivided into certain Classes, and placed under various Titles, according to the Variety of the Subject they treat of, and many times there are many of them dispos'd of under one Title; whereas in the Volume of the Novellæ each Constitution has its own Title, and are put together without Order, only observing the Order of Time; neither was that Order observ'd altogether, as we have shewn above.

Of the Use and Authority of these Books in Italy, and in these our Provinces.

ALTHO' Justinian, by these his celebrated Works, had eclips'd the Fame of Theodosius in the East so much that the Name of his Code was intirely extinguish'd; neither were the Academies nor the Courts of Justice to have recourse to any other Books but these; and tho' in the Empire of the East, they alone were receiv'd, and all others rejected; nevertheless in the West, and particularly in Italy, their Fortune was different, being publish'd by Justinian in the last Years of the Reign of Athalarick, while the Dominion of the Goths yet continued, they were not receiv'd in Italy, nor in these our Provinces, where, as being a Foreign Soil, they could not take deep Root; but the ancient Codes, and the old Books of the Civilians were retain'd, and the Theodosian Code lost nothing of its Esteem or Authority; on the contrary, by the Authority of Alarick, they were in great Reputation amongst the Westrogoths, insomuch that the Compend of the Theodosian Code, which they called a Breviary, was not only of great Value and Authority amongst them, but also amongst the Ostrogoths, and many other Nations, such as the Burgundians, French, and Longobards, and what was Roman Law, was contain'd in these Books.

AND altho' after the Death of Athalarick, and that of Amalasuntha soon after, the Affairs of the Goths in Italy, were reduced to a very low Ebb; and Justinian, by the Valour of Belisarius, had gain'd many Victories over them, and by a particular Edict¹, had order'd the Roman Laws contain'd in his Books, to be observ'd over all the Provinces of Italy; and Belisarius afterwards, in the Tenth Year of this Emperor's Reign, had conquer'd Naples, Puglia, Calabria, Samnium, and Campania, and taken these Provinces from the Goths; nevertheless, they having afterwards recover'd their ancient Spirit and Valour, under the most gallant and wise Prince Totila, made so great a Revolution in the Affairs of Italy, that in the Heat of so cruel a War, when no regard was had to Laws, those of the Romans contain'd in the Books of Justinian again lost their Vigour and Authority: And tho' at last, in the latter End of his Reign, he had gain'd an intire Victory over them, and under Teja their last King, by the Means of Narses, had wholly subdued and defeated them, yet, notwithstanding all that, he dying soon after, and being succeeded by Justin the Younger, a most foolish Prince, it was not long before Italy came under the Dominion of the Longobards, who, following the Example of the Goths, acknowledg'd no other Laws but their own, and those of the Romans which were contain'd in the Theodosian Code, and what by Tradition had been remember'd by the People; so that the Books of Justinian were not minded, of which the Longobards had little or no Knowledge, as we shall shew anon.

A D D to this, that not many Years after they began to have the same Fate in the East, where, as we shall shew in the following Books, partly by Ignorance and the Folly of his Successors, and partly by Envy, they came to be so forgotten, by reason of the numerous Collections which were made of them in Emulation of Justinian, that the Credit of them was quite eclips'd and extinguish'd; by which we see the strange Vicissitudes of human Things: This great Work of Justinian, compil'd with so much Care and Study, that it ought to have been famous and immortal for ever, yet scarcely was its Author dead, when it was likewise buried in the thickest Darkness and profoundest Oblivion for the Space of Five Centuries; but rising again in the West in the Reign of Lotharius, it spread its Fame over all the Provinces of the World; so that there was no Nation, neither civiliz'd or barbarous, which had it not in high Esteem and Veneration, and which did not prefer it to their own Laws and Customs.

C H A P. IV.

The Expedition of Justinian against Theodatus King of Italy, the Successor of Athalarick.

AFTER Justinian had put the last Hand to a certain and fixed Form of the Roman Jurisprudence, with the same good Fortune he betook himself to Arms. A Prince most fortunate as well in Time of Peace as War; for as in his own Time, for the accomplishing the Undertaking of the Laws, which was as bold and noble, as hard and difficult, he had those famous Civilians Tribonianus, Theophilus, Dorodens, and all the others, of whom we have made honourable mention, who were able to bring it to Perfection; so in War he had most gallant and famous Captains, such as Belisarius, Narses, Mondus, and some others, who by their incomparable Virtue, and glorious Achievements, added no less to his Glory than to the Increase of the Empire by their many Conquests; whence his Name was transmitted to Posterity, adorn'd with so many Titles of Alemanicus, Gothicus, Francicus, Germanicus, Anticus, Alanicus, Vandalicus, and Africanus, for his having conquer'd and subdued so many Nations. He was as fortunate in the Opportunities which offer'd to make the Conquests easie, as he was in so illustrious and gallant Captains who flourish'd in his Time; and particularly in the War which he made upon the Goths in the Expedition of Italy, the Success of which we are briefly to relate.

AFTER that Belisarius had conquer'd the Vandals in Africa and taken Carthage, having made Gilimere their King Prisoner, and carried him in triumph to Constantinople; Justinian seeing that vast Kingdom subjected to his Empire, turn'd all his Thoughts on the Expedition of Italy, in order to drive the Goths out of it; and a very lucky Opportunity, which presented it self, hasten'd the Undertaking, and push'd on the Execution.

Amala-

Amalasuntha, a most prudent Princess, seeing her Son, by a riotous Life, had contracted a lingering Disease, so that there were no more Hopes of his Life, was afraid, that after his Death she should not be able to live amongst the Goths in Safety, who, because she could not bear with their Disorders and Debaucheries, hated her mortally, and because she was much respected by the Emperor Justinian, who honoured and regarded her so much, that at last Theodora his Wife became jealous of her; began secretly to treat with Justinian, how she might be able to put him in Possession of the Kingdom of Italy, thinking by that means she might live in Peace and Quiet; but the untimely Death of her Son gave her not Time enough to accomplish her Design: For which Cause, being suspicious that the Goths, who would not suffer her to continue in the Government, might chuse a King according to their own Mind, she cunningly prevented them, by placing upon the Throne Theodatus her Cousin, Son of Amalasfrida Sister to the great Theodorick, who was likewise of the illustrious House of *Amala*¹. This was a Prince who had led his Life in the Desarts of Tuscany, and was much addicted to the Platonick Philosophy²; a Man of great Learning, and a perfect Master of the Latin Tongue, which in his Time had so far decay'd in its Purity, that he who understood it to Perfection was in great Esteem; and, if we may believe *Cassiodore*³, since Procopius says nothing of it, Theodatus was also expert in Divinity, and the Ecclesiastical Learning: Forasmuch as in the Letter which Amalasuntha wrote to the Senate of Rome, wherein she gives them an Account of his Advancement to the Throne, amongst the other Commendations and Honours which she bestows on Theodatus, she tells them, That he was a Prince very knowing in Ecclesiastical Learning. But all this Learning was not able to change his Nature, and the Meanness of his Spirit; and besides he was most unexpert in Military Matters, Fearful, Lazy, and above all most Covetous, without Honour or Probity, and so full of Treachery and Mischief, that he was capable of committing the most vile Actions in the World, when he was push'd on by his own or the Passions of other People.

THE unhappy Princess Amalasuntha soon after was sensible of his treacherous Nature to her utter Ruin; for he no sooner mounted the Throne, than, forgetting all the Promises he had made to his Benefactress, he suffer'd himself to be govern'd by the Relations of those whom this Princess had put to Death for their Crimes; and following the Advice of these People, caused her to be carried from the Palace of *Ravenna*⁴ to Prison, in an Island in the Middle of the Lake of Bolsena, and some Days after order'd her to be barbarously strangled in the Bath, at the same time that he was begging Peace of the Emperor Justinian, having first compell'd that unhappy Princess to write to the Emperor for obtaining it. There are not wanting Writers who say, that Theodatus was induc'd to commit such a Piece of Villainy, not only thro' the Perverseness of his Nature, and the Advice of those of his Court, but likewise by the Means and Persuasion of Theodora the Wife of Justinian, who being jealous of the Love that her Husband had for this Princess, was afraid, that one Day he would forsake her for Amalasuntha.

IN the mean time, Justinian being furiously inrag'd at the horrible Brutality of Theodatus and the Ostrogoths, resolved to revenge the Death of Amalasuntha; and, on the other hand, being eagerly desirous of uniting Italy to the Empire, he thought this was the best Opportunity that could ever offer to make War upon the Goths, in order to drive them out of Italy: Therefore, in the Year of our Lord 535, having pitch'd upon Belisarius for that Undertaking, and made great Preparations both by Sea and Land, he sent him with a powerful Fleet to Sicily, judging it to be the fittest Place to begin the War in, it being in a manner the Nursery of these Provinces, which now form our Kingdom, which being taken would render the Conquest of them the more easy.

JUSTINIAN likewise tried all Means for facilitating this Enterprize, and used all his Endeavours to bring the French to his Assistance, informing them of all his Grievances against the Goths, and laying before them the Reasons which he thought most just for undertaking this War. The Goths, says he, as *Procopius*⁵ has it, raptâ Italia, quæ nostri baud dubiè est juris, they not only don't like to restore it to the Empire, but besides, in Contempt of me, they have cruelly murdered Amalasuntha whom I so much esteem'd, and had so great a Value for, at the same time when they were begging Peace of me. But the French made no Motion towards his Assistance. On the contrary, Theodebert their Prince, Nephew of the great Clovis, whom Justinian in his Edicts had so much extoll'd, and also given him the Surname of Franciscus, as if he had subdued his renowned People, made War against him in Favour of Theodatus, and afterwards of Vitiges.

IN the mean time, Belisarius arriving in Sicily made an easy Conquest of it, by reason of the Confusion that was there. Having taken it, he immediately passed over from Messina to Rbegium, where the Gates were open'd to him; from thence by Land he march'd directly to Rome. All the Places on his March surrender'd willingly; therefore without much Resistance he took Aprutium, Lucania, Puglia, Calabria, and Sannium: Beneventum, and almost all the principal Cities of these Provinces yielded by the Terror of his Arms, and much more by the Astonishment the Goths were in, and the Stupidity and Fright of Theodatus. Only Campania resisted as much as the Forces in it were able. In this Province, the Cities that were able to defend themselves were Naples and Cuma: Naples stood out with great Valour and Intrepidity, and endured a Siege of many Days without surrendering; but a Soldier luckily having discover'd an Aqueduct which reach'd into the City, by which, with great Constancy, altho' sometimes dishearten'd, the Greeks enter'd it at last, and to the great Astonishment of the Besieged, turned every thing in the City topsy-turvy; and the Pillage had been more lamentable and dismal, if Belisarius had not put a Stop to the Insatiableness of the Soldiers. After the Conquest of these our Provinces, Belisarius pursued his way to Rome, and at last took it in the Eleventh Year of the Empire of Justinian, after it had been Sixty Years in the Possession of foreign Nations.

WHEN by the Terror of these Arms, and the so many Victories of Belisarius, Theodatus was quite discourag'd, he tried all ways possible for obtaining Peace from Justinian: He sent many Ambassadors to Constantinople, amongst whom Pope Agapitus offer'd Terms and Conditions of Surrendring¹. Justinian had likewise sent into Italy one Peter to treat of this Peace; he was a venerable Person, and most expert in managing State Matters. Theodatus propos'd many Projects to him, which, without the express Orders of the Emperor, he could not accept of, so that they were sent directly to Constantinople. Theodatus offer'd Sicily to Justinian: That the People of Rome, on Solemn and Festival Days, or upon any other Publick Occasion, either on the Theatre or the publick Market-place, should celebrate the Name of the Emperor before that of Theodatus: That there should be no Statue erected, either of Marble, of Brass, or any other Matter whatsoever, nor any Medal struck with the Image of Theodatus alone, but should be inscrib'd and stamp'd with that of the Emperor likewise, and that the Effigies of the Emperor should possess the most honourable Place on the Right Hand of Theodatus.

DURING the Time that they were expecting Justinian's Answer, Theodatus never ceas'd asking of the Ambassador, for whom he had a great Regard and Veneration, as may be seen by his Letters in Cassiodore, if he thought the Emperor would accept of the Conditions offer'd: He complain'd grievously of Justinian to Peter, that upon so slight an Occasion he had made so cruel a War against him, and, under various Pretexes, sought unjustly to take Italy from the Goths, after they had recover'd it out of the Hands of Odoacre with their own Forces, and with the Consent of the Emperor Zeno himself. Peter, as also the Greek Captains, gave no other Answer to these Complaints, than this; That it was a Duty incumbent upon the Emperor to recover these Provinces, which were known to every Body to have been lopp'd off the Empire; and that it became him, to whose Care it was committed, to use all Means to restore them to it again². In the mean time, the Proposals which had been sent by Theodatus to Justinian were laugh'd at, as Alexander the Great laugh'd at those offer'd to him by Darius, who propos'd to give him, as a Portion with his Daughter, all those Places betwixt the Hellepont and the River

Hali, which he had already conquer'd¹; and as the Romans did by Volgesus King of the *Parthians*²; and as afterwards Charles the Great did by Nicephorus, who offered him Saxony which he had already subdu'd³; forasmuch as Theodatus offer'd Sicily, which had been already possess'd by Belisarius together with the Provinces of our Kingdom: So that these Conditions being rejected, Theodatus's Fear, and the Terror of the Goths increased.

THE miserable Goths, seeing themselves in such a Consternation, and perceiving the Fright of Theodatus, and that by his Cowardliness they had been reduc'd to such a lamentable Condition, had a Mind to try if at least they could bring about the Treaty of Peace with Belisarius; wherefore they sent Ambassadors to lay before him their just Grievances, and to stop him from pursuing his Design. Being admitted to Belisarius, they began to lay forth to him the Wrong which was done the Goths by this unjust War. The Romans are much in the Wrong, said they⁴, who without any Cause have taken up Arms against us; their Confederates and Friends. The Goths have not taken Italy from the Romans by Force; it was Odoacre, who by much Slaughter and superior Strength robb'd them of it, while Zeno reign'd in the East, who not being able to revenge himself, by retaking the unjust Prey, nor having sufficient Force to oppose the Tyranny of the Heruli, called our Prince Theodorick, who was then threatening, on account of some Difference which had fallen out betwixt them, to besiege him in Constantinople itself, and intreated him to forgive his new Enemy, for the Sake of the Dignity of Patriciate, and Roman Consulship, which he had conferr'd upon him, and for the Regard he had always had for his Person, to turn his own Courage, and the Ferity of his People elsewhere; and to turn his Arms against Odoacre, and revenge the Death of Augustulus, dishonourably killed by him, and recover Italy from him, which he freely resign'd to him, and his Goths, that for ever after they might govern it, and hold it with a just Title, and good Right. Theodorick came to Italy, and by his own Valour, and the Strength of his Goths, drove out the Tyrant, and with the Consent of, and in Confederacy with all the Princes of the East govern'd it so many Years, as it is to this Time govern'd by his Goths: With what Justice then could they pretend to make War against them, who possess it by so just Titles, after having possess'd and govern'd it so many Years with so much Justice?

BUT Belisarius, who flush'd with his late Successes, was not to be moved by such Stories, which signify nothing, if they are not back'd by Force, answer'd them to their Face severely and gravely; That they had said more than they could make good: That Theodorick was indeed sent by Zeno to fight Odoacre, but not to make himself Master of Italy; since it signified nothing to the Emperor, as long as it was not restored to the Empire, whether it was under the Slavery of the one or the other Tyrant; that Italy was to be set at Liberty, and put under the Imperial Laws: But that Theodorick having behaved himself gallantly against Odoacre, set up for himself, and refused to deliver Italy to its Right Owner. To me, said he, he seems to be as bad, who keeps Goods that are not his own, against the Will of the Owner, as he that takes them by Force; therefore I will never yield to any Man in the World that Country which belongs to the Empire.

BY such a surly Answer, the Goths gave themselves up to Despair: they made use of all their Power and Art to find a Remedy for so imminent a Danger. him, and then put him to Death, and in his stead, in the midst of the Army, chose Vitiges, and proclaim'd him their King. Goldastus ¹ gives us another Reason for his Death; to wit, that the Goths had discovered, that Theodatus being wearied with so long and toilsome Wars, had agreed with Justinian at last to surrender the Kingdom to him, for a large yearly Pension, that he might retire to some solitary Place, and give himself up to the Study of Philosophy; and both the Letters which Theodatus wrote to Justinian, and his Answers to them, are related by the same Goldastus. Vitiges had for Wife Matafuenda, Daughter of the Princess Amalasuntha: He was a Prince of great Courage and Prudence, of which his notable Deeds bear Testimony, as do also his Speeches, and Letters which we read likewise in Cassiodore ² and Goldastus ³.

NO sooner had Vitiges mounted the Throne, after having in vain attempted to make Peace with Justinian, than he laid close Siege to Rome, which he kept block'd up for a Year and nine Days, till Belisarius reliev'd it in the Year 538. Whereupon seeing himself disappointed of his Hopes, he retired with his Wife to Ravenna: Not long after, Belisarius being Victorious every where, made them both Prisoners, and it luckily fell out (for at that Time he was recall'd by Justinian) that he triumph'd over Vitiges King of the Goths, in Constantinople, as he had done over Gillimere King of the Vandals.

THE Emperor Justinian recall'd Belisarius to Constantinople, being jealous of his Conduct, and sent John and Vitalis to Italy in his Room, altogether unlike him in Valour and Manners, which had this Effect, that the Goths taking new Courage, chose Ildibaldus, who was Governour of Verona, for their King ⁴; but he, on account of his Cruelty, was soon after kill'd by the Goths, and Eraricus chosen in his Place, who likewise in a short time was put to Death, being suspected to have enter'd into a Confederacy with the Greeks, and Totila advanced to the Throne.

S E C T. II.

Of T O T I L A, King of Italy.

UNDER this Prince, by his singular Virtue, and extreme Bravery, the Goths recover'd Vigour, and retook many Provinces which Belisarius had taken; they defeated the Emperor's Army, and regain'd Tuscany. Not long after they recover'd these our Provinces, which form the Kingdom. They having regain'd Samnium, and destroyed Beneventum, which they took by Force, threw down their Walls. From thence they went to Campania, and besieg'd Naples; and in the mean time took Cuma, and all the other Places along the Sea-Coast; and during the Siege of Naples, their Fleet being made very strong by the infinite Number of Goths that flock'd to it from all Parts, they made themselves Masters of Puglia, Calabria, and all the other Provinces, by their Lieutenants, without Resistance; from which they drew immense Sums, which had been gathered by Justinian. The Neapolitans at last surrendered; and altho' they were afraid, that by such Resistance, they should be severely treated by Totila, nevertheless they had a Proof of the Mildness of this Prince, who not only was a Defender and Preserver of the Chastity of the Neapolitan Women ¹, but treated them kindly, and with the greatest Humanity. And thus by the Valour of Totila, these our Provinces, which by the Folly of Theodatus had been lost, return'd anew to the Goths.

HITHERTO the Popes had not meddled in the Affairs of State nor of Princes; but were indifferent whether Italy were under the Dominion of the Romans, Goths, or Greeks. All their Care was employ'd in reuniting the Church of the East with that of the West, and in taking Order in various Councils about several Controversies which had arisen amongst the Bishops of the East, both in Doctrine and Discipline. The Popes Silverius and Vigilius were the first: Silverius being suspected by the Greeks, as more desirous of the Government of the Goths, than that of the Greeks, was accused by Belisarius of keeping a Correspondence with the Goths. Silverius on the Death of Pope Agapitus had been elected in Rome in his Place, and acknowledged by the Clergy and People of Rome, as lawful Bishop of that City. On the other hand, Vigilius a Deacon of the Church of Rome, who having been sent to Constantinople about the Affairs of Religion, had remain'd in that City, aspired likewise to the Papacy, and seeing himself prevented by Silverius, who was supported by the Romans and the Goths, left no Stone unturn'd to induce Justinian to send Belisarius again into Italy with a powerful Army, and retake from the Goths all they had recovered under Totila; and had now prevail'd with him to do it. He likewise us'd all his Art and Cunning with the Empress his Wife, promising that if she would get him to be elected Pope, he would receive Theodosius, Antimus, and Severus into his Communion, and approve of their Doctrine.

THEREFORE Belisarius return'd to Italy in order to drive the Goths out of it; but having carried so few Troops with him, he rather lost the Reputation which he had gain'd by his first Expedition, than acquir'd a greater; forasmuch as Totila, while Belisarius with his Forces was at Ostia, took Rome in his Sight; and seeing that he could neither conveniently leave it nor keep it, he laid it waste for the most Part, and drove the People out of it, carrying the Senators along with him; and undervaluing Belisarius, he went with his Army to Calabria, to encounter the Forces that were coming from Greece to his Assistance. Rome being deserted, was immediately retaken by Belisarius, who in all haste rebuilt the Walls, and recall'd the Inhabitants. Vigilius, hearing that Belisarius had retaken Rome, left Constantinople with a secret Order from the Empress, directed to Belisarius to put her Design in Execution. When he came to Rome he deliver'd it to Belisarius, promising to give him Money if he would put him in Possession of that See: Belisarius sent for Silverius, and accus'd him of keeping a Correspondence with the Goths, and urg'd him to acknowledge Antimus; which Silverius refusing to do, was stript of his Pontifical Garments, and banish'd to Patara, and Vigilius elected in his room. But Fortune soon put a Stop to the Proceedings of Belisarius, because at that Time Justinian being attack'd by the Parthians, recall'd him. He to obey his Master, abandon'd Italy, and this Province was left to the Discretion of Totila, who retook Rome; but it was not so cruelly treated as formerly, because being besought by S. Benedict, who in these Times had a great Reputation of Sanctity, he rather began to repair it. In the mean time Justinian having made up Matters with the Parthians, and designing to send new Succours to Italy, was diverted from it by the Sclavonians, a new Northern People, who had pass'd the Danube, and assaulted Illyricum, and Thracia; so that Totila reduc'd almost all Italy under his Obedience.

BUT the Goths did not long enjoy the Fruit of so many Victories, for Justinian had no sooner vanquish'd the Sclavonians, than he sent Narses the Eunuch, a Man of great Experience in War, who increas'd his Armies even with Foreigners, such as the Heruli, the Hunni, and the Gepidæ; he likewise employ'd the Longobards, whom he brought out of Pannonia, who afterwards knew so well how to improve the Knowledge they had of such a fine Country, and the Occasion which offer'd to them, that from Auxiliaries they became Conquerors, as shall be related by and by. Narses had not as yet disengaged himself from the Expedition of Thracia in order to go into Italy, when the Governor of Tarentum quitting the Party and Service of Totila, delivered up the Place to some Imperialists, who had landed at Cortona; Totila being surpriz'd at so many Losses, and amazed at the Greatness of the Preparations for War, which were nois'd Abroad, and magnified every where, that Narses was making against him, sent Teja a most valiant Captain to stop Narses at a Pass; but Teja not being able to hinder his Progress, Narses removed all Obstacles, and over-run the Country with a powerful Army, so that a Field Battle could not be avoided, in which Totila gave the utmost Proofs of his Valour, and not being able to withstand the Forces of his Enemy, far superior to his own, was defeated, and killed, and his Goths put to the Rout, and subdu'd; whereupon the unlucky Goths retired to Pavia the best Way they could after such a cruel Battle, where they made Teja their King, in whose Valour and Boldness they had plac'd all their Hopes of restoring restoring Italy to their Dominion. On the other hand, Narses after this Victory took Rome, and the other Cities surrendered to him.

THIS Defeat so dishearten'd the Gothish Troops in Italy, that they were never after able to re-establish themselves there: but the Loss of their gallant King Totila, was a much greater Detriment to them: A Prince, who by his Valour, and much more by his Prudence and Goodness, had been able to repair in such a manner the Condition of his Goths, that he had almost brought them to the same State in which Theodorick had left them. He in little less than ten Years that he reign'd, left so many Monuments of his Valour, his Goodness, and his other great Virtues with which he was adorn'd, that there's not a Writer who does not commend, and for his so many good Qualities extol him to the Skies: He, altho' a Goth, says Paul Warnefride, lived with the Romans, like a Father with his Children, changing nothing of their Laws and Institutions. He continued the same Administration, the same Form in the Provinces, and the same Government: A great Lover of Justice and Equity; and the Speech is truly wonderful, which this Prince made to his Soldiers, in Praise of Justice, and the other Virtues, which we likewise read in Procopius after he took Naples. His Goodness and Mildness towards the Vanquish'd is often celebrated by the same Historian, tho' a Greek. He preserv'd Rusticana untouch'd and secure from all Contempt, Wife as she was of Boetius, a Woman odious to the Goths, with whom they had no reason to be satisfied.

NEITHER have the Historians pass'd over in Silence his Temperance: It was he, who often sav'd the Chastity, and the Liberty of the Roman Matrons, and having taken Naples, he was most zealous in preserving the Honour of the Women, and punish'd severely the Transgressors that way: He was contented with the most simple Food with his Goths, such as Bread, Milk, Cheese, Butter, the Flesh of wild Beasts, Venison, often raw, and sometimes salted: So that from the Example of this Prince the Goths could boast of being reputed Temperate, Just, and Mild; whereas the Romans themselves, as *Salvianus*² says, came short of the Virtue, the Justice, and the Temperance of the very Goths.

S E C T. III.

Of TEJA the last King of the Goths in Italy.

THE unhappy Goths, after the dismal Defeat which Narses gave them, made use of all their Might and Industry to find out ready Expedients for repairing their past Losses; besides their having chosen for their King, Teja, a most gallant Prince, they tried to get the Assistance of the neighbouring Princes. They had recourse to the French, and sent Ambassadors to move them to come to their Assistance. The Oration of these Ambassadors deserves to be read and admired by every Body, it being full of so moving and most excellent Reasons, which they set forth to the French, and may be read as yet in *Agathias*¹. If the Goths are destroyed, said they, then the Romans will be ready and prepared to renew their old Wars against you. Neither will their Covetousness fail to furnish them with specious Pretexts, and far-fetch'd Excuses. They will put you in mind of the Marii, the Camilli, and the many Emperors who made War with the Germans, and who extended the Bounds of their Empire beyond the Rhine. And by making use of these Pretexts, they will not have themselves to be reputed Robbers of other Peoples Dominions, but that they only have a Property in every Thing, and no Body else: They brag that what they do, is only recovering with their just and lawful Arms, what had been possessed by their Forefathers: Upon no other account have they made War so unjustly upon us; as if our ever-glorious Prince, and Author of this Expedition, Theodorick, had wrongfully and unjustly taken Italy from them: therefore they have believ'd it lawful to take from us our Goods, to destroy the greatest Part of our People, and the most renown'd and eminent of our Captains, and cruelly to use our Wives and Children in carrying them into miserable Slavery; altho' Theodorick came not into Italy as an Enemy to them, but by the special Concession and Permission of their own Emperor Zeno, not to take it from the Romans who had lost it, but with his own Troops and his own Valour, having driven out Odoacre the foreign Invader, Jure Belli acquir'd what he had possess'd. But after the Romans found themselves re-instated, they regarded neither Justice nor Reason; at first they pretended to be offended at Theodatus on Account of the Death of Amalasuntha, and afterwards did not fail to make War against us unjustly and by Force to rob us of every Thing: And yet these are the People who boast of being the only Wise, the only Fears of God, and who alone direct every Thing according to the Rules of Justice. To the End then, that what is our Fate now, may not be yours some time or other, and that ye may not repent too late when ye cannot help your selves, ye ought now to prevent the Enemy, and not to slip the present Opportunity in sending a competent Army, under the Command of one of your brave Captains, who by acting prudently and courageously against the Romans, may put a Stop to their Undertaking against Italy, and restore us to the Possession of it.

BUT this Embassy was unsuccessful, for the French would give no Ear to it, because Theodibert, after the War which he had made upon Justinian, a little before he died, in the Year 548, had made a firm and stable Peace with him, which was afterwards confirm'd by Theodobald his Son, who, mindful of the Conditions, could on no Account be induced to break the Peace; till at last they undertook not only to make War upon the Goths at the Instigation of Justinian, but likewise against the Romans, as the Goths had so earnestly desir'd it: And altho' after the Dominion of the Goths had been already extinct in Italy, in the Year 555, after the Death of King Theobald, Leotarus, and his Brother Bucellinus General of the Forces of Austrasia, with the French and Germans, had attempted the Conquest of Italy, the first having advanc'd into Puglia and Calabria, and the latter, besides his having laid waste Samnium, had gone over to Sicily; nevertheless, their Armies were soon after defeated; that of Leotarus by a cruel Sickneſs which in one Summer swept them all away, and the other of Bucellinus by Narses near Casilinum. And this was the first time that the French endeavour'd to subject these our Provinces to their Dominion; which was an unlucky Omen, and portended that their Arms were to be always unfortunate in their Undertakings against Italy, which Experience has demonstrated to us in the Ages less remote from us, and that their Lillies, tho' many times planted in our Soil, could never take deep Root.

THE Goths therefore being deny'd Assistance from the French, plac'd all their Hopes in the Valour of Teja, who made the most surprizing Attempts that could be desir'd in such a desperate Condition, for repairing the Fortune of the Goths. Narses and he met at the Foot of our Vesuvius, and Teja incamp'd his Army so, that the two Camps were only separated by the River Sarno; nevertheless, they continued Skirmishing for two Months, Narses not daring to pass the River before Teja's Army, which was Master of the Bridge, neither durst he retire, for fear that the Goths should have reinforc'd the Garrison of Cuma; but at last Narses, who was much superior in Forces, order'd Matters so, that he forc'd him to a Battle, who shewing the utmost Proofs of his Valour and Boldness, was unhappily kill'd; which put the Goths into such a Consternation, that seeing themselves depriv'd of so gallant a Captain, they resolv'd to surrender to Narses, who allow'd them to depart out of the Territories of the Empire with all the Money they had, and to live according to their own Laws. Thus the Conditions were faithfully perform'd on both Sides after Eighteen Years War, so that all the Towns were put into the Hands of the Commissaries of Narses, and the Goths marched out of Italy in the Year of our Lord 553, where they had reign'd Sixty-four Years, from Theodorick down to Teja.

THUS ended the Dominion of the Goths in Italy, and these our Provinces: A Nation most Illustrious and Warlike; which in the Heat of War never left off the Exercise of Justice, Temperance, Faith, and the other excellent Virtues with which they were adorn'd, not so barbarous and inhuman as some have reputed them. They allow'd the conquer'd People to live after the Roman Laws, under which they had been born and bred up; for which Laws they had a very great Regard: neither did they alter the Disposition and Order of these our Provinces; did not change the Magistracy; retain'd the Consulares, the Correctores, and the Præsides, and kept up many other Customs and Institutions, after the same manner they had been in the Times of the Roman Emperors; though, that these our Provinces underwent another Form, and a new Administration, not while they were under the Dominion of the Goths, but when they passed under that of the Emperors of the East, who sent their Exarchs into Italy, and divided the Provinces into many Dukedoms, which so alter'd their Disposition, that it was quite different from what it formerly had been, as we shall see anon.

NEVERTHELESS those Disorders and Confusions, which so cruel and bloody Wars usually create in Discipline and Learning, could not be avoided. As for the Jurisprudence in these Times, it could not be expected that there should be so many famous Civilians in Italy, nor so eminent Professors and Advocates as could be able to restore it to its ancient Splendor in the Courts of Justice and the Academies: Therefore we ought not to look upon it as a trifling Affair, that in the Midst of so many and cruel Wars, the Gothish Kings could apply themselves, as Athalarick and Theodatus did, to maintain as much as possible the ancient Lustre of the Roman Senate, and the Academy of Rome, and to furnish it, as *Athalarick*¹ did, with Professors expert in the Laws, and with famous Grammarians, to prevent the Latin Tongue's being altogether lost amongst so many foreign and barbarous Languages; and certainly in these Times it would have been entirely lost, if it had not been re-establish'd in that Academy, and if Theodatus, who was a great Lover of it, had not given his Assistance. From these Times, Rome was commended for the Purity of the Latin Tongue, because in all the other Provinces, the barbarous Languages were at their height; and the Instruments, that passed the Hands of the Tabelliones, whom we now call Publick Notaries, were drawn up in no better Language than what is now spoke in Italy. *Fornerius*², in Cassiodore, relates, that there is preserv'd in the King's Library in Paris, an ancient Instrument of a Transaction, conceived in no better Stile than what we use at this Time; in which one Stephen, Guardian to Gratian a Minor, transacted a certain Law-Plea with him, which was sign'd in Ravenna in the last Year of the Empire of Justinian, to wit, in the 38th, in the 12th Indiction, which fell out in the 564th Year of Christ: And therefore it was reckon'd in those Times a very great Qualification to be Master of the Latin Tongue, for which Theodatus, besides his other Learning, is particularly commended: And even in this Age, Italy could boast of some great Men, such as Ennodius, Jornandes, Boetius Severinus, Symmachus, Cassiodore, Arator, and some others, who were all Men of great Knowledge and Erudition.

JUSTINIAN, by the Means of Narses, having thus routed the Goths and retaken Italy from them, at the Request, as he says, of Pope Vigilius, publish'd in the last Year save one of his Empire, a Pragmatical Act³ consisting of many Heads, by which he design'd to remedy the Disorders which Italy and the other Western Parts had lain under. It was directed to Antiochus Præfect of Italy, and dated in Constantinople in the 37th Year of his Empire: In which, as all the Acts and Donations made by Athalarick and Amalasuntha his Mother, and even those of Theodatus, are confirm'd; so on the other Hand, looking upon Totila as a Tyrant, he abolish'd, detested, and render'd null, all the Acts and Donations made by him during the Time of his Tyranny; and he order'd, that in the Prescriptions of 30 and 40 Years, the Time should not be computed, whilst Italy was under the Tyranny of Totila: That in Law-Suits amongst the Romans, the Military Judges should not concern themselves, but that the Civil were to decide them: He took Care of the Superindictiones laid on the Merchants of the Provinces of Calabria and Puglia; and put forth many other Laws concerning the State of Italy, and these our Provinces, which may be seen in that Pragmatical Act distinguish'd into many Heads, which is placed after the Novellæ. But we may observe a Thing very remarkable in it: Some by Conjectures and Arguments have written, that because the Publication of the Pandects and the Code was committed by Justinian to the Præfect of Illyricum, therefore we ought to believe that they were likewise publish'd in Italy. There's no need of Arguments in a Thing so manifest: We read, in that Pragmatical Act, that Justinian by his particular Edict order'd, the Laws inserted in his Books to be observ'd over all Italy; but because afterwards in the Reign of Totila the Affairs of the Greeks went all to wreck, and the Goths return'd to their former Dominion, in the midst of so many Revolutions, his Laws surely could not take Place. The Affairs of the Greeks being afterwards restor'd by Narses, and the Goths intirely subdued, by this Pragmatical Act he would not only have these Laws to be observ'd over all Italy, but also that his other Constitutions in the Novellæ, which he had publish'd afterwards, should be likewise obey'd; so that by God's Permission having formed one Commonwealth, the Authority of the Laws should be one and the same in every Part of it, as the Words of the Pragmatical Act import; and as they are remarkable for our Purpose, and, for what I know, have never been hitherto taken notice of by any other, it will not be improper to transcribe them; Jura insuper, vel Leges Codicibus nostris insertas, quas jam sub Edictali Programme in Italiam dudum misimus, obtinere sancimus; sed & eas quas postea promulgavimus Constitutiones, jubemus sub Edictali propositione vulgari ex eo tempore, quo sub Edictali programme evulgatæ fuerint etiam per partes Italiæ obtinente, ut una Deo volente facta Republica, Legum etiam nostrarum ubique prolatetur auctoritas.

BUT altho' the Name of Goth was extinct in Italy, yet these Provinces did not continue long under the Dominion of the Emperors of the East, neither were the Books of Justinian of long Duration: After the Death of Justinian we return'd afresh, tho' not under the Dominion of the Goths, yet under that of the Longobards, who derive their Origin from the same Goths, and of whom they are Branches and Sprouts, as we shall see when we come to treat of them.

ALTHO' these Provinces came under the Empire of Justinian, yet he had not Time sufficient for establishing his Laws in them, or for his excellent Compilations getting Footing or Stability in them: If they reach'd us, their Memory and all Vestige of them was soon extinct; for Justinian had scarcely acquir'd the Glory of having freed Italy from the Goths, when he was diverted by the second Persian War, and the Invasion of the Huns, even to his Death, which fell out in the Year 565, in an advanced Age of Eighty-two Years, after having reign'd Thirty-eight Years and Nine Months. A Prince, who if he had not in the End of his Days obscured his Fame by the Eutychæan Heresy¹, which he would embrace, and never adjured, might have exceeded the Glory of many Emperors for Piety, Magnificence, many notable Exploits, and signal Victories, which both in Peace and War made him immortal, as all the most famous Historians of his Time represent him to us, and those likewise who flourish'd after him, such as Theophilus the Abbot his Master², Procopius, Agathias, Theophanes, Zonara, Marcellinus, Evagrius, and Nicephorus among the Greeks; and amongst the Latins, Cassiodore, Warnifred, and many others³; so that the Mistake of those is now inexcusable, who believed, from the Testimony of Suidas, that this Prince was so illiterate and unpolish'd, that he did not so much as know the A, B, C, when he himself testifies, that he had read and survey'd the Books of his Institutions. The Mistake proceeds from the Incorrectness of the Text of Suidas, which Demetrius Calcondila caus'd to be printed in Milan, where, instead of Justin, as we read in all the Copies of Suidas which are in the Vatican, we read *Justinian*⁴; whence that, which out of a Mistake is ascrib'd to Justinian, ought to be attributed to Justin, Uncle and adoptive Father of Justinian, as Procopius an Eye-witness declares, who affirms, That Justin from a Shepherd became a Soldier, afterwards a Comes, and lastly, by a wonderful Turn of Fortune, was rais'd to the Imperial Throne; and because he could not write, seal'd his Publick Acts with a certain Instrument or Signet made on purpose, as Theodorick likewise used to do; who, tho' he was so great a Prince as we have related, nevertheless was ignorant of Learning; and as in latter Times we read of Witbred King of Kent, and of Thassilo Duke of Bavaria: And it was also said of Charles the Great by some, that he could not write, tho' he could read and was very learned.

C H A P. V.

Of the Emperor Justin II. and of the new Polity introduced into Italy, and these our Provinces by Longinus his first Exarch.

AFTER Justinian died, all his Designs were broken, and the Fortune of the Emperors of the East began to decline as formerly; for he was succeeded in the Empire by Justin the Younger, Son of Vigilantius the Brother of Justinian, very unlike him; who, by his Stupidity, suffer'd himself to be intirely ruled by his Wife Sophia, by whose Advice he recall'd Narses out of Italy, and in the Year 568¹, sent Longinus to succeed him.

LONGINUS being arriv'd in Italy with an absolute Power and Command, given him by Justin himself, attempted Innovations, and altered the State of it. He was the first who gave a new Form to Italy, and who introduc'd a new Disposition and a new Government into it, which facilitated its Ruin; altho' he had fixed his Residence in Ravenna, as the Western Emperors, and Theodorick with his Goths had done, nevertheless he would put Italy in another Shape². He took away from the Provinces the Consulares, the Correctores, and the Præsides, contrary to what the Romans and the Goths had done, and in all the Cities and Towns of any Moment made Heads, whom he call'd Dukes, and appointed Judges in each of them for the Administration of Justice. In which Distribution he honoured Rome no more than any of the other Cities³, because having taken away the Consuls and the Senate, which Names hitherto had been kept up, he put it under a Duke, whom he sent every Year thither from Ravenna; whence arose the Name of the Roman Dukedom: And to him who resided in Ravenna, and govern'd Italy for the Emperor, he gave the Title not of Duke, but Exarch, in Imitation of the Exarchs of Africa. With the Greeks, he was called Exarch who presided over a Diocess, that is to say, many Provinces of which the Diocess was compos'd: So we see in the Hierarchy of the Church, that the Bishop who was put over a Diocess, and consequently many Provinces, of which it was compos'd, was not called Metropolitan, who had only one single Province, but Exarch. Thus Italy suffer'd greater Changes under the Empire of Justin Emperor of the East, than under the Goths, who had maintain'd it in the same Form and Appearance, in which it had been govern'd and manag'd.

THE Provinces, with respect to Government, were chang'd and divided; and as formerly every one had its Consularis, or Corrector, or Præsides, to whom the Management and Government of them was intrusted; so by this new Division, every City or Castle had its Duke and Judge, each of whom intermeddled with the Government of them separately, and were only subject to the Exarch, who, in Ravenna govern'd all Italy, at whose Disposition they were, and to whom the People had recourse in Matters of Moment. Whence it was, that in these our Provinces the so many Dukedoms, which we shall see in the Reign of the Lombards, took their Rise; some of them under the Dominion of the Greeks, such as the Dukedom of Naples, Surrentum, Amalphis, Gaeta, and Bari; and some under the Longobard Dukes, who having retaken from the Greeks almost all Italy, and a great Part of these our Provinces, retain'd the same Titles of Dukedoms; whence, above all the rest, the Dukedom of Beneventum, those of Spoletum, and Friuli rais'd themselves, as we shall shew more fully in the following Book of this History.

BUT the Empire of the Greeks was of no long Duration in Italy, neither could Longinus boast much of this new Form which he gave it; since this minute Division of the Provinces into so many Parts, and more Dukedoms, made the Ruin of Italy the more easy, and gave occasion to the Longobards to make themselves Masters of it the sooner; forasmuch as Narses being highly offended at the Emperor, for having taken from him the Government of that Province which he had acquir'd by his Virtue and Bravery, and Sophia not content with having got him to be recall'd, but she must needs likewise give him injurious and disdainful Language, telling him, that she would cause him to be put to Spin with the other Eunuchs and Women of her Palace, carried his Wrath so far, that, not able to smother his bitter Displeasure, he answer'd, That he would warp her such a Web that neither she nor her Husband should ever be able to unravel it; and having disbanded his Army, he went from Rome to Naples, from whence he began to treat with Alboinus, King of the Longobards, his great Friend, who at that Time reign'd in Pannonia; upon whom he wrought so much, that at last he persuaded him to come and take Possession of Italy with his Longobards. But seeing that by the coming of the Longobards into Italy, the Affairs of Italy took another Turn; and as there were new Laws and a new Polity introduc'd into it, so likewise these our Provinces were divided after another manner, and by taking new Names, were dispos'd of and govern'd under other Dynastæ; and at the same time subjected to the Dominion not of one single Prince, but of divers Nations, such as Greeks, Longobards, and sometimes even Saracens; it will be necessary on Account of the Novelty of the Subject, and the Importance and Variety of the Events, that after we have related the Ecclesiastical Polity of this Century, in the following Book we treat of it particularly.

C H A P. VI.

Of the Exterior Ecclesiastical Polity.

LET H O' the Church, in the Reigns of Arcadius and Honorius, most religious Princes, who in a manner destroy'd Idolatry in the Roman Empire, was, on that Score, in a flourishing and peaceable State, nevertheless she was invaded with so many and so various Heresies, that neither the numerous and frequent Councils, nor the many Constitutions of the Emperors publish'd against Hereticks, were sufficient to keep her in Peace. Tho' the Heathen Religion, under the Christian Emperors, by the Subjects imitating their Sovereigns, was very much decay'd, nevertheless it was not thought proper to extinguish it altogether by Force: On the contrary, the aforesaid Emperors for a long time tolerated the Heathen Temples, and many Pagan Superstitions; and the Worship of the Gods¹ was profess'd by many, tho' the Number of the Christians was much greater than that of the Heathens. But under the Emperors Arcadius and Honorius, the Heathen Worship was almost quite wore out in all the Cities of the Empire; it was only in the Castles, the Pagi, and in Campania, that the Exercise of that Religion was kept up; whence comes the Word Pagani, which we so often meet with in the Theodosian Code ¹, to signify Idolaters; a Name which at this time is commonly given them by Christians, instead of that of Gentiles. The Emperors Theodosius the Younger and Valentinian III. depressed the Pagans in such sort, that, by discharging them from being admitted into Military or other Offices, he brought them to that pass, that the Emperor Theodosius himself question'd, if in his Time there was so much as one remaining; Paganos qui supersunt, quamquam jam nullos esse credamus ². At last he condemn'd and proscrib'd them, and ordain'd, That if there were still any of their Temples or Chapels remaining, they should be destroy'd and converted into Churches ³.

BUT notwithstanding all the Power of these Emperors, there remain'd in Campania, in Pagis, many ancient Temples, in which the Worship of the Gods was kept up; and it continued much longer there, because the Inhabitants were the last in parting with their ancient Ways and Customs; insomuch, that in our Campania 'tis said, St. Benedict, in the Time of King Totila, threw down the Remains of Paganism, which had also remain'd amongst the Goths, and in the Place thereof erected a Church. There was a vast Number of barbarous Nations that continued as yet in the Darkness of Idolatry; but above all, what disturb'd the Church most in these times, was the Irruption of the Barbarians, and the new Dominions of Foreign Princes establish'd in the Empire: These, if not altogether Pagans, were for the most part Arians, and confounded and abused her; and if Italy and these our Provinces did not undergo such strange Revolutions, all is owing to the Picty and Moderation of King Theodorick, who, tho' an Arian, suffer'd our Churches to continue in Peace; and as he did not alter the Polity of the Civil and Temporal State, so likewise he maintain'd in Italy the same Form and Polity in the Ecclesiastical and Spiritual State.

THE same Thing happen'd, but upon another Account, to Gallia, which was owing to the Conversion of the famous Clovis King of the French, who, in the Year 496, receiv'd the Christian Religion intirely pure and bright, no ways stain'd with the pestilent Heresy of Arius. Spain, before Reccarede, had not the same good Fortune; nor Africa after it was set at Liberty from the Vandals; nor Germany after it was subdued by the Alemanni, and other more rude and barbarous Nations; nor Britain after the Invasion of the Saxons; and finally, not all the other Provinces of the Western Empire. There were greater Revolutions and Confusions in the Eastern Provinces: The Huns, under their famous King Attila; the Alani, the Gepidæ, the Ostrogoths, and lastly the Saracens not only, overturn'd the State of the Empire, but also that of the Church.

TO all these Misfortunes, the Ambition of the Bishops of the greater Sees was added, and the bad Use the Emperors of the East made of their Power, who reduced the Priesthood to such a State, that at last they subjected Religion intirely to the Will of the Prince. These were the Occasions of that Change, which we shall take Notice of from the Death of Valentinian III. to the Empire of Justinian. We shall see three Patriarchates in a manner sunk and extinct, to wit, that of Alexandria, of Antioch, and of Jerusalem; and that of Rome in the West, and the other of Constantinople in the East sprung up, whose Churches jarring among themselves, occasion'd an implacable and obstinate Division betwixt the Greeks and the Latins; and how that of Constantinople, whose Ambition had no Bounds, endeavour'd to invade the Patriarchate of Rome, and these our Provinces, tho' as being Suburbicariæ they belong'd to that of Rome.

Of the Patriarch of the W E S T.

THE Pope, who at this Time began to be call'd Patriarch, as well by the Greeks as the Latins, very justly obtain'd the first Place among all the Patriarchs, as well because his Chair was fixed in Rome, a City once the Head of the World; as for his being the Successor of St. Peter, who was Head of the Apostles. Therefore the Prerogatives of Primate over all the Churches of the Catholick World were united in his Person, it belonging to him, as Head of all the Churches, to have the Care and Inspection of them, and to watch that the Faith might be preserved pure and unspotted, and the Discipline conformable to the Canons, and that these should be exactly observed¹. His usual Power, as we have seen in the preceding Book, did not extend further than the Suburbicarian Provinces, that is to say, those that obey'd the Vicar of Rome, among which were all our four Provinces, of which our Kingdom is now made up; and to which Limits it was confin'd till the Reign of Valentinian.

IN process of Time, because the Prerogatives of Primate were also lodged in his Person, it was very easy to extend them over the other Provinces. By reason of his Primacy it likewise belong'd to him to have a Care and Inspection over them; whence he began to send his Vicars into some Provinces, where he thought there was occasion. The first that were appointed, were those, that were sent to Illyricum: After Thessaly, the Head of the Diocess of Macedonia, in which the Bishop exercis'd Exarchal Power, acknowledg'd the Vicars sent by the Pope, it became subject to the Patriarch of Rome, who by his Vicars, exercised not only the Power of Primate, but likewise that of Patriarch; and thus besides Macedonia, it also fared with the rest of the Provinces of Illyricum. In progress of Time he not only subjected all Italy to his Patriarchal Authority, but likewise the Galliae and Spain; whence it was, that not only the Latins, but the Greeks themselves in later Times look'd upon the Pope to be Patriarch of all the West, as on the other hand, they would have the Patriarch of Constantinople to be of all the East. Besides the Popes were always ready, and made haste to send Prelates to govern the many Provinces and Nations that embrac'd the Faith of the Catholick Religion; and by that means subjected them to their Patriarchate; as it happened to Bulgaria, which being brought to embrace the Faith of Christ, immediately got an Archbishop sent to it; whence arose the so many Disputes about this Province with the Patriarch of Constantinople, who pretended to it as his Right. Thus by Degrees did the Popes extend the Bounds of their Patriarchate over all the West; whence it came to pass (not without great wrangling) that they arrogated to themselves a Power to ordain the Bishops over all the West, and consequently to suppress and overthrow the Rights of all the Metropolitans; besides, they assum'd to themselves the Ordination of the very Metropolitans. Thus, tho' formerly the Archbishops of Milan, who were Exarchs of all the Vicariate of Italy, were ordain'd by the Bishops of Italy only; as we read in *Theodoritus*² of the Ordination of S. Ambrose; yet in process of Time the Popes would have them to come and ask their Consent to their Ordination, as S. Gregory relates in his Letters³. They likewise took upon themselves all the Privileges of the Metropolitans with respect to Ordinations, by granting the Pall, which they sent them; for by that the Popes gave full Power to the Metropolitans of ordaining Bishops in their Province; so that consequently the Power was given them jointly with the Pall: Whence by a new Law, the Metropolitans were forbid the Exercise of all Episcopal Functions, till they had first receiv'd the Pall; and it was also ordain'd that they were to take the Oath of Fidelity to the Pope. And in process of Time, it was determin'd likewise, that Appeals from the Sentences pronounc'd by Metropolitans concerning Disputes about Elections, should devolve to the Pope, in case the Electors were negligent, or if the Elected was not a fit Person; that it should be in his Power alone to admit of Resignations of Bishopricks, and to determine the Translations, the Coadjutorship, and the Succession: And finally, that the Confirmation of the Elections of all the Bishops of the Provinces should belong to him.

BUT all these Incroachments, which were made upon the other Provinces of the West, made no Alteration in these of which the Kingdom is now made up; for they being Suburbicarian, and over which the Pope from the Beginning always exercis'd his Patriarchal Authority, were as formerly subject to him; he took no Power from the Metropolitans, because there were none; neither as to the Ordination of Bishops, was the Discipline of the preceding Ages chang'd. Our Churches were not as yet rais'd to be Metropolitan; neither were the Privileges of Metropolitans granted to their Bishops, by the sending them the Pall, as was afterwards done: Neither hitherto had they been usurped by the Patriarch of Constantinople; for what is related of Peter Bishop of *Bari*¹, who in the Year 530, under the Pontificate of Felix IV. had got the Title of Archbishop, and the Authority of Metropolitan from the Patriarch of Constantinople, with Power to consecrate twelve Bishops in his Province of Puglia, ought not to be carried back to that Year, when these Provinces had not as yet been invaded by the Greeks, and were under the Dominion of Atbalarick King of the Goths, but to the following Times, when Part of Puglia, and Calabria, of Lucania, and the Brutii, and many other maritime Cities of the other Provinces, remain'd in the Hands of the Emperors of the East, 'twas then that the Patriarchs of Constantinople, by the Favour of the Emperors, usurped the Patriarchal Authority over them, as we shall relate in the following Books.

S E C T. II.

Of the Patriarch of the E A S T.

IF the Usurpations of the Patriarchs of Rome were great over the Western Provinces, greater and more bold, without doubt, were those of the Patriarch of Constantinople, over those of the East: He not only subjected to his Patriarchate the three Autocephalæ Diocesses, to wit, that of Asia, of Pontus, and of Thrace; but in process of Time, he in a manner extinguish'd the three famous Patriarchates of the East, the Alexandrine, the Antiochian; and lastly, that of Jerusalem. These Bounds not having satisfied his Ambition, he also invaded many of the Western Provinces; neither did he spare those of our Country, which in Justice belong'd to the Patriarchate of Rome.

FROM what mean and slender Beginnings the Patriarchate of Constantinople had its Rise, may be seen in the preceding Book. The Bishop of Byzantium, at first, was only a simple Suffragan of the Bishop of Heraclea, who presided as Exarch in *Thrace*¹. Of all the Patriarchates of the East, those of Alexandria and Antioch were the most famous and eminent. That of Alexandria was in the second Place next to the Patriarch of Rome, perhaps, because Alexandria was reputed, after Rome, the second City in the World: The other of Antioch had the third Place, also venerable on account of St. Peter's having had his Chair first there. Thus the three Parts of the World owned three Churches superior to all the rest: The West that of Rome; the East that of Antioch; and the South that of Alexandria. However, the Church of Rome did not exercise her Patriarchal Authority over all Europe, nor that of Antioch over all Asia, nor that of Alexandria over all Africa; each of them, as we have seen in the Second Book, did not extend their Authority further than their own Diocess: The others obey'd their own Exarchs; and many other Places had their own Autocephali Bishops, that is to say, were subject to no other. Such were the Bishops of Carthage and Cyprus in the East. Such were once the Bishops of Gallia, Spain, and Germany, and other more remote Countries in the West. The Churches of Barbary were certainly not subject to any Patriarch, but were govern'd by their own Bishops. — Thus the Churches of Ethiopia, Persia, and the Indies, and other Countries not subject to the Roman Empire, were govern'd by their own Priests.

THERE was yet another Patriarch in the East; to wit, that of Jerusalem. If we consider the Disposition of the Empire, the Bishop of Jerusalem deserv'd that Prerogative no less than the Bishop of Byzantium; and as the one was a Suffragan to the Metropolitan of Heraclea in Thrace, so the other was a Suffragan to the Bishop of Cæsarea, Metropolis of Palestine: But even with great Reason the Honour of Patriarch was given to the Bishop of Jerusalem: From the Times of the Apostles it being esteem'd a great Honour to sit in the Chair placed in the holy City, where our Saviour instituted his Church, and from which the Gospel was spread over all the World: and where the Author of Life conversed amongst us, and where he left the Land sprinkled with his Blood:

*Where his Life he spent, his Life he sacrific'd,
His Body here entomb'd, to Life he rais'd.*

But tho' we may see in a thousand Examples, that the Polity of the Church kept pace with that of the Empire; and as the one chang'd its Form and Disposition, so likewise did the other, yet surely nothing can convince us more of the Truth of this, than the raising of Constantinople to a Patriarchate. After that Constantine the Great had made that City so illustrious and magnificent, by making it the Seat of the Empire of the East, with a Design to render it equal to Rome, and next to which it might be reputed the second City of the World; its Bishop began likewise to exalt himself, and shake off the Yoke of his Metropolitan. Because Constantinople was esteem'd another Rome, we see that in the Council of *Constantinople*¹, the first Honours were allow'd to its Bishop next to that of Rome, eo quod sit Nova Roma. Thus tho' formerly next to the Roman, the first Honours were due to the Patriarchate of Alexandria, yet now that of Constantinople came into its Place. 'Tis true, as Du Pin well proves², that the Honours only were granted its Bishop by the Council, and not any Patriarchal Jurisdiction over the three Autocephalæ Diocesses: But it was enough, that by the specious Pretexts of these Honours, he might begin his Incroachments; it was not long before he invaded Thrace, and exercising there his Exarchal Power, made himself Exarch of that Diocess, and eclips'd the Rights of the Bishop of Heraclea.

AFTER having establish'd himself in Thrace, his Ambition push'd him to extend his Bounds further; he invaded the neighbouring Diocesses, to wit, of Asia and Pontus, and at last subjected them to his Patriarchate. He did not snatch them at once, but from time to time by the Favour of Councils, and more by that of the Emperors. S. John Chrysostome pav'd the Way more than all the other Bishops of Constantinople, for getting full Possession of them: at last he came to usurp not only the Power of Ordaining the Metropolitans of Asia and Pontus, but he obtain'd a Law from the Emperor, that none could be ordain'd Bishops without the Authority of the Patriarch of Constantinople; so that, being supported by this Law, he took upon him afterwards to ordain simple Bishops. Thus did the Patriarchs of Constantinople possess themselves of Asia and Pontus; which afterwards, in order to render their Conquest the more sure, they got confirm'd by the Council of Chalcedon, and by the Edicts of the Emperors³. The Popes oppos'd their aggrandizing themselves so much: S. Leo disputed it with them, as did also his Successors, but especially *Gelasius*⁴, who held the See of Rome from the Year 492. to 496. But all their Endeavours were in vain, because the Patriarchs of Constantinople were all favour'd by the Emperors, so that not only the second Rank of Honour, next to the Patriarch of Rome, was confirm'd, but also the Jurisdiction of Pontus, of Asia, and of Thrace. The Emperor Basilius in one of his Edicts quoted by Evagrius ¹, ratified it to them: The Emperor Zeno by one of his Constitutions, which we yet read in our Code, did the same ²; and lastly, our Justinian by his Novellæ ³, to back what had been ordain'd by the Canons of the Council of Chalcedon, ordered the same, which afterwards was approved of by the Consent of the Universal Church; for the Canons of the Councils of Constantinople and Chalcedon, having been inserted in the Codes of the Canons of the Church, in the following Centuries it was taken for granted, that the Patriarchate of Constantinople held the second Rank of Honour and Jurisdiction over all those three Diocesses.

THUS did this Patriarch out-strip the three others which were in the East: These three Sees lost their ancient Lustre and Splendor, not only by the aggrandizing of the other, and by the frequent Incurfions of the Barbarians, who invaded their Diocesses, but much more by the Factions and Disputes which often arose amongst them, about Elections, and concerning Doctrine and Discipline; and from that Time forward, the Patriarchal Sees were rank'd after this manner; the Roman, the Constantinopolitan, the Alexandrine, the Antiochian, and that of Jerusalem. The Council of Constantinople which was celebrated in the Year 536, observ'd this Order. And Justinian, both in his Code ⁴, and in his Novellæ ⁵ did the same, as also all the other Writers, as well Greek as Latin. However, the Title of Patriarch was not restricted to these five only, sometimes it was given to eminent Metropolitans; so in the above cited Council of Constantinople, it was given to Epiphanus Bishop of Tyre; and Justinian both in his Code, and his Novellæ, generally gives this Title to Exarchs, who had the Government of some Diocesses: But not long after this Title was restricted to the above five only.

BUT in the West it continued, as formerly, to be given to other Bishops and Metropolitans. In Italy our King Athalarick, as we read in Cassiodore ⁶, called the Bishops of Italy Patriarchs, and the Pope their Head, as such, Bishop of the Patriarchs. The Bishops of Aquileja and Grado, are likewise call'd Patriarchs by Paul Warnefride ⁷. In France this Title was also given to the most eminent Metropolitans and Primates. Gregory of Tours ⁸ calls Nicetius, Patriarch of Lyons. The Council of Mascon, which was held in the Year 585, likewise calls Priscus Bishop of that City Patriarch ⁹. Desiderius of Cabors call'd Sulpitius Bishop of Bourges also Patriarch; and Hincmarus of Rheims does not distinguish betwixt the Patriarchs, and the Primates ¹⁰. So likewise in Africa the first Bishop of the Vandals assum'd the Title of Patriarch, at which the Catholick Bishops laugh'd; and in process of Time, the first Bishop of those Nations that embrac'd the Faith of Christ, was call'd Patriarch. Bulgaria being converted to the Faith, the first Archbishop and his Successors took the Name of Patriarch. At this Time the Christians of the East have such Patriarchs, where, excepting those, which are properly call'd Greeks, who still retain the four Patriarchs, of Constantinople, of Alexandria, of Antioch, and of Jerusalem, tho' the Popes use likewise to create Titulars: There are as many Patriarchs as Sects; the Jacobites have their Patriarch; the Maronites theirs; and both take the Title of Patriarch of Antioch. The Copti have likewise theirs, who calls himself Patriarch of Alexandria, and keeps his See there. The Abyssins have theirs, who governs all Ethiopia, tho' it be in a manner subject to the Patriarch of the Copti. The Georgians have an Autosephale Archbishop subject to none. The Armenians have two general Patriarchs: The first resides in Arad a City of Armenia; the other in Cis a City of Caramania.

WE have seen how much the Patriarch of Constantinople raised himself above the other Patriarchs of the East, and how much he enlarg'd the Bounds of his Patriarchate in this Century, to the Empire of Justin. In the two following Centuries we shall see him, being grown much greater, incroach upon other Provinces and Nations; for those Limits being too narrow for his Ambition, in the Time of Leo Isauricus, we shall see him take Possession of Illyricum, Epirus, Achaia, and Macedonia: We shall likewise see him subject Sicily, and many Churches of these our Provinces to his Patriarchate, and in the end dispute with the Pope for Bulgaria, and other Countries.

S E C T. III.

The Ecclesiastical Polity of these our Provinces under the Goths, and under the Greeks, to the Reign of Justin II.

TH E O D O R I C K, and the other Kings of the Ostrogoths his Successors, tho' Arians, suffer'd, as is said, our Churches to continue in Peace; and the same Polity that they found, was by them maintain'd inviolate and untouch'd. The Pope was supported in them, and, as formerly, exercised his Patriarchal Authority over these our Provinces as Suburbicarian, so that he was acknowledg'd both as Patriarch and Metropolitan; for hitherto our Metropolis's, in what concern'd Ecclesiastical Polity, had neither Archbishop nor Metropolitan: In the Cities as formerly, there were simple Bishops, who own'd the Pope for their Metropolitan; whence *Athalariek*¹, who used to give the Title of Patriarch likewise to the Bishops, call'd him the Bishop of the Patriarchs. And in some Cities of Italy, in the Reign of the Goths, as also of the Longobards, who were likewise Arians, there were seen in the same City two Chairs, possessed by two Bishops, the one Catholick, and the other Arian; in these our Provinces, which were always stedfast, and never polluted with the Errors of Arius, all the Bishops profess'd the Faith of Nice, and kept their Churches pure and unspotted, and maintain'd the ancient Doctrine, and the same Discipline, which the Church of Rome their Mistress and Guide observ'd. The Bishops govern'd their Churches by the common Advice of the Presbytery. There was no other Hierarchy observ'd in them, than of Priests, Deacons, Sub-Deacons, Acolyts, Exorcists, Readers, and Door-Keepers.

T H E Bishops were likewise elected by the Clergy and People, and ordain'd by the Pope, as formerly, altho' the Favour of the Princes began to have Weight: *Grotius*² is of Opinion, that the Gothish Kings, whether Arian or Catholick, semper Episcoporum Electiones in sua potestate habuere, and says, that the same was also observ'd by Joannes Garta; but it will not hold true of our Gothish Kings, who made use of no other Power but what had been exercised by the Emperors, both of the West and the East. They, as Guardians and Protectors of the Church, and who look'd upon her Government and outward Polity also to belong to them, believ'd it was in their Power, and incumbent upon them to regulate the Elections by their Laws, to crush Ambition, and to remedy Disorders and seditious Tumults, and often to prevent them; to make up Discords, which often happen'd by the Factions of Parties, and to decide Controversies which arose about these Elections; but they left the Election to the Clergy and the People, as they did the Ordination to the Provincial Bishops, or the Metropolitans. Odoacre King of the Heruli, the more immediate Successor in Italy, to the Rights of the Emperors of the West, than Theodorick; in the Election of the Bishop of Rome, and the other Bishop of Italy, would exercise the same Power: Basilus his Præfectus Prætorio, always had a watchful Eye upon that, and even, as he said, by the Advice of Pope Simplicius, who on his Death-bed gave it him in Charge, to see that no Election was made without his Advice and Direction³.

I T was observ'd, that Theodorick made use of the same Authority in putting an end to the Schism which arose in the Church of Rome in his Time, betwixt Laurentius and Symmachus, as the Emperor Honorius had done, in that betwixt Boniface and Eulalius; by the Death of Pope Anastasius, which fell out in the End of the

Year 493, they both pretended to be advanc'd to that See: Symmachus Deacon of that Church was chosen by the greatest Number, and Ordain'd; but Festus a Senator of Rome, who had promised the Emperor Anastasius to get a Pope chosen, who should be obsequious to his Will, caused Laurentius to be elected and ordain'd. The two Parties went to Ravenna to be judg'd by King Theodorick, who determin'd, that he who had been first elected, and had had the greatest Number of Votes, should be Bishop of Rome: Symmachus had both these Advantages over Laurentius; whereupon he was confirm'd in that See, and in the first Year of his Pontificate held a Council, wherein there were some new Canons made in order to prevent Competitions in such Elections for the future. Those, who had oppos'd the Ordination of Symmachus, seeing him in Possession in spite of them, did all they could to get him turn'd out; therefore they accus'd him of many Crimes, stirr'd up a great Part of the People and Senate against him, and demanded a Visitor of King Theodorick, who might take Cognizance of these Accusations: Theodorick nam'd Peter Bishop of Altino, who rashly, and contrary to Justice, immediately depriv'd the Pope of the Administration of his Diocess, and of all Power over the Church: This precipitate Action rais'd great Disorders, and pernicious Tumults in Rome; for quieting of which, Theodorick in the Year 501, caused a Council to be call'd in Rome, to which he invited all the Bishops of Italy. Almost all the Bishops of our Campania went to it, as also the Bishops of Capua, Naples, Nola, Cuma, Misenum, Pozzuolo, Surrentum, Stabia, Venafro, Sessa, Alife, Avellino, and some others of the other Cities of this Province. From Samnium, the Bishops of Beneventum, Isernia, Bojanum, Altina, Ciети, Amiternum, and others went.

FROM these two Provinces, as being nearest to Rome, there went a great many: From the other two of Puglia and Calabria, of Lucania and Brutium, as being more remote from Rome, and nearer the Greeks, very few went. The Bishops of Emilia, of Liguria, and of Venice, likewise went; who in passing thro' Ravenna, spoke to Theodorick in favour of Symmachus; and being arriv'd at Rome, without so much as examining the Accusations laid against Symmachus, they declar'd him Innocent to the People, and absolv'd him; and they managed it so with King Theodorick, that he was satisfied with the Sentence; and the People and Senate, who had been much incens'd against the Pope, were pleas'd, and acknowledg'd him for true Pontiff. Nevertheless there were still some Malecontents, which occasion'd some Writings against that Synod; but the Bishop of Pavia answer'd them, which was approved of in another Council held in Rome in the Year 503, in which the Sentence of the first Synod was confirm'd. The Calumnies invented against Symmachus were carried to the East, and the Emperor Anastasius, who had left the Communion of the Roman Church, upbraided him with them; Symmachus in an Apologetick Writing justify'd himself sufficiently, and in spite of his Enemies continu'd peaceable Possessor of that See to the Year 514, in which he died.

IN those Times it was reckon'd the peculiar Right of Princes to regulate these Elections, in order to prevent Caballing and Seditions. And Athalarick being mov'd by the preceding Schisms which fell out in Rome about the Election of their Bishop, and desirous to make a Rule for the Time to come, to prevent the like Disorders, in imitation of the Emperors Leo and Antemius, made a rigorous Edict, which he directed to Pope John II. who, in the Year 532, had succeeded to Boniface in the See of Rome, by which he regulated the Elections not only of the Roman Pontiffs, but likewise of all the Metropolitans and Bishops, by imposing severe Penalties on those, who out of Ambition, or by Money, should aspire to possess the Sees, declaring them Sacrilegious and Infamous; and that besides the Restitution of the Money, and other heavy Fines, which were to be employ'd in the Reparation of the Fabricks of the Churches, and in maintaining the Ministers of them, they were to be severely punish'd by their Judges, and their Elections as Simoniackal made void and invalid: By this Edict he provided against Contentions and Debates about Elections, which when complain'd of to him by the People, he immediately caus'd them to be examin'd and decided; declaring, That what he had establish'd by this his Edict, did not only concern the Election of the Bishop of Rome, Sed etiam ad universos Patriarchas, atque Metropolitanas Ecclesias. This Edict was drawn up by *Cassiodore*², who, though he was a Catholick, and most conversant in Ecclesiastical Matters, so much that at present he is esteem'd none of the meanest Writers of the Church, and by some reputed a Saint, perhaps because he died a Monk of Casino ¹, not only made no Difficulty in drawing it up, but even advis'd it, as a Thing very convenient for his Prince; neither was it thought, according to the Maxims of this Age, strange or foreign to his Royal Authority. It was directed to Pope John II. who receiv'd it with a great deal of Respect and Esteem, neither did he ever complain of it; on the contrary, if 'tis true, that that Letter was his, which we read among the Laws of the Code ² written to the Emperor Justinian, wherein he so much commends his Care about the Ecclesiastical Discipline (for Hottomanus ³ and others ⁴ doubt of it, tho' it be asserted by Fachineus ⁵) we see that this Pope never disputed that Power which the Princes claim'd in the Discipline of the Church. And besides Athalarick ordered Salvanti ⁶, who was at this Time Præfect of Rome, that without delay he should publish it to the Senate and People of Rome; and in order to perpetuate the Memory of it to future Ages, ordain'd him to cause it to be engraven on Tables of Marble, which he was to place before the Porch of St. Peter the Apostle for a publick Testimony ⁷.

THE Gothish Kings, as Successors of the Emperors of the West, would keep up all these Prerogatives, which these had exercised in the exterior Ecclesiastical Polity, to which their so many Constitutions which are registred in the last Book of the Theodosian Code, bear Witness. Thus it belonging to them to settle the Degrees, within which Marriages could be contracted ⁸, and to forbid Marriages within the nearest Degrees, and to dispense with them by their Rescripts ⁹, and their taking Cognizance in matrimonial Cases, it ought not to seem strange, that amongst the Formularies related by Cassiodore ¹⁰, we likewise read that of our Gothish Kings made about Dispensations, which were wont to be granted in Degrees prohibited by the Laws. So likewise that the Goths imitated what the Emperors of the West and East did, in not allowing their Subjects without their Consent, to dedicate themselves to the Church, or Monasteries, of which we have many Evidences remaining in the Theodosian Code: Grotius writes ¹¹, Non minus laudanda cautio, quod subditorum suorum neminem permisisse se Ecclesiis, aut Monasteriis mancipare, suo impermissu.

THE same Polity concerning this Matter was kept up in these our Provinces, when they passed from the Goths to the Emperors of the East, and much more under the Emperor Justinian. The Emperors of the East follow'd the same Footsteps; and we read many Edicts concerning the outward Polity of the Church, of the Emperor Martianus, who was the most moderate of them all, as Facundus ¹² Bishop of Hermania in Africa wrote. The Emperor Leo, follow'd afterwards by Athalarick, likewise discharg'd the Election of Bishops by Ambition, or Simony; and besides the Penalty of Degradation imposed by the Council of Chalcedon, he added that of Infamy; and Antemius did the same ¹³. But above all the other Emperors of the East, Justinian was he, who took the greatest Care, and concern'd himself the most about Ecclesiastical Discipline; whence it came to pass, that the last Emperors of the East, not knowing how to keep themselves within Bounds, went so far, that at last they intirely subjected the Priesthood to the Authority of the Prince. His Novellæ for the most part are stuffed with so many Edicts about the Discipline of the Church, that on that account he is reckon'd amongst the Number of the Ecclesiastical Authors: He made many Laws concerning the Ordination of Bishops, their Age, what was requir'd of them in order to qualify them for being elected and promoted to a Bishoprick, their Residence, their Learning, and Privileges, and a Multitude of other Things belonging thereto. He regulated the Convocation of Synods and Councils, and prescrib'd their Time. He made various Rules about the Manners and Conduct of Priests, Deacons, Sub-Deacons, their Immunities and Personal Functions. He made many Edicts touching the Degrading of the Clergy, and the Regularity and Profession of Monks. By his Laws he gave more Strength and Vigour to the Canons, which had been establish'd in divers Councils, injoyning the Observance of them by the Metropolitans, Bishops, and all the other Ecclesiasticks; adding severe Penalties on those who should transgress them, by being deposed and degraded from their Orders; and he put forth many other Edicts concerning Ecclesiastical Matters, which may be seen in his Novellæ, and his Code.

IT belong'd likewise to the Oeconomy of the Prince to prevent the Abuse of the Keys in Bishops: So that when they excommunicated any Person wrongfully, he immediately opposed them; and Justinian himself, by a Law¹, discharg'd the Bishops from Excommunicating, until the Reason should be first verified: And in the Basilici we see yet a particular Law², inhibiting Bishops from Excommunicating without a just Cause, and when what is required by the Canons did not concur; whence it came to pass, that the Princes in their Kingdoms, which they establish'd in Europe after the Decay of the Roman Empire, would maintain this Right, as the Spaniards and French practise, and as we likewise see every Day in our Kingdom; of which we shall have occasion elsewhere to discourse at large. Neither were those Laws in these Times thought to exceed the Imperial Authority, but were commonly receiv'd by Justinian, as well in the East as the West, as Joannes Scholasticus Patriarch of Constantinople, *S. Gregory the Great*³, *Hincmarus*⁴, and others testify: And if the Epistle be not Apocryphal, which we read in our Code⁵, the same Pope John II. commends him and is his Panegyrist, for the Care and Concern which he shew'd for the Ecclesiastical Discipline.

JUSTIN his Successor follow'd his Footsteps, under whose Empire we now see these our Provinces; so that hitherto the Ecclesiastical Polity of them has not been alter'd, but the same retain'd both by the Goths and the Greeks, which had been observ'd in the preceding Centuries under the Successors of Constantine down to Valentinian III. Emperor of the East.

HOWEVER these our Provinces in this Century began to be sensible of some Change with respect to Monachism, which was now in its Perfection, and establish'd in them. Neither the Solitarii nor Canobitæ were establish'd in our Parts, before the Reign of Valentinian, as we have seen in the preceding Book; but no sooner was the Monastick Order compleated in the East, as well by the Laws of the Emperors, as the various Ascetick Treatises, than the Order of St. Basil became, above all the rest, so famous and numerous, that in our two most Neighbouring Provinces to the Greeks, to wit, Puglia and Calabria, Lucania and Brutium, they began to found Monasteries of that Order in some Cities of them, which they call'd Basilians.

IN the two other, which, as they were more distant from the Greeks, so were nearer to Rome, to wit, Campania and Samnium, Monachism was establish'd under many Rules, but especially that of St. Benedict, which Order was so successful, that being establish'd in our Campania, it spread it self in a short time, not only over all Italy, but likewise over France and England.

St. Benedict was born in Norcia, a City in the Diocess of Spoletum, about the Year 480. He was sent to Rome when he was young to Study¹, but being wearied of the World, he retir'd to Subiaco Forty Miles distant from Rome, and shut himself up in a Grotto, where he remain'd for the Space of three Years, without being known to any body, except to Romanus a Monk, who supplied him with Food from his Neighbouring Monastery. Being afterwards known, the Monks of a Monastery in the Neighbourhood, by the Death of their Superior, elected him for their Abbot; but their Ways not suiting with those of Benedict, he retir'd again to his Solitude, where being visited by many People, he built twelve Monasteries, of which the Abbot of Nuce gives us the Names, and the Places where they were founded¹. From thence, in the Year 529, he came to our *Campania*², and settled himself on the Hill which takes its Name from Cassinum, an ancient Roman Colony, situated on the Side of it, about Fifty Miles distant from Subiaco, and Seventy from Rome. Hard by, he threw down a Relick of Gentilism, which had continued in that Corner in the Time of the Goths, and in its Place erected a Church, which he dedicated to SS. Martin and John. The prodigious Things he did there, and the Sanctity of his Life, drew People to that Place, and many remain'd with him under his Rules. He became much more famous, by the Opinion and Esteem which Totila King of Italy, and a great many noble Romans had of him: On which Account, the Number of his Monks encreas'd, and Personages of the greatest Note enroll'd themselves there; whence he extended his Rule, and laid the Foundation of a great Order.

THE Devotion of the People, and the Fame of his Sanctity, drew likewise the Piety of many Nobles to enrich him with Lands and Goods. Tertullus a Roman Patrician, while St. Benedict was still alive, gave him all that Tract of Land which lies round the Monastery³; whence Zacharias in his Diploma, said, that this Monastery was built *in solo Tertulli*⁴: He likewise gave him many other Possessions which he had in Sicily; and Gordonius, Father of St. Gregory the Great, gave him a Village which he possessed in the Neighbourhood of Aquinum. Thus, by degrees, Benedict being still alive, this Monastery began to grow very numerous and famous for the Quality of its Monks, and rich by the many Donations which were daily made. Its Fame could not be confin'd to Campania only; Monks of known Probity and Learning were sent to found other Monasteries in the other Provinces. Cassiodore, one of the most famous Men of this Age, when he was Seventy Years old, retired from the Court and turn'd Monk; and being entic'd by the Fame of St. Benedict, who was yet alive, he would build a Monastery in Brutium, particularly in Squillace the Place of his Birth, and according to *P. Garetius*⁵ and *Du Pin*⁶, he put it under the Rule of St. Benedict, under which he liv'd; and afterwards govern'd it himself, and spent the remaining Twenty-five Years of his Life there: He died very old, at the Age of more than Ninety-five Years, about the Year 565 of our Salvation, whence Bacon of Verulam makes him about an Hundred⁷.

THIS is the Vivariefian or Castellefian Monastery of which P. Garetius, a Benedictine Monk of the Congregation of St. Maur, treats at large⁸; founded by Cassiodore its Abbot, not far from Squillace, at the Foot of the Mountain commonly call'd Moscio or Castellese, from a Village of that Name in the Neighbourhood, the Foot of which is wash'd by the River Pelena now call'd Squillace. It was named Vivariefis, because Cassiodore, while he enjoy'd the highest Honours at the Court of the Gothish Kings, used to go often for his Recreation to Squillace, the Place of his Nativity, and on account of the Conveniency, and the Abundance of the Water of that River which wash'd the Foot of the Hill, he caus'd many Ponds to be made⁹. Having afterwards, by reason of the declining State of the Goths, abandon'd the Court, and become Monk, he retir'd to this Place where he had made his Ponds, and where likewise his Estate was, and built this Monastery, where he compos'd the greatest Part of his Works, and in which he had for a Companion *Dionysius Exiguus*¹⁰. He enrich'd it with his Estate and a Library, and made it famous and numerous in Monks; causing many Cells to be built on the Top of the Hill, for those who were willing to leave the Monastick Life and become Hermits, and from Cœnobitæ, to become Anchoritæ and *Solitarii*¹. Before he died, he left Calcedonius and Gerontius Abbots, the one to govern the Hermits, who were retir'd to the Top of the Hill Castellese, the other the Cœnobitæ of the Vivariefian Monastery. *P. Garetius*² also relates, that after he died, the Benedictine Monks kept it many Years; but afterwards the Basilians intruded themselves into their Place, who possessed it a long time, until it was entirely destroy'd and ruin'd by the subsequent Irruptions of the Saracens. Thus not only in the neighbouring Samnium and in Puglia, were Monasteries of this Order begun to be built in these Days, but likewise in the Provinces more remote and distant.

St. B E N E D I C T in the last Year of his Life, sent Placidus his Disciple to found Monasteries of his Order in Sicily, where, by the Donations of Tertullus, and the Devotion of these People, it was propagated over the whole Island. At the same time he sent other Missions into France, where St. Maurus, Faustus, and their Companions made wonderful Progress. According to Leo of Ostia, and others, St. Benedict died in the Year 543, or according to some others, in the Year 547, the precise Day and Year in which he died not being in any of the Writers made clear, about which the Abbot of *Nuce*³ has toiled and fatigued himself so much, as if it was a very important Point of History; but the Prosperity of his Order was rather greater after his Death: Forasmuch as the Monasteries multiplied much more, and spread themselves not only in Italy, Sicily, and France, but likewise in England, and other more remote Provinces of Europe.

T H U S these our two Provinces of Campania and Samnium had a much greater Number of Monasteries of this Order, than the other two, because of their greater Distance; but on the contrary, those founded under the Rule of St. Basil were more numerous in Puglia and Calabria. In Brutium and Lucania, and the Maritime Cities of Campania, such as Naples, Gaeta, Amalphis, and some others, which for the most part continued a long time under the Emperors of the East, as being near to the Greeks, and with whom they had much more frequent Commerce, those Institutions were embraced more readily, and the Rule of St. Basil was so very famous and renown'd in the East, that all, or the most Part of the Monasteries which were founded there, were establish'd under that Order. In Naples, St. Agnellus was the first, for what we know, who establish'd a Monastery there, first begun by St. Gaudiosus, who was Abbot of it. Some believ'd⁴ that St. Agnellus follow'd the Rule of St. Benedict; but *P. Caracciolus*⁵ proves very clearly, that he was a Basilian Monk, who, finding that St. Gaudiosus, when he retir'd to Naples, where he died in the Year 452, before St. Benedict was born, had erected a Monastery there, establish'd the Rule of St. Basil; an Order which in those Times was become very famous and renown'd. Neither was it subject to the Rule of St. Benedict, till after the Year 590, when Agnellus was dead; then the Benedictines began to be in greater Esteem, and made themselves more renown'd. A long time after, in an Age less distant from us, about the Year 1517, it was possess'd by the Canons Regular of the Congregation of our Saviour⁶, who remain in it to this Day. And so in the Sixth Century, as also in the following, many of these Monasteries were seen in Naples under the Rule of St. Basil; such as the Monastery of Gazares on the Sea-shore; of SS. Nicander and Martian; of St. Sebastian, of SS. Basil and Anastasius in the Ward of Amelia; of St. Demetrius in the Ward of Albina; of St. Spirito, or Spirido; of St. Gregory Armenus in the Ward of Nostriana; of St. Mary of Agno; of St. Samona; of SS. Quiricus and Julitta, and others, both in Naples and elsewhere⁷.

T H U S were Monasteries introduc'd into these our Provinces. The first that appear'd were under the Rules of St. Basil and St. Benedict, whence it was (the Societies of Women being already begun, who made a Vow of Virginity, and after a certain time receiv'd the Veil with Solemnity) that there were likewise seen Monasteries of Women under the Rule of St. Benedict, who had for their Head Scolastica his Sister ; and also under that of Basil, which are the most ancient that are found in these our Provinces. Thus was the Monastick Order establish'd with us, which however had not made that wonderful Progress which it did afterwards. Neither had the Abbots and Monks as yet been withdrawn from the Jurisdiction of the Bishops, nor had the Popes granted them so many Privileges, which they afterwards did, in order to have them at their Devotion, and to be their Vassals. Nevertheless Monte Casino became one of the two most famous Sanctuaries, which our Provinces had in this Age, whither Pilgrims flock'd from all Parts of the World. At the same time another was sprung up in Puglia in Monte Gargano, on Account of St. Michael's having appear'd, as 'tis said, in that Grotto in the Time of Pope Gelasius, while Laurentius was Bishop of Sipontum. Sanctuaries, which in the Reign of the Longobards and Normans, became so conspicuous and renown'd, that by their wonderful Fame they drew to them not only Pilgrims from the remotest Parts of the World, but likewise the greatest Kings and Monarchs of Europe, and the most mighty Princes of the Earth.

Ecclesiastical Statutes and new Collections.

THE Ecclesiastical Statutes in these Times, as well concerning Doctrine as Discipline, were very ample and numerous. As there were many Occasions for calling many Synods and Councils, so consequently very many Canons were establish'd. They began likewise to establish some of those which belong'd to the Authority of Princes. The Degrees of Kindred, which were formerly regulated according to the Civil Law, were now regulated by the Canons; and the Prohibition of Marriage was extended to Cousins, and the Children of Cousins. Theodosius the Great had formerly forbidden Marriage betwixt Cousins, which Arcadius and Honorius his Sons confirm'd, as St. Ambrose declares¹: Justinian afterwards allow'd it²; whence Tribonianus being to insert this Law of *Theodosius*³ in his Code, mangled it indiscreetly, that it might not clash with what Justinian had alter'd in it⁴. The Canons now forbid it, not only betwixt Cousins, as Theodosius had done, but likewise betwixt their Children; and introduced a new Method of reckoning the Degrees, which *Cujacius*⁵ thinks not to be older than St. Gregory the Great and Pope Zachary. There were as yet no Regulations made about the Goods of the Church, but they being at this Time increas'd, and squander'd away by the Ecclesiasticks, they began to make Canons to prevent the Wasting and Alienation of them. It belong'd to the Prince to forbid servile Works on the Lord's-day, and the Emperors practis'd it, as may be seen by the Laws of Leo and *Antemius*⁶; but now we see Canons made likewise concerning that. It belong'd to the Emperors to declare Churches to be Sanctuaries⁷, concerning which we read many Constitutions in the Theodosian Code; but now this Right is also determin'd by the Canons. There were moreover many Constitutions made concerning Usury and Divorces, and other Matters, the Care and Regulating of which belong'd to, and was in the Power of the Princes: Whence it is, that their Number has grown immense; which occasion'd other Codes, and new Compilations.

We have seen in the foregoing Book, that before the Reign of Valentinian III. neither the Western nor the Eastern Churches knew any other Statutes, but those which were collected in the Code of the Canons of the Universal Church, compiled by Stephen Bishop of Ephesus. But afterwards, in the first Year of the Empire of Justinian 527, the Collection of Dionysius Exiguus appear'd. This was a Scythian Monk who lived in Rome, and was the first that introduc'd the Custom of numbering the Years from the Birth of Christ our Lord, as we continue to do¹; for formerly they computed, either after the ancient manner of Rome by the Consuls; or from the first Establishment of the Greek Princes, Successors of Alexander; or from the Times of the Martyrs, who suffered Martyrdom under Dioclesian; and in Spain, from the Æra of the Emperor Augustus, which was Thirty-eight Years before the Birth of Christ. He was in great Esteem with Cassiodore, who courted him, for instructing his Monks of the Vivariensis Monastery in Learning, and particularly Philosophy²: He read Logick there with Cassiodore, and remain'd many Years his Companion in that Magistery. The Encomiums which Cassiodore gave him are to be read in his Works³. He enrich'd the Latin Church with many faithful Translations of the Works of the Greeks; and at the Request of Stephen Bishop of *Salona*⁴ in Dalmatia, he translated the Collection of the Greek Canons very faithfully into Latin, which was more than could be said of the ancient Latin Translation made use of in the West: To this he added all that was in the Greek Code, to wit, Fifty Apostolical Canons, those of the Council of Chalcedon, Sardica, Carthage, and other African Councils.

H E likewise added the Decretal Epistles of Pope Syricius, who died in the Year 398, (an Argument, that the Epistles formerly related of Syricius are Apocryphal). Those are called Decretal Letters, which the Popes wrote upon their being consulted by the Bishops for deciding Points of Discipline, and which were put amongst the Canons. So the Greeks put the three Letters of St. Basil to Amphilochus, and some others of the most famous Bishops of the greater Sees⁵, amongst the Canons. To these afterwards, after the Death of Dionysius, were added the Decrees of Gregory II. contain'd in Seventeen Chapters, as has been observ'd by Peter de Marca Archbishop of *Paris*⁶: What is surprizing is, that tho' the Greek Code, which Dionysius made use of, ends with the first Constantinopolitan Council, to which he annex'd the Canons of the Council of Chalcedon, (as Dionysius himself affirms in the Preface to Stephen Bishop of Salona) as he did the African Canons; and those of Sardica; yet, tho' his Subject seem'd to require it, he makes not the least mention of the Ephesian Council, or of its Canons made in the Year 431, tho' these Canons are in the Greek Code publish'd by Justellus in the Year 1610; so that their Opinion is confuted, who believ'd, that Justinian in his 131st Novella made in the Year 541, did confirm and give the Force of Laws to the Code of the Canons compil'd by Dionysius; for Justinian in that Novella likewise confirms the Canons made in the Ephesian Council, where he says; Sancimus vicem legum obtinere Sanctas Ecclesiasticas Regulas, &c. in Ephesina prima, in qua Nestorius est damnatus, &c. *Doviat*⁷ therefore says, That Dionysius makes no mention of it, because that Council made no Canons concerning Discipline, but only concerning the Execution of the Condemnation of Nestorius, and his Adherents.

T H I S Collection of Dionysius had all Authority and Force in the West and in these our Provinces⁸; and by Pope *Nicholas I.*⁹ it is call'd, by way of Pre-eminency, Codex Canonum, and by the Canon Law *Corpus Canonum*¹⁰: And in subsequent Times it had so much Force, that in the Year 787, it being sent in a Present by Adrian I. to *Charles the Great*¹¹, this Prince order'd the Bishops of France to take care to see the Canons contain'd in it observ'd; and caus'd these Decrees to be inserted in his Capitularia of Aix la Chapelle, which he order'd to be compos'd in the Year 789, as Justellus says¹².

A B O U T the same time, in the Year 547, Fulgentius Ferrandus Dean of Carthage made another Collection of Canons¹³, but after a different manner, rather quoting than relating them, and under each Head he recapitulates the Canons of different Councils, of which Gratian in his Decree makes mention¹⁴.

CARDINAL BARONIUS¹ reckons, that about the same time the Collections of Martin of Braga and of Cresconius were made. Others believe², that that of Martin's was made about the Year 572, and that of Cresconius's about the Year 670. Martin, a Hungarian by Nation, and a Benedictine Monk, was Bishop of Braga in Portugal. He made his Collection for the Use of the Churches of Spain, by translating the Greek Synods, and adding other Canons of the Latin Councils, and especially those of the Council of Toledo; therefore that Collection was not made use of but in Spain, excepting for Illustration³.

CRESCONIUS a Bishop of Africa composed his Collection of Canons, of which we have a Compendium; the Title of which, according to a Manuscript which Baronius relates, was this; Concordia Canonum a Cresconio Africano Episcopo digesta sub capitibus trecentis: And because he likewise makes mention there of a Poem in Hexameter Verse, composed by Cresconius himself for celebrating the Wars, and the Victories gain'd by Joannes Patricius over the Saracens of Africa, Baronius concludes, that he liv'd about the Time of Justinian the Emperor.

JOANNES SCHOLASTICUS, after Eutichius had been banish'd, was advanced to the Patriarchate of Constantinople by the Emperor *Justinian*⁴, and surviv'd him, and was the first who made a Collection in the East, wherein he join'd the Canons with the Laws, especially the Novellæ of Justinian, which kind of Book was afterwards, by the subsequent Writers, call'd Nomocanon; and tho' this Collection divided into fifty Titles, was of some use at first, nevertheless Theodore Balsamon in his Supplement observes, that in his time, to wit, about the End of the twelfth Century, it was in no Esteem, as having been eclips'd by the Nomocanon of Photius, which was more useful, and more full⁵.

THESE were the Collections of Canons, which, after the Code of the Canons of the Universal Church, appear'd in the subsequent Times, down to the Empire of Justin, Successor of *Justinian*⁶; they had not the Force of Laws, but when it was given them by the Emperors and Princes. The Church had not as yet acquir'd compleat Jurisdiction, so as to make her Statutes have the Authority of Laws, and thereby oblige the Faithful to observe them by Secular Force, or to punish the Transgressors with Temporal Penalties; their Souls were only bound by the meer Dint of Religion, and the Pains and Punishments only Spiritual by Censures, Penitence, and Deposition. The Princes, by the Means of their Constitutions, gave them the Force of Laws, by obliging their Subjects to the Observance of them by Temporal Force, as the Novellæ of Justinian in the East, the Collection of Joannes Scholasticus, the Nomocanones of Photius, and Balsamo testify; in France the Capitularia of Charles the Great; in Spain the Laws of those Kings, by which, the Canons establish'd in the Councils held in Toledo, or elsewhere, gave them all Force and Authority; and in Italy, the so many Edicts of Theodorick and Athalarick, which we read in Cassiodore.

SECT. VI.

Of the Cognizance of CAUSES.

THE Ecclesiastical State, during the Dominion of the Goths in these our Provinces, acquired no greater Power of Cognizance, or of trying of Causes in Judgment, than what it had in the preceding Centuries under the Successors of Constantine down to the Empire of Valentinian III. It was still confin'd to the Cognizance of Matters of Faith and Religion, of which it judg'd in Form of Polity;

Polity ; to the Correction of Manners, of which it cognosced by way of Censure ; and to Differences that arose amongst Christians, which it decided by way of Arbitration and friendly Composition : It had not as yet acquir'd compleat Jurisdiction ; neither had it a Court of Justice, nor Territory ; neither were its Judges become Magistrates. Theodorick, and the other Kings his Successors, kept it within its Bounds, nor did its Cognizance exceed the Limits of its Spiritual Power, excepting in those three Emergencies already related ; in all other Things, the Ecclesiastics observ'd the Civil Laws, and, as Members of the Civil Society, obey'd the Secular Magistrate, as all others did, as well in Criminal as Civil Cases, by whom they were judg'd and punish'd. The Accusations were reported to the Prince, that he might either judge them, or appoint others to hear the Cause, and they were often banish'd for their Faults, or depos'd from their Charges. We have seen how the People of Rome carried the Accusations which they had invented against Symmachus to Ravenna to King Theodorick, that he might take Cognizance of them, demanding a Visitor from him, which he gave them, in order to try him ; the Bishops of Italy did the same against Damasus, having had their recourse unto the Emperors Gratian and Valentinian, intreating them to judge that Pope whom they had accus'd. 'Twas no strange thing in these Times, for Kings to send the Bishops, as their Subjects, and the Pope himself, to sundry Parts, as Business requir'd, and to call them at their Pleasure, and they were always ready and most obedient. Pope John I. was sent by King Theodorick to Constantinople, for obtaining from the Emperor Justin I. the Revocation of one of his Edicts, whereby he had ordain'd, That the Churches of the Arians should be given to the Catholics : And this Embassy not having had that Success which Theodorick expected, he imputed it to the Want of Fidelity in Pope John, and his Ill-conduct ; so that as he was returning through Italy, he caus'd him to be arrested in Ravenna, where he died the 27th Day of March in the Year 526 : And Theodatus sent Pope Agapitus to Constantinople for treating with Justinian about the Peace which he so much long'd for.

KING ATHALARICK ordain'd by his Edict drawn up by *Cassiodore*¹, that those, who by Simony and Ambition had been elected, should be accus'd before his Judges, and severely punish'd, and appointed Rewards for the Accusers, by giving them the third Part of what they should be condemned in, and the rest to be employ'd upon the Fabricks of the Churches, and the Maintenance of their Ministers.

AS for their Civil Causes, the same Jurisdiction was continued to the Secular Magistrates as they had formerly ; they behov'd to lay their Case before them, propose their Actions, and, being summoned, give Bail Judicio Sisti. Only King Athalarick favour'd the Church of Rome in that, by approving of a Custom which had been introduc'd among her Clergy, of her Priests being first to be brought or accus'd before their Bishop. The Secular Magistrates, which had been appointed in Rome by that Prince for the Administration of Justice, and which was practis'd in all the other Provinces, forced a Deacon of that Church, at the Suit of his Creditor, to satisfy a Debt ; and were so hard upon him, that they deliver'd him up to the Creditor himself to keep him in Custody. Another Priest of that same Church being accused on a slight Occasion, they us'd him very severely, and handled him very roughly. The Clergy of Rome, with mournful Lamentations and Prayers, had recourse to Athalarick, setting forth to him, that in their Church, by a long Custom, to the end their Priests by being involv'd in Law-Suits, and the Affairs of the World, might not be diverted from Divine Worship, it had been usual to cite them before their Bishop ; notwithstanding which, one of their Priests and a Deacon had been roughly and reproachfully used ; therefore they intreated the Clemency of that Prince to put a Stop to such Proceedings for the future. The King, at their Entreaty, answer'd, That out of the Reverence and Honour which was due to that Apostolical See², from that time forward he ordain'd, That if any Person had occasion to summon any Priest of the Clergy of Rome, on whatsoever Account it might be, he was first to have recourse to the Judgment of the Bishop of that See, who, either himself was to enquire more Suæ

² Cass. lib. 8. cap. 24. Considerantes Apostolicę sedis honorem.

Sanctitatis into the Merits of the Cause, or to delegate it, æquitatis Studio terminandum; but if the Plaintiff or Accuser, after using that Respect, should find himself amused and delay'd, tunc ad Sæcularia fora iurgaturus occurrat: If contrary to this his Ordinance, he first had recourse to the Secular Tribunals, he should be oblig'd to pay a Fine of Ten Pounds of Gold, which was to be immediately receiv'd by his Treasurers, and by the Hands of the Bishop distributed amongst the Poor, and besides to lose his Cause, and thus be doubly punish'd. But at the same time, Athalarick did not neglect to admonish them to live suitably to their State, telling them; Magnum scelus est crimen admittere, quos nec conversationem decet habere sæcularem; professio vestra vita cælestis est. Nolite ad mortaliū vota humilia, & errores descendere. Mundani coarceantur humano jure, vos sanctis moribus obedite.

WE see then that in these Times, in all the other Churches, the Secular Magistrates had the Cognizance and Jurisdiction of the Causes of Ecclesiasticks as well Civil as Criminal, and that they were subject to their Judgment and Fines; and tho' Athalarick gave this Indulgence to the Clergy of Rome only, out of respect to that See, yet nevertheless he gave no manner of Jurisdiction to the Bishop or his Delegates; but only, that they were to determine them more suæ Sanctitatis, & æquitatis Studio, by way of Arbitration and charitable Composition, not by way of Judgment and litigious Justice.

JUSTINIAN then was the first who began to enlarge the Cognizance of the Bishops in Ecclesiastical Causes, and granted them the Privilege of not pleading before Laick Judges. As this Prince was both Pious and Religious, so he enlarg'd the Cognizance of the Bishops, ordaining, by his Novellæ ¹, That in Civil Actions the Monks and Clerks should be first conven'd before the Bishop who was to decide their Differences immediately without Process, without any Noise, or judicial Dispute; upon condition however, that if one of the Parties should declare within ten Days that he would not acquiesce to his Sentence, the ordinary Magistrate should take Cognizance of the Cause, not by Way of Appeal, as some have believ'd, and as superior to the Bishop in that, but begin anew; and if he gave the same Judgment with the Bishop, there was no Appeal from him; but if otherwise, there was room for Appealing. And as for Criminal Causes, it was allow'd to pursue the Clergy either before the Bishop or the ordinary Judge, except in Ecclesiastical Crimes, such as Heresy, Simony, Disobedience to the Bishop, and all other Things concerning their Quality, the Cognizance of which belong'd to the Bishop only; as did also the Differences concerning Religion and Ecclesiastical Polity even against Laicks. Moreover he ordain'd, That if in Criminal Causes any of the Clergy should be condemn'd by the Laick Judge, his Sentence could not be put in Execution, nor a Priest degraded, without the Approbation of the Bishop; and if he refus'd, Application was made to the Emperor. And as for the Bishops, he granted them this Privilege, of not being oblig'd to plead before the Laick Magistrates, which Privilege he likewise allow'd the Nuns by his Novella 79, which Interpreters have wrongfully extended to the Monks. And that Regulation of Justinian contain'd in his 123d Novellæ is almost intirely repeated in the Constitutions of the Emperor Constantine III. Son of Heraclius, and of Alexius Comnenus, related by Balsamon in the Sixth Title of his Nomocanon. Thus, by the Privilege of the Prince, the Cognizance of the Bishops began to be enlarg'd; nevertheless, they did not at this Time acquire compleat Justice, which the Law calls Jurisdiction, over the Priests, they not having in those Days Jus Terrendi, nor any coercive Power; therefore they could not, by their own Authority, imprison Ecclesiastical Persons, neither had they any Prisons: They could not inflict Corporal Punishments, Banishment, and much less Mutilation of Members or Death, even for the greatest Crimes; nor condemn in Pecuniary Mulcts.

THE Punishments which they inflicted were Depositions, Suspension of Orders, Fastings, and Penance; which Form of Discipline continu'd throughout all the Eighth Century; which Gregory II. excellently well observes in that fine Epistle which he directed to Leo Isauricus ², wherein he shews the great Difference there was betwixt the Imperial Punishments and those of the Church: The Emperors condemn'd to Death, Imprison'd, and Banish'd the Guilty, and confin'd them to a certain Place ; none of which the Popes could do : Sed ubi, as his Words are, peccavit quis, & confessus fuerit, suspendii, vel amputationis capitis loco, Evangelium, & Crucem ejus cervicibus circumponunt, eumque tanquam in carcerem, in Secretaria, Sacrorumque vasorum æraria conjiciunt, in Ecclesiæ Diaconia, & in Catecumena obligant, ac visceribus eorum jejunium, oculisque vigilias, & laudationem ori ejus inducunt. Cumque probe castigarint, præbeque fame afflixerint, tum pretiosum illi Domini Corpus impartiunt, & Sancto illum sanguine potant : & cum illum vas Electionis restituerint, ac immunem peccati, sic ad Deum, purum insontemque transmittunt. Vides, Imperator, Ecclesiarum, Imperiorumque discrimen, &c.

HOWEVER the Ecclesiasticks had begun in these Times, to usurp the Power of burning the Books of Hereticks, because in the Year 443. St. Leo the Pope burnt many Books of the Manichei in Rome, whereas at first Censure belong'd only to the Church, but Prohibition and Burning to the Prince¹, concerning which we shall have occasion to discourse more at large.

Of TEMPORALITIES.

THE Cognizance of Causes did not keep pace with the Increase of the Temporalities in our Churches ; the last out-stripp'd the first very much. The Princes did not much mind the Acquisitions which were daily made ; they not only neglected to put a Stop to their excessive Growth, as Theodosius the Great and his Successors did, but they even contributed to them by Donations and Privileges¹ ; whereas formerly, Purchases were made by the Churches only : but now that the Monasteries began to be founded in these our Provinces, they had likewise their Share, and the Monasteries of St. Benedict, from their first Institution, gave many good Presages of their future Riches.

BESIDES new Sources were discover'd, from whence sprung greater Riches. In these Times Sanctuaries had their Beginning ; and the Veneration for the Relicks of the Saints began to be much greater than it had formerly been. The many Miracles which were publish'd ; the Apparitions of Angels ; the particular Devotions to Saints ; and the Exhortations of Monks, drew the People, out of Devotion, to offer abundance of Riches to their Monasteries. The giving or leaving by Will to the Churches, was, in these Times, look'd upon as a most powerful Means for obtaining the Remission of Sins. *Salvianus*², who flourish'd in the Reign of Anastasius, exhorted many godly People to relieve their Souls, ultima rerum suarum oblatione : Whence it is that we often read in the Donations made to Churches this Clause ; Pro Redemptione animarum, &c.

THERE was likewise a new Fund much more stable than the former, from which they drew good Profits. Tythes, which in the three first Centuries were free and voluntary : In the fourth and fifth, by reason of the Lukewarmness of the Faithful in giving them, were recommended by the Preachings and Exhortations of the Priests, to the end that they might not be left off : In this sixth Century they became due and necessary. Seeing at this time Preachings and Exhortations did not avail, it was necessary to have recourse to more powerful and vigorous Assistance ; so they began to think of establishing them by the Way of Precepts and Canons. Thus by many Councils of the West, and many Decretals of the Popes, the Use of paying them became a Law. By these and other Means, the Riches of the Churches began to increase and be very considerable, and they were in Possession of particular Inheritances. The Church of Rome, above all the rest, became the richest, and in such a degree, that Paulus Warnefridus ¹ relates, when Trafimondus King of the Vandals in Africa had banish'd 220 Bishops, Symmachus, who was then Bishop of Rome, caus'd them all to be furnish'd with every Thing necessary for their Sustenance. They not only contriv'd ways for acquiring of Riches, but likewise means by which to preserve them; for with Riches were join'd Looseness of Discipline and Manners: The Ecclesiasticks appropriated them to themselves as their own Goods, whereas formerly they were look'd upon only as the Patrimony of the Poor, consequently they were ill employ'd and worse distributed; whence it was that many Councils (although before this Time there had not any Regulation been made concerning this Matter) were mov'd to establish a great many Canons, discharging Alienations, regulating the Method of distributing them, and especially for taking care to preserve and secure them. However 'tis likewise true, that the Princes notwithstanding that, did not fail to make Laws concerning the Goods of the Church, by regulating the Acquisitions, and sometimes also the Manner of distributing them, and by discharging their being put to wrong Uses; and Justinian assures us, that by his own Prerogative he establish'd many Laws concerning them ².

THE Division of the Fruits of these Goods into four Parts; one to the Administrator or Incumbent, the second to the Church, the third to the Poor, and the fourth to the Clergy; which is attributed to Pope Simplicius, who was chosen in the Year 468, was not always fix'd, nor the same over all the Provinces of the West. In France, in the first Council of Orleans ³ assembled in the Year 511, the one half was assign'd to the Bishop, and the other to the Clergy. In Spain, from the first Council of Braga ⁴ held in the Year 563, the Division of the Oblations was reserv'd for the Clergy all in common. But afterwards in the fourth Council of Toledo conven'd under King Sisenandus in the Year 633, it was ordain'd, that the Bishops should have the third Part of the Rents ⁵. Thus, as Gratian ⁶ very much to the purpose observes, according to the Diversity of Places, and the Customs of Countries, in some a third, and in others a fourth Part was reserv'd for the Bishop; such Divisions were not always unalterable and perpetual.

HOW great soever the Increase of the Temporalities of our Churches and Monasteries were in this sixth Century, nevertheless, in respect of the immense and excessive Acquisitions, which were afterwards in the Times of the Longobards and Normans, it was tolerable; no great Alteration happen'd to the Civil State on account of it: We shall see it greater under the Longobards, of whose Kingdom we are now going to treat.

THE
CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of NAPLES.

BOOK IV.

THE Longobards acknowledge their Origin from none other but the Goths, and the Peninsula of Scandinavia was the common Mother of both: A Country, which by Jornandes was rightly call'd Vagina gentium, and which justly may boast of having produc'd all those Princes, who for a long time were Lords and Masters of Spain, of a good part of the Gallia, and especially of Italy, which, tho' recover'd from the Goths, yet soon fell under the Dominion of the Longobards; and these having afterwards fail'd, under that of the Normans, who likewise boast of the same Origin¹. The Gepidæ descended of the Stock of the Goths, and who came out of the same Peninsula, together with the Goths, stopp'd at the *Vistula*²: From thence, after having overcome the Burgundians, they advanc'd, as Procopius relates, to both the Banks of the Danube; from whence, as Vopiscus writes, they infested the Romans by the many Incursions and Robberies which they committed in that Country. Lastly, while the Emperor Martian reign'd in the East, having driven the Huns out of Pannonia, they fix'd their Residence

there. Moreover, grave Writers affirm it for certain, that the Gepidæ having fallen out amongst themselves, the Longobards sprung from this Division; whence *Salmafius*¹ declares, that he had read in some ancient Greek Books, not as yet printed, that the Gepidæ were call'd Longobards: Gepidæ qui dicuntur Longobardi; and Constantinus Porphyrogenitus, Emperor of Constantinople, from the History of Theophanes (who is honoured by the Greeks as a Saint) likewise writes that the Longobards sprung from the Division of the *Gepidæ*².

PROSPER AQUITANIUS Bishop of Rhegium, who wrote before Paul Warnefride Deacon of Aquileja, is the first that mentions the Longobards, whom he brings from Scandinavia to the Banks of the Ocean, in quest of new Habitations, first under Ibo and Ajo their Captains, they overcame the Vandals, and were call'd Winili, that is to say, Wanderers, because at this Time they had no fix'd Residence; but afterwards having elected Agilmundus for their King, and over-run diverse Countries, at last they settled themselves in Pannonia. After Agilmundus they had for their Kings successively, Lamiscus, Leta, Ildeock, Gudeock, Claffus, *Tatus*³, and after these Waltau; of which Prince none other make mention, as having reign'd but a short time, and in continual Wars. Afterwards Wacus and Andoinus succeeded, and lastly Alboinus; who having made a settled and strict Peace and Friendship with Narses, was reserv'd for the future Conquest of Italy.

HOW this People took the Name of Longobards, we need no other Voucher than *Paul Warnefride*⁴, who writes, that these Winili were call'd Longobards from the Length of their Beards, which they kept very carefully from being touch'd with Iron; because in their Language, Lang signifies Long, and Baert, Beard: In which *Constantinus Porphyrogenitus*⁵, *Otbo Frisingensis*⁶, *Gunterus*⁷, and Grotius agree.

I KNOW that some modern Writers, not contented with what so ancient and grave Authors have reported, have gone to other Countries to find out the Origin of this People, and have derived the Name of Longobards, not from the Length of their Beards, but as the Abbot *de Nuce*⁸ believ'd, from that of their Halbards, and others from something else.

SOME have deny'd that they came out of Scandinavia, but from the inner Parts of Germany; they say, that long before the Time mention'd of their coming out of that Peninsula, Strabo, Tacitus, Ptolemeus, and *Paterculus*⁹, make mention of the Longobards, as a People who liv'd in the Heart of Germany; therefore their Name being more ancient, we must not take it from their Beards, as Paul Warnefride has asserted, but it must be deriv'd from something else. The Difficulty was easily solv'd by the incomparable *Hugo Grotius*¹⁰; for this Name signifies nothing else but Men with long Beards, as all the Germans, and Warnefride himself acknowledge: Now Names of this Kind which are deriv'd from different Habits and Aspects, arise and spread themselves, sometimes among one People, sometimes among another, in different Places, and likewise in most distant Times, according as the Novelty and Odness appear. Among the Germans, as Tacitus relates, it was a most common Custom to let their Hair and Beards grow, and they never used to cut their Hair, but when they had overcome their Enemies; but when it happen'd, that a great Knot of Men appear'd in another Country, with a very new and strange Aspect, certainly the People of that Country gave them their Name from that new and strange Aspect which had astonish'd them; therefore 'tis no wonder, if that Novelty, sometimes in one Place, sometimes in another, was the Occasion of new Names: Whence had Domitius Enobarbus, Fredericus Barbarossa, and some other famous Pyrates of that Name their Denominations? The Name was common to them only, from the Similitude of their Aspects. 'Tis reasonable then, that in such Matters we should give Credit to ancient Writers, and especially to Paul Warnefride in what concerns the Longobards, who though he was born in Italy, was originally a Longobard, and he is the only and proper Writer of their Actions. Wherein this Writer fails, we may have recourse to Erchempertus, and after him to other contemporary Writers, of which there are many¹; so that Grotius advises us to believe the Ancients, when these new Writers produce nothing that's more credible or certain; and to hold with the first, that the Vandals, the Ostrogoths and Westrogoths, the Gepidæ and Longobards, all of them owe their Origin to Scandinavia.

BUT be that as it will, 'tis manifest to every Body, that the Longobards after having roam'd about in many Countries of Europe, at last fix'd themselves in Pannonia, in which Province they rul'd Forty-two Years, and they reckon from Agil-moldus to Alboinus, ten Kings under whom they liv'd. In the Reign of Alboinus, Narses having been sent into Italy by Justinian, in order to drive out the Goths, who under Totila had regain'd that Province, and being long before in Confederacy with the Longobards, sent Ambassadors to Alboinus to demand Assistance against the Goths. 'Twas then that Alboinus sent a choice Band of Warriors, who assisted the Romans against the *Goths*². They went into Italy by the Gulf of the Adriatick Sea; and it was the first Time that this People had seen this beautiful Country, and in one Day they landed in these our Provinces, to wit, at Samnium, as we shall relate. In the mean time, having join'd the Romans, they engag'd with the Goths, and having successfully beaten them in that Battle wherein Totila was kill'd, loaded with many Presents, and Victorious, they return'd to their own Habitations; and all the Time that the Longobards possessed Pannonia, they assisted the Romans against their Enemies, and Narses maintain'd and kept up a strict and faithful Friendship with Alboinus; whence 'twas no difficult Matter to allure him (in order to revenge himself of the Affront done him by Sophia Wife of the Emperor Justin) to come to the Conquest of Italy; besides he well knew the Riches of this Province, and the many other Advantages which it yielded. In the mean time this Prince resolv'd, at the Invitation of Narses, to go in Person at the Head of his Army, and having likewise solicited the Assistance of the Saxons for this Undertaking, he left Pannonia to the Huns (from whom this Province afterwards took the Name of Hungary) on Condition, that if by some cross Accident, the Undertaking which he was going about should not succeed, and that he should be oblig'd to return, they were to restore him what he left them: He began his march with his Longobards and their Families, the Saxons and other People, and in the Month of April in the Year 568, while Justin the Emperor reign'd in the East, they enter'd *Italy*³. At this Time this Province was so destitute of all Assistance, and divided into so many Parties by the new Form which Longinus the Exarch of Ravenna had given it; that Alboinus was enabled at once to possess himself of Aquileja, and many of the Towns of the Venetian Province; and this same Year 568, he likewise took Friuli the chief City of this Province, where he remain'd during the Winter, and having reduc'd it to the Form of a Dukedom, he created Gisulphus his Nephew, Duke of it. Such was the Origin of the Title of the Ducatus Forojuliensis, which was the first that was made by the Longobards in the Province of Venice.

ALBOINUS having taken this Province from the Greeks, the next Year 569, he took Possession of Trivigi and Oderzo; from thence, leaving Padua behind him, he took Monte Selice, Mantua, and Cremona; he surpriz'd Vicenza, Verona, and Trent, and other Towns of that Province; and as these Cities fell under his Power, besides leaving a strong Garrison of Longobards in them, he created a Duke to govern each of them. These Dukes at their Beginning, after the Manner of the Dukes of France, which *Paulus Emilius*⁴ describes to us, were nothing but simple Officers or Governors of Cities, and their Duration depended on the Pleasure of the Prince who created them.

Of Alboinus I. King of Italy, who fix'd his Royal Seat in Pavia; and of the other Kings his Successors.

ALBOINUS was no less successful in his Conquests the following Year 570. in Liguria, having pass'd the River Adda, he immediately took Brescia, Bergamo, Lodi, Como, and all the other Castles of Liguria, as far as the Alps; from thence he prepared to take Milan the Head City of the Province, which after a short Siege surrender'd to his Arms. As soon as he had subjected this City to his Dominion, the Longobards proclaim'd him King of Italy, and with joyful Acclamations saluted him as such, by giving him a Launce, which at this Time was the Ensign of Royalty. The Rites and Ceremonies which were practis'd by this Nation in creating their Kings, were only the raising up the Elected upon a Shield in the Midst of the Army¹, and with Acclamations, proclaiming and saluting him King, by giving him a Launce in his Hand, as a Token of the Royal Dignity. This was the Beginning of the Kingdom of the Longobards in Italy, under Alboinus I. King of Italy; but if we also reckon Waltau, who reign'd but a short time, and whose Empire was much contraverted, among the Series of their Princes who reign'd in Pannonia, there were Eleven Kings of the Longobards. As 'tis of no Service to us to keep account of the Kings of Pannonia, we shall reckon Alboinus the first King of Italy in this History, and according to this Order we shall name his other Successors; and from the Month of January of this Year 570, we shall reckon the Beginning of his Reign, and of the Longobards in Italy, not from their coming in the Year 568, as others have done. The Abbot Bachini in his Dissertations upon the Pontifical Book of Agnellus Ravennate, observes, that in order to shun all Confusion, there ought to be two Epochas settled; the one taken from the Entry of the Longobards into Italy, in the Year 568. on the second Day of April; the other from the Beginning of the Reign of Alboinus in Italy, which answers to the 29th of December in the Year 568: By these two Epochas, he shews us how Baronius was mistaken, who makes Alboinus die in the Year 571, after having reign'd three Years and a half according to Paulus Diaconus, and defends the bright Sigonius, who was censured by Camillus Pellegrinus concerning this Particular, by exactly comparing the Computations of the one with the other, from the said first Year of the Reign of the Longobards, to the Death of Rotaris, which fell out in 671, according to Paulus Diaconus and Sigonius, who agree wonderfully.

BUT be that as it will, it not being to our Purpose to enter into so nice an Examination of Time, Alboinus having subdued Liguria to his Dominion, with the same Success extended his Power over the neighbouring Provinces. He besieg'd Pavia, but by reason of the Difficulty of its Situation, could not take it, therefore he left a Part of his Army to continue the Siege, and with the rest invaded Emilia, Tuscany, and Umbria. He took many Citties of Emilia, Tortona, Placentia, Parma, Brissello, Reggio, and Modena. Tuscany being almost all in his Possession, he march'd into Umbria, and took Spoletto, a City once as noble as ancient; which, tho' ruin'd by the Goths, nevertheless had been restor'd to its former State by Narses, and not only preserv'd by Alboinus, but likewise adorn'd with new Privileges, and made the Metropolis of Umbria, which he turn'd into the Form of a Dukedom, and subjected to Spoletum, of which he constituted Faroaldus first Duke¹, and from this Time forward the Ducatus Spoletanus began to be famous, and was conspicuous above the rest, therefore it was reckon'd amongst the three famous Dukedoms of the Longobards; and thus Alboinus likewise appointed Dukes for governing the other Cities, as he had done in the Provinces of Venice and Liguria. But this Prince being disingag'd from the Conquest of these Cities immediately return'd to the Siege of Pavia, and at last, after the third Year, reduc'd it to his Obedience; and though he was highly incens'd against the Citizens, because of their obstinate Resistance, and design'd to have put them all to the Sword, nevertheless, being persuaded to the contrary by the very Longobards, he spared them, and enter'd the City, and was proclaimed and saluted King by all. And there, as in a strong and convenient City, did he fix his Royal Seat; whence afterwards it came to pass, that during the Dominion of the Longobards in Italy, Pavia was exalted above all the other Cities, as the Head and Metropolis of all the Kingdom of Italy.

ALBOINUS by these so many and sudden Conquests, believing that he had already reduc'd Italy under his Power, went to Verona, where he made a solemn Feast. This Prince had married Rosmunda Daughter of Comundus King of the Gepidæ; from whom in a Battle, together with his Life, he had taken Pannonia, and being spurr'd on by his cruel Nature, had order'd a drinking Cup to be made of Comundus's Scull, out of which, in Memory of that Victory, he was wont to drink²: Alboinus being grown a little merry at this Feast, and having Comundus's Scull full of Wine, caused it to be presented to his Queen Rosmunda, who was sitting over-against him, saying with a loud Voice, that he would have her drink with her Father at so great a Merry-making: Which Words struck the Lady to the very Heart; whereupon she resolv'd to be reveng'd, and knowing that Almachildes, a noble Longobard, and a bold Youth, lov'd one of her Maids, she manag'd Matters so with her, that Almachildes was to be convey'd privately to lie with herself in Place of the Maid; and Almachildes, according to the Appointment of the Maid, being come to the dark Place agreed on, lay unknowingly with Rosmunda, who after it was over, discover'd herself to him, and said, that he had it in his Power to chuse whether he would murder Alboinus, and always enjoy her and the Kingdom, or be put to Death by the King as a Ravisher of his Wife. Almachildes consented to kill Alboinus; but after he had kill'd him, there was no appearance of their getting Possession of the Kingdom; on the contrary, they were afraid of being murder'd by the Longobards, who lov'd Alboinus, therefore they fled to Longinus in Ravenna, with all the Royal Treasure, who receiv'd them honourably. But Longinus judging it was now a proper Time, by the Means of Rosmunda and her Treasure, to make himself King of the Longobards, and of all Italy, imparted his Design to her, and persuaded her to murder Almachildes, and then to take himself for her Husband; which she agreed to, and prepar'd a Cup of poison'd Wine, which she gave with her own Hand to Almachildes as he was coming thirsty out of the Bath, who after he had drunk the half of it, finding a Commotion in his Bowels, and remembering who he had to do with, oblig'd Rosmunda to drink the rest: And thus in a few Hours they both died, and Longinus was disappointed of being King.

Of CLEPHIS II. King of ITALY.

I N the mean time the Longobards, on the Death of Alboinus, who had reign'd three Years and six Months, after having bitterly lamented the Loss of him, assembled in Pavia the principal Seat of their Kingdom, and made Clephis their
E e e King;

King¹; a Man as noble as he was high and cruel minded, who rebuilt Imola near Ravenna, which had been ruined by Narses, took Possession of Rimini, and all other Places almost as far as Rome; but in the Career of his Victories died by the Hands of one of his own Creatures, after he had reign'd only eighteen Months. Clepbis was very cruel, not only to Strangers, but likewise to his own Longobards, who were so terrified at Royal Power, that they did not incline to chuse another King in haste, but rather chose to be subject to Dukes; each of which kept the Government of his own City and his Dukedom, with full Power and Dominion, and did not, as formerly, acknowledge Royal Authority, or any other Supreme Dominion. This Resolution was the Cause that hindred the Longobards from taking Possession at that Time of all Italy; and that some of the following Cities made a Defence for some Time, and others were never conquer'd by them; to wit, Rome, Ravenna, Cremona, Mantua, Padua, Monfelicie, Parma, Bologna, Faenza, Forli, and Cesena: Forasmuch as their want of a King made them less capable of carrying on their Conquests; and afterwards when they did create one, they became (by their having been free for some time) less obedient, and more liable to quarrel amongst themselves; which put a Stop to their Conquests, and at last was the Occasion of their being driven out of Italy.

WE ought not to pass over this Place, without observing with *Camillus Pellegrinus*², the Errors long since common amongst modern Writers, who by following Sigonius, or some other Writer more ancient than he, believ'd that the Longobards, abominating Royal Power, chang'd the Form of Government, and at Clepbis's Death created thirty Dukes, among whom they divided their Kingdom; because whoever will but attentively consider the Words of *Paul Warnefride*³, who speaks of that Change, will perceive, that the Longobards after the Death of Clepbis neglected to chuse a King, terrified, perhaps, at the Cruelty of that Prince, and frighted at the unhappy Deaths of Alboinus and Clepbis, but chose to live under their Dukes; who were not then first instituted for giving a new Form to their Kingdom, and changing the Ancient, but had been chosen from the Times of the Kings Alboinus and Clepbis, according to the Custom of the Longobards taken from the Greeks, who after the Conquest of Cities, appointed a Duke to govern them, as indeed the same Warnefride assures us, that at the Death of Clepbis, the Dukes who were Governors of the following Towns were, Zaban of Pavia, Alboinus of Milan, Walaris of Bergamo, Alachis of Brescia, Evin of Trent, Gisulphus of Friuli; and besides these, in the other Cities subject to the Longobards there were thirty Dukes, to whom the Government of them was committed. Notwithstanding their delaying to chuse a King, no other Innovation happen'd; but this, that as formerly, the Dukes were in every Thing subordinate to the Kings, and as their Ministers depended on their Becks; now every one of them govern'd his Dukedom with absolute Power for the Space of ten Years, during which Time there was no King, which was the Occasion of many Disorders, and at last made them think of chusing, with common Consent, Autaris Son of Clepbis, that he might shelter them from the constant Dangers they were in, and give them Relief. Besides we ought not to forget, that, as the same Warnefride assures us, the Number of Dukes was not thirty, as is commonly believ'd, but they amounted to 36; and that 30 were appointed for the Government of the other Cities, besides the six he had mention'd, to wit, the Dukes of Pavia, Milan, Bergamo, Brescia, Trent, and Friuli. There is no mention of the Dukedom of Beneventum, as not being yet instituted, for our Provinces were still subject to the Greeks under Tiberius who succeeded Justin, who after a Reign of twelve Years, died with excessive Torment, and in his Place Tiberius being chosen, was so engag'd in the War against the Parthians, that he could not relieve Italy, nor hinder the Progress of the Longobards.

ALTHO' their Affairs, during this Inter-reign, were somewhat prosperous with respect to the Wars they had with the Greeks, for in the Year 579, by the Conquest of Sutri, Bomarzo, Orta, Todi, Amelia, Peruggia, Luceoli, and other Cities, they had enlarged their State; nevertheless they soon perceiv'd, that their Realm thus divided could not last long; forasmuch as by some Disagreement amongst themselves, they had afforded an easy and ready Opportunity of being attack'd by foreign Nations, and knew by their manifest Danger, what Mischiefs their Divisions would involve them in; for in their Conflicts with the French, they had come off with Loss; and besides, at the Instigation of the King of France, three Dukes had rebell'd. Moreover in the Year 584. Tiberius died, who had govern'd the Empire seven Years, more commendable for his Christian Piety, than his Skill in Military Affairs; and was succeeded by Mauritius of Cappadocia, one of his Captains, to whom he had given one of his Daughters in Marriage; a Prince for Valour and Prudence much superior to his Predecessors Justin and Tiberius; he considering seriously the great Damage he had suffer'd by the Longobards in Italy, thought of using all possible Means for driving them out of it; but finding that it was an Undertaking that requir'd a better Head than that of Longinus (whose Fidelity was also suspected) he recall'd him, and in his Place sent Smaragdo a most prudent Man, and well experienc'd in warlike Affairs, with a new Army the same Year 584, to be Exarch of *Ravenna*², and made a certain Gregory Duke of Rome, to whom that Dukedom was committed, and at the same time made Castorius Commander of the Soldiers in Rome, because the Greeks were wont likewise to have such an Officer to oversee the Soldiers, besides the Duke; whence it is, that in Naples, which was a long time under the Empire of the Greeks, besides the Duke, we read also of this other Officer.

SMARAGDO being arriv'd in Ravenna, was not long before he put his Designs in Execution; he made Doctrulfus a skilful Warrior to rebel against the Longobards, and come over to his Side; and not long after he took Brissello, and subjected it to the Grecian Empire. And while Smaragdo was so successful in Italy, Mauritius did not fail to take other Measures in order to drive the Longobards from this Province; he used all his Industry to draw the French to his Side, and at last, by Money, prevail'd with Childebert King of France, to make War against the Longobards, who justly fearing the great Damage such a Confederacy and Preparation from the other Side of the Alps would bring upon them, and considering that they had no other way to ward off so great a Mischief, and to resist the Power of the French and Romans, but by submitting again to the Authority of one single Person, assembled themselves, and with unanimous Consent created Autaris Son of Clephis, their King, in the Year 585.

Of AUTARIS III. King of ITALY.

AUTARIS was a Prince of so great Valour and Prudence, that he much exceeded Alboinus, and his Progress in Italy was so great, that the Duration of the Kingdom of the Longobards for the Space of Two hundred Years was owing to him; for he had no sooner mounted the Throne, than he closely besieg'd Brissello, and in order to inflict a signal Punishment upon Doctrulfus for his Felony, he used all Methods possible to get hold of him; forasmuch as that Treachery had made him so suspicious, that during all his Reign he was afraid the other Dukes would imitate him, so that he was more perplex'd how to reduce them to their Obedience, than to resist the Power of his Enemies. He was so wise and prudent a Prince, that above all Things he studied Means for giving his Kingdom a more lovely Aspect, and a more settled Form of Government. In the first Place he ordain'd, that the Kings of the Longobards, in Imitation of the Roman Emperors, should be called Flavii, and he would be so nam'd himself, that his Successors, after his Example might retain that Surname, which afterwards all the succeeding Kings of the Longobards happily made use of¹. And considering that the Dukes being accustom'd for the Space of ten Years to rule with an absolute Command and Power over their Dukedoms, would bear it impatiently to have all Authority and Dominion taken from them, and be reduc'd to their former Condition; in order to shun greater Disorders, and to prevent an Insurrection, with much Prudence he compounded Matters thus¹; that each of them should give to the King and his Successors, the Half of the Tax and Subsidies for maintaining the Royal Grandeur and Kingly Majesty, and come to Court; the other half they were to keep to be employ'd in the Government of their Dukedoms, and the Administration of their Cities, of which they had been appointed Dukes, reserving to himself the Dominion and Supreme Right and Royal Authority; and that in case of Necessity, they should be immediately ready to assist him with their Might and Arms against his Enemies; and albeit he could deprive them of their Dukedoms at his Pleasure, nevertheless Autaris never put others in their Places, except either when their Male-Issue fail'd, or when they became unworthy by some great Felony committed by them².

The Origin of Fiefs or Feodal Holdings in ITALY.

WE come now to the Origin of Fiefs in Italy, which like the Nile, had their Head so hidden, and their Origin so concealed, that among the Writers of the Ages by past, it was reputed so difficult and desperate a Task to find it out, and their Accounts were so different and inconsistent, that the Thing in question was render'd more obscure and dark, than clear and evident. However, we must not take upon us to say that the Longobards were the first who introduc'd them, and that in Imitation of them, other Nations afterwards receiv'd them into their Dominions; for in the History of France, as Charles Molineus, the French Papinian relates¹, there is mention of Fiefs since the Reign of Childebert I.; and in their Annals, and in *Aimoinus*², and *Gregory of Tours*³, we likewise read the same. We read also, that about the same time of King Autaris, but eleven Years sooner, in the Reign of Chilperick I. and properly in the Year 574, King Guntrannus depriv'd Erpon of his Dukedom, and created one in his Place⁴; and *Paulus Emilius*⁵, and *Jacobus Cujacius*⁶ assure us, that the Kings of France had likewise the same Custom of creating Dukes and Counts in the Cities; and as at the Beginning when it was introduc'd, it was in the King's Power to turn them out at his Pleasure; so afterwards there was a Custom brought in, that they could not be depriv'd of their Estate unless it could be proved that they had committed some great Felony. And at last the same Kings with an Oath confirm'd them in these Estates, of which by their Courtesy they had made them Lords. 'Tis true, at first, as is said, these Dukes and Counts were only Governors of Cities, but afterwards they held these Cities as Lordships⁷.

AND indeed, neither the Romans nor the Grecians, nor any other ancient People ever acknowledg'd any other Dignity but that of Orders and Offices: 'Twas the ancient French, and these Northern People, who settling themselves in other Peoples Countries, invented Fiefs, and consequently the third Order of Dignity, which is the Lordship. Not but that in some sort this Invention owes its Beginning to the Roman Emperors¹, who for the greater Security of the Frontiers of the Empire, were wont to grant to the Captains and Soldiers, who had signaliz'd themselves in the Conquests, some Lands situated on these Frontiers, as a Reward for their Bravery, of which they had all the Profits, so that this Grant was called Beneficium; which was in order to oblige them to continue in the Military Profession with the greater Courage, by defending their own Lands; ut attentius militarent, propria rura defendentes, as Lampridius says².

BUT this is certain, that much about the same time, the Northern People, viz. the French in Gallia, and the Longobards in Italy, introduc'd the Fiefs³, both of them perhaps in Imitation of the Goths, who according to *Horatius Montanus*⁴; were the first who laid the Foundations of them. *Charles Molineus*⁵ asserts, That the French were the first who introduced them into Gallia, from whom the Longobards took them, who brought them into Italy afterwards, and properly into Lombardy, from whence they spread into Sicily and our Puglia; and, 'tis believ'd, that the first who brought them into these our Provinces, were the Normans who came hither from Neustria, which is now call'd Normandy; but our Predecessors were acquainted with Fiefs long before the Coming of the Normans; and the first who introduc'd them into the Provinces of Samnium and Campania were the Longobards, who conquer'd these Provinces first; and Puglia and Calabria receiv'd them later from the Normans, who entirely drove out the Greeks, amongst whom the Use of Fiefs was not known, as shall be shewn in the Progress of this present History.

HOWEVER 'tis likewise true, that all their Growth, and all the Customs and Laws which afterwards were introduc'd and publish'd concerning them, are owing to the Longobards, who gave them a certain and regular Form⁶; and they so gain'd Ground, that amongst all other Nations Successions, Acquisitions, Investitures, and all other Matters relating to Fiefs, were regulated by no other Laws and Customs but those of the Longobards; whereupon, a new Body of Laws sprung up, which we call Feudal: But we shall discourse of that in a more proper Place, when we shall have occasion to reason more at large about their Books, which make up one of the principal Parts of the Jurisprudence of our Kingdom.

AFTER that Autaris had in this manner pleas'd his Dukes, he did not neglect to provide what his Kingdom stood in need of, and, above all, he had a special Regard for Justice and Religion⁷. He order'd that Theft, Robbery, Homicide, Adultery, and all other Crimes should be severely punish'd. He demolish'd Paganism, and embrac'd Christianity, which had not been receiv'd before by the Longobards, who for the most part, after the Example of their King, embrac'd his Religion. But the Circumstances of these Times, and the fresh Example of the Goths, occasion'd their not receiving it pure and uncorrupted, but polluted with Arianism; which was the Occasion (their Bishops being Arians) of many Disorders and Strifes which arose betwixt them and the Catholick Bishops that were in the Cities subject to them.

THE Progress of Autaris was no less in Military Valour, than his Prudence in Civil Matters: He soon regain'd Brissello; and that it might not, in time to come, be a Receptacle for his Enemies, demolish'd the strong Walls which furrounded it. But especially his Wisdom and Bravery appear'd, when Childebert King of France pass'd the Alps with a powerful Army, for knowing himself to be inferior in Forces, and not able to withstand him in the Field, he order'd his Dukes to provide their Cities with strong Garrisons, and not to go out of their Fortifications, but expect the Enemy upon the Walls; which Conduct had such prosperous Success, that Childebert considering it would be a very tedious and difficult Undertaking to lay Siege to so many Cities, immediately yielded to the Allurements of Autaris, who had sent Ambassadors to him with rich Presents, in order to divert him from his Enterprize, and to desire Peace of him, which succeeded to his Wish; so that the Emperor Mauritius made heavy Complaints, and was so much displeas'd at Childebert's Breach of Faith, that he demanded either to have the vast Sum of Money which he had taken for making War upon the Longobards return'd, or that he should perform his Promise in returning to Italy to fight them; and these Complaints and Reproaches were so continual and frequent, that at last Childebert, spurr'd on by the Punctilio of Honour, resolv'd to return into Italy with a more powerful Army than the first. 'Twas then that Autaris gave the utmost Proofs of his Valour; for he consider'd seriously that he ought to employ all his Might and utmost Efforts, in order to crush this powerful Enemy; that for the future the French might never more come to disturb his Kingdom, and that by their Example other Nations might likewise be deterr'd, he resolv'd to dispose his Army after another Manner than at first he had done; for he design'd to prevent the Enemy, and meet them in the open Field. And having conven'd his Armies from all Parts of the Kingdom, he encourag'd them to the Undertaking, which was as hard and difficult as glorious, and, if successful, would procure a perpetual Peace and Tranquility to his Kingdom; he stirr'd up his Longobards to give the utmost Proof of their Bravery; he put them in Mind of the many Victories they had obtain'd over the Gepidæ in Pannonia; that by their Prowess they had subjected Italy; and lastly, that their Business was not now, as formerly, to fight for Empire, or the enlarging it, but for their Liberty and Safety. These Words were such a Spur to the Longobards, that it touch'd their very Hearts, so that the Signal for Battle was given. At the first Attack, they behav'd with so much Valour and Intrepidity, that immediately the Enemies Wing began to give way; and taking more Courage from so prosperous a Beginning, they pursued them so briskly, that the French were oblig'd to abandon the Field, and save themselves by Flight. The Enemy thus fled and dispers'd, many were taken, and as many kill'd, and Multitudes, in order to be shelter'd from the Fury of the Longobards, hid themselves, where they died of Hunger and Cold. By so famous and notable a Victory, the Name of Autaris became illustrious and bright over all Europe: And now seeing himself freed from the Incursions of Foreign Nations, he thought of subjecting the rest of Italy, which was yet in the Possession of the Greeks.

C H A P. II.

Of the Dukedom of Beneventum; and of Zoro its first Duke.

UTARIS had done what his Predecessors had not, to wit, subjected almost all the hither Italy, excepting the Roman Dukedom, and the Exarchate of Ravenna, which was at this time govern'd by *Romanus*¹; for the Emperor Mauritius a little before had recall'd Smaragdus, but he had not as yet conquer'd the most beautiful and famous Part of Italy, viz. that Part and these Provinces which now make up this Kingdom of Naples. Hitherto these Provinces had been maintain'd under the Empire of the Emperors of the East, who had govern'd them according to the Form that had been introduc'd by Longinus; almost all the principal Cities had their Dukes: Naples, Surrentum, Amalphis, Taranto, Gaeta, and almost all the rest which now belong to this Kingdom, were governed by their Dukes; however they were all immediately under the Exarch of Ravenna, and consequently subject to the Emperors of the East: And tho' their Form of Government appeared to be Republican, nevertheless 'tis the Height of Folly to believe they were so free, that they did not acknowledge the Emperor of the East, under whose Dominion they liv'd, for their Sovereign; yet by the Weakness of the Exarchs of Ravenna, and the Distance of the Imperial Seat, the Government of the Dukes became a little more absolute, insomuch that they often proceeded to open Rebellion against their Prince, which the Dukes of Naples frequently attempted to do, as we shall relate in its own Place.

THESE Provinces, as being the most distant from Pavia, the Seat of the Longobards, and which could have been soon assisted by Sea, with which they are all very near surrounded, in case they had been attack'd, were maintain'd with very small Garrisons by the Greeks; so that Autaris, a most experienc'd Prince, design'd to begin his Conquests by the inland Provinces: He left Rome and Ravenna behind him, which he could not have easily subdu'd; and in the Spring of the Year 589. join'd his Army in the Dukedom of Spoletium, and pretending to direct his March to other Places, turn'd upon a sudden, and threw himself into Samnium. The Greeks being thus surpriz'd, were so stunn'd and astonish'd, that without much Dispute, Autaris in an instant conquer'd all this Province, and at last Beneventum, a City, which, as Sigonius believ'd, has ever since been Metropolis of Samnium. From whence 'tis said, that this Prince, flush'd with the Success of so remarkable a Conquest, push'd forward, and over-run all Calabria, as far as Rhegium, a City situated upon the furthest Point of Italy, on the Sea-shore; where, being still on Horse-back, he struck a Pillar that was posted on the Shore, and said: *Thus far shall the Bounds of the Longobards reach*¹; whence Ariosto, singing of the Actions of this glorious Prince, said, That ————— his Standard he bore,

From the Foot of the Alps, to th' Aprutian Shore.

'Tis also said, that when he return'd to Beneventum, he reduced that Province into a Dukedom, and made Zotto Duke of it; and so to the two famous Dukedoms of Friuli and Spoletium, he added a Third, which in process of Time, became as much superior to the other two, as they exceeded the lesser Dukedoms of Italy.

BUT seeing about the Beginning and Institution of the Dukedom of Beneventum, Opinions are different; and that this Dukedom is to take up a great Part of our History, for the Space of more than 500 Years; which was not only of great Duration, but so large, that it extended itself so far, as to comprehend almost all that which is now the Kingdom of Naples; therefore it ought not to be reputed beside the Purpose, if we shall reason more particularly about it. 'Tis commonly believ'd, that the Dukedom of Beneventum was first instituted by Autaris in the Year 589, and that Zoto was created first Duke of it by the same Prince. It passes for an undoubted Truth amongst all Historians, that this Zoto was the first Duke of Beneventum; but who made him such, and at what Time, Sentiments are various. *Carolus Sigonius*², and *Wolfgangus Latius*³, not having well examined the Words and Phrases used by *Paul Warnefride*⁴, when he speaks of this Institution, contend, that he was instituted by Autaris the same Year in which he conquered Samnium and Beneventum, which at this Time they took to be the Head of this Province; but the very manner in which Warnefride mentions it, solves the Difficulty; he does not affirm it for certain, but with a putatur, refertur, fama est; and also what he subjoins, that Zoto held the Dukedom of Beneventum twenty Years, would not agree with the Series of Things that happened since, nor the Chronology of the Times of the other Dukes who succeeded him; if from this Year 589. they will begin to reckon the twenty Years of the Dukedom of Zoto: Wherefore some others, amongst whom Scipio Ammiratus, in his Dissertations on the Dukes and Princes of Beneventum; and *Ant. Caracciolus*⁵ doubted if the Epocha of this Dukedom ought not to be fixed in more ancient Times. But what made them afterwards reject the Opinions of Sigonius and Latius, was the Authority of Leo Ostiensis ¹, who tho' he flourish'd Three hundred Years after Warnefride, writes not doubtfully, but with great Assurance, in his Chronicle of the Neapolitan Edition, that the Greeks retook Beneventum from the Longobards, in the Year 891, Three hundred and twenty Years after Zoto had been Duke of it; whence, according to Ostiensis, the Beginning of the Government of Zoto should be carry'd back to the Year 571; or, as Ammiratus will have it, to the Year 573; who in order to make it agree with the Things fallen out since, and with the Chronology of the other Dukes, own'd by the same Warnefride, corrects the Place of Ostiensis, and will have it read, not Three hundred and twenty, but Three hundred and eighteen: So that according to their Opinions, the Dukedom of Beneventum had its Beginning before Autaris conquer'd Samnium, and some Years after the coming of Alboinus into Italy. Others have found out the Origin of this Dukedom to be of an older Date, to wit, in the same Year 568, when Alboinus left Pannonia, in order to come and conquer Italy; and that besides the Province of Venice, a Band of Longobards went as far as Beneventum, and having fix'd themselves there, elected Zoto for their Duke; which they prove from an ancient Register of the Dukes and Princes of Beneventum, made by an unknown Monk of the Monastery of S. Sophia in Beneventum, which goes further back than the History of the Anonymus Salernitanus, who says ²: Anno ab incarnatione Domini Quingentesimo Sexagesimo Octavo, Principes ceperunt principari in Principatu Beneventano, quorum primus vocabatur Zoto, to whom he assigns Twenty-two Years Government, and not twenty, according to Warnefride.

BUT the Difference in Opinions does not end here, neither are the most careful Inquirers satisfied with this Beginning, but they search for one further back in more distant Times; which Leo Ostiensis shews us in his Chronicle, in which, tho' we read in the Neapolitan Edition, that there were Three hundred and twenty Years from the Creation of Duke Zoto, to the Year 891, in which Beneventum was retaken by the Greeks; nevertheless the Original, which is preserv'd in the Archives of Casino, differs very much from the Neapolitan Edition; since we read there, that from Zoto to the Year 891, not 320, or 318, but 330 Years interven'd: According to this Reading are the Editions of Venice and Paris, and the last publish'd by the Abbot de Nuce; both the one and the other are more correct than that of Naples as to the Number of Years, so that according to this Reckoning it must be acknowledg'd, that the Dukedom of Beneventum had its Beginning from Zoto in the Year 561. But certainly it will seem a very strange and new Thing, to alledge that this Dukedom had been instituted this Year, which would make it commence seven Years before the Longobards came out of Pannonia in order to conquer Italy; and when the Greeks bore absolute Sway over all the Provinces of it.

IN so great Variety, we chuse to follow the Opinion of the most exact Camillus Pellegrinus ³, who treats of this Subject with more Care, and to better Purpose than all the rest; whose Opinion is supported by what Constantinus Porphyrogenitus has left us in Writing concerning the coming of the Longobards to Beneventum: Though he be an Author somewhat Fabulous in what he writes about the coming of the Longobards into Italy, nevertheless in the midst of his Fables some Glimpses of Truth likewise appear, which in so difficult and doubtful a Matter, may point out the Way by which we may find out the Beginning and Institution of this Dukedom. This Writer relates ⁴, that the Longobards being invited into Italy by Narses, came with their Families to Beneventum, but not being admitted within the City by the Beneventans, they built their Habitations without the Walls, which became a small City, and which even to his Time retain'd the Name of Citta Nova; and having settled themselves there, some time after by Fraud they enter'd arm'd into Beneventum; and having turn'd every Thing topsy-turvy, kill'd all the Citizens, and afterwards over-run the whole Province, and subjected it to the Dominion of the Longobards, and extended their Empire from Calabria to Pavia, excepting the Cities of Otranto, Gallipoli, Rossano, Naples, Gaeta, Surrentum, and Amalphis.

ALTHO' what this Author relates of the Longobards having come out of Beneventum, and extended their Empire over all Italy, be Fabulous, and contrary to all History, which says, that after their marching out of Pannonia under Alboinus, their first Conquests were in the Province of Venice, and afterwards by degrees in Liguria, Emilia, Tuscany, and the other Provinces: And what he says also of the Citta Nova, which near Two hundred Years after the coming of Alboinus into Italy, was built by Arechis for fear of the French, be likewise a Fable, as we shall shew in its Place. Yet what he says of the Longobards having retired to Beneventum under Narfes, certainly is not fabulous; for, from what is above related, 'tis most certain, that Narfes, before he invited Alboinus, and before their general Transmigration, almost in all his Wars, was wont to make use of the Longobards in Italy; neither was this the first time they had been call'd by him; he had them in the War against Totila, and, as Warnefride says, tho' that after having gain'd that Victory, being loaded with many Presents, they had been ordered back to their own Habitations, nevertheless all the Time that they possess'd Pannonia, they were Auxiliaries to the Romans; whence 'tis very probable, that altho' Narfes had dismissed them, yet they did not all return Home: But that about the Year 552, or 553, many of them being taken with the Pleasantry of the Country, remain'd in Italy, and after the manner of Robbers, wander'd sometimes in one Place, sometimes in another, of which Procopius also gives Testimony; and that at last, either of their own Choice, or perhaps by the Command of Narfes, in order to keep them under, and to prevent Disorders which their going so dispersed occasion'd, they had Beneventum assign'd them for a Place of Residence; and that afterwards in the Year 561, they had made themselves Masters of it, in which Action Zoto had had the principal Share as their Captain: So that from this Year, we may say with Ostiensis, the Longobards began to rule in Beneventum under Zoto; therefore to the Year 891. in which they were driven out by the Greeks, there were exactly Three hundred and thirty Years: But the Dukedom was not instituted in those Times; nor when the Dominion of the Greeks was powerful in that Province, could a Handful of Longobards reduce Samnium to the Form of a Dukedom, and establish Zoto Duke of it. In order then to make the Years of the Government, which Warnefride gives to Zoto, agree with the Facts and the Chronology of the other Dukes his Successors, own'd by the same Writer; we must reckon the Beginning of it from the Year 571, that is to say, when Alboinus had already enter'd Italy, and conquer'd many Provinces: Then those Longobards that were in Beneventum being become more bold, openly threw off the Yoke of the Greeks, and rebelling against them, possess'd themselves of the neighbouring Country; and afterwards, in the same Year 571, created Zoto Duke of their own People, who from such an obscure Beginning commenced his Government. Thereafter Autaris having come to invade our Cistiberina Italia, and having subdu'd the intire Province of Samnium, finding Beneventum possess'd by the Longobards, who were under this Government of Zoto their Duke, confirm'd him in it, and having made him Tributary, as all the succeeding Dukes of Beneventum were, to the Kings of Lombardy, he left that Dukedom under his Administration; whence it came, that by some Writers the Beginning of the Government of Zoto is taken, not from the Time that Autaris possess'd Samnium, and reduc'd it to the Form of a Dukedom, and put it under his Command, but from the Time that Zoto commenced from these obscure Beginnings, and that Order of Things, to have the Government of Beneventum, and of those Longobards who had possess'd themselves at first of it, as Porphyrogenitus relates.

THE Dukedom of Beneventum then, from so mean and slender Beginnings, had its Rise: Such 'tis said, has been the Rise of the most famous Commonwealths, and the most renown'd Principalities in the World; thereafter in the Course of Years it not only equal'd those of Spoletium and Friuli, but by much overtopp'd them; and we shall see it at once possess'd almost of all the Cistiberinan Italy, but towards the North its Limits were further extended than at present those of our Kingdom are on that Side. It began from that Handful of Longobards who settled themselves in Beneventum under Narfes; and upon so slender a Foundation, by degrees, was built that Polity, and that Form of Government which was kept up for many Ages under the Dukes who succeeded Zoto. Autaris was the first who gave it the most stable and certain Form, and began to enlarge its Limits; forasmuch as he subjected the whole Province of Samnium to this Dukedom; and as we shall see, the Kings of the Longobards, his Successors, by the Means of the Dukes, augmented it wonderfully. Beneventum had the good Luck to be the Head and Metropolis of so great a Dukedom, not by Choice, perhaps neither because in the Reign of Autaris this City was eminent above all the other Cities of these Provinces which he then commanded: For there were other Cities in Samnium no less famous and ancient, such as Ifernica, Bojanum; and others; and there were much more noted Cities in Campania: On the contrary, Beneventum, tho' in the Time of the Romans it had been one of the most famous Colonies of that Commonwealth; nevertheless by the Invasion of the Goths often suffered those Calamities which such strange Revolutions carry along with them; neither in their Time did it retain its ancient Dignity, but in the Reign of Totila who caus'd its Walls to be demolish'd, it was reduc'd to a very lamentable Condition. Beneventum then by a certain Fate, and its own good Luck, was made the Seat of this Dukedom, and thereafter became the Head and Metropolis of its neighbouring Provinces; but it acquir'd this Honour a long time after. At the Time that Warnesfride wrote, this City had rais'd itself above all the rest; but that was two Centuries after the Reign of Autaris. For which Cause, when this Author describing the seventeen Provinces of Italy, and placing Beneventum in Samnium, names this City as Head of the neighbouring Provinces, he did so with regard to the Time in which he wrote, when the Seat of this Dukedom was become very great and rich, and was advanc'd to be Head, not only of one, but of many Provinces, such as Samnium, Campania, Puglia, Lucania, and the Bruttii, either in whole or in part, as we shall shew hereafter. But elsewhere, when he places Beneventum in Samnium, he did it not with regard to the Times in which the Longobards govern'd, but had an Eye to the old Description of Italy in the Days of the ancient Samnites; for according to the later of Augustus, as Pliny assures us², Beneventum was plac'd in Puglia, and not in Samnium; and in the other following Descriptions, we see this City posted on the Confines of Campania; whence it is, that in the Acts of Januarius, that holy Bishop of Beneventum, now the first Tutelar of Naples, we observe when he suffer'd Martyrdom under Dioclesian, such Affairs were committed to the Præses of Campania, whose Business it was. And we likewise find, that Ausonius speaking of those who have chang'd Sexes, and telling that in Beneventum, not long ago a pretty Youth became a Woman, calls Beneventum a City of Campania.

Nec satis antiquum, quod Campania in Benevento, Unus epheborum virgo repente fuit.

AND in the Itinerary which is attributed to Antoninus, the Bounds of Campania are fix'd at Equo Tutico, and according to the Observation of *Philippus Cluverius*³, that City which we now commonly call Ariano, is situated further in than Beneventum; the Words of the Itinerary are these: A Capua Equo Tutico M.P. LIII. ubi Campania limitem habet. Caudis M.P. XXI. Benevento M.P. XI. Equo Tutico M.P. XXI.

AND it was for no other Reason that the Inhabitants of Beneventum, as we have said, set up many Marbles with Encomiums on the Consulares of Campania, as did also the Campanians, the Neapolitans, and the other Cities that were govern'd by the Consulares of Campania. By which Documents it manifestly appears, why the other Januarius, likewise Bishop of Beneventum, when he was at the Council of Sardica, which was held in the Year 347, the Custom being then, that the Bishops subscrib'd with the Name of their own City, and the Province in which it was situated, subscrib'd in this manner: Januarius a Campania de Benevento.

WARNEFRIDE did the same when he described the seventeen Provinces of Italy, by representing them as he found them in the Notitia of the two Empires, made under Theodosius the Younger, about the Year of our Lord 440; for in his Time the Provinces of Italy, tho' they had the same Names given them by Writers, as we at this Time, in order to shew our Erudition when we write, not only have recourse to the Days of Theodosius, but go much higher, and name each of the twelve Provinces of which our Kingdom is compos'd at present, as they were under the Free-Commonwealth, by calling their People Samnites, Lucani, Harpini, Salentini, and the like; nevertheless there was a Difference in all their Administration and Italy was divided into many Dukedoms, which were not formerly Provinces; whence it came, that what is now our Kingdom, and which formerly was only divided into four Provinces, was afterwards form'd into twelve, which got other Names, and other Bounds, as in the Sequel of this History we shall see.

TO return then to our Purpose, the Institution of this Dukedom, if we consider its mean Beginning, owes its being establish'd in Beneventum to Chance, and not Design, as not only the other lesser Dukedoms of the Longobards were instituted in diverse Cities, but also those of Friuli and Spoletto; and as it fares with all other Things of this World, that if we will look back to their Origin, being sprung from very small Beginnings, they rise to their Height, whither they are no sooner arriv'd, than they must return to their former State, according to the Rule of worldly Things; unavoidable Laws, which human Wisdom cannot withstand nor remedy. However, in Process of Time, the Longobards having fixed themselves in Italy, and their Kings having perceiv'd, that the perpetuating a long Series of so many Dukedoms, would be a Means to keep their Kingdom too much divided, had a mind to extinguish a great many of them, and to keep up only those that could best help to preserve the State. In effect, Warnefride himself assures us, that in his Time many of them were extinct, and in the Sequel of his History, he makes mention of no other Dukedoms but those of Trent, Turin, Bergamo, Brescia, and these other three which were exalted above all the rest, to wit, of Spoletto, Friuli, and this of Beneventum.

NEITHER is it unreasonable to believe, that these three last were exalted above all the rest on Account of their Situation, by which the Kingdom was enabled to keep it self more secure, and extend its Limits farther: Forasmuch as the Dukedom of Friuli being situated at the Entrance of Italy, from whence they could the more readily resist the Incursions of Foreign Nations that might endeavour to invade it; and Spoletto being placed in the Middle of Italy, they could easily suppress the Motions of the Romans and the Greeks, who being fortified in Ravenna and Rome, gave frequent Disturbance by their Excursions; and as for Beneventum, its Situation was such as to command the lower Part of Italy, from whence they could make a Stand both against the Greeks and the Romans, by whom they were often assaulted from the Maritime Places, and kept in continual War. Therefore Mattheus Palmerius gives an exact Description of the Polity and Form of Government of the Longobards, when he says, That having fix'd their Seat in Pavia, they divided Italy into several Principalities, over which they set Dukes, amongst which the most conspicuous, and, in Process of Time, remarkable, were that of Friuli at the Entrance of Italy, that of Spoletto situate as it were in the Centre of it, and the third of Beneventum for commanding the lower Part thereof; seeing these three Dukedoms were always subject to the Kings, and govern'd with the same Spirit and by the same Laws, making but one Commonwealth; and being establish'd after this manner they became more famous, and by degrees extended their Limits (in which Beneventum made the greatest Progress of all the rest) and the Longobards were enabled to preserve their Dominion long in Italy.

IN recording the Exploits of the Dukes of Beneventum, we shall follow the Order of Time and Years observ'd by the most exact Pellegrinus, as the most accurate of all the rest, and even of more Credit than Warnefride himself; and by reckoning the Beginning of the Government of Zotto in the Year of God 571, and not in the Year 585, as Warnefride did, who nevertheless confesses that his Government lasted Twenty Years, which is certainly the most sure time, shall put an end to it in the Year 591, and not in 605 or 598, as Sigonius does; So that what this Writer relates of the Pillaging and Sacking of Croton, which happen'd certainly in the Year 596, not under Zoto, but Arechis his Successor; whence we clearly see the Mistakes that arise, and of which Sigonius himself was not aware, who fix'd the Beginning of the Government of Zoto in the Year 589, for he ought to have placed the End of his Government and his Death in the Year 609, after the Expiring of the twenty Years, and not as he did in 598, in which Year there would only have been nine Years of his Government past.

THE Deeds of Zoto, first Duke of Beneventum, deserve no Praise; for Autaris was no sooner return'd to Verona, after having subdued Samnium to his Dukedom, and left the Government of it to Zoto, than he gave evident Signs of his Rapacity, and likewise of his no regard to Religion, which may be understood by the following Fact. The Monastery of Casino, built Sixty Years before by St. Benedict, famous all the World over, as well on Account of its Founder, as for the Sanctity and Quality of its Monks, had been wonderfully enrich'd by the Donations of divers Princes; Zoto, a most avaricious Man, being covetous of these Riches, attack'd it unawares in the Night-time, and, not satisfied with the Booty and all that was valuable in it, destroyed and threw down the Edifice; and while the Longobards were all intent upon the Pillage, Bonitus, who was then Abbot, made his Escape with his Monks, and fled to Rome, where they were kindly receiv'd by Pope Pelagius, and had Lodgings appointed them near to the Lateran, where they built a Monastery, in which they remain'd a Hundred and thirty Years; during which Time the Monastery of Casino was forsaken, until Petronax, being exhorted by Gregory II. took Care of it; who having led back again many Monks and Nobles who chose him for their Abbot, rebuilt the Edifice, and restor'd it to its former Greatness.

THE Pillage of this Monastery was certainly committed by Zoto not long before his Death, towards the End of the Year 589, under Pope Pelagius, who died in the Year 590, not long before St. Gregory the Great wrote his Dialogues, who making mention of this Pillage, speaks of it as a Thing lately done¹; and 'tis most certain, as Baronius carefully observes, that St. Gregory wrote his Dialogues in the Year 593, whence we clearly see the Error of Warnefride, who places this Fact in the Year 605, and that of Sigebertus, who will have it to have been in the Year 596, not adverting to the undoubted Testimony of St. Gregory, and what is gathered from the Chronicle of Leo Ostiensis. This deserves to be treated of more at large, but the Abbot *de Nuce*² supplies that Defect, who has examin'd this Point very carefully.

Of Agilulfus IV. King of the Longobards; and of Arechis II. Duke of Beneventum.

WHILE these Things happen'd in our Provinces, Autaris, not able to obtain the Sister of Childebert King of France in Marriage, for she was given to Recaredus King of Spain, after he had embrac'd the Catholick Faith, and by a memorable Example driven Arianism out of his Kingdoms, demanded Theodolinda, Daughter of Gari-baldus King of the Bojoari; a most prudent Woman, whose transcendent Virtues deserve often to be remember'd in this History; and having married her in Verona in the Year 590, he was intangled in a new War with the French: For Childebert being desirous to recover the Honour he had lost by the Defeats of the preceding Years, return'd with a powerful Army into Italy, and the Terror of his Arms and his Promises were so great, that many of the Longobard Dukes rebell'd: Minolphus Duke of Novara, Gandolphus Duke of Bergamo, and Valfaris

Valfaris Duke of Triviggi went over to his Side. 'Tis said¹, that in those Days Pavia being possessed by Papius Duke of the Franconians, this City took its Name from him, which it retains to this Day, and the ancient Name Ticinum was forgot. But this Expedition of the French was as unfortunate as the rest, their Army being afflicted with the Bloody Flux, while Autaris and his Dukes were well provided within their fortified Places. The French, tho' they roam'd up and down in Italy for the Space of three Months, yet at last the Disease growing more insupportable, were forced to return home; so that Autaris took this fit Opportunity of asking Peace of Childebert, by the Means of Guntrandus Uncle to Childebert, who mediated a Treaty; but Autaris died soon after, for having gone from Verona to Pavia, he got a poisonous Drink², by which he ended his Days in September, the same Year 590, after having reign'd in Italy a little less than six Years. The Longobards hearing of the Death of their Prince, immediately conven'd in Pavia to elect a Successor, and in the mean time sent Ambassadors to Guntrandus, to notify to him what had happen'd, at the same time beseeching him to interpose his good Offices for procuring Peace with Childebert his Nephew; but when they were about electing a new Prince, finding they had none who was fit to support the Dignity, they resolv'd that Theodolinda should govern them, and that the Person she should chuse amongst the Dukes for a Husband, should be invested with the Regal Dignity. Amongst the Longobard Dukes at this Time, Agilulfus was Duke of Turin, a Prince near of Kin to Autaris, who, besides the Comeliness of his Person, had a Mind truly Royal and fitted for any Government. Theodolinda, out of so many, preferr'd him, who, to the general Satisfaction, was proclaimed King.

AMONGST the many and valuable Endowments of Theodolinda, her being most zealous for the Catholick Religion, in which she had been brought up and instructed, was not the least in those Times, on which Account she was much beloved by St. Gregory the Great, who sent her the four Books of the Lives of the Saints which he had compos'd, as knowing her to be most affectionate to the Faith of Christ, and well instructed and excelling in all human Knowledge; and tho' all her Endeavours for inducing Autaris her first Husband to renounce Arianism had been to no purpose, nevertheless she believ'd that she should not find the same Inflexibility in Agilulfus, not only on Account of his pliable and sweet Temper, but much more out of Gratitude for her having advanc'd him to the Throne: Therefore Agilulfus embrac'd the Catholick Religion, and the Longobards, following the Example of their Prince, many of them left Heathenism, others Arianism, with which they were infected, and turn'd Catholicks; and the Zeal of Agilulfus for this Religion prevail'd so far, that, by the Advice of Theodolinda, he repair'd many Monasteries, and rebuilt many Churches, which in the by-past Wars had been almost ruin'd; to which he gave many Possessions, and re-instated the Bishops in their Honour and Credit, who while the Longobards were in the Error of Paganism, had been slighted and despis'd³.

Of ARECHIS II. Duke of Beneventum.

IN the Reign of Agilulphus, according to the Computation of Pellegrinus, the Death of Zoto Duke of Beneventum happen'd in the Year 591; he was more famous for his Rapacity, and the remarkable Pillage of the Monastery of Casino, than any Thing else; so that by his Death Arechis, Cousin to Gilulphus Duke of Friuli

Friuli ¹ was chosen Duke of Beneventum by King Agilulfus. According to the Polity introduc'd by Autaris into the Kingdom of the Longobards in Italy, these Dukes never lost their Dukedoms, but for Rebellion, or at their Death; and after their Death, it likewise became a Custom to prefer the Sons of the Deceased to any other, if the King thought them capable: So we see that after the long Government of this Arechis, which lasted 50 Years, Ajo his Son succeeded him; and if the Duke died without Sons, the King either chose another in his Place, or extinguish'd the Dukedom without appointing a Successor. Which is observ'd to have begun to be practis'd in the last Years of the Reign of this Prince; which he did for Reasons of State, push'd on by the Ambition of the Dukes, who often endeavour'd to shake off the Yoke of Dependancy, in order to make themselves Absolute; for which Cause they were oblig'd to suppress many of these Dukedoms when they could, so that by Degrees they reduc'd them to a small Number, reserving only those, as has been said, that could be helpful in the Security and Preservation of the Kingdom. So much the more, because the Kings of the Longobards were in continual Vexation and Trouble, not only by the Wars with foreign Nations, but likewise by those of their own Dukes, as we have seen in the Reign of Autaris, and which may be observ'd in that of Agilulfus, who in the Year 600, having made Peace with the Romans, and renew'd the Alliance with Theodibert the new King of France, had a War upon his Hands against his Dukes who had rebell'd, and having given them a notable Defeat, he put three of them to Death without Mercy, to wit, Zangrulphus in Verona, Gandulphus in Bergamo, and Varecausius in Pavia.

THEREFORE when any of them failed, either by Death or Rebellion, there were others appointed in their Place, of whose Fidelity and Affection they were very sure, as Agilulfus, who, when Eoinus Duke of Trent died, appointed Duke Gondaldus in his Room, who was a Catholick, and remarkable for his Piety ²: Or if they were not willing to continue the Succession; as in the Case of the Duke of Crema, who died without Sons, there was no Successor appointed ³.

THE Dukedom of Beneventum under the Government of Arechis, which was the longest of any that had ever been, having lasted fifty Years, from the Year 591. to 641, extended its Bounds very much; so that according to Paulus Emilius ⁴, and other Writers, its Limits on one side reach'd to Naples, and on the other to Sipontum, which City after the Pontificate of Gregory the Great, surrendered likewise to the Longobards, and was join'd to the Dukedom of Beneventum. Neither hitherto had it so far enlarged its Confines, as it afterwards luckily did in the subsequent Years, when it comprehended almost all that which is at present the Kingdom of Naples. Neither can it be said that from this Time its Bounds were extended to Croton, because the Longobards under the Duke of Beneventum, which according to the Epocha of Pellegrinus could not surely be Zoto, but Arechis, had taken and pillaged the City of Croton, and made many Prisoners there; for the Custom of the Longobards was, that when they did not succeed in conquering a Place, in which they could maintain themselves, and leave a Garrison, they over-run the Country after the Manner of Robbers, pillaging and carrying the People along with them Prisoners, from whom they exacted large Sums for their Ransom; as it happen'd to those of Croton, who were obliged to pay a great Sum of Money for their Redemption: And by a Letter of S. Gregory the Great's, wherein he laments their Captivity, we read of the Efforts he made to get them set at Liberty; we see clearly, that having taken the City, and pillag'd it, loaded with Booty, they carry'd off with them many of the Nobility, and not sparing either Age or Sex, left it, without putting a Garrison into it, as being at a great Distance from the Borders of their Dukedom, and surrounded with many Cities of the Greeks their Enemies. This was a Custom likewise practis'd by the Catholicks, who altho' they did not make Slaves of the Prisoners, nevertheless they kept them until they were ransom'd with Money; of which we have the Testimony of grave Authors ⁵. Therefore it ought not to be reputed Cruelty or Fury in the Longobards only, some of which were Heathens, others Arians, that they practic'd the same on their Enemies. Neither can it be said, that this Dukedom comprehended the Monastery of M. Casinò, in the Time of Zoto, because it was then that they pillag'd it; and for the same reason it would be more ridiculous to alledge, that in the Reign of King Autaris, the Dukedom of Beneventum reach'd as far as Rbegium, because Autaris carried his Standard to this furthest Part; for 'tis manifestly known, that when this Prince struck the Pillar that stood there with his Spear, and said, So far would he extend the Limits of his Kingdom; then, and for a long time after, all these Parts were under the Dominion of the Emperors of the East.

THUS, what is now the Kingdom of Naples, was not at this Time under the Government of one single Lord or Prince, but of two. The Dukedom of Beneventum was immediately subject to its own Duke, and he to the King of the Longobards. Puglia and Calabria, Lucania and the Brutii; the Dukedom of Naples; those of Gaeta, Surrentum, Amalphis, and the other lesser Dukedoms, were immediately under their Dukes, and they held of the Exarch of Ravenna, who was under the Emperors of the East.

C H A P. IV.

Of the Dukedom of Naples, and its Dukes.

BEING in the Dukedom of Naples, we find Dukes who govern'd it for a continu'd Tract of Time, and that it was the only one which was not under the Dominion of the Longobards, and which after the other lesser Dukedoms were extinct, comprehended many Cities which had been comprized in them, on which account it became the more conspicuous; It will not be amiss, that in treating of the Dukes of Beneventum, we at the same time discourse of those of Naples; because by so doing, we may perceive the Vicissitude of worldly Things, as by the continual Wars which the People of Beneventum had with the Neapolitans, the Dukedom of Beneventum always increased, so on the contrary that of Naples, and the Dominion of the Greeks over the other Provinces diminished; and as we now see, that there is scarcely any Vestige of the Dukedom of Beneventum remaining, so on the contrary Naples is rais'd to that Height, not only to be the Head of a small Dukedom, as it was, but Head and Metropolis of a great and most flourishing Kingdom.

THE Dukedom of Naples, which in its Infancy had very narrow Bounds, comprehending only the City of Naples, with its Dependencies, in the Time of Mauritius Emperor of the East made notable Acquisitions; for this Prince added to its Dominions the neighbouring Islands of Ischia, Nisida, and Procida, in the Possession of which he confirm'd the Neapolitans, as *S. Gregory the Great*¹ writes. He likewise added afterwards Cuma, Stabia, Surrentum, and Amalphis, which till the Times of Pope Adrian, and Charles the Great, belong'd to the Dukedom of Naples, as is evident from a Letter of that Pope's mention'd by Pellegrinus; so that this Dukedom being reduced in a manner into the Form of a Province, it came likewise to be call'd Campania; whence very often the Duke of Naples took the Title of Dux Campaniæ, as *S. Gregory*² call'd Scholasticus, Dux Campaniæ; and elsewhere³ he gave Gudiscalcus the same Title. This comprehending many Cities of that Coast, they were subject to the Neapolitans and their Duke; for which Cause the Bishops of the Cities were wont to call themselves Neapolitan Bishops; whence it is, that very often we read in the Letters of that Pope: Episcopis Neapolitanis.

IT could not stretch its Borders further towards the West, North, or East; for the Dukedom of Beneventum being become powerful, extended its Authority over all these Parts: Capua, with its Territory, as far as Cuma, and the Coast which has no Harbour from Minturno, Uturno, and Patria, of old called Linterno, was already under the Dominion of the Longobards. Not long after the Longobards extended the Borders of the Dukedom of Beneventum as far as Salernum; and many other Cities towards the East, as far as Cosenza, with all the inland Towns were taken from the Greeks; and this Dukedom of Naples had likewise fallen under the Dominion of the Longobards, as in process of Time all the inland Cities of the Kingdom did, and afterwards the Maritime, excepting Gaeta, Amalphis, Surrentum, Otranto, Gallipoli, and Rossano, if two Causes had not hinder'd it; which were, that the Longobards had no naval Forces, neither were they expert in besieging Sea-Port Towns; and also, because the Neapolitans, by reason of their Situation, had well fortified Naples, and all the other Maritime Towns subject to them. So that Naples with its small Dukedom may justly boast, that tho' almost all the Cities of the Kingdom had been subdu'd by the Longobards, excepting those few abovemention'd, yet they never could wholly subdue the Neapolitans, tho' afterwards in latter times they were made tributary to the Princes of Beneventum, as in the Course of this History we shall relate: So that 'tis an unpardonable Error in *Blondus*¹, who writes, that the Longobards, not long after the Government of 36 Dukes, subdued Naples.

IT was the Custom to send Dukes to govern the Dukedom of Naples, either directly from Constantinople by the Emperors of the East, or, when Necessity would not permit to wait their coming from so distant a Place, the Exarch of Ravenna, who was at this Time the first Magistrate of the Emperors of the East in Italy, was wont to send them.

DURING the Government of Arechis, of which we are now treating, while Mauritius reign'd in the East, Naples being without a Duke, and Arechis, together with Arnulphus Duke of Spoletto designing to attack it, S. Gregory the Great, who had the Defence of it much at Heart, and who took Care of the Interest of the Emperor against the Longobards, thinking that if they should conquer the rest of Italy, which was under the Dominion of the Greeks, they might at last subject Rome likewise, wrote² in the Year 592, very earnestly to John Bishop of Ravenna, to hasten the Exarch to send the Duke immediately to Naples, in order to defend it against the Treachery of Arechis, otherwise it would certainly be lost.

AND from another Letter³ of the same Pope, dated in the Year 599, we observe, that not long after Maurentius was sent to be Duke of Naples, who was so careful of the Preservation of that City, that besides his having provided it with a strong Garrison, he oblig'd even the Monks to stand Centinels on the Walls, without so much as exempting Theodosius the Abbot, at which Gregory was much griev'd⁴; and the sending Soldiers to lodge in a Nunnery, and constraining the Abbess to receive them, afflicted him exceedingly.

BUT the Emperor Mauritius being driven from the Empire in the Year 602, by Phocas, who caus'd himself to be proclaim'd Emperor by the Army in Pannonia, and being arrived at Constantinople, was acknowledg'd there, and put Mauritius and his Sons to Death; and having sent his Picture to Rome, was there likewise proclaim'd Emperor, with the Consent also of S. Gregory, who acknowledg'd him in Rome, as the Patriarch Ciriacus had done in Constantinople. Phocas then having mounted the Throne, in the Room of Callinicus, who had been put in Place of Romanus by Mauritius, sent Smaragdus anew to be Exarch in *Ravenna*⁵, and Gondoinus to be Duke of Naples.

ON the Death of Gondoinus, Phocas sent Joannes Compositus, a Constantinopolitan, to be Duke of Naples, who, breaking his Faith to his Prince, endeavoured to make himself absolute Lord of the City committed to his Charge; Phocas was put to Death in the Year 610¹; and Heraclius his Competitor succeeded in the Empire; and the People of Ravenna, not being able to bear the Pride and Oppression of *Joannes Lemigius*² the new Exarch, who had been sent to Ravenna by Heraclius, in the Year 612, took Arms, and tumultuously went to the Palace, where they kill'd him, together with his Judges. This Fact coming to the Knowledge of Joannes Compositus, Duke of Naples, he thought he could not have a more fit Opportunity for making himself Master of the City; whereupon he immediately possess'd himself of it, and provided it with a strong Garrison against the Forces which he was afraid the Emperor Heraclius would send against him, who in Effect, being appriz'd of the Mutiny in Ravenna, and of the Rebellion of Compositus, immediately sent *Eleutherius*³, a Patrician, and Gentleman of his Bedchamber, a gallant and wise Man, to be Exarch in Italy. He having quell'd the Mutiny in Ravenna, went with a sufficient Army to Naples, into which he fought his way, and kill'd the Tyrant, and reducing it as it was formerly under the Dominion of Heraclius, and appointing a new Duke, return'd to Ravenna Victorious⁴.

THE Opinion of Summontes, or what he supposes, is not probable; that the new Duke left by Eleutherius in Naples, was that Theodore who is said to be the Founder of the Church of S.S. Peter and Paul, now situated in the Quarter of Nido; for the Greek Inscription which was upon a Marble Stone, and in which Theodore Consul and Duke, was named as Founder of that Church, bearing Date of the fourth Indiction, falls much lower, to wit, in the Year 717, in which Time this Duke govern'd, as has been observ'd by Men of Worth; on the contrary, 'tis true, that Eleutherius was sent to Ravenna by Heraclius, in the Year 616, where he held the Exarchate little more than two Years; for in the Year 619, Isaicus a Patrician was sent to be his Successor⁵.

THE Fables which our Modern Writers have invented concerning this Rebellion of Compositus are surprizing; they say, that this Duke, after he had possess'd himself of Naples, made himself Master also of Puglia and Calabria, and of other Places of our Kingdom: That moreover he caus'd himself to be crown'd King of them; and that he went first to Bari to be crown'd with the Iron Crown, and afterwards to Naples to receive the Golden one; and that therefore he was the first who had usurp'd the Title of King of Naples; adding, that the Normans, after the Example of this first King of Naples, would likewise be crown'd at Bari with the Iron Crown, and in Palermo with the Golden one⁶. All which are Dreams of weak Men; for Compositus was never Master of Puglia and Calabria, nor other Provinces, which for the most Part at this Time were under the Dominion of the Longobards. He invaded Naples only with its Dependencies; *Paul Warnefride*⁷ relates, that a few Days after he was driven out of it by Eleutherius a Patrician. 'Tis not likely he could do great Feats, while not only the Greeks, but likewise the Longobards were very powerful: Neither do we ever read in Authors of any Account, that he made himself to be crown'd King; and 'tis yet more ridiculous to say that he went to Bari to take the Iron Crown, and afterwards to Naples, that of Gold; what is related of that Coronation at Bari with Iron being altogether fabulous, and never practis'd by any of our Kings, as shall be clearly seen in the following Books of this History.

C H A P. V.

Of Adalualdus and Ariovaldus V. and VI. Kings of the Longobards.

THE Dominion of the Greeks in Italy being already reduc'd to a very low Ebb, the Longobards under their King Agilulfus, attempted to make an end of driving them intirely out of the Countries they were in Possession of; and what contributed very much to it was, the Longobards for the most Part (after the Example of Agilulfus) having forsaken, some of them Gentilism, and very many Arianism, had embrac'd the Catholick Religion, which made them less odious to the People, and their Government more tolerable. In effect, the Peace which the Kingdom enjoy'd for so long a Time, was owing to Agilulfus, who was the first King of the Longobards that embrac'd this Religion, and during all the Course of his Life, left Monuments of much Piety and Munificence towards the Churches and Monasteries: He being dead, Adalualdus his Son succeeded him, who had been his Collegue on the Throne while alive; and following the Footsteps of his Father, and much more those of his Mother Theodolinda, whom he would have to be his Copartner in the Government, brought the Affairs of the Longobards to such a peaceable and quiet State, that no Noise of War disturb'd their Repose; and under them the Churches were repair'd, and many Donations given to holy Places¹.

BUT Adalualdus did not long enjoy so great Prosperity, for in the eighth Year of his Reign, the Emperor Heraclius having sent to him a certain Eusebius, his Ambassador, for treating of Peace and other Matters of Importance; this Man, either of his own Head, or by Order of his Master, while the King was coming out of the Bath, presented to him a Drink as wholesome for him; which he had no sooner drank, than he lost his Senses, and became foolish²; which the cunning Eusebius perceiving, gave him to understand, that for his greater Security he ought to cause the most powerful of the Longobards to be put to Death; which Advice, being young, and a Fool, he embrac'd, and immediately caused to be put to Death twelve of the Chief Nobility; which the rest of the Longobards perceiving, and seeing themselves in the same Danger from his Folly, made an Insurrection, and proclaim'd him Impious and a Tyrant, and dethroning both him and the Queen Theodolinda, his Mother, put Ariovaldus, Duke of Turin in his Room, who had for Wife Gundeberga, Sister of Adalualdus.

THIS Adventure divided the Longobards into two Factions; Ariovaldus was supported by those Nobles who had made the Insurrection, to whom all the Bishops on the other Side of the Po join'd, who with all their Might endeavour'd to increase their Party; Adalualdus on the other hand was assisted by Honorius Pope of Rome, who had strong Reasons for supporting him, as well on account of Theodolinda, to whose Piety the Catholick Religion was much indebted, as because Ariovaldus was abhorr'd by the Catholicks for being an Arian, in which Heresy he was born and brought up; and so great were the Pains which Honorius took, that he likewise brought over Isaicus, at this Time Exarch in Italy, to his Party, and with a powerful Army oblig'd him to restore Adalualdus to the Throne. He also got the Bishops who favour'd Ariovaldus to desert him, by threatening that he would not let such Treachery pass unpunish'd; but Isaicus not having accomplish'd his Undertaking, and Adalualdus dying opportunely of Poison, Ariovaldus at last obtain'd the Kingdom, who being odious to the Catholics, occasion'd no small Disturbance in Italy.

NOT many Years of this Reign had pass'd, when Theodolinda seeing herself so despicable, and without all hopes of recovering her former Royal Dignity, full of Anguish and extreme Grief, died in the Year 627. A Princess, both for the excellent Endowments of her Mind, and her singular Piety, most worthy of Praise, and to be number'd amongst the most illustrious Women in the World, and who did not deserve to be put in the Novels of the Decameron of John Boccacio ¹.

ARIOVALDUS reign'd other nine Years after the Death of Theodolinda, and died without leaving Male Children, in the Year 636; for which Cause the Lombards having call'd together the Dukes, thought of chusing a new King, and not knowing whom they could raise to that Dignity, gave to Gundeberga, as they had formerly given to Theodolinda, the Power of making him King whom she should choose to be her Husband. Gundeberga, like a most prudent and wise Lady, chose Rotaris Duke of Brescia for her Husband and King, in the same Year 636, according to the Computation of Pellegrinus.

CHAP. VI.

Of King ROTARIS VII. by whom the Laws of the Lombards in Italy were put in Writing.

ROTARIS was a Prince most valiant, and of consummate Prudence, but especially a great Lover of Justice; and if any Blemish obscur'd his Worth, 'twas his being stain'd with the Arian Heresy; whence in his Time, in many Cities of Italy there were two Bishops, the one Catholick, and the other Arian ¹.

THIS was the first Prince who gave written Laws to his Lombards ², by whose Example the other Kings his Successors being mov'd, in length of Time there appear'd a new Volume of Laws, call'd the Lombard Laws, which had once such an Ascendant in our Kingdom, that the Roman Laws were forced to give way to them. But before we mention the Lombard Laws, it will be requisite to look into the Condition the Roman Jurisprudence was reduc'd to in Italy, and these our Provinces, during the Reign of this Prince, and those of the Kings his Successors, and in what Books it was comprehended.

THE Emperor Justinian, tho' he had taken Care to have his Volumes spread over all Italy, and had strictly commanded, that, all others being abolish'd, these only, with his Novellæ Constitutiones, should take Place; nevertheless their Authority expired almost with himself; for he was no sooner dead, and succeeded by Justin, a most foolish Prince, than Italy fell anew into the Hands of Strangers; and, excepting the Exarchate of Ravenna, the Dukedom of Rome, and those small ones of Naples, Gaeta, Amalphis, and other Maritime Cities of Puglia, Calabria, and Lucania, the Longobards were Masters of all its other Provinces: The other Emperors who succeeded Justin, being at very little Pains to recover them, and at much less to restore the Laws of Justinian; also there were not wanting some of them, as shall be told in its Place, who either out of Envy, or Emulation, endeavour'd even to extinguish them in the East altogether. Besides it may be added, that among the Longobards, by reason of the continual Wars kindled betwixt them, the Name of a Greek was most abominable, and all that proceeded from them, was with the greatest Aversion rejected and abolished; whence, altho' it was allow'd to the Inhabitants to make use of the Roman Laws, and to the Romans to live under them, nevertheless they were to stick to the Theodosian Code, which was in greater Esteem amongst the Longobards than the Justinian ¹.

Lombards

TO which was added the Example of the Westrogoths, who at this Time reign'd in Spain; who being satisfied with the Code made by the Order of Alarick, and the new Compilation of the Laws of the Westrogoths, in imitation of that of Justinian, did not acknowledge his Books.

WE may likewise add the Example of the French, who until the Reign of Charles the Bald, did not acknowledge other Roman Laws, but those which were contain'd in the Theodosian Code, or its Compendium made by Order of Alarick ². So Charles the Great himself, desirous to restore the Roman Jurisprudence, which in his Time was reduc'd to a very lamentable Condition, neglected the Books of Justinian, and set about restoring and amending the Theodosian Code, as these Words join'd to the Commentary of Alarick, which is put at the Beginning of the Theodosian Code, demonstrate: Et iterum Anno XX. Regnante Carolo Rege Franc. & Longobard. & Patritio Romano. And so great was the Care of this glorious Prince, and the Regard he had for this Code, that he caus'd many of its Laws to be inserted into his Capitularia ³.

IN the Reign of Charles the Bald, 'tis evident, that France began first to approve of the Laws of Justinian, as the Authors of that Age testify, who often quote his Laws, but never mention the Theodosian; thus Hincmar of Rheims: Et Sacri Africæ Provinciæ Canones; & lex Justiniana decernunt ⁴, and elsewhere ⁵, Leges Justiniani dicunt. Which may be gathered from what Joannes Italus ⁶ wrote concerning Abbo, Father of Odo of Cluny, who, Justiniani Novellam memoriter tenebat. Altho' there are not wanting Authors in the Times following, who likewise made use no less of the Books of Justinian than of the Theodosian Laws, as Ivo of Chartres ⁷, Gratian, and others did.

IN Italy the Popes studied solely to maintain the Authority of the Justinian Laws, and those of the other Emperors of the East, for which they had a great Regard and Veneration. Their Design was to support with all their Might the Authority of the Grecian Emperors, by acknowledging them for Sovereigns, that so they might counterballance the Power of the Longobards, and by that Means keep Italy divided betwixt two equal Powers, to the end, that when the one incroach'd upon the other, Rome might not fall under the Servitude of either of them. The Popes lov'd the Empire of the Greeks best, because they being at a Distance were not in a Condition to bestow much Time in hindering the Progress and Designs they had of making themselves Masters of Rome; and therefore when the Longobards grew so powerful, as to make them afraid lest they should possess themselves of that City, the Loss of which would have been their Ruin, they immediately had recourse to the Greeks for their Assistance to oppose them. In effect, S. Gregory the Great, as is said, was very much against the Greeks being totally driven out of Italy: He had the Laws of the Emperors of the East in great Veneration, and especially those of Justinian, which he often made use of, and most frequently of the Novellæ, as is manifest from Gratian, and the Decretals ⁸. Which Custom his Successors retain'd afterwards, and amongst the rest Gregory III. ⁹, Nicolas I. Lucius III. John VIII. ¹⁰, and others related by Dadinus Alteserra ¹¹. For which Cause Leo IV.

following the Footsteps of his Predecessors, wrote that Letter which we read in *Gratian*¹, to the Emperor Lothaire I. in which he intreats him to preserve the Roman Laws: Vestram flagitamus Clementiam, ut sicut hactenus Romana lex viguit absque universis procellis, & pro nullius persona hominis reminiscitur esse corrupta; ita nunc suum robur, propriumque vigorem obtineat: whence *Ivo of Chartres*² said, Dicunt enim instituta legum Novellarum, quas commendat, & servat Romana Ecclesia: And the Ecclesiasticks, both in computing the Years that made them capable of Orders, and in many others Things, have follow'd the Roman Laws; whence the Books of Justinian in these Times had more Force and Authority in the Roman Dukedom, than in any other Part of Italy, and the same as in *Ravenna*³ the Seat of the Exarchate of the Greeks; whence 'tis related⁴, that that Volume of the Digests which is now call'd Infortiatum, to which the People of Ravenna had recourse for deciding their Causes, was long preserv'd in this City: So that with good reason Hermendus Conringius concluded⁵, that in Italy, before Lothaire II. Juris Romani & quidem maxime Justiniani, usus aliquis arbitrarius superfuit exiguus ubivis; frequentior tamen Romæ, inque aliis Exarchatus locis, quam in Regno Longobardico, Novellarum præcipua fuit auctoritas in rebus Ecclesiasticis nonnullis.

BUT the Longobards by reason of the obstinate and cruel Wars which they had with the Greeks, altho' they allow'd the People to retain the Roman Laws, as the Goths had done, yet would not suffer any other Books but the Theodosian Code, and the Compendium of Alarick to be learned, or to have the Force and Authority of Laws, imitating also in that the Practice of the Goths; neither hitherto for the Space of sixty Years that they had been in Italy, had they any written Laws of their own⁶, but govern'd themselves only according to their Customs, and the Institutions handed down to them by the Tradition of their Forefathers, which they observed very religiously.

ROTARIS then was the first, who having mounted the Throne, and enlarged his Kingdom by the Conquest of the Alpes Cottia, and Oderzo, thought of giving written Laws to his Longobards.

THE Method which the Longobard Kings took for establishing their Laws, is so much commended by *Hugo Grotius*⁷, that he prefers the Longobards in that to the Romans themselves: These often receiv'd Laws from the Will of one single Person, which he alter'd and chang'd at his own Pleasure; so that whatever pleas'd the Prince had the Force of Laws. On the contrary, the Longobard Kings did not assume that Power to themselves alone, but took the Opinions and Advice of the principal Lords and Barons of the Kingdom in establishing Laws, and the Order of Magistrates had likewise their Share in them; neither were they establish'd but in publick Assemblies conven'd for that end, into which after the manner of the French they did not admit the Ecclesiastical Order, but that of the Lords and Magistrates only; neither did the Commons with them make an Order apart, but as Cæsar wrote of Old Gallia, Plebs plane servorum habebatur loco, quæ per se nil audet, nullique adhibetur concilio.

ROTARIS having then, according to the Epocha of Camillus Pellegrinus, in the Year 644, summon'd a Diet in Pavia, in which the Lords and Magistrates assisted, enacted many Laws which he had caus'd to be committed to Writing, and inserted in an Edict which he publish'd over all his Kingdom, after the same manner that Theodorick the Ostrogoth had done, when he publish'd his over all Italy, of which we have made mention in the preceding Book. Amongst the other Monuments of Antiquity, which are preserv'd in the Archives of the Monastery of the Trinity of the Cave of the Order of S. Benedict, which next to that of Monte Casino is the most ancient we have in the Kingdom; there is a Parchment Code, which with our own Eyes we have carefully observ'd, written in Longobard Letters, wherein not only the Edicts of the Longobard Kings (beginning from this Rotaris) but likewise of the French and German Emperors, who were Kings of Italy, are inserted. In this Edict of Rotaris, after the Preamble, which is also transcrib'd by *Sigonius*⁸ in his History of Italy, we read the Titles of each Chapter, and the first Of AJO and RADOALDUS III. and IV. Dukes of Beneventum.

THE Dukedom of Beneventum was govern'd by Ajo the Son of Arechis, who died in the Year 641, and had associated him in the Government five Months before he died¹; but the Father being sensible of his weak Understanding and Incapacity for such a Charge, recommended him on his Death-bed to Radoaldus and Grimoaldus, both of them Sons of Gisulphus, formerly Duke of Friuli, and who had been brought up and kept at his Court. These were lov'd by Arechis as his own Sons, and whom he had appointed to succeed in the Dukedom upon the Failure of Ajo. While the Dukedom of Beneventum was govern'd by Ajo, under the Direction of these two Brothers, the Sclavonians made their first Appearance in these our Provinces.

THE Sclavonians were originally of the European Sarmatia, on both sides of the Borysthenes; who after the Example and Manner of the other barbarous People, advanced to the Banks of the Danube, and pass'd it under the Empire of *Justinian*². Afterwards having fallen upon Illyricum, at last they possess'd themselves of a great Part of it, particularly that which lies betwixt the Drave and the Sarve towards the West, call'd to this Day by their Name Sclavonia.

THESE falling down from Dalmatia, which they had already possess'd themselves of, and landing at Sipontum, began to ravage our Puglia. Ajo hearing of the Irruption of the Sclavonians into Puglia, which had been for the most Part join'd to the Dukedom of Beneventum, gathered together the best way he could, some Troops, while Radoaldus was absent, and went immediately to fight them; but having engag'd them near the River Ofanto, fell into a Ditch, where the Sclavonians kill'd him³.

Ajo held the Dukedom of Beneventum one Year only, besides the five Months he reign'd with his Father; but after his Death the Sclavonians triumphing on account of the Victory they had gain'd, Radoaldus coming opportunely upon them with a strong Army, and incredible Valour, overthrew and dispersed them; and after having so gallantly reveng'd the Death of Ajo, he with his Brother Grimoaldus, took Possession of the Dukedom of Beneventum, according to the Appointment of Arechis, who had left them to succeed himself and Son.

THESE two Princes govern'd the Dukedom of Beneventum five Years. Radoaldus invaded other Provinces belonging to the Greeks, and carried his Arms to Surrentum, which City he besieg'd, and endeavour'd to take it by Assault; but the Surrentins, encourag'd by their Bishop Agapitus, repulsed him; whereupon he rais'd the Siege, and Surrentum was freed¹.

WHILE these Princes govern'd the Dukedom of Beneventum, the new written Laws of the Longobards publish'd by Rotaris, with his abovementioned Edict were known for the first Time in these Provinces, which now make up our Kingdom: So that the Cities of our Kingdom which were comprehended in that Dukedom, and our People, altho' they had been made solely by the Longobards, began by Degrees to learn them, and to accustom themselves so much to them, that in the succeeding Times the Roman Laws were forc'd to give way to them, and were only observ'd as ancient Customs by the Commonalty, who are the last in leaving off the Laws and Customs of their Forefathers; as we shall see anon.

C H A P. VIII.

Of Grimoaldus V. Duke of Beneventum; of the Wars which he had with the Neapolitans; and the Death of King Rotaris.

RIMOALDUS V. Duke of Beneventum, was a Prince so daring, and of so great a Spirit, that not content with having extended the Bounds of his Dukedom, and obtain'd many Victories over the Neapolitans and Greeks; he aspir'd still at more glorious and noble Enterprizes, till at last it was his Fate to be exalted to the Throne, and after he had govern'd his Dukedom sixteen Years, he reign'd other nine over the Kingdom of Italy.

WHILE he was Duke of Beneventum, he was often at War with the Neapolitans; and 'tis said to have fallen out at this Time, what *Paul Warnefride*¹ relates, that he hindred the Greeks from pillaging the Cathedral Church of St. Michael, situated in Mount Garganus, by intirely defeating them. 'Tis likewise said, that fifteen Years after, when he had already mounted the Royal Throne in Pavia, he had another Victory over the Neapolitans; and that they being touch'd at the Heart, on account of such a Calamity, chang'd their Religion, and of Heathens became Christians, as the Author of the Angelical Apparitions ¹, and the unknown Monk of Casino relate ².

BUT seeing these Adventures are variously reported by Writers, some ascribing to the Saracens, what Paul imputes to the Greeks; while others, by a manifest Anachronism, carry back these Events to the Times of Theodorick and Odoacre, when the Longobards were not as yet known in Italy; and others with more Truth attribute them to the Longobards; therefore it will be necessary to shew more at large, that it was neither the Greeks, Neapolitans, nor the Saracens who pillag'd that Church, but the Longobards; and that the Conversion from Gentilism to Catholicism which is attributed to the Neapolitans, ought to be ascrib'd to the Longobards of Beneventum, and not to those.

MOUNT Garganus, situated in Puglia, above Sipontum, over-against the Diomedean Islands, in the Upper Sea, now call'd Tremiti, a Name likewise very ancient, and made use of by Tacitus ³, was first made famous by Virgil and Horace; but afterwards, in the Time of Pope Galesius I. was much more renown'd by the miraculous Apparition of Michael the Archangel in this Place; and after the Goths were driven out of Italy in the Reign of the Emperor Justinian, by Means of Belisarius and Narses, when it was restor'd to the Empire of the East, the Veneration of the Greeks for this Saint was incredible. There was not a City either in Greece or Italy, that did not build Temples, and dedicate Altars to him. Procopius ⁴ relates, that Justinian in the City of Constantinople alone, erected many Temples to him, and rebuilt others that were old; whose Example the Greek Cities in Italy follow'd. In Naples especially, they had a wonderful Veneration for him; they erected a Temple, which afterwards in the Time of Gregory the Great, they dedicated to him after the Rites of the Church of Rome; and the same Pope makes mention of this Dedication in one of his Epistles ⁵. The same is said of many other Greek Emperors, particularly Heraclius, who enrich'd that Sanctuary with many valuable and precious Donations: So that 'tis not to be doubted, but the Neapolitans being a long time in Conjunction with the Greeks, had an equal Veneration for this Archangel; and to impute Infidelity and Idolatry to the Neapolitans of these Times, is so gross an Error, that the Chronology of the Catholick-Bishops of this City alone, and what is related in the preceding Book, are sufficient to make it manifest, and put it out of all doubt.

ON the contrary, 'tis most certain, that when the Longobards retook Italy from the Greeks, they profess'd no other Religion but Paganism and Arianism; and altho' in the Reign of Agilulfus, many of the Longobards, after the Example of their Prince, had forsaken Arianism and Idolatry; yet nevertheless the other Kings his Successors persevering in Arianism, was the Occasion that the Longobards, and particularly those of Beneventum, return'd anew to their first Errors, which they did not altogether abandon until the Year 663, when the Emperor Constans, by the Means of S. Barbatus, Bishop of Beneventum, was defeated; and then it was that they embrac'd the Catholick Religion, as we shall shew by and by.

AND besides 'tis most evident, that all who consider attentively the History of the Longobards, written by Paul Warnefride, who was a Longobard, will see, that he has endeavour'd all he could, as well as all the other Writers of his Nation, to excuse his Countrymen from the Blemish of Infidelity, and the Errors of Arius; and rather chuses, in all the Course of his History, not so much as to speak of the Religion of this People, nor their Conversion to the Catholick Faith by means of S. Barbatus, on purpose that he might not be oblig'd to mention their old Errors, which Pellegrinus very carefully has observ'd ⁶.

SO that there are many Things in his History laid to the Charge of the Greeks, which were committed by the Longobards, which Cardinal Baronius likewise rightly observ'd ⁷: And this very Fact is a most clear Document; seeing 'tis altogether incredible, that the Greeks, who had so great a Veneration for that Sanctuary, could ever have had so wicked Inclinations, as to think of pillaging it, as he says, and thereupon come to Blows with the Longobards, who drove them away from committing so execrable and sacrilegious a Crime. We are to believe the Fact was quite otherwise, and just as Pellegrinus ¹ describes it, to wit, that the Longobards contending with the Greeks for the Possession of that Place, after a long and obstinate Battel, at last overcame the Greeks; and as they had been accusom'd to perpetrate such Wickedness already, in Monte Casino, under Zoto, so they design'd to commit the same in Mount Garganus, under Grimoaldus, by pillaging that Sanctuary, which being enrich'd by sundry Donations of the Greeks, had allured their Rapacity to commit that Sacrilege. And in effect, from the Acts of S. Barbatus, Bishop of Beneventum, which before they were printed, were preserv'd in the Monastery of the Monks of S. John the Baptist, in the City of Campania, and which were afterwards publish'd by Joannes Bollandus ², with his Notes, part of which is likewise now to be seen printed in Octavo, by Ferdinandus Ugbellus ³, we clearly perceive, that that Cathedral was actually pillag'd at that Time: So far was it from being prevented by the Longobards of Beneventum, that it remain'd abandon'd and desolate, ut nec sedulum illic Officium persolvi possit, as S. Barbatus says. It was not restored to its ancient Lustre till fifteen Years after, when Constans was driven out by the Longobards, who by the Assistance of Barbatus embrac'd the Catholick Religion, and relinquish'd their Infidelity; which Conversion the Author of the Acts of the Angelical Apparition, likewise a Longobard, was also pleas'd to apply to the Neapolitan Greeks, as we shall see anon; which will the more confirm what we have now said.

AND for the same Reason, they are likewise in an Error ⁴, who would impute to the Saracens, that which Paul Warnefride relates of the Greeks, to wit, that Grimoaldus in the same Years of his Government had fought on Mount Garganus with the Saracens, who designing to have pillag'd that Sanctuary, were by him defeated, and put to the Rout; for this War was betwixt the Longobards and the Greeks, as Warnefride writes, and not with the Saracens, who at that Time had not as yet come to ravage these our Provinces; and when they did come, it was not to Garganus, where they never fix'd themselves till the latter Times, but to Garigliano, where, sua aliquando domicilia habuerunt, as Pellegrinus writes. Neither is it true that the Pillage was prevented, so that the Defeat said to be given the Saracens by Grimoaldus, is equally fabulous with that other, which Summontes and others relate they receiv'd in Naples by S. Agnellus the Abbot, at a time when these People were not as yet known in Italy; neither had their Name been so much as heard of in these our Parts.

BUT while the Longobards of Beneventum are employ'd in these Wars with the Greek Neapolitans, the fatal Death of King Rotaris happen'd in Pavia, in the Year 652, who left Rodoaldus his only Son his Heir and Successor in the Kingdom, none other of his Male-Line remaining. Rotaris govern'd the Kingdom sixteen Years, with so much Prudence and Justice, that he was deservedly esteem'd one of the most illustrious Princes in the World; his having left his Subjects at liberty to live in whatever Religion they pleas'd, and his having allow'd in almost all the Cities of his Kingdom two Bishops, the one Catholick, and the other Arian, gave fresh Encouragement to the pernicious Maxim of wicked Politicians, that a Prince ought not to trouble himself about the Religion of his Subjects, nor force them to believe and profess what he might think the best: So that Bodinus ⁵, the Defender of this perverse Doctrine, to the Example of Theodosius the Great, who he believ'd likewise allow'd the same Liberty of Conscience to his Subjects, without minding whether they were Arians or Catholicks, did not forget to add this other of Rotaris, who allow'd the same. However, we ought not to pass over this Place without observing by the bye, the Error of this Author, who reckon'd Theodosius the Great to have been the Author of that Law ⁶; to which, altho' the Name of Theodosius the Great, as well as that of Valentinian II. be prefix'd in the Theodosian Code; nevertheless all Writers firmly agree, that Valentinian was the sole Author of it, who by the Instigation of the Empress Justina his Mother, and the Importunities of the Arian Goths, caus'd it to be publish'd that Year while he resided in Milan, against which S. Ambrose Bishop of that City so much declaim'd; and besides 'tis known, that altho' at this Time two Emperors govern'd the Empire divided into the Western and Eastern; nevertheless the Custom was, that the Laws which were publish'd by either of them, bore in the Front the Names of all those who then govern'd the Empire; which we yet see on the Marbles: And the Theodosian Code itself furnishes us with abundance of other Examples, as was likewise observ'd by the careful *Jacobus Gotifredus*¹, who challeng'd Franciscus Baldovinus as guilty of the same Mistake, who by reason of that Inscription, likewise believ'd that Theodosius was the Author of that Law.

Of Rodoaldus, Aripertus, Partarites, Gundebertus, VIII. IX. X. and XI. Kings of the Longobards.

AS the long and prudent Reign of Rotaris, render'd the Affairs of the Longobards very prosperous in Italy, so the very short and imprudent Reign of his Son Rodoaldus, and especially the Discord among his Successors, brought them to a very dangerous Condition. Although Warnefride relates, that Rodoaldus reign'd five Years, yet he scarcely govern'd one alone; for having ravish'd the Wife of a certain Longobard, he was murder'd by the Husband; and amongst the five Years of his Reign Paul reckons up those when he reign'd together with his Father, who had made him his Colleague.

THE Male-Issue of Rotaris being extinct, the Longobards assembled in order to chuse a new King, and elected Aripertus, Son of Gundoaldus, Brother of Theodolinda. He, according to Warnefride, reign'd nine Years¹: In all the Course of his Government, History makes mention of nothing he did worthy of being recorded, if it was not that he deserv'd to be prais'd for his being much inclin'd to the Catholick Religion, as was thought, contrary to the Example of Rotaris and his Son Rodoaldus.

ARIPERTUS died in the Year 661, and left two Sons, Partarites and Gundebertus, who by bad Advice divided the Kingdom betwixt them. So Gundebert fix'd the Seat of his Kingdom in Pavia; and Partarites his in Milan; which furnish'd Grimoaldus our Duke of Beneventum with an Opportunity of driving them, both from their Seats, and of making himself Master of all the Kingdom; for Dissention and great Hatred having arisen betwixt the two Brothers, each of them seeking to possess the other's Kingdom, Gundebert, not satisfied with his own Lot, had a mind to have the intire Kingdom, and to drive his Brother from it; but not trusting to his own Strength, he sent Garibaldus Duke of Turin, to Grimoaldus Duke of Beneventum, to invite him to come and assist him in the Undertaking, promising for a Reward to give him his Sister in Marriage.

BUT the Duke of Turin address'd Grimoaldus in a quite different Manner, and betraying his Master, persuaded him that he ought not to neglect to take the Advantage of this Discord, which was able to put him in Possession of the Kingdom : It was no hard Matter to persuade him ; so that being spurr'd on by a covetous Desire to reign, he assembled some Troops the best way he could, and leaving Romualdus his Son Duke of Beneventum, march'd towards Pavia. Being arriv'd at Piacenza, he dispatch'd Garibaldus to Gundebert with Advice of his coming, Garibaldus after he had deliver'd his Message, told him besides, that it was proper he should go and meet the Duke ; and if he was suspicious of any Thing, he might put on Armour under the Royal Robes : On the other hand, with unheard-of Treachery, he advertis'd Grimoaldus to be aware of Gundebert, for he was coming to meet him in Armour. Grimoaldus believ'd the Traytor ; and what made him give the more Credit to him, was, that after they had met, while they were saluting and embracing one another, he felt that Gundebert had really Armour on him ; so that he did not in the least doubt but that all was prepared for murdering him, and in a violent Fury he drew his Sword, run him through, and kill'd him on the Spot, and immediately made himself Master of the Kingdom. Gundebert had at this Time a little Son call'd Rambertus, whom his trusty Friends carried off privately, and brought up carefully : Grimoaldus was not very solicitous about having him in his Custody, because he was yet but a Child.

AS soon as Partarites heard of this Adventure, in a panick Fear he deserted his Kingdom, and left his Wife Rodolinda, and Cunipert his little Son, to shift for themselves ; and in great haste fled to Cacanus King of the Avari for shelter. Grimoaldus, having taken Milan, confin'd Rodolinda and Cunipert in Beneventum ; afterwards he went to Pavia, where in the End of the Year 662, he was proclaim'd King by the Longobards themselves ; and having married the Sister of Gundebert, to the great Joy of every Body, he sent back the Army to Beneventum, loaded with Presents, and kept with himself only some of his most trusty Friends, whom he rais'd afterwards to the first Honours of the Kingdom.

Of Grimoaldus XII. King of the Longobards ; of Romualdus VI. Duke of Beneventum ; and of the Italian Expedition of Constantine Emperor of the East.

WHILE Grimoaldus reign'd in Pavia, and Romualdus his Son in Beneventum, with so great Contentment, a most dangerous and cruel War was hatching against them, which put them in danger of being driven from their Dominions. Hitherto the Greek Emperors, little mindful of the Affairs of Italy, and contenting themselves with having in it the Exarchate of Ravenna, the Dukedom of Rome, and those of Naples, Gaeta, and Amalphis, with some Cities in Calabria and the Brutii, had no Thoughts of restoring it to their Empire. The Emperor Heraclius could scarcely keep the Longobards within their Bounds, and from intirely driving the Greeks out of Italy ; but he dying in the Month of May, in the Year 641, left his Son Constantine his Successor : Constantinople, the Seat of the Empire, was at this Time so plagu'd with Revolutions, that the Affairs of Italy were quite neglected ; forasmuch as Constantine had been upon the Throne but four, or according to others ' six Months, when Martina his Mother-in-Law caus'd him to be put to Death, to make room for her Son Heracleon. But he was turn'd out at the End of six Months, and banish'd, together with his Mother. Constans Son of Constantine succeeded him in the Year 642, at which time the Empire of the East began in some measure to breathe. This Prince was so intent upon reuniting Italy to the Empire of the East, that he reckon'd himself unworthy of swaying the Scepter of that Empire, if he did not altogether drive the Longobards out of Italy; and he was so bent on putting this Design in Execution, that not content with sending thither his Captains for that Undertaking, he would needs come in Person to these our Provinces, and put himself at the Head of his Army, leaving his Seat of Constantinople to shift for itself: A new Thing truly, which had never happen'd before, this being the first time that an Emperor of the East had been seen to go to Italy and to Rome. The Oddness and Novelty of which Fact gave occasion for much Speculation, in order to discover the Intent and Reasons of such a Movement.

SOME believ'd, that he having most treacherously murder'd Theodore his own Brother, who had often terrified him in hideous and frightful Shapes, and being tortur'd with such ugly Visions, had contriv'd Means for leaving that City, and those Places which had become so odious and fatal to him¹. Others attributed this Departure to the Hatred which the Constantinopolitans bore him, for his having embrac'd the Heresy of the Monothelites; and that therefore he intended to remove the Seat of the Empire to Rome. But the most judicious Authors, among which are, Anastasius Bibliothecarius and *Warnefride*², say, that he was moved on no other Account, but out of a Desire to recover Italy, and the Hopes of being able to drive the Longobards out of that Country with his own Forces; therefore in the Spring of the Year 663, he prepared a great Fleet, and departed from Constantinople, directing his Course for Tarentum. Many Cities of these our Provinces, which at present make our Kingdom, in the Reign of Constans were still under the Dominion of the Greeks; who besides the Dukedom of Naples, and other lesser Dukedoms, had likewise many other Maritime Cities in Calabria, such as Tarentum, that had not as yet been possess'd by the Longobards of Beneventum. Constans being arriv'd in this City, and having landed his Troops, whom the Neapolitans afterwards join'd, directed his March towards Beneventum. This unexpected Appearance of the Greeks, at first put the Beneventans into such a Consternation and Fright, that they deserted many Cities of Puglia; so that with small Resistance Constans took and destroy'd Lucera, a City not far from Sipontum; but he could not take Acerenza by reason of its strong Situation; and not willing to consume much Time, went immediately and pitch'd his Camp under Beneventum, and laid close Siege to it.

S E C T. I.

Of Romualdus VI. Duke of Beneventum.

ROMUALDUS Duke of Beneventum seeing himself in this Condition, immediately dispatch'd Gesualdus his Ambassador, to King Grimoaldus his Father in Pavia, to beg of him to send him powerful Assistance; and in the mean time, tho' the City was often assaulted by the Greeks, yet the Beneventan Longobards still repuls'd them, and sometimes they likewise attack'd the Greeks in their Lodgments by frequent Sallies, and routed and did them considerable Damage every where; the Labours of Barbatus, now a Priest, and afterwards their Bishop, contributed not a little to the Defence of this City; who often inveighing against them, and declaring, that they were punish'd with the Calamities of so cruel a War, because that some of them had not as yet forsaken the Superstition of the Gentiles, and others of them Arianism; wrought so far upon them, that he brought them to renounce their Idolatry, and to implore the Divine Assistance, and the Protection of the Saints, in order to be freed

freed from the Calamities that were hanging over them. But while Constans was at this Siege, behold, King Grimoaldus comes in Person with a powerful Army for the Relief of his Son; and in the mean time sends Gesualdus to advise him of it, and bid him take Courage, for that he would very soon relieve him. But this unlucky Man being arriv'd at the Enemies Camp, while he was endeavouring to throw himself into the besieged City, was taken, and carried before the Emperor Constans; who understanding that Grimoaldus was on his March with a strong Army in order to relieve his Son, and that he was already very near, was greatly perplex'd; and being resolv'd to raise the Siege, he try'd, because he could do it safely, and by that means reap some honourable Conditions of Peace, to get Gesualdus to declare the Success of his Embassy to Romualdus quite contrary to what it was; therefore having caus'd him to be brought under the Walls, he compell'd him to call to Romualdus, and tell him, that it was not possible his Father could come to his Relief; but Gesualdus, with undaunted Courage, seeing Romualdus upon the Wall, with a loud Voice, that all the Greeks that were present might likewise hear, said to him: Continue stedfast, and be of good Courage, my Lord; know, that your Father is near at hand with a powerful Army in order to relieve you, and this Night he will reach the River Sangro. I earnestly recommend to you my dear Wife and Children, because I am certain that these rascally Greeks will put me to Death immediately. Constans being highly incensed at this generous and bold Action, instantly caus'd his Head to be cut off, and with the Machine for throwing Stones, threw it within the Walls. Duke Romualdus took it up, and most affectionately kissing it, bathed it with Tears; thus did he honour the singular Vertue and Love of his faithful Friend, and besides gave him a sumptuous and noble Burial.

THE Emperor therefore afraid of the coming of Grimoaldus, rais'd the Siege; and while he was marching in a great hurry towards his City of Naples, Count Mitula of Capua, gave his Army a great Overthrow on his way at the River Calore, which much afflicted him; and after his Arrival at Naples, with a Design to go from thence to Rome, Saburrus having represented to him, which encourag'd him in the Undertaking, that if he would leave with him Twenty thousand Soldiers under his Command, he would engage to subdue all the Longobards, and gain a compleat Victory; Constans granted his Request, and left him at the Pass of Formia, which is now said to be Castellone, or Mola di Gacta, where he could at least keep the Enemy in Awe, while the Emperor should go to Rome. The Army of Saburrus was made up of Greeks and Neapolitans, People who had always been Rivals, and implacable Enemies of the Beneventans, and with whom they always had had cruel and obstinate Wars. Grimoaldus being arrived at Beneventum, when he heard of the Braggings of Saburrus, and the Designs of the Greeks, was for going himself in Person to fight him; but being intreated by Romualdus his Son, to commit that Undertaking to him, for that he had Courage enough to engage him; he consented, and gave him a Part of his Army. Romualdus encountred the Enemies Army with wonderful Intrepidity; and while they were fighting boldly, and the Victory as yet very doubtful, a Longobard named Amelongus, who was wont to carry the Launce before the King, boldly struck with the same Launce a Greek Horseman, with so much Strength and Fury, that lifting him from the Saddle, he rais'd him up high in the Air, and threw him Headlong on the Ground. Such a valorous Action struck so much Terror and Astonishment into the Greeks, that they basely abandon'd the Field, and fled, and the Longobards pursuing them, made a most cruel Slaughter; and obtain'd a compleat Victory. Romualdus full of Joy return'd triumphantly to Beneventum, where he was receiv'd by his Father and the Beneventans with great Applause, as the Deliverer of his native Country, and was honour'd and prais'd by the State. In the mean time Constans, when he saw all his Labour lost, and himself left without any hopes of defeating the Longobards, that his coming to Italy might not seem altogether in vain, full of Rage, design'd to go to Rome, where altho' he was receiv'd with many Marks of Respect and Veneration by Vitalianus the Roman Pontiff, yet all the twelve Days he remain'd there, he minded nothing else but plundering it of the richest Ornaments he could find, taking what was most valuable of Gold, Silver, Brass and Marble, which he caus'd to be put on board his Ships, in order to carry them to Constantinople; he himself return'd by Land to Naples, and from thence to Rhegium, where his Army was for the third Time defeated by the Beneventans: From thence he went to Sicily; where having continued some time, in the Year 668. he was miserably kill'd in the Bath by his own Men ¹ in Syracuse; and the inestimable Plunder and Riches which he had gathered together in Rome, and other Places, fell into the Hands of the Saracens, and were carried to Alexandria, and not to Constantinople.

SUCH was the fatal Issue of this Expedition of Constans, both with respect to the Greeks and himself, who by undertaking to restore Italy to his Empire, render'd the Affairs of the Longobards more prosperous: An Expedition as unfortunate to the Greeks, who were very near quite driven out of Italy, as it was fortunate and prosperous to the Longobards, who being more firmly establish'd in their Dominion, were intent on nothing afterwards but expelling the Greeks from those Cities which as yet they had Possession of. By these famous Victories, Romualdus so much enlarg'd the Dukedom of Beneventum, that having driven the Greeks from Bari, Tarentum, Brundysium, and all the other Places of Calabria, which at present go by the Name of Terra d'Otranto, he confin'd them to the small Dukedom of Naples, and Amalphis, and to Otranto, Gallipoli, Gaeta, and some other Maritime Cities of the Bruttii, which we now call the Further Calabria.

THESE were the remarkable Defeats, which, as the Historians of those Times relate, were given the Neapolitans by the Beneventans; about the same Time it was, that by the Labour of S. Barbatus the Longobards of Beneventum renounc'd Idolatry and Superstition, and heartily embrac'd the Catholick Religion. Which Conversion Warnefride, and the Writer of the Acts of the Angelical Apparition in Mount Garganus, both of them Longobards, most industriously conceal; that by so doing they may not discover, that hitherto the Longobards had continu'd Heathen, and that they had charg'd the Neapolitans with what the Longobards did, tho' the Neapolitans, as we have seen, had a great Regard both for the Catholick Faith, and the Sanctuary of Mount Garganus, of which there can be no better Proof than the Acts of S. Barbatus himself, now publish'd by Bolandus and Ughellus ², for after Barbatus had persuad'd the Duke of Beneventum, and the Longobards, that their having escap'd so many Calamities, was the Work of God and S. Michael the Archangel, they forsook all Heathenish Rites, and embracing the Catholick Religion, chose him Bishop of that City; and the Duke having offered him many and rich Donations, the holy Bishop refused them, and at the same Time persuad'd Romualdus that these Donations would be better bestow'd on the Cathedral of Mount Garganus, which by its being lately pillaged, had been neglected, and less frequented; and that his Example would instill into his Longobards a Veneration for the Place, and make it to be more frequented; and he likewise desired that the Duke would annex to his See of Beneventum, all that depended on the Bishoprick of Sipontum, because these Places at present uncultivated, being put under his Care, could be better kept and look'd after, to which Grimoaldus consented; whence it is, that from the Time of Pope Vitalianus, the Bishoprick of Sipontum, and the Care of the Cathedral of Mount Garganus did belong to the See of Beneventum, as is manifest from some Letters of Pope Vitalianus directed to the same Barbatus, related by Marius Vipper, in the first Book of his Chronology of the Bishops and Archbishops of Beneventum: So that afterwards in the succeeding Times, the Churches of Sipontum and Mount Garganus were long subject to the Bishops of Beneventum, until the Principality of Beneventum being in a declining Condition, Sipontum got its Archbishop restored; under whose Care these Churches absolutely return'd, as we shall shew more at length, when we come to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity of these Times.

ON this Account, the Veneration which the Longobards had for this Sanctuary grew greater, insomuch that they acknowledg'd the Saint for their Protector; and as the Subalpine Longobards had for their Protector the Forerunner of Christ, so those of Spoletium had S. Sabinus Bishop and Martyr; and our Longobards on this Side of the Tyber, had Michael the Archangel ³: So that all the Victories which the Longobards gain'd after this Time over the Neapolitans, which were many, as well as this which happen'd on the eighth of May, the Day of the Angelical Apparition, were attributed to the Intercession of this their Protector ⁴: Whence likewise the Error of those is manifest, who being ignorant of these Facts, carry back these Events to the Time of Theodorick the Ostrogoth; and being now convinced that before these Times the Neapolitans were Catholick, would have what is said of the Heathen Neapolitans to be understood of the Vandals, who were then join'd with the Neapolitans against the Goths.

The coming of the Bulgarians; and the Origin of the Italian Language.

BUT to return to King Grimoaldus, whom we left in Beneventum; this Prince seeing the Affairs of the Greeks at such a low Ebb, after having rewarded Mitola by making him Count of Capua, and given him his Daughter to Wife besides; on the Death of Zoto likewise made him Duke of Spoletium, and kept his Court at Pavia. While he was there intent on punishing the Rebellion of Lupus Duke of Friuli, Alczetus Duke of the Bulgarians came to him¹, who having forsaken his own Country, for what Reason is not known, enter'd peaceably into Italy with his Bulgarians, and offered his Service to Grimoaldus, intimating at the same time, that he was willing to live with his People in any Place of his Dominions he should be pleas'd to appoint. The Bulgarians had come from that Part of the Asiatick Sarmatia which is wash'd with the River Volga; and after having travers'd all those vast Countries which reach from that River to the Mouths of the Danube, they pass'd it for the first time in the Reign of the Emperor Anastasius, and made great Havock in Thrace and Illyricum, and settled themselves at last along the Danube, in that Tract of Country which comprehends the two Mysias, with the lesser Scythia, which is now called Bulgaria from the Name of these People.

THE King receiv'd him very graciously, thinking he would be of great Use and Assistance to his Son against the Greeks, and sent him to Romualdus in Beneventum, whom he order'd to give him some Places in the Dukedom of Beneventum, for himself and People to live in. Duke Romualdus gave him a kind Reception, and allotted to him and his People many fine Cities in that Dukedom, to wit, Sepinum, Bajanum, and Ifernina, with other Cities and Territories in the Neighbourhood; but he would have him to lay aside the Title of Duke (for he had not given him those Places in Seignory and Property) and for the future call himself Gastaldus, perhaps he thought it was not fit, seeing he had no other Title himself but that of Duke, that one of his Subjects should have the same Title; whence it came to pass, that the Dukedom of Beneventum being divided into many Counties, all subject to the Duke of Beneventum, they who were appointed to govern them, had no other Title but that of Comites or Gastaldi, and they held these Places, as Cujacius says, *Jure Gastaldie, non perpetuo, proprioque Feudi jure*².

THUS in the Year 667, a new Nation of Bulgarians was brought into our Kingdom; a People who for many Ages inhabited that Country which we now call Contado di Molise; and altho', more than a Hundred and fifty Years after, when Warnefride wrote his History, they had learned our common Italian Language, nevertheless, they had not then lost the Use of their own, as he relates in the fifth Book of the Actions of the Longobards, Article 11.; in which Place what he writes is worthy of Observation, that in his time the Bulgarians retain'd their own Language, tho' they likewise spoke a sort of Latin, Quamvis etiam Latine loquantur, which we are not to understand, as some have done³, that they spoke Roman Latin, which about the End of the ninth Century, when Warnefride wrote, was generally forgotten and diffus'd, and was only made use of in Writings, but very much corrupted, and the Variety, Mixture, and Confusion of so many foreign Languages with the Latin, had given Rise to another new and vulgar Language which was then current in Italy, and call'd the Italian.

³ Ciarlant. of Samnium and others.

THIS not to be doubted in the least; but that at this Time the Italian Language had got footing, and was much in use, it being more ancient than some believe. Fornerius attests ¹, that in the Time of the Emperor Justinian there had been an Instrument drawn up in Ravenna, Conceptum eo fere Sermone, quo nunc vulgus Italiae utitur. Constantinus Porphyrogenitus also in his Time, about the Year 910, calls Beneventum and Venice, Citta Nova ². The Author of the Acts of Alexander III. as Cardinal Baronius has it ³, relating the reproachful Language given by the Roman Women to Octavianus the Antipope, says, that they called him Lingua Vulgari: Santa Campagno. Afterwards in the Time of Frederick II. it was most common, and become already old: Not to mention Ramitus of Calabria, who, as Richard of S. Germano relates ⁴, went about crying, Benedittu, laudatu e santificatu lu Patre: Benedittu laudatu e santificatu lu fillu: Benedittu laudatu e santificatu lu Spiritu santu; nor the same Frederick, nor Eutius his Bastard Son, nor Pietro delle Vigne, nor many others of that Age, we read of many Compositions written in the Italian Language.

THIS Language, by the Writers of this, and likewise of the following Centuries, was also call'd Latin, for it was commonly spoke even by the ancient Provincials (whose Language before the Corruption was the ancient Latin) who were call'd Latins, or Romans, in order to distinguish them, either from the Greeks, or Longobards, or other Nations that came into Italy; whence not only Paul Warnefride, but Writers much later than he, by the vulgar or common Latin, understand the vulgar or common Italian. So Otho Frisingensis ⁵ commends the Longobards of his Time, who were then become Italians, for the Elegancy of the Latin Language, that is to say, the Italian, which they spoke not only well, but also readily. At this Time our Italian Idiom pass'd under no other Name but that of the vulgar Latin; it was call'd so in the End of the first Chapter of Ser Brunettus: So likewise those who spoke not the ancient Latin, but our Italian Dialect, by Dante Alighieri, Petrarcha ⁶, and Boccaccio ⁷ are said, Latine loqui, as the most exact Pellegrinus nicely observes ⁸.

AND from this Residence, which various Nations had in many Parts of this our Kingdom, has risen the so great Diversity of Language which we observe in these our Provinces, altho' they all spoke a sort of Italian; for tho' the Bulgarians had liv'd many Ages in these Cities, and in process of Time had become Italians, and left off their own Language, and learn'd the Vulgar; nevertheless the Mixture of two Nations in the same Place, occasion'd that the Italian, tho' superior, became somewhat corrupted; and besides the new Words of that strange Nation, retain'd likewise a foreign Twang or Accent. So likewise in other Parts of our Kingdom, such as Samnium and Apurium, where the Longobards continued longest, besides Words, they left an Impression different from the common Italian Language: And in those Countries where the Greeks were long settled, as in some Cities of Calabria, and particularly in Naples, they retain to this Day a great deal of the Tone of their Language, as also many of their Words; and there are some who have been at the Pains to collect a long Catalogue of them, as Capaccius ⁹ did of the Greek Words which the Neapolitans make use of in their common Discourse at this Day. The Novelty and Variety of foreign Nations who invaded the Kingdom, did not end here, but one Nation succeeded another at different Times, and in different Countries of it; from whence sprung the so many various and strange Mixtures which we see at this Time.

EVEN the Arabians or Saracens left us their Share; these fixed themselves first in Garigliano; from thence dispersing themselves over Calabria, Puglia, and Pozzuolo, left several Words among us; for Example, Meschino, Magazzino, Maschera, Gibel, which signifies a Hill; whence Aetna, by way of Excellency, is called Gibel, and corruptly Mongibello, repeating the same Thing twice, not to mention other Examples. And some have written, that it was the Arabians who first taught the Sicilians, and afterwards the other Italians, as also the Spaniards, to rhyme; and Thomas Campanella, in order to confirm that, brings a Sclavonian Song for a Testimony, wherein the same is affirm'd, and which he was wont to repeat by Heart; from whom afterwards the other Provinces of Europe learn'd it, and at last it reach'd Germany, as may be seen in that Poem, or rhiming Verses of Otphridus, who liv'd in the Time of Lewis the Pious, whom *Antonius Matthæus*¹ believes to be the most ancient Writer the Germans now pretend to: Besides, as we shall see in the following Books of this History, it was from the Arabians, and none else, that we had Philosophy, Physick, Mathematicks, and other Learning, which for many Ages have been taught in our Schools.

BUT the Normans, the Suevi, the French, the Spaniards, the Albani (and who not?) succeeding the Longobards, Greeks, and Saracens, tho' all our Provinces retain'd the same Italian Language, occasion'd that Diversity and Mixture which we at present see, and is the more surprizing, that there is not the least Part whatsoever in the Kingdom, that either in the Terms, the Accent, and often in the Words, does not differ, and is distinguish'd from the rest; but enough of this, and perhaps we shall have occasion to touch on it elsewhere.

The Laws of Grimoaldus, and his Death.

MEAN while Grimoaldus freed from all Suspicion and warlike Cares, in the sixth Year of his Reign, was altogether intent on the Arts of Peace, and to secure the Quiet of his Dominions by new Laws. The Laws of Rotaris during the Space of Twenty-four Years that they had been publish'd, had taken deep Root in Italy; not only the Longobards, for whom they had been made, began to conform themselves to them, but likewise the Natives, tho' the Use of the Roman Laws had never been forbid them: But in process of Time, as commonly happens, it was observ'd, that these were not sufficient for every Thing that was necessary, and many of them when they came to be made use of, and put in Practice, seem'd something harsh and grievous¹; whence Grimoaldus, a most prudent Prince, desirous to reform in Part the Edict of Rotaris, and to add to it other Laws, which seem'd to him more useful: Having assembled his Longobards and their Judges, according to their Custom, in the Year 668, which was the sixth of his Reign, added other Laws to the Edict of Rotaris, and reform'd those already made, and publish'd a new Edict with this Preamble; *Superiore pagina hujus Edicti legitur, quod adhuc annuente Domino memorare poterimus, de singulis Causis, quæ præsentibus non essent adscriptæ in hoc Edicto adjungere debeamus, ita ut causæ, quæ judicatæ & finitæ sunt, non revolvantur. Ideo ego Grimoaldus vir excellentissimus, Rex Gentis Longobardorum, Anno Deo propitio, sexto Regni mei, mense Julio, Indictione undecima, per suggestionem Judicum, omniumque consensum, quæ illis dura, & impia in hoc Edicto visa sunt, ad meliorem sensum revocare prævidimus*².

THIS Edict of Grimoaldus is to be found in the abovementioned Code of the Monastery of the Cave, after that of Rotaris, and is contain'd in eleven Chapters, the Titles of which are these, I. Si quis hominum nolendo occiderit. II. Ut causæ finitæ non revolvantur. III. De servo, qui 30 annos servivit. IV. De 30 annorum libertate. V. De culpa servorum. VI. De 30 annorum possessione. VII. De successione Nepotum. VIII. De Uxoribus dimittendis. IX. De Crimine uxoris. X. Si mulier, aut Puella super alia ad maritum intraverit. XI. Si ancilla furtum fecerit.

THE Compiler of the three Books of the Laws of the Longobards, inserted likewise some of these Laws of Grimoaldus in the first and second Book, to the Number of Seven. We read the first in the first Book, under the Title de Furtis, & servis

AFTER Grimoaldus had so well perform'd the Part of an excellent Prince, by a most surprizing Accident he was snatch'd away by Death; for having been blooded in one of his Arms, nine Days after, when with all his Strength he was bending a Bow, the Vein opened again, and all Means possible were used for closing it, but to no purpose; being drain'd of Blood, he died in the ninth Year of his Reign, which fell out in the Year 672. of Man's Redemption. Grimoaldus was endued with all singular Vertues, and by his Prudence and courteous Deportment was exalted to the Throne: A Prince, who by his Piety left a commendable and worthy Example for his People to follow; for tho' he had been born and brought up in the Arian Heresy, by the Assistance of John Bishop of Bergamo, a Man of singular Goodness and Learning, he forsook it, and embrac'd the Catholick Religion; not content with that, he repaired many Churches, and rebuilt others, amongst which that dedicated to Alexander, in the Island of Dulcheria was famous, and the other in Pavia to the holy Bishop *Ambrose*¹. And his Example was so prevalent, that the Kings his Successors were all Catholicks, and Arianism was forsaken by all the Longobards in Italy.

Of Garibaldus, Pertarites, Cunipertes, and other Kings and Dukes of Beneventum, down to Luitprandus.

RIMOALDUS left, besides Romualdus who reign'd in Beneventum, another little Son nam'd Garibaldus, to whom on his Death-bed he left the Kingdom. Romualdus Duke of Beneventum was not advanc'd to the Royal Throne, tho' the Eldest, because he was reputed a Bastard. But Garibaldus did not long enjoy it, for he had scarcely mounted the Throne, when Pertarites, who had been banish'd into France, hearing of the Death of Grimoaldus, came immediately into Italy, where being receiv'd with incredible Joy by a great Multitude of Longobards, he presently went to Pavia; from whence Garibaldus, after a Reign of three Months from the Death of his Father, was expell'd, and Pertarites plac'd on the Throne by the Longobards; and having recall'd his Wife Rodolinda, and Cunipertus his Son, who had been long in Exile in Beneventum, he govern'd the Kingdom afterwards with so much Peace and Justice, that no Violence, Robbery, or Treason was heard of during his Reign.

THIS Prince in the Year 680, associated Cunipertus his Son with himself in the Kingdom, and Pertarites at last dying in the Year 690, he continued to govern alone: However his Peace and Quiet was somewhat interrupted by Alabis Duke of Trent, who invaded the Kingdom; but he was soon expell'd, and Cunipertus continu'd to govern the Realm with the former wonted Quiet. Cunipertus died in the Year 703, leaving for Successor in the Kingdom Luitpertus his only Son, yet an Infant, therefore he left him under the Care of Asprandus, a Man of noble Birth.

Birth. Cunipertus, as Warnefride says, was a Prince of singular and wonderful Beauty, of most sweet Manners, and uncommon Courage, and a Catholick of rare Piety, so that the Kingdom of the Longobards had never been seen hitherto in so much Peace and Tranquillity as in his Reign, and that of Pertarites his Father.

Of Grimoaldus II. Gisulphus I. Romualdus II. Adelai; Gregorius, Godescalcus, Gisulphus II. and Luitprandus, Dukes of Beneventum.

IN the mean time, Romualdus dying in the Year 677, was succeeded by Grimoaldus II. his Son, to whom he left the Dukedom much greater, having enlarged it with the Conquest of Taranto, Brundisium, Bari, and all the Country round about, which he had taken from the Emperor of the East. But Grimoaldus enjoy'd the Dukedom not quite three Years; during which Time, together with his Brother Gisulphus, he had govern'd it, and dying, left him alone in the Dukedom.

GISULPHUS held the Dukedom of Beneventum, reckoning the three Years which he reign'd with his Brother Grimoaldus, seventeen Years; and he began to govern it alone about the End of the Year 680, according to the Computation of Pellegrinus, and laid waste the Campania Romana.

BUT Gisulphus dying in the Year 694, was succeeded in the Dukedom by Romualdus II. his Son, and while he govern'd Beneventum the Monastery of Casino was restor'd to its ancient Lustre by Pertinax. The Government of Romualdus was of a pretty long duration, having lasted twenty-six Years, during which Time he much vexed the Neapolitans, from whom he took Cuma; but they, at the Instigation of Pope Gregory II. making War under their Duke John, very soon retook it, and made great Havock of the Longobards ¹.

TO Romualdus, in the Year 720, Adelai succeeded, who govern'd only two Years. To him succeeded Gregory, who held the Dukedom seven Years, and dying in the Year 729, was succeeded in the Dukedom by Godescalcus, who rul'd it somewhat less than four Years.

GISULPHUS II. of that Name succeeded in the Year 732, who to make amends for the Pillage of Zoto, enrich'd the Monastery of Monte Casino with many Possessions and large Donations; such Places and Lands of the Estate of S. Germano were given to it at this Time; and that at length being increas'd with other Donations, it became so rich, that the Abbots being Lords of many Vassals, rose to such a Height, that they kept Troops in their own Pay.

GISULPHUS govern'd the Dukedom of Beneventum seventeen Years; a Prince of great Piety, and most munificent to the Churches, to which he was profuse in his Gifts, and built many, amongst which that of S. Sophia was famous, which he rais'd in Beneventum from the Foundation. He died in the Year 744, and his Successor was Luitprandus the last Duke of Beneventum. He held the Dukedom eight Years and three Months; and after his Death, in the Year 758, Arechis his Son-in-Law was substituted in his Room by the Barons of Beneventum, and King Desiderius; Who, when the Kingdom of the Longobards was extinguish'd by Charles the Great, first chang'd the Dukedom of Beneventum into a Principality, and introducing a new Polity, filled his Dominion with many Counts, and Castellains or Gastaldi; and laying aside the Title of Duke, took that of Prince, and causing himself to be anointed by his Bishops, assumed the Crown, Scepter, the Purple Garment, and all the other Ensigns of Royalty; whose notable Exploits will furnish us with abundance of Matter in the sixth Book of this History.

Of Luitpertus, Ragumbertus, Aripertus II. and Asprandus Kings of the Longobards.

IN the mean time Ragumbertus had succeeded Luitpertus, who had reign'd only eight Months in the Kingdom of Italy. He was Duke of Turin, and Son of Gudebertus, who left him very young when he was kill'd by King Grimoaldus. He invaded the Kingdom in the Minority of Luitpertus, and at last drove him from the Throne.

TO Ragumbertus, who died the same Year, Aripertus II. of that Name, his Son, succeeded, of whom 'tis said, that he confirm'd the Patrimony of the Alpes Cottiae to the Church of Rome; but he was afterwards chased away and kill'd by Asprandus, who took Possession of the Kingdom; and he likewise dying after three Months, left it to Luitprandus his Son, in whose Time were hatch'd those Mischiefs, which not long after were the Occasion of the transferring the Kingdom of Italy from the Longobards to the French; whence sprung the Beginning of the Temporal Dominion of the Popes in Italy, and so many and strange Changes happen'd in these our Provinces, that for the Novelty and Importance of the Events, after we shall have related the Ecclesiastical Polity of these Times, deserve to be reported in the following Book of this History.

C H A P. XII.

Of the Exterior Ecclesiastical Polity in the Kingdom of the Longobards, from Autaris down to King Luitprandus; and in the Empire of the Greeks, from Justin II. down to Leo Isauricus.

HOW great soever the Progress of the Patriarchs of Constantinople had been in these Times in the East, nevertheless they had not as yet extended their Patriarchal Authority over these our Provinces; although by Degrees, being upheld by the Favour of the Emperors, they began to lay Claim to some Churches of those Cities which were yet under the Greek Empire. The first Step they took was, by giving the Bishops the Title of Archbishops, which not being a Title of Power, such as Metropolitan, but only of Dignity, it was very easy for a simple Bishop to obtain it, and for the Patriarchs of the East to give it: So we read, that from the Reign of the Emperor Phocas, who govern'd the Empire from the Year 602. to 610, the Patriarchs of Constantinople began, according to the wonted Pride of the Greeks, to give many of the Bishops of our Cities which were under their Subjection, that specious Title of Archbishop, such as those of Otranto, Bari, and afterwards also to the Bishop

Bishop of *Naples*¹, to the great Indignation of the Popes. These were the first Steps they took in these our Parts; but in the East, by reason that the other Patriarchal Cities were possessed by the Barbarians, and the three Patriarchs laid aside, so that there could not be a continued Succession preserv'd, the Patriarch of Constantinople became more haughty and arrogant: Whence Joannes Jejunator, who was elected Patriarch of Constantinople in the Year 585, during the Empire of Mauritius, took the vain-glorious Title of Oecumenical Patriarch.

BUT on the other hand, the Progress of the Patriarch of Rome was no less in the West, that he might withstand so much Pride, and counterballance so great Power. And the Chair of Rome was at this Time much exalted above all others, on account of the Sanctity and Doctrine of Gregory the Great, who sat in it in the Year 590. This Pope maintain'd the Prerogatives and Rights of his See, and made his Authority to be respected over all the West; he oppos'd the Patriarch John, and did not approve of the pompous Title of Oecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople, as being Ambitious, and which tended to the Diminution of the Power and Jurisdiction of other Bishops; so that he was the first who call'd and subscrib'd himself Servus Servorum Dei, in Opposition to the vain-glorious Title of Oecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople.²

FOR which purpose he endeavour'd to keep in Favour with the Emperors of the East, whose Subject he profess'd himself to be³, Rome being under those Princes; and that he might deserve well of them, he always oppos'd the Power of the Longobards, by not only taking Care for the Defence of that City, but of all the rest; and particularly of Naples, in order to maintain the Dominion of the Emperors of the East in Italy, and to counterballance the Power of the Longobards, who aim'd at the universal Monarchy of all Italy, and driving the Greeks intirely out of it: Therefore he reliev'd the People by his great Liberality; and when the Longobards pillag'd Croton, and carried the Citizens into Captivity, he apply'd himself so strenuously, that by his good Offices he got them ransom'd. And he took a special Care of the Churches of Italy, Sicily, and of these our Provinces, which as formerly acknowledged no other Patriarch but him, and the other Popes his Successors. So we see, that in the Ordination of Bishops in Sicily, Naples, Capua, Misenum, Beneventum, Puglia, Calabria, Lucania, and Aprutium, recourse was had to him, and any Disputes that arose about Elections were decided by him. He likewise applied himself wholly to the Affairs of the Universal Church, and he not only took Pains to extinguish the Division which was in the Church, betwixt the Latins and the Greeks, but also to extirpate the Schism of the Donatists out of Africa; and he sent Augustin the Monk into England, in order to convert those People. He left no Stone unturn'd, that by the Means of Theodolinda, the Longobards, by forsaking their Idolatry and Arianism, might embrace the Catholick Faith: Nevertheless he forbid the using of Violence to oblige the Jews to turn Christians. And above all, he was intent on keeping up the Church Discipline, and the absolute Observation of the Canons in all the Churches, holding it for certain, that the Power and Authority which the Primacy of his See gave him, made the most shining Figure by these Means.

THE Successors of Gregory took the same Measures; for although he died in the Year 604, and was succeeded by Sabinian, who held the See only five Months, and twenty-one Days; yet Boniface III. his Successor, who had been a long time Nuncio with the Emperor Phocas, Successor of Mauritius, by his Prudence had found Means so to insinuate himself into his Favour, that if we may give Credit to Anastasius, Bede, Warnefride, and many other Authors, when the Patriarchs of Constantinople claim'd the Primacy over all the Churches, he obtain'd a Rescript from Phocas, in which it was declar'd, That the Church of Rome ought to have the Primacy over all the Churches, and that the Bishop of Rome alone ought to have the Title of Oecumenical Patriarch; which 'tis said the Emperor Phocas did in Odium of Chriacus Patriarch of Constantinople, who had succeeded Joannes Jejunator in the Year 596, and died soon after.

BONIFACE IV. who succeeded the Third, found Means likewise to keep in Favour with the Emperor, and oppos'd the Longobards, so that he got the Temple of Phaeton in Rome, from Phocas, in order to make a Church of it, which he did, and which, from its Figure is now call'd the Rotunda. All his Successors took the same Measures, and Pope Vitalian, when the Emperor Constantine came to Rome in the Year 663, receiv'd him with great Marks of Esteem and Respect: All the other Popes did the same, who continued firm in their Obedience to the Emperors of the East, against the Longobards, until Leo Isauricus, who, by defending the Error of the Iconoclasts, against the Authority of Gregory II. and III. put all in Confusion, as we shall see in the following Book of this History.

ON the other hand the Longobards, tho' for the most part Idolaters, and some of them Arians, did not disturb the Peace of our Churches; and as they found them at first under the Care of the Popes, so they suffered them to continue. King Autaris about the Year 587, forsook Paganism, and embrac'd the Christian Religion; but after the Example of the Gotbick Kings, he receiv'd it polluted with the Arian Heresy. The Longobards following the Example of their King did, the same, and made no Alteration in the Religion of the Provincials; whence there were seen in some Cities of Italy two Bishops, the one Arian, who had the Inspection of the converted Longobards; the other Catholick, who govern'd the Catholick Churches of the Provincials: However our Provinces were free of that Deformity; for those which continued subject to the Emperors of the East were all Catholick; the rest which were brought under the Dominion of the Longobards, kept the same Religion intire, which the Goths, and especially the great King Theodorick, had left them; in which King Autaris, and the other Kings his Successors persever'd. To all this was afterwards added the Piety of Queen Theodolinda, a most Religious and Catholick Lady, who, tho' she had not the desir'd Success in getting her first Husband Autaris perswaded to relinquish Arianism, yet such was the Influence she had upon her second Agilulfus, on account of the great Obligations he ow'd her, that she perswaded him to embrace the Catholick Religion; whence it was that S. Gregory the Great acknowledg'd himself so much oblig'd to that Princess, to whom he dedicated his four Books of the Lives of the Saints¹; and we read many affectionate Letters of his, full of Encomiums and Praises, directed to this Queen²: Whence many Longobards, following the Example of their Prince, became likewise Catholicks; whereupon many Churches and Monasteries were built in the Reign of *Agilulfus*³, to which many Lands were given, and the Bishops, who formerly had been despis'd in the Cities of the Longobards, were now comforted and much respected. And tho' in the Reign of Ariovaldus, a perfidious Arian, who succeeded Agilulfus, that Peace was disturb'd which Agilulfus had settled, nevertheless, Rotaris afterwards ascending the Throne, a Prince tho' an Arian, of a peaceable Disposition, and who allow'd the Provincials, as well as the Longobards, to enjoy what Religion they pleased best, Things return'd to the former Peace and Tranquillity, which was still more confirm'd in the Reign of Aripertus, who was very favourably inclin'd to the Catholick Religion.

BUT afterwards our Longobards on this Side of the Tyber were the first that relinquish'd Arianism altogether, the Praise of which was owing to two illustrious Bishops, Barbatus of Beneventum, and Decorosus of Capua. Barbatus, after the Defeat which the Beneventan Longobards, under their Duke Romualdus, gave the Greeks, purg'd that Nation not only of Idolatry, but likewise of Arianism; and they became all Catholicks; the same happen'd to the Capuan Longobards by Decorosus their Bishop: So that in all these Provinces which had been subjected to their Dominion, Arianism was quite abolish'd by the Longobards themselves. Altho' the East frequently produc'd Heresies and Errors concerning Doctrine, whence these Churches had no good Agreement with our Western, and especially at this Time on account of the Heresy of the Monothelites; nevertheless the Vigilance of the Popes, under whose Care and Government the Churches of the Provinces yet subject to the Greeks still continued, was such, that they were not polluted with these Errors.

BUT not long after, what happily fell out to our Longobards on this Side of the Tyber, under Romualdus Duke of Beneventum, happen'd to the Subalpine Longobards, under Grimoaldus King of Italy: This Prince becoming Catholick, so much favour'd the Churches, and had so great an Aversion to the Doctrine of the Arians, that he intirely abolish'd Arianism over all Italy. This gave Rise to the Riches of the Churches; whence likewise proceeded the Depravation of Manners of the greatest Part of Christians, and the Decay of Ecclesiastical Discipline.

THESE Longobard Princes, after the Example of all the other Princes of the West, and of the Emperors of the East, altho' they had become Christians, nevertheless with regard to the exterior Ecclesiastical Polity, kept up the same Prerogatives and Pre-eminence in their Dominions, that the Gothish Kings had done; and though the Popes made their own Authority to be regarded in the West, yet the Princes, and especially those of France and Spain, had a mind, amongst other Things, by their Laws and Edicts to give Force to the Provincial Synods, which were very frequent in this Century, and conven'd by their Order, for redressing of Grievances, and the corrupt Discipline and Irregularities of Ecclesiasticks. Likewise the Emperors of the East, not only follow'd the Footsteps of their Predecessors, but concern'd themselves much in the Affairs of Religion, the Popes not being able to make that Resistance they would willingly have done. The Emperor Mauritius treading in the same Footsteps of the other Emperors his Predecessors, publish'd Laws forbidding Soldiers to be receiv'd into Monasteries: S. Gregory ¹ complain'd of the Law, but did not impugn the Power of the Lawgiver; and with much Caution represented, that it was unjust, and against the Service of God, to hinder Men from chusing the Way to greater Perfection. Mauritius our Duke of Naples, oblig'd the Monks to stand Centinel for guarding the City, and quarter'd the Troops every where, not even sparing the Nunneries, of which this Pope likewise complain'd ².

MOREOVER the Emperors of the East appointed the Diocesses, and the Metropolis's, regulated the Sees and Precedencies, and augmented and diminish'd the Prerogatives of the Metropolitans at their Pleasure. And our Dukes of Beneventum did the same in their large Dukedom: At the Request of Barbatus Bishop of that City, Duke Romualdus united the Bishoprick of Sipontum to that of Beneventum; see the Request of Barbatus to Romualdus, as we read it in his Acts: Simunus, says he, tuæ salutis offerre Studes, unum impende beneficium, ut B. Michaelis Archangeli domus, quæ in Gargano sita est, & omnia, quæ sub ditione Sipontini Episcopatus sunt, ad sedem Beatissimæ Genitricis Dei, tibi nunc indigne præsum, in omnibus subdas; & quoniam absque cultoribus omnia depravantur, unde nec sedulum Officium persolveri potest melius a nobis disposita tibi præstent in Salutem. Romualdus granted his Request, and gave him a Diploma for it: Illico Princeps viri Dei consentit petitionibus, eo ordine, ut fati sumus, & sicut mos est, per Præceptum Genetrici Dei universa concessit, & ut resonet in futurum, Anathematizaverat, qui contra hæc agens irritam hanc facere voluerit Concessionem. Barbatus wanted likewise to have the Pope Vitalianus to consent to it, because it was the Business of the Roman Pontiffs (to whom Samnium and Puglia, as Suburbicarian Provinces, belong'd) to unite and separate their Churches, as had been often practis'd by Pope Gregory, who in the Year 592, join'd the Church of Cuma to that of Misenus ³, which Union was of short Duration; and the same was practis'd in other Suburbicarian Provinces. For we read in Vipera and Ughellus ⁴, the Brief of Vitalianus directed to Bishop Barbatus, wherein amongst other Things we find this; Concedentes tibi, tuæque præfatæ Reverendissimæ Beneventanensi Ecclesiæ, Bibinum, Asculum, Larinum, & Ecclesiam Sancti Michaelis Archangeli in Gargano, pariterque Sipontinam Ecclesiam, quæ in magna inopia, & paupertate esse videtur, & absque cultoribus, & Ecclesiasticis Officiis nunc cernitur esse depravata, cum omnibus quidem eorum pertinentiis, & omnibus prædiis cum Ecclesiis, &c. Therefore since this Time of Pope Vitalianus, the Church of Sipontum has been united to that of Beneventum, and the Bishops of Beneventum call'd themselves likewise Bishops of Sipontum, until these Churches were again separated.

THEREFORE, the Ecclesiastical Polity was not alter'd, either in the Provinces which were brought under the Dominion of the Longobards, or those which remain'd under the Greeks; but every Thing with respect to that was preserv'd in the same Form in which it had been under the Gothish Kings of Italy, and under Justinian and Justin Emperors of the East.

S E C T. I.

The Election of Bishops, and their Disposition in the Cities of these our Provinces.

THE Bishops were still elected by the Clergy and People, and ordain'd by the Popes as formerly; but the Princes, as if such Power had been devolved upon them by the People, would have the greatest Share in the Elections, whence it came, that by their Means some being elected, who had neither Merit, Learning, nor Capacity, the Churches were ill govern'd. In the Register of the Letters of S. Gregory we read, that this Pope exercising both his Metropolitan and Patriarchal Authority in these our Provinces, not only ordain'd those elected by the Clergy and People, but also regulated the Elections, decided the Controversies which arose, and often depriv'd the Bishops of their Sees, when he found them unworthy. Thus we read of the Bishops of Naples, that in the Year 590, while Demetrius fill'd that Chair, he, for his many and heinous Crimes was deposed by Gregory the following Year; who after he had deposed him, wrote to the Clergy and the Orders of that City, to wit, to the Nobles and People, that in the Room of Demetrius they should chuse another; and in the mean Time he sent Bishop Paul to govern that Church, until they should chuse a Successor. The Neapolitans were so well pleas'd with Paul, that they wrote to the Pope, intreating him that he would give them him for their Bishop: Gregory took Time to consider; and in the mean while, Paul being in the Castle of Lucullus, which is now call'd Uovo, and having receiv'd an Affront from some Servants belonging to a Neapolitan Lady, named Clementia, intreated Gregory that he would allow him to return to his Church; whereupon the Neapolitans not agreeing amongst themselves in the Election of one of their Citizens, and perceiving that Paul would not accept, elected Florentius the Pope's Subdeacon, who was then in Naples; but he refusing the Charge, soon made his Escape, and fled to Rome; so that Gregory wrote to Scholasticus Duke of Naples, exhorting him to assemble the Nobles and the People of the City, in order to elect another Person; and after the Election to send the Decree to Rome, that he might ordain the Person elected: Adding besides, that seeing they had twice elected Strangers, if they could not find amongst the Citizens a Person fit for such a Charge, at least they should chuse three prudent and virtuous Men, to whom all the Orders were to give their Power, and send them to Rome as Representatives of the City, that together with the Pope, they might consult and order Matters so, as at last to find a Person of unspotted Life, and approve of him, that the Pope might ordain and send him to the vacant Church.

GREGORY wrote such another Letter¹ to Peter Subdeacon of Campania, who had the Charge of St. Peter's Patrimony in that Province, whom he injoin'd to cause the Clergy of the Church of Naples to be assembled, and to order them to chuse two or three of their Number, to whom they should give full Power, and send them to Rome; where being join'd to the other Representatives of the Nobility and People, they might treat about the Election and Ordination of the new Bishop.

THIS Election was call'd per Compromissum, which was wont to be practis'd in Cases of Division and Disagreement, that so by uniting their Minds and Suffrages in two or three prudent Persons, in order to shun Confusion and Disputes, these might elect him whom they thought the most deserving and capable². In this manner Fortunatus was elected at last by the Arbitrators in Rome, in the Month of June, in the Year 593; and being ordain'd by the Pope, came to Naples, where he was most lovingly receiv'd by the Neapolitans his Children, and he govern'd that Church for many Years with so much Prudence and Care, that he was highly commended by Gregory; whence we read many of his Letters directed to this Bishop⁴.

FORTUNATUS dying, there arose new Disputes about a Successor; and the Suffrages being divided, the Clergy and People elected two Bishops; one Party elected John the Deacon; the other Peter, likewise a Deacon. Immediately they had their recourse to Pope Gregory, that of the two he might chuse him whom he should esteem the most worthy, and confirm and ordain him. But none of them pleas'd him: John was remarkable for Incontinency, having a Daughter who was a Testimony of his Weakness; Peter as an Usurer, and of a weak Understanding, was reckon'd unworthy, and not fit; whereupon he wrote back to the Neapolitans to chuse others, which they afterwards did¹.

WE see the same Method practis'd in the Elections of the Bishops of Capua, Cuma, Misenus, Beneventum, Salernum, Aprutium, and of all the other Churches in these our Provinces, which as Suburbicarian belong'd to the Pope: Palermo, likewise Messina, and all the other Churches of that Island, Sicily being also a Suburbicarian Province, observ'd the same Rule.

THE Election, according to the Direction of the Canons, ought to fall upon one who was of the same Church, or who (according to the Language of this Time) was incardinated into it, and not of other Churches; but when the Citizens could not find a fit Person amongst themselves, which seldom happen'd, then in that case they had recourse to Strangers, who were eminent either for their Piet^y, Prudence, or Learning: So we read, that Gregory, when a Bishop of Capua was to be elected, the Capuans disagreeing in the Election, and some of them naming Strangers, protesting, that there were none of the Natives worthy, answer'd, that it appear'd very strange to him, and that in the mean Time they ought to make a more narrow Scrutiny among their Citizens, and if truly there was not one fit Person found among them, then he would furnish them with one.

BY the Death of Liberius Bishop of Cuma, which fell out in the Year 592, this same Pope sent Benenatus Bishop of Misenus to govern it until a Successor should be elected. The People of Cuma disagreed in the Election, some designing to elect a Person of another Church; but Gregory made Benenatus to understand, that he should not allow a Stranger to be elected, unless it appeared that there was not a Person amongst the Inhabitants of Cuma fit to be rais'd to that Dignity.

THE same was practis'd in the Election of the Bishop of Palermo. By the Death of Victor that Church had remain'd vacant: S. Gregory immediately sent thither Barbatus Bishop of Beneventum to govern it until there should be a Successor elected². The Palermitans disagreeing in the Election of a Native, thought of electing a Stranger; Gregory oppos'd them, and would not allow a Person of another Church to be elected, Nisi fortè inter Clericos ipsius Civitatis nullus ad Episcopatum dignus, quod evenire non credimus, poterit inveniri.

IN such manner were the Elections of Bishops, when the ancient Discipline of the Church, and what the holy Canons prescribe, were regarded. Thus likewise by the Clergy and People, ought the Election of the Bishop of Rome to have been: They had not the Emperors of the East to obstruct them in it. But already in these Times the Princes had begun to usurp the Rights of the People and Clergy in these Elections; whether out of Fear or Complaisance, the Person who pleased the Prince was often elected. The Emperors of the East, as Masters of Rome, had a great Hand in the Election of the Popes, who were their Subjects, and there was a Custom introduc'd, that without their Mandate none could be ordain'd; whence the Elected was oblig'd to send to Constantinople to ask the Consent and Permission of the Emperor³. Paul Warnefride writes⁴, that after the Death of Benedictus Bonosus, Pelagius II. was exalted to that Chair in the Year 577, when Rome was so closely besieg'd by the Longobards, that none could go out of it, and Pelagius could not send to the Emperor in Constantinople to obtain his Consent, whereupon he was ordain'd Pope without the Mandate of the Prince; afterwards when the Obstacles were remov'd, the Popes were wont to send Letters to the Emperors, in which they gave Account of the Impediments they had had, and begg'd to be excus'd, and to have their Ordination confirm'd. S. Gregory the Great being elected Pope, and refusing to accept of it, wrote to the Emperor Mauritius, earnestly intreating him that he would not give his Consent to the Election; but the Emperor was so well pleas'd with it, that he deny'd his Request¹.

IN our Provinces the Princes likewise would have their Share in the Election of the Bishops of their Cities: So it happen'd in the Year 663, when, by the Means of Duke Romualdus, Barbatus was elected Bishop of Beneventum.

WE also read the same of the Neapolitan Bishops, and particularly of Bishop Sergius, who by the Death of Laurentius, was exalted to that See by John Duke of Naples; but these Cases happen'd to be out of the Rule. The Discipline was, that as the Election belong'd to the Clergy and People, so the Ordination to the Pope.

THE Disposition of Bishops in these our Provinces was the same as in the preceding Centuries: And with regard to their Authority and Jurisdiction, their Power of taking Cognizance was restricted as formerly to Ecclesiastical Causes, wherein they proceeded by way of Censure; they had no compleat Justice, nor Tribunals, nor Magistrates, and their Cognizance extended no further than what Justinian had given them in his *Novellæ*². As to Honour and Power, it was the same, and confin'd to the same Bounds. In the Cities they were only Bishops, none of them having as yet acquir'd the Authority of Metropolitans; neither had they Suffragan Bishops under, and depending upon them, but every Bishop govern'd his own Church, and the People committed to his Charge. The Patriarchs of Constantinople had not as yet invaded our Churches, so as to be able to make any of them a Metropolis, and advance their Bishops to be Metropolitans, and subject them to the See of Constantinople, as they did in the Empire of Leo Isauricus, and of the other Emperors of the East his Successors; only, as we have said, some Bishops of the Cities subject to the Greek Empire, began, according to the Vanity of the Greeks, to be honour'd with the Title of Archbishop, which highly offended the Popes, who rebuk'd those Bishops severely that accepted of it³.

SOME have believ'd, that the Bishop of Naples before S. Gregory the Great, or at least by this Pope, was rais'd to the Honours of Metropolitan and Archbishop. They prove it from this Inscription which we read in the Decretal⁴, under the Title de Statu Monac. where, Gregorius Archiepiscopo Neapolis; and under the other de Religiosis Domibus, where, Gregorius Victori Archiep. Neap. But who does not see the manifest Incorrectness of the vulgar Code⁵ for in the correct Copies the first is read thus, Gregorius Fortunato Episcopo Neapolitano, as Gonsales likewise read it⁶; and the second, Gregorius Victori Neapolis Episcopo: Besides, that in the Register of the Letters of S. Gregory, acknowledged and corrected in Rome, from which this Text is said to be transcrib'd, this Title is not to be found; neither is this Decretal to be seen amongst the Letters of S. Gregory, which is said to be directed to Victor. Whence our most accurate Writers, such as *Caracciolus*⁷, and *Chioccarelli*⁸, with good Reason blam'd this their Belief, and they bring back the raising of this See to be a Metropolis to later Times.

OTHERS have grounded their Opinions upon the Disposition of these our Provinces under the Pontificate of Gregory, that in these Times Naples was made a Metropolis. Naples, say they, had in those Times its own Duke; the other Cities had their Counts and Governors. A Duke, according to the Polity of the Empire, presided over many Cities in the Province of which the Dukedom was compos'd. A Count presided over one City only; whence in the Laws of the Westrogoths, 'tis said Duke of a Province, and Count of a City; and Fortunatus says to Count Sigoaldus, Qui modo dat Comitibus, det tibi Jura Ducis.

REGULARLY the Dukes had twelve Cities under them, and those Cities were call'd Counties; whence a Duke govern'd twelve Counts, as Petrus Pictus observ'd from that Place of Aimoinus: Pipinus domum reversus, Grisonem more Ducum duodecim Comitibus donavit, as does also *Camillus Pellegrinus*⁸, from the many Examples which we read in Gregory of Tours in his Appendix: Whence Durandus observ'd; that by adapting the Polity of the Church to that of the Empire, the Ducal Cities had Archbishops, and those of Counts had Bishops, the Archbishops answering to Dukes, as the Bishops to Counts. Thus Naples being made a Ducal City at this Time, tho' its Dukedom was not of such Extent as afterwards, as comprehending only the neighbouring Cities about Cratere, such as Pompei, Herculaneum, Acerra, Nola, Pozzuolo, Cuma, Misenus, Baja, and Iscbia, might have been a Metropolis, and its Bishop a Metropolitan.

BUT as 'tis true, that in process of Time, the Polity of these our Churches, was by degrees adapted to the Disposition or Polity of the Empire, as we shall see in the following Centuries; nevertheless, in the Times we are now treating of, the Ecclesiastical Polity was not adapted to the Disposition of the Dukedoms, either of the Longobards or Greeks; and the Disposition of our Churches, and of those of Italy was quite different: So that 'tis a fallacious Argument to give Archbishops to the Ducal Cities. Could there be seen in those Times a more conspicuous and eminent City in these our Provinces than Beneventum, the Head of so large a Dukedom, that it comprehended many Provinces, and was the Seat of the Dukes of Beneventum? and yet its Bishop was neither Metropolitan nor Archbishop, but acquir'd that Prerogative long after, to wit, in the Year 969, in the Pontificate of John XIII. as we shall shew. Spoletium, the Head of another famous Dukedom, had no Archbishop. Brescia, Trent, and other Cities of Lombardy, honour'd by the Longobard Princes with the Titles of Dukedoms, had not their Archbishops in this Century, but long after; and Brescia and Spoletium never had any. Gaeta likewise had its Duke, but never an Archbishop. Capua, Bari, Rbegium, Salernum conspicuous Cities, and many other of these Provinces which were subject to the Greeks, had not their Metropolitans from the Popes before the tenth Century, and others much later; altho' the Patriarchs of Constantinople dispos'd of them otherwise, as we shall relate in the following Books. Naples then, as the same P. Caracciolus, and others of our Writers confess, was not made a Metropolis in these Times. It was honour'd with this Dignity in the tenth Century, in the Pontificate of John XIII. after Capua and Beneventum, as shall be told in its Place: All the other Churches of these our Provinces had not as yet obtain'd that Prerogative; they were only Bishops who presided over Cities, how great and famous soever they might be, and Seats of Dukes. However, 'tis true, that in process of Time some Cities rising to be Heads and Metropolis's of Dukedoms, or Principalities, and the Popes beginning in the tenth Century to exercise new Patriarchal Privileges in these our Provinces, by raising Bishops to be Metropolitans, and sending them the Pallium; the Polity and Ecclesiastical Disposition began to be adapted and answerable to the Polity of the Empire.

'TIS likewise true, that from these Times the Foundations of a new Polity, as well of the Empire as of the Priesthood, began to be laid. Thus we see in these Times the Churches of Sipontum, Bovinum, Ascoli, and Latinum annexed to the Bishoprick of Beneventum: Those of Cuma, Misenus, and Baja, join'd to the Bishop of Naples; not that the Bishops of these Cities acknowledg'd him for their Metropolitan; but in Honour of the Ducal City, as their Metropolis, in what concern'd the Polity of the Empire, they allow'd him the chief Honours, for he was look'd upon to be the first Bishop of that Dukedom. In process of Time, besides the Dukedoms of Beneventum and Naples, the Dukedoms of Capua and Salernum sprung up; which with that of Beneventum were exalted afterwards to be Principalities. Amalphis and Surrentum had likewise their Dukes, and were erected into Dukedoms. Bari had likewise its Duke. Some Cities of Puglia and Calabria, of the Brutii, and Lucania, being also made Heads and Metropolis's of these Provinces, became more famous than the rest; whence, conformable to the Polity of the Empire, they receiv'd Metropolitans, and the Bishops of the lesser Cities of these Provinces became their Suffragans: Whence it came to pass, that the more their Dukedom or Province was extended, the more Suffragans they had; for which Reason, seeing the Dukedom of Beneventum extended its Bounds more than all the rest, its Archbishop had so many Suffragan Bishops, that to this Day he has a much a greater Number than any of the other Metropolitans; whence also it has happen'd, that the Principality of Salernum, having likewise enlarged its Bounds, tho' not so much as Beneventum, its Archbishop retain'd many Suffragans; and that of Capua for the same Reason likewise had very many. And on the contrary, the Dukedoms of Naples, Surrentum, and Amalphis, as being but very small, had not so great a Number of Suffragan Bishops, Bishops, as the Metropolitans of the other Cities of these our Provinces ; as we shall observe when we come to treat of their Ecclesiastical Polity in the latter Times.

SUCH then was the Disposition and Ecclesiastical Hierarchy of these our Provinces in this Age, to wit, the Pope, as both Metropolitan and Patriarch : Bishops, Priests, Deacons, Subdeacons, who were already at this Time tied down to Celibacy, and their Order put in the Rank of superior Orders, Acolytes, Exorcists, Lectors, and Door-keepers.

WE read also in the Writers of these Times, and especially in S. Gregory's Letters, of Cardinal Priests, Cardinal Deacons, and Cardinal Subdeacons ; and that many Churches besides the Roman had of these Cardinals, such as those of Aquileja, Ravenna, Milan, Pisa, Terracina, and Syracuse ; and likewise in our Provinces, such as the Churches of Naples, Capua, Beneventum, Venafrum, and perhaps all the rest. But in these Times, as Florens and Balutius sufficiently prove ¹, and as is evident from the very Letters of S. Gregory ; these Cardinals were nothing else but stranger Priests, Deacons, and Subdeacons, who were join'd and added, or, as you may say, thrust in like a Wedge into a certain Church, whence they were call'd Incardinati, and depended, and turn'd on that Body as a Door on its Hinges ; so that they were no more look'd upon as Strangers, but as belonging to that Church, therefore they were call'd Incardinati, or Cardinales, a Title which tho' at its Rise did not denote any Dignity nor Superiority whatsoever, yet in the following Centuries made such a tearing and dazzling Figure, that of late it hath found Means to vie with the Royal Title ; and those who are honour'd with it, to put themselves on a Level with the most potent Kings of the Earth.

'TIS true there likewise arose at the same Time in the West, diverse Officers, and other Titles were heard of, such as Cimeliarcha, Rector, Chartularius, and others ; and in the Eastern Church a great many more, of which there is a long Catalogue in Bodinus ², and Leunclavius ³. But these Officers were appointed in order to take care of the Temporalities of the Churches, and their Riches. The Bishops by the Piety of the Princes and the Faithful, who were profuse in making Donations to their Churches, applied themselves to build other new and more magnificent ones ; and especially our Neapolitan Bishops ⁴ beautified the Churches of their own Cities above all the others of these Provinces, and built many of them anew : And whereas before this Time the Vessels had been made of Wood, Glass and Earthen-Ware ; the Vestments, and all the other Ornaments had been simple and plain ; so now they were made of Gold and Silver ; the Vestments came to be rich and pompous ; the Ornaments all precious and magnificent ; wherefore it behoved them to appoint one of the Clergy to keep them, and take care of them ; whence the Keeper of them with us ⁵ was call'd Cimeliarcha, and with the Greeks ⁶ Magnus Vasorum Custos. The Church of Naples had her Cimeliarcha, which she continues to have to this Day, but with a different Employment : All the other Churches of these our Provinces had likewise such an Officer, as also those of Rome, Ravenna, and in fine all the rest. The Possessions, Farms, and the large Revenues situated in remote and distant Countries, had a Person appointed to take care of, and look after them ; whence came the Rectors, of whom S. Gregory often makes mention, who had the Charge of the Patrimony of the Churches, and consequently the Chartularii, the Oeconomists and other Officers. But all these Offices were ordain'd for the Temporalities of the Churches, and were not Hierarchical Degrees, nor were they concern'd in the least with Spiritual Matters.

CHURCHES as well as Monasteries became more frequent and magnificent in these Times, and their Monks more numerous. The Longobards, as it commonly happens in the first Ardour of new Religions, having embrac'd that of the Roman Catholicks, were much more profuse in their Donations to Churches and Monasteries, than the Old Greek Christians. King Agilulfus having become Catholick, repaired many Monasteries in Italy, and built others new. King Aripertus was as profuse in giving to the Monasteries and Churches, and particularly to the Roman, as he was in restoring the great Possessions in the Alpes Cottiae; whence the Patrimony of St. Peter grew so great in that Province, that it made some believe, that Aripertus had given all the Province of the Alps to the Church of Rome.

OUR Dukes of Beneventum, altho' the Monastery of Casino had suffer'd so terrible a Pillage under Duke Zoto I. a Pagan and Idolater; nevertheless having afterwards, by the Labour of Barbatus, embrac'd the Catholick Faith, were bountiful to the Churches and Monasteries; insomuch that Pertinax having repair'd that Monastery in the Year 690, the Dukes of Beneventum enrich'd it hugely, and among others Gilulphus II. increas'd it with immense Donations, and great Possessions. Those Places and Lands belonging to the State of S. Germano were mostly given to that Monastery; so that afterwards in process of Time, being enrich'd with other large Donations, it became so great and powerful, that the Abbots, as Lords of many Lands and Vassals, kept Armies in their own Pay, as we shall see in the following Century.

BY this the Monasteries of the Order of S. Benedict became more numerous in the Dukedom of Beneventum, which in these Times comprehended what we now call the two Aprutii, the County of Molise, and the Capitanata; almost all Campania, a good Part of Lucania, of Puglia, and of the ancient Calabria, Tarentum, Brundisium, and all the large Country about it¹. Many such, both of Men and Women were newly erected in these our Provinces under the Reign of the Longobards; we read of very many in Beneventum in the Time of *S. Gregory*², of the Monastery of the Monks of S. Nazarius the Martyr; of another near to that of the Friars of S. Mary ad Olivulam: And in the Time of Grimoaldus V. Duke of Beneventum, we read of that of S. Modestus enrich'd by Grimoaldus with great Possessions³; and Theodorata Wife of Duke Romualdus his Son, founded a Monastery of Women without the Walls of Beneventum, in Honour of St. Peter the Apostle. The Example of the Princes was afterwards follow'd by their rich Subjects, as well Longobard as Provincial; so that in the Dukedom of Beneventum, over all the Provinces which it comprehended, the Monasteries of S. Benedict were in those Days more numerous than in the preceding Century.

IN the Dukedom of Naples, and in all those Cities which were subject to the Greeks, altho' many others of this Order were newly built, nevertheless the Number of Monasteries, as well of Men as of Women, under the Rule of S. Basil was greater: Naples had a great many of them, as we have seen in the foregoing Book; they were no less frequent in Otranto, Brundisium, Rhegium, and almost in all the other Cities of Calabria and Brutium.

THUS the Monasteries were no less numerous and rich in these our Provinces, than in France and Germany, and other Parts of the West; so that they began to pretend to shake off the Yoke of the Bishops, and to ask Privileges and Immunities in order to be at Liberty. If the Acts of the Council be true, which S. Gregory is said to have held in Rome in the Year 601, in favour of the Monks, it was there ordain'd, that the Monks should have the Liberty to elect their own Abbot, and to chuse a Monk of their own Community, or of another Monastery; that Bishops could not take a Monk out of a Monastery in order to make him a Clerk, or to employ him in reforming another Monastery, without Consent of the Abbot; that the Bishops were not to meddle with the Temporalities of Monasteries, neither to celebrate solemn Offices in the Church of the Monks, nor exercise therein any Jurisdiction. By reason of all which, the Monastick State from that Time became considerable, and soon after began to inroach upon the Civil and Temporal State of Princes, who instead of setting Bounds to so great Acquisitions, rather increas'd them with their immense Donations.

ECCLESIASTICAL Regulations.

THE Canons which had been establish'd in different Councils in the West during this seventh Century, and particularly in Toledo and in France, redress'd in a great measure the Irregularity of the most Part of Christians, and the Discipline of the Ecclesiasticks, that had been much decay'd. They were invigorated likewise by the Edicts of the Sovereigns; and S. Gregory the Great restor'd in Italy the declining Discipline of our Churches; he took much Pains to preserve it, and apply'd himself wholly in causing the Canons to be inviolably observ'd in all the Churches. For which Purpose he wrote a great Number of Letters during the fourteen Years of his Pontificate, which contain a great many Decisions concerning the Government and Discipline of the Church.

IF that which Baronius wrote of Cresconius Bishop of Africa be true, and what the most grave Authors say of the Collection of Isidore Mercator, there was not one Collection of Canons made in this seventh Century. Baronius believ'd that the Bishop Cresconius flourish'd about the Time of Justinian the Emperor, therefore his great Collection of Canons was spoke of in the foregoing Book. If then we would follow the Opinion of *Doviat*¹, reckon'd true by *Pagi*², and embrac'd by *Burcardus Gebelf Struvius*³, the Collection of Cresconius would belong to this seventh Century, according to the Opinion of those who reckon it was made about the Year 670. That of Isidore Mercator must certainly be referr'd to the next Book, seeing this Writer flourish'd in the eighth Century, in the Year 719.

IF Isidore of Spain, Bishop of Seville, be reckon'd Author of it, this should certainly be its Place; he sat in that Chair after the Death of his Brother Leander, to whom he succeeded about the Year 595, and govern'd it for almost the Space of forty Years; but 'tis certain he was not the Compiler of it, as well because that Collection contains many Canons establish'd in diverse Councils held in Toledo a long Time after his Death, which fell out in the Year 636, and some Letters of Gregory II. and III. and of *Zacharias*⁴, who sat in the Chair of Rome in the eighth Century; as also, because amongst the many Works of this eminent Writer, this Collection has never been mention'd by any⁵.

T E M P O R A L I T I E S.

THE so many profuse Donations, which from Time to Time were made, as well by private Men as by Princes, to the Churches in the Course of little less than two Centuries, were the Cause that the Churches, as well as the Prince and Private Men, had their particular Patrimonies. The most ample Possessions which they acquir'd, not only within the District of their Cities, but also in distant Countries, from whence they drew so great Revenues and Fruits, were call'd Patrimonies, according to the Custom of that Time, in which the Possessions of any Family, and the Heritages descended to them from their Forefathers, were call'd its Patrimony. So likewise an Estate which a Prince possess'd in Property, was call'd Patrimony; and in order to distinguish it, not only from the Patrimonies of Private Men, but also from his own Revenue, was call'd Sacrum Patrimonium, as we read in many Constitutions of the *Justinian Code*¹; which afterwards, in the new Kingdoms of Europe, was call'd the Royal Demaine. For the same Reasons the Name of Patrimony was given to the Possessions of each Church: So in the Letters of S. Gregory, we see not only the Patrimony of the Church of Rome mention'd, but also the Patrimony of the Church of Ravenna; the Patrimony of the Church of Milan; the Patrimony of the Church of Rimini; and of many others. The Churches of great Cities, such as Rome, Ravenna, and Milan, as Imperial Cities, and where the Senators, great Officers, and other illustrious Persons liv'd, acquir'd Patrimonies, not only within their own Bounds, but also in different Parts of the World. The other Churches of lesser Cities, such as Naples, Beneventum, Capua, Salernum, Bari, Rhegium, and many others, whose Inhabitants had but moderate Fortunes, and all within their own Limits, had no Patrimonies without their own Districts.

AMONGST all the Churches of the Imperial Cities, the Church of Rome was that, which in those Days had acquir'd the most ample and vast Patrimonies, not only in Italy, but also in the most distant Provinces of *Europe*². In the Pontificate of Gregory the Great, as may be gathered from his Letters, the Church of Rome had ample Patrimonies in Sicily; this Pope writing to Justin, Prætor of that Island, which was govern'd by him for the Eastern Empire, desir'd that he would take care, without delay, to cause some Grain gathered in the Patrimony of S. Peter, to be transported to Rome were there was a Scarcity. And seeing these Possessions were many, and some of them divided into small Portions, according to the Donations which from Time to Time had been made by the Faithful; therefore he wrote again to Peter the Subdeacon, Rector of that Patrimony, that being solicited to farm out some of them, he had not as yet resolv'd what to do in that Matter: The Church of Rome had likewise a Patrimony in Africa, whence Gregory gave infinite Thanks to Gennadius a Patrician, and Exarch of that Province, which he held for the Emperor of the East; that seeing many Places of that Patrimony had been abandon'd by the Labourers, he had been so good as to send many of those People who depended on him to it, whereby it had been much improv'd. She had also a Patrimony in France, the Care of which was committed to a Priest, whose Name was Candidus, whom he earnestly recommended, not only to the Queen Brunichilda, but also to King Childebert her Son, in the Year 596, shewing, That that Charge had formerly been recommended to Dinanius a Patrician, and wrote to Candidus giving him an Account how he should dispose of those Revenues; and about the End of his Pontificate, in the Year 604, he recommended that Patrimony to Asclepiodatus a French Patrician. She likewise had a Patrimony in Dalmatia, which was put under the Care of Antonius, or Antoninus a Subdeacon.

IN Italy and in these our Provinces, the Church of Rome had likewise many Patrimonies. In the Province of the Alpes Cottiae she had a large Patrimony, which being possess'd for a long Time by the Longobards, was afterwards restor'd to her by King Aripertus in the Pontificate of John VII. Paul Warnefride writes, That Aripertus King of the Longobards restor'd the Donation of the Patrimony of the Alpes Cottiae, belonging to the Apostolical See, but for a long Time possess'd by the Longobards; and sent this Donation to Rome written in Letters of Gold. Which Donation, as the same Author affirms, was confirm'd by King Luitprandus: his Words are; At which Time King Luitprandus confirm'd to the Church of Rome the Donation of the Patrimony of the Alpes Cottiae. In the Exarchate of Ravenna S. Peter had also his Patrimony; for in the Pontificate of S. Gregory, there was a Law-Suit betwixt him and the Bishop of Ravenna for the Patrimony of both the Churches, which they agreed by Transaction. Likewise in our Dukedom of Beneventum the Church of Rome had her Patrimony, as she had in Salernum and Nola; the Revenues of which *S. Gregory*¹ allotted for the Relief of certain poor Nuns. She also had a Patrimony in Naples, whither, as we see in some of this Pope's Letters, he sent Rectors from Rome to oversee it, whom he injoin'd to lay out a good Part of the Revenues of it on the Poor. The Rectors of which Patrimony in Naples, were successively Petrus, Theodinus, Antemius, and others, all Subdeacons of the Church of Rome. These in Naples had their certain Diaconiae, or Places and Stations appointed, in which the Subdeacon Rector supply'd the Poor of the City, and dispers'd the Alms, after the manner of Rome, which had many of these *Diaconiae*²: In fine, she had Patrimonies in some other Cities of this Province of Campania, as she had in Aprutium, in Lucania, and likewise in Calabria.

THE Bishops of these greater, as well as of the lesser Sees, in order to make the Possessions of their Churches the more respected, were wont to give them the Name of the Saint which that Church had in special Veneration; thus the Church of Ravenna gave her Possessions, the Name of S. Apollinarius; and that of Milan, of S. Ambrosius; and the Roman her's the Patrimony of S. Peter in Sicily, Africa, Dalmatia, Calabria, Aprutium, Beneventum, Naples, and elsewhere; just so as in Venice, the Publick Revenues were call'd S. Mark's. Thus likewise the Churches of the lesser Cities, for the more Respect, nam'd their Patrimonies by the Name of the Saint for whom they had the greatest Devotion, as in Naples the Patrimony of S. Aspremus; in Beneventum, of S. Barbatus; in Brundisium, of S. Leocus; and in Amalphis, of S. Andrew; in Salernum, of S. Matthew; and so of all the rest.

BUT 'tis well worthy of Observation, that this Name of Patrimony, which the Church of Rome had in these Provinces, did not import any supreme Dominion, or any Jurisdiction which the Pope, or the Church of Rome had over such Patrimony; they held of the Prince in whose Provinces the Patrimony was situated, as all other private Patrimonies did, and were subject to the Jurisdiction and immediate Dominion of that Prince in whose State they were. 'Tis true, some Ecclesiasticks of the Church of Rome attempted to make Incroachments, but all in vain; for in the Patrimonies of Princes, when they were not allotted to Soldiers, there was a Governor appointed with Jurisdiction over all Causes which could happen concerning these Possessions, for the more easy bringing in of their Revenues, and for compelling Debtors; which very Prerogatives some Ecclesiasticks attempted to usurp in the Patrimonies of that Church, by taking the Administration of Justice into their own Hands, without having recourse to the Judgment of Magistrates: But S. Gregory, that most prudent and wary Pope, check'd that Incroachment, and forbid it under the Pain of Excommunication; neither would the Princes on any account suffer it within their Dominions.

THEREFORE the Ecclesiastical Possessions paid Tribute to the Prince as all other private Patrimonies did, which appears plainly from Can. si tributum, of *S. Ambrose*³; and 'tis clear, that the Emperor Constantinus Pogonatus, in the Year 681, granted Exemption from the Tribute which the Church of Rome paid for her Patrimony in Sicily and Calabria. And the Emperor Justinianus Ritmenus, Successor of Constantine, in the Year 687, remitted the Tribute which the Patrimonies of Aprutium and Lucania paid. This Indulgence of Tribute occasion'd a Friendship and good Correspondence betwixt the Popes and the Emperors of the East; but when afterwards by the Innovations which arose in the Empire of Leo Isauricus, there grew those bitter Contentions betwixt the Popes and the Emperors of the East, which shall be the Subject of the following Book, and which at last broke out into open Sedition and Enmity; Leo Isauricus in the Year 732, not only did not exempt, but took away altogether from the Church of Rome the Patrimonies of Sicily and Calabria, and apply'd them to his own Exchequer. And the Writers, who relate these Events, report, that these confiscated Patrimonies yielded in all a Revenue of three Talents and a half of Gold Yearly ¹, which make in our Money; (not to be precise as to the different Opinions about how much answers exactly to a Talent) the Sum of 2500 Crowns; and the Patrimony of Sicily, tho' very large, yielded no more than 2100 Yearly.

THOSE Patrimonies which the Church of Rome had in different Provinces, where the Ecclesiasticks, when they found their Account in it, likewise frequently usurp'd some Jurisdiction in Causes belonging to them, gave rise amongst the Writers of latter Times, to a Blunder, which was swallow'd as a Truth by those that came after them, who from this invented other Stories, to wit, that the Province of the Alpes Cottiae, Sicily, the Dukedom of Beneventum, the Dukedom of Spoletium, Part of Tuscany and Campania, and many other Provinces belong'd to the Church of Rome, because she had Patrimonies in them, by confounding the Patrimony which she had in the Alpes Cottiae, with the Province itself, and so of the other Provinces. Into which Blunder, we cannot but admire, that amongst others our Scipio Ammiratus ², otherwise a most careful Historian, should have fallen; who, as Paul Warnefride himself declares, would likewise give us to understand, that the Donation of King Aripertus contain'd the Restitution and Confirmation of the Alpes Cottiae to Pope John VII.; whereas from the Words of this Writer above related, 'tis evident, that the Patrimony of the Alpes Cottiae is meant, and not that Province, which comprehended a great Tract of Country, and reach'd as far as Genoa, beautified with so many Cities and Towns, that it would be Folly to believe, that that Prince, in so gloomy and suspicious Times, would have given it to the Pope, then a Confederate of the Emperors of the East, who were implacable Enemies of the Longobards.

WE shall sift this Mistake when we come to treat of the many famous Donations of Charles the Great, and Lewis the Pious; where we shall see, that what we read in them of Naples, Salernum, and especially Beneventum, is to be understood only of the Patrimonies which the Church of Rome had in these Provinces, and not at all of the Dukedoms and Principalities; which Patrimonies, according to the Custom of these Times, were confirm'd and granted to the Church of Rome by Virtue of the Præcepta of the Emperors, who successively reign'd in Italy, as was the Patrimony of Beneventum by Lewis the Pious, in the Year 817, to Pope Paschale I. which was afterwards confirm'd and granted anew by Otho III. and Otho King of Germany, his Son, to John XXII. in the Year 962, and not the Dukedom or City of Beneventum, which certainly came under the Dominion of the Church in the Year 1052, by way of Exchange, made betwixt Henry II. the Son of Conrade, and Pope Leo IX. for the Church of Bamberg; as shall be shewn in its proper Place.

SO great in these Times was the increase of the Temporal Riches of our Churches, and especially of the Church of Rome their Mistress and Leader, and according to the Circumstances of the Times we shall see them make greater Acquisitions in the Ages following.

THE Number of Churches and Monasteries increasing, the Worship of Saints, their Reliques and Images grew much more. The Sanctuaries, and above all, that of Mount Garganus, were more frequented, and enrich'd with valuable Gifts, not only by the Greeks, but Longobards. Miracles were multiplied; and besides Preachings and Sermons, innumerable Stories began to be forg'd concerning them, and to be collected into Volumes; and S. Gregory publish'd a great many of them in his four Books of Dialogues, which he dedicated to Queen Theodolinda. Holy-Days were multiplied in the Churches; the Octave of Christmas; that of the Epiphany; those of the Purification and Annunciation of the Virgin; her Death and Nativity; and in fine, that of all Saints. Riches increas'd proportionably to Worship and Devotion, the Faithful promising themselves to obtain of the Saints, not only Spiritual, but also Temporal Riches, Health, Abundance, and good Success in their Traffick and Affairs, Navigation, and Land Journies.

FROM so many and different Springs which began to discover themselves, the Possessions and Inheritances of the Churches multiply'd much more; and the Reason was, because, as our Ammiratus writes, Religion being an Account which is kept with God, and Mortals standing in need of him in many Things, either by thanking him for the Good receiv'd, or the Evil escap'd, or by intreating him that such a Thing may not happen, or that another Thing may succeed well; it necessarily follows, that out of Gratitude we should give a Share of our Goods, not to Him, who stands not in need of them, but to his Temples, and his Priests: How much more then must the Donations and the Offerings increase, when there was not only an Account to be kept with God, but likewise with so many Saints, by whose Intercession the Faithful expected the same Things? and their Worship and Veneration having increas'd so much, and thereby many Monasteries and Temples being erected in their Names, and their Sanctuaries being multiply'd, it was easy to draw the People in to make Offerings of their Goods and Riches in greater Plenty, both to their Temples and Priests. The Custom began likewise of giving, not only to the Churches, but also to the Parishes and Priests, and other Ministers, for their Masses for liberating the Souls of their deceas'd Friends out of Purgatory¹; whence proceeded, as *Mornacius*² believes, the Authority which they assum'd of making Wills to those who died Intestate; of which we shall have occasion to treat in another Place.

OUR Churches kept up the same Rule in the Distribution of the Revenues and Temporal Riches into four Parts, one to the Bishop, another to the Clergy, a third to the Poor, and the fourth to the Material Church. The Church of Naples in the Time of S. Gregory, under Bishop Pascasius, had a numerous Clergy, amounting to a hundred and twenty-six, besides Stranger Priests, Deacons, and Clerks: And we read in the Letters of this Pope³, that Pascasius neglecting to distribute the Revenues to the Poor and the Clergy, as was requisite, he, the Pope, was oblig'd to distribute them, and reserving the Bishop's Portion, he appointed what was to be given to the Clergy and the Poor, injoyning likewise Antemius his Subdeacon, who was Rector of S. Peter's Patrimony in Naples, that jointly with the Bishop, he should oversee the Division according to the Necessities of the Poor, and the Quantity of the Money; and order it so, as to distribute it at a proper Time, according to his own Discretion.

THE Church of Beneventum likewise observ'd the same Custom of dividing the Revenues into four Parts: S. Barbatas her Bishop would not in that depart from the Direction of the Canons; and we read in his Acts, that after Duke Romualdus had enrich'd his Church with so many Donations, and added that of Sipontum to her, by a particular Direction he resolv'd to settle this Distribution for ever, which was always to be observ'd in his Church; thus we read in these Acts⁴, Impetratis omnibus ut poposcerat vir Sanctus, non est oblitus mandatorum Dei: In quatuor partes cunctum Ecclesiæ redditum omni tempore sanxit fideliter dispartiri, unam egentibus, secundam his, qui Domino sedulas in Ecclesiis exhibent Laudes, tertiam pro Ecclesiarum restauratione distribui juxta quartam suis peragendis utilitatibus Episcopus habeat; Et hætenus sicut ab eo disposita sunt, in præsentia cuncta videntur.

ALL the other Churches of these our Provinces observ'd the same Rule, which besides other Things was commendable for this, that the Poor were not cheated of their Portion, and the Bishops practis'd that Hospitality to Strangers, to which they are oblig'd by the Canons.

THE
CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of NAPLES.

BOOK V.

LUITPRANDUS King of the Longobards, having in the Year 711, fix'd the Throne of his Kingdom in Pavia, as his Predecessors had done, began to give very great Marks of his Goodness and Prudence. And like his Father and other Kings his Predecessors, was most stedfast in the Catholick Religion, to whose Piety Pavia owes the glorious Bones of Augustine, which he recover'd from the Saracens, after he had driven them out of Sardinia, where he found the precious Shrine. He, imitating Rotaris and Grimoaldus, would likewise have his Share of the Glory of a wise Lawmaker; for which end, in the first Year of his Reign, according to Custom, having conven'd the States of the Kingdom in Pavia, he ordain'd other Laws, and added them to the Edicts of Rotaris and *Grimoaldus*¹; not satisfy'd with that, in the following Years, as Occasion requir'd, he establish'd others: So that amongst the Kings of the Longobards, next to Rotaris, Luitprandus was he, that more than any other provided his Kingdom with Laws.

The Laws of LUITPRANDUS.

MANY Laws of this Prince, full of the greatest Wisdom, have been handed down to us in the Volumes of the Longobard Laws; but in the Parchment Code of the Monastery of the Cave we read his intire Edicts, whence the Compiler of that Volume took them. There we read his first Edict, which was publish'd in the First Year of his Reign, containing six Chapters, amongst which the first has this Title, de Successione filiarum. We likewise read the other Edicts which he made in the following Years; for in the Fifth Year of his Reign he publish'd another, which contains other seven Chapters; in the Eighth, ten; in the Tenth Year five; in the Eleventh, thirty-three; in the Thirteenth Year five; in the Fourteenth, fourteen; in the Fifteenth, twelve; in the Sixteenth, eight; in the Seventeenth, thirteen, in the Nineteenth, thirteen; in the Twenty-first, nine; in the Twenty-second, four; in the Twenty-third, five; and some others he publish'd in the following Years: So that the Laws of this Prince, as they are registred in the same Code, which is preserv'd in the Archives of the Cave, amount to the Number of a hundred and fifty-two; to which in the foresaid Code we see seven other Chapters added, whose Titles or Summaries are, I. De Mercede Magistri. II. De Muro. III. De Annona. IV. De Opera. V. De Caminata. VI. De Furno. VII. De Puteo.

OF these Laws, only 137 were inserted in the Volumes of the Longobard Laws by their Compiler. In the first Book we read 48; and in the Second 89; for in the Third there are none. The first which we read in the first Book is under the Title de Illicito Consilio; the other under Title 8, we read nine others under the Title de Homicidiis; another under that de Parricidiis; one other under the fourteenth Title of the same Book; four under the Title de Injuriis Mulierum; three in the seventeenth Title; one under the Title de Seditione contra Judicem; another in the nineteenth Title; one under that de Paupere; four in the twenty-third Title; twelve under that de Furtis, & servis Fugacibus; one under the Title de Invasionibus; another under the twenty-ninth; another under the Title de Raptu Mulierum; another under that de Fornicatione; three under the Title de Adulterio; one in the thirty-fourth Title; and another under that de Culpis servorum, which is the last of the first Book.

IN the Second we read many more to the Number of 89; two under the second Title; one under the third; three in the fourth; one in the fifth; another in the sixth; another in the seventh; eight under the Title de Prohibitis Nuptiis; one in the ninth; another in the tenth; another in the eleventh; three under that de Conjugiis servorum; another under the thirteenth Title; another under that de Donationibus; another under the Title de ultimis Voluntatibus; three under the thirteenth; sixteen in the Title de Debitis, & Guadimoniis; one under that de Treugis; two under the twenty-fifth; another under the twenty-sixth; another under that de Depositis; another under the Title de Rebus interdictatis; seven in the Title de Prohibita Alienatione; two under the thirtieth; one under that de Prohibita Alienatione servorum; four under the Title de Præscriptionibus; two under that de Evictionibus; four under that de Santimonialibus; two in the Title de Ariolis; four under the Title de Reverentia Ecclesiæ, seu immunitatibus debita; five under that Qualiter Judices judicare debeant; one under the Title de Consuetudine; another under that de Testibus; four under the Title Qualiter quis se defend. Deb.; and one in that de Perjuriis, which is the last Title of the Book.

IN the third, we have no Laws of Luitprandus, it being compos'd for the most Part of the Laws of those Emperors who reign'd in Italy, as Successors to the Kings of the Longobards, after having driven them out of this Province; all that the Compilers inserted in it were a few of the Laws of Rotaris, of Rathis, and Astolphus. We may see some other Laws of this King in Marcolphus ¹ and Goldastus.

BUT the Wisdom which this Prince shew'd in settling his Kingdom with such provident Laws, and all his other Talents, were not a little eclips'd by his too great Ambition of Dominion, and his extreme Desire to enlarge the Bounds of his Kingdom beyond what his Predecessors had left him, which he push'd so far, that at last it occasion'd the Ruin of the Empire of the Longobards in Italy to his Successors; for not satisfy'd with having retaken the Patrimony of the Alpes Cottiae from the Pope, which a little before King Aripertus had confirm'd to the Church of Rome; he likewise invaded the Sabinian Patrimony; and being altogether intent upon taking Advantage, and seeking any Opportunity of enlarging his Dominions, spurr'd on by a covetous Desire to a quick and dexterous Execution, he much enlarg'd his Kingdom upon the Ruins of the Greeks: So that his Power made the Popes jealous of him ever afterwards, and at last they seeing the Greeks depress'd, and the Authority of the Emperors of the East almost quite abolish'd in Italy, and not trusting any more to the Greeks, who had become their greatest Enemies, resolv'd to have recourse to foreign Assistance, in order to bring down so great an Empire, in the Manner we shall shew anon.

S E C T. II.

Innovations in Italy, occasion'd by the Edicts of Leo Isauricus.

AT this Time Leo Isauricus reign'd in the East, who following the Footsteps of Bardanus, Surnamed Philippicus (who was the first Emperor of the East that began to make War upon Images) was called Iconomachus, because he had Images in the greatest Abomination; for he was persuad'd, that by throwing them down, he should drive out Idolatry, which, he believ'd, by the Adoration and Worship of them, had intruded upon Christianity, by which he promis'd himself Prosperity to his Empire; and for a Reward of so bold and pious an Undertaking, as he thought, flatter'd himself, that if he succeeded he should be able to enlarge his Empire, to recover Italy from the Longobards, and to restore it to its antient Dignity and Grandeur. There were not wanting some who, in order to improve his Error and fond Conceit, by Presages and Omens, confirm'd by Chance, promis'd him an easy and safe Accomplishment of his Design; and the Policy of this Prince, which cannot be deny'd, was very great, was deluded and impos'd upon by such idle Prophecies; forasmuch as he did not consider that so strange and unheard of an Undertaking could not but excite Disturbance and Tumults amongst a People, and especially Italians, who now for a long time, had been accusom'd to worship those Images in the Churches, and elsewhere, and to promise themselves not only spiritual, but also temporal Happiness by the Intercession of their Prototypes; being struck with such a strange Novelty, their Minds could not but be filled with great Horror, by seeing those Statues which by their Forefathers, with equal Piety and Magnificence, had been placed in their Temples, and over the Gates of the Cities, for publick Adoration, burnt by the Hands of vile Men, and, with the utmost Contempt, thrown down, and broke in a thousand Pieces.

IT certainly could never have entered into the Mind of Man, to contrive a more flagrant or shocking Innovation than this, for putting all the Provinces of Italy into Disorder; for the other Heresies, which had nothing popular or tragical in them, tho' they had diffus'd themselves in the Minds of Men, and especially the Arian, yet they could not raise so many Tumults, and such Confusion, as this was able to do, which could not be put in Execution but by such tragical Means as burning, throwing down, demolishing, and the like. Leo, as a prudent and judicious Prince, in the Beginning took soft and peaceable Methods; he first endeavour'd by Reasoning, and earnest Entreaties, to persuade others to believe as he did; but seeing that did not avail, he put forth an Edict, by which he commanded only, that the Images should be remov'd from the usual Places where they were set in order to be worshipp'd, and placed on the Tops of the Temples, where they could neither be worshipp'd nor adored: But when he afterwards perceiv'd that the People entertain'd a Horror and Aversion for such Edicts, he was seiz'd with sudden Indignation and Rage, and laying aside all Patience and Moderation, became so furious in the Undertaking, that convening the Senate, by publick Declaration he ordain'd, That all the Images should be thrown down, and not so much as one should be suffered within the Churches of Constantinople, being persuaded, that the longer he delay'd the bringing this heroick and glorious Work to a Conclusion, the longer it would be before he receiv'd his Reward, according to his conceiv'd Notions.

IN the East, Germanus, Patriarch of Constantinople, and S. John Damascene, oppos'd this Design of the Emperor; but Leo caus'd Germanus to be depos'd, and, in the Year 730, ordered Anastasius to be put in his Place. There are some who have wrote, That he likewise caus'd his Edict to be put in Execution in Constantinople by Force, by burning, and turning topsy-turvy all the Images, and all that was rare or foreign in that City; and likewise, in the Sight of all the World, caus'd the Statue of our Saviour, which was rais'd above the great Gate of the Imperial Palace, and had been plac'd there by Constantine the Great, to be pull'd down: Others reckon the pulling down of the Statue of our Saviour as fabulous, and will have it, that in these Beginnings Leo did not proceed to that Heighth of Madness. However that may be, he would have his Edict observed, and put in Execution, not only in Constantinople, and in the East, but also in all the Provinces of the West which had remained under his Dominion. Therefore he strongly enjoyn'd his Officers who had the Government of these Provinces, that they should see the Edict put in Execution in the Cities under their Command; and, especially, he commanded Scholasticus, a Patrician, who was at that Time Exarch of Ravenna, that he should see his Orders punctually obey'd, by throwing down all the Images in that City, without suffering one to remain.

BUT in the West, and particularly in Italy, the Edict was not only not obey'd, but the People had it in such Abhorrence, that they broke out into open Rebellion. The Princes of the West that were not subject to his Empire, the Longobard Kings of Italy, and our Dukes of Beneventum, detested it, and would not allow it to be receiv'd into their Dominions. The People of the Greek Empire had the same Aversion for it; neither was all the Power of the Officers, who us'd all Means possible for having it observed, ever able to surmount the obstinate and universal Repugnancy. It was of no Force in Rome, nor all the Roman Dukedom: It had no better Success in the Dukedom of Naples, and the other Dukedoms and Cities subject to the Emperors of the East. Scholasticus, Exarch of Ravenna, by endeavouring to oblige that People to observe the Edict by Force, occasion'd greater and more dangerous Disorders; for having commanded that all the Images of that City should be pull'd down by main Force, he rais'd such Tumults, that the People being driven on to an open Revolt against the Emperor, brought Matters to that Extremity, that at last they subjected themselves to the Dominion of Luitprandus: For this most cunning Prince, who was always upon the Catch for aggrandizing his own Kingdom at the Expences of the Emperor, having heard of this Revolt in Ravenna, immediately laid Siege to that City, and invested it both by Sea and Land; and, after having defeated the Grecian Fleet, made himself Master of it in a few Days: Many other Cities of the Exarchate surrendered to him; and at last he reduced the Exarchate into a Dukedom, and added it to the other Dukedoms of the Longobards, giving it a new Form, and created Ildeprandus, his Nephew, Duke of it (the same who was afterward rais'd to the Royal Throne) to whom, being yet an Infant, he gave Peredeus Duke of Vicenza, for Guardian.

AT the same Time Gregory II. of that Name govern'd the Roman See, who had succeeded to Constantine in the Year 714. Altho' he in Conjunction with the Romans had greatly oppos'd the Designs of Leo; nevertheless being jealous of the Power of the Longobards, as all his Predecessors had been, he could not endure their Kingdom under Luitprandus an ambitious Prince, to become so powerful as to enable him to ruin his See and the Pontificate. On this Account, as the other Gregory had done, he was always careful of the Interest which the Emperors of the Greeks had in Italy, and took care that their Power might not decline in order to oppose the Designs of the Longobards, to hem in their Authority, and to curb their Power; therefore he oppos'd the Duke of Beneventum, and assisted the Greek Neapolitans in keeping Cuma from being subjected by the Beneventan Longobards. And tho' he was bound in Duty to oppose the Designs of Leo in this Innovation of throwing down the Images, and had been most unworthily treated by the Emperor, even by threatening to drive him out of his Sec, and send him into Exile¹; for all that, preferring the Publick Cause to Private Injury, he did his utmost to prevent the Revolt of the People of Italy who were under his Command, and defend the Lands of the Empire against the Invasion of the Longobards.

HE had not a neighbouring Prince in Italy to whom he could have recourse for Assistance to stop the Career of the Longobards. The single Power of the Greeks was not sufficient; the Republick of Venice was the only one remaining, which tho' risen from a slender Beginning, was at this Time come to be of some Consideration in Italy, insomuch that the Exarch had fled thither for Shelter; in the mean Time Gregory recommended himself and apply'd to the Venetians for Assistance, and having wrote a very pithy Letter to Ursus their Duke, it had so good Effect, and so far influenc'd his Officers, that at last the Venetians were induc'd to reinstate the Exarch in Ravenna, which they retook so suddenly from the Longobards, that Luitprandus could not succour it from Pavia; the Longobards being driven out, Ildeprandus remain'd Prisoner in the Hands of the Venetians, and while Peredeus was making his Escape, he was miserably kill'd.

THE Pope thought that Leo would have been grateful for so considerable a Service; whereupon he began to solicit him by Letters more pressingly than ever², to give over his Undertaking. But Gregory was much deceiv'd in his Expectation, for this Prince, who knew very well that Gregory had bestir'd in getting him Assistance, more for his own Interest, than that of the Empire, was much more exasperated seeing he continu'd still to oppose his Design, and that by an open Revolt he had endeavour'd to shake off his Dominion; and knowing the Steadiness of the Pope, that he would always be an Enemy to his Enterprize, he resolv'd in earnest to remove all Obstacles; and because it would be a very difficult Matter to compass his Ends by Force, he resolv'd to have recourse to Art and Treachery. The Roman Dukedom, as we have often said, continu'd under his Dominion, and the Dukes were sent by him to Rome to govern it. Mauritius was at this Time Duke of Rome, to whom he gave most secret Orders to befriend three of his Officers, who were at Rome; who lying in wait for the Pope's Life, had given their Parole to Leo to carry him to Constantinople dead or alive; but their Design did not succeed, and the Emperor thinking that it had miscarried by the Negligence of some of his principal Officers, in the Year 725. sent Paul a Patrician to Italy to command as Exarch³, whom he injoin'd to see this Design put in Execution, upon which the three Conspirators being assur'd of such powerful Protection, made haste to give the design'd Blow; but before they could put it in Execution the Conspiracy was discover'd by the Romans, who were most vigilant for the Preservation of a Pope for whom they had so great a Value; for they apprehended two of them, who were immediately put to Death; and the other escaping into a Monastery, turn'd Monk, and there ended his Days.

IN the mean Time the new Exarch, who was spurr'd on with most pressing Orders from Leo, to leave no Stone unturn'd for getting the Pope into his Clutches, seeing all his Art and secret Ambushes came to nothing, the Pope being too well guarded by the Romans, at last, impatient of any longer Delay, in order to keep his Parole which he had given to Leo of putting Gregory into his Hands⁴, resolv'd to make use of open Force. Therefore as soon as possibly he could, he assembled some Troops, partly from Ravenna, and partly from the Army, which he had always ready for defending himself against the Insults of the neighbouring Longobards, which he order'd to join the Imperial Forces which were too weak in Rome, and to carry off the Pope and conduct him to Ravenna.

BUT Luitprandus, a crafty and subtle Prince, tho' offended at Gregory, who had stirr'd up the Venetians to take Ravenna from him, as they had done, yet in this Pinch, resolv'd to assist the Pope and the Romans against the Greeks, in order to keep the Ballance even betwixt them, that by assisting each Party, as he saw occasion, he might divide, and by degrees weaken both the one and the other, and afterwards take Advantage of their Weakness. In the mean Time he gave Orders to the Governors of the Towns which he had in the neighbourhood of Ravenna and Rome, to join the Romans, who by so strong Succours, being superior in Strength to the Exarch, oblig'd him to stop near Spoletium, and at last give over his Undertaking, and return to Ravenna.

IN the mean Time Leo, otherwise not so unexpert in the Art of Government and Dissimulation, altho' he had seen that his Force and Treachery had succeeded so ill, yet suffer'd himself to be so much led by his Passion, that not minding the great Detriment that so extravagant a Resolution, which he had taken when he had least Reason, would bring upon him, he believ'd that his Authority alone, without Force, would easily do what with Arms and Treachery could not be put in Practice; therefore, laying aside all other Considerations, and consulting only his Passion, at a very unseasonable Time, he strictly repeated his Orders to the Exarch, to publish and put in Execution in Rome, and in all the Cities of Italy which were under his Empire, the Edict, which a little before he had fram'd in Constantinople. The Edict contain'd, as was said, that all the Images, as so many Idols, should be remov'd out of the Churches; moreover he promis'd the Pope his Favour, provided he obey'd; if not, he declar'd him Contumacious, and no longer vested with the Papal Dignity.

THERE never was seen a more ready, or a more general or better concerted Resolution than that which was taken over all Italy, and especially at Rome, immediately upon the Publication of this Edict.

GREGORY being now secure of a hearty Assistance both from the Italians and Longobards, and seeing that Leo had broke all Squares, and now openly attack'd not only his Person, but Religion likewise; resolv'd at first to employ all his Pontifical Authority, and the Spiritual Arms of his Office, in order to hinder so detestable an Edict from being received in Italy. He began with solemnly Excommunicating the Exarch and all his Accomplices. Afterwards he sent Apostolical Letters to the Venetians, to King Luitprandus, and to the Longobard Dukes, and to all the Cities of the Empire, by which he exhorted them to continue stedfast and immoveable in the Catholick Faith, and to oppose the Execution of that Edict with all their Might.

These Letters made such an Impression upon the Minds of the People, that all those of Italy, tho' of different Interests, and often at War with one another; to wit, the Venetians, Romans, and Longobards, united in one Body, animated with the same Spirit, to act in concert for defending the Catholick Faith, and the Life of the Pope, protesting that they would preserve it with the Hazard of their own in so glorious a Cause. But as 'tis difficult in the Heat of a new Commotion, even when the Design of it is for doing good, to keep within just Bounds, so they exceeded those of a lawful Defence; for not only the Romans, and those of Pentapolis, which is now la Marca d'Ancona, took up Arms, and join'd the Venetians, who were the first that arm'd; but by carrying their Zeal further, openly shook off the Yoke. Not contenting themselves with having thrown down the Statues of Leo, they would no longer acknowledge him for their Emperor, and elected new Magistrates for governing them during the Interreign, which they pretended to do by their own Authority. They even went further, and at last carried the Matter almost to the utmost Extremity; being resolv'd to elect another Emperor, and conduct him to Constantinople with a strong Army, to place him in the Room of Leo; but the Pope not thinking this Resolution seasonable, nor proper at that Time, oppos'd it, so that it did not take Effect.

BUT this did not prevent the Fate of Leo, which terminated in his Loss of the Exarchate of Ravenna, the Dukedom of Rome, and had very near lost that of Naples, and with it all his Authority in Italy: The People being now in a Commotion, immediately turn'd into Factions and Parties. Paul the Exarch had gain'd a great many of them in Ravenna, who basely comply'd for Interest, or hopes to advance themselves to better Posts. But the opposite Party, which the Pope supported, being the strongest and most numerous, could not endure the Exarch, therefore they mutinied, and a violent Sedition arising, or rather a kind of a Civil War betwixt the two

* P. Warnefr. lib. 6. Regin. lib. 1. Chron. Sigon. ad annum 726.

Parties, they took themselves to Arms, in order to destroy one another. The Catholick Party, as the stronger, after coming to Blows, remain'd victorious, having made a terrible Slaughter of all the Iconoclasts, without so much as sparing the Exarch, who was kill'd in the Tumult. These were the Causes of the Emperors of the East's losing many Cities in Romagna, which belong'd to the Exarchate, and all the other Cities of la Marca, which surrender'd to Luitprandus King of the Longobards. For this cunning Prince, who had enter'd into this War on no other account but to take an Opportunity of aggrandizing himself at other Peoples Cost, did not fail to improve this Revolt, and to cloak it with the Pretence of Religion for compassing his Ends, according to the Maxims of human Policy. He suggested to these People on the one hand, that they could never preserve their Religion under an Emperor, who was not only a Heretick, but likewise a Persecutor of the Orthodox; and on the other hand, that they were too weak to resist the Power of any potent Prince who might attack them at a Time, when perhaps other Interests might hinder their Friends from assisting them: Thus those Cities, in this Commotion, following such Advices only as were instill'd into them, either out of Hatred or Fear mix'd with Zeal, and the Love of Religion, after having shook off the Yoke of the Empire, put themselves under the Dominion of the Longobards. An Instance which may let Princes see what mighty Influence Religion has on the Minds of People; whence they may learn, that it cannot be alter'd without the Danger of giving a violent Shock to the chief Hinges of their States.

The Dukedom of Naples keeps its Allegiance to Leo Isauricus.

WHAT the Predecessors of Luitprandus, in a long Tract of Time and Wars, could not compass, he at once was near accomplishing, by making himself Master of the Dukedom of Naples, as he had done of many Cities of the Exarchate of Ravenna. The Dukedom of Naples, as we have said, was govern'd by a Duke whom the Emperors of the East were wont to send from Constantinople. In the Time of Leo, this City was govern'd for him by Exbilaratus Successor of John, who being spurred on by the precise Orders of Leo, urged the People of Campania to receive the Edict, and to comply with the Religion of their Prince. He had likewise suborn'd some Men to murder the Pope, by promising them great Rewards if they should strike that Blow, which he said was absolutely necessary for the Quiet of Italy. This execrable Villainy being discover'd by the Neapolitans, who were always most devoted to the Popes, and most tenacious of the Doctrine of the Church of Rome; it appeared to them so horrid and monstrous, that laying aside all other Considerations, except that which kindled their Indignation, in order to revenge this outrageous Attempt, they took Arms, and amidst these Commotions and Tumults, revolted from the Duke Exbilaratus, who not having wherewithal to make Resistance, was murder'd, together with his Son Adrian; and one of his chief Officers, who was accus'd of having compos'd a seditious Libel against the Pope, likewise lost his Life.

BUT the Neapolitans carried their Resentment no further, neither did they fail in their Duty to their Prince, as the other Cities had done; neither would they have any recourse to the Longobards, who had a watchful Eye on so fair an Opportunity; nor basely subject themselves to them, for fear of disobliging the Emperor, or, what is more likely, because they mortally hated one another on Account of the continual Wars which had always been betwixt them; so that neither Luitprandus nor the Beneventan Longobards succeeded in making Advantage of so fine an Occasion. By which means this Dukedom continued firm and constant in their Obedience to their Prince, when all the other Dominions which the Emperors of the East had in Italy began to fail; whereupon Peter was appointed Duke of Naples in the Room of Exbilaratus : And the Neapolitans continu'd to live under the Empire of the Greeks until, after a very long Tract of Time, their Dukedom was at last conquered by the Normans, as we shall relate in the following Books.

LEO, upon the Advice of so general a Revolt, was much amaz'd ; but, instead of removing the Cause of so great an Evil, he rather added to it, till he made it incurable ; which at last caus'd him likewise to lose the Dukedom of Rome, without hopes of ever recovering it ; and would have also lost him that of Naples, and all his Authority in Italy, if the Steadiness of the Neapolitans, and the Aversion which they had to the Longobards, had not put a Stop to it. He still persevering in his wicked Design against the Life of the Pope, believing him to be the Author of all these Mischiefs, as soon as he had heard of the Death of Paul the Exarch, and the Revolt of Campania against the Duke of Naples, in the Year 727, sent the Eunuch Eutychius to Ravenna in the Quality of Exarch¹, who was one of the most wicked Men upon the Earth, and the most fit for putting in Execution the most impious and difficult Undertaking. He set about corrupting the Governors of the Towns, which were subject to the Longobards in the Neighbourhood of Naples and Rome, in order only to get them to dissemble, and not to do all that they could for defending the Pope : But that base Artifice had not all the Success which he expected ; for a Messenger that was privately sent to Rome by this Eunuch, was taken by the Romans, and express Orders from the Emperor being found about him to all his Officers to risque every thing in order to murder the Pope ; they were for cutting him in Pieces, if Gregory had not hindered it, contenting himself only with Excommunicating *Eutychius*².

S E C T. IV.

The Origin of the Temporal Dominion of the Popes in Italy.

GREGORY was truly very much perplexed ; for though Luitprandus and his Longobards pretended to defend him against the Power of Leo, yet he knew very well, that this Zeal was design'd not so much for his Service and Preservation, as for taking Advantage of other Peoples Quarrels ; for which Cause he had no great Reason to put much Trust in them, as the Event demonstrated. Whereupon the Romans, abominating the Impiety of Leo, into which he strove to involve them by his Edict on the one hand, and on the other, being jealous of the Ambition of Luitprandus, who thirsted after nothing so much as to be Master of the Roman Dukedom ; at last resolved to shake off the Yoke of Leo, and to keep themselves united under the Government of the Pope, to whom they took an Oath to defend him against the Power of Leo and Luitprandus. This was the Origin, and these were the first Foundations that were laid, upon which, in Process of Time, the Temporal Dominion of the Popes came to be established in Italy. From this Inter-reign which the Romans made, began their Dominion, who having shaken off Leo, were all united under the Pope as their Head, but not yet as their Prince.

BUT though Eutychius found his Design thwarted, yet he had Courage to go on in it ; for having recruited his Army the best Way he could, he went to Ravenna, and the Factions continuing yet in that City, it was easy for him, seeing his Party was succoured with such powerful Assistance, to recover it, and reduce the People of Ravenna to the Obedience of their Prince. He considering that all Italy was lost as to him, and that he could never suppress the Pope and the Obstinacy of the Romans, as long as Luitprandus was ready to support them ; employed all his Cunning and Policy to take off that Prince from the Pope's Interest and that of the Romans, and to bring him over to his own. At this very Time, Trasimund Duke of Spoletium had rebelled against Luitprandus, who finding it very hard to suppress him, resolved to bring him to condign Punishment. The King was likewise appriz'd of the firm Resolution the Romans had taken to subject themselves to the Pope, that all his Art and Flattery would not avail for bringing them under his Obedience, and that there was nothing to be done but by meer Force. For these Reasons, the Exarch offered him his Army for suppressing first the Rebellion of Trafimund, as having concerned himself in that War for no other End, but in order to take hold of all the Opportunities, with which it might furnish him of making great Advantage by the one or other Party. Eutychius had no great Difficulty to draw him into his Measures: The King then forgetting the Obligations he lay under to the Romans, and his Promise to defend the Pope and Religion against the Insults of the Emperor, accepted these Offers, and concluded a Treaty with Eutychius, who immediately join'd his Army to that of the King, and went along with him to the War which he was entering upon against the Duke of Spoletium his Rebel, which did not last long; for Trafimund was so much surpriz'd with that Confederacy, which he did not in the least dream of, that no sooner was Luitprandus come before Spoletium, than he cast himself at his Feet, begging Forgiveness, which he obtain'd: He was likewise re-establish'd in his Dukedom, and took a new Oath to the King, and gave Hostages for his Fidelity.

THE Opportunity of employing their Arms against the Rebels being so soon over, in pursuance of the Treaty with Eutychius, they were turn'd against the Romans, and Luitprandus came with the two Armies and sat down before Rome, incamping in the Meadows of Nero, which are betwixt the Tyber and St. Peter's Church, over-against Castle St. Angelo. Gregory being appriz'd of the Preparations of Luitprandus, had caused the City of Rome to be fortified the best way he could; but perceiving that he could ill resist such warlike Preparations with Force, and having before his Eyes the Example of the Duke of Spoletium, who, by request, had obtain'd, from the Piety of Luitprandus, what he could not have expected by Arms, resolv'd to imitate him, and, without consulting human Prudence, which would never have persuaded him to go and deliver himself up into the Hands of his Enemies till he had cautiously guarded against the worst that could befall him, accompanied with the Clergy and some Roman Barons, went to the King. Luitprandus, surpriz'd at such an unexpected Action, could not resist the Impulses of Courtesy, which were very natural to him, and receiv'd him with all the Respect due to the Sanctity of his Life, and the august Character of Roman Pontiff. Then it was, that Gregory taking upon him that Air of Majesty, which Vertue alone, accompanied with so high a Dignity, inspires, began with all Force imaginable, temper'd with tender Affection, to display the Power of his Eloquence, taxing him with the Breach of Faith; the Harm he did to Religion, for which he had been so zealous; and laying before him the great Prejudice he would do to his Kingdom, if he fail'd to protect the Church, he conjur'd him to leave off his Undertaking, and turn his Arms another way. Luitprandus either inwardly touch'd with Remorse, or that at this instant he saw many Things, which he had not thought of in the Heat of his Passion, or because Men, as they cannot be altogether good, so neither can they be altogether bad; was so struck with these Remonstrances of Gregory, that, without insisting on the Justification of his Conduct, or seeking Excuses, in some measure to vindicate his Honour, he cast himself at his Feet in the Presence of all, confessing his Fault, protesting that he would repair it immediately; and for the Time to come never suffer any Injury to be done the Romans, nor the Majesty of the Church to be violated in the Person of him who was the Father and Head of it. When the Exarch insisted that the Emperor's Orders might be obeyed, he not only did not give Ear to him, but in order to give the Pope a more secure Pledge of his Word, he intreated him to go along with himself to the Cathedral Church of S. Peter, which at this Time was without the Walls of the City, and there, in Presence of all the Chief Men of his Army, who had follow'd him, he caus'd himself to be disarm'd, and laid his Girdle, his Sword, his Gauntlet, his Royal Mantle, his Crown of Gold, and Cross of Silver, upon the Apostle's Sepulchre; afterwards he begg'd of the Pope, that he would receive Eutychius into his Favour, of whom he needed be no longer in fear, seeing he was not now supported by the Lombards. Gregory still hoping that Leo some time or other would acknowledge his Errors, consented to this Demand: So that Luitprandus retiring with his Army to his own Dominions, the Exarch was receiv'd in Rome, and continu'd for some Time very peaceable, and in a good Understanding with the Pope. At this very Time it happen'd that an Impostor, who call'd himself Tiberius, and bragg'd of his being descended of the Emperors, had seduc'd some People in Tuscany, who had proclaim'd him Emperor : Gregory; who slipp'd no Opportunity of obliging Leo, perceiving that the Exarch had not Forces sufficient to crush him, manag'd Matters so with the Romans, that they accompanied him in this War against the Tyrant, who was besieg'd and taken in a Castle, and his Head sent to the Emperor.

BUT Leo being still more obdurate, carried his Passion to the utmost Extremity ; for in the East where he govern'd more absolutely, and had no-body to controul him, he fill'd every Place with Slaughter, Tears, and Blood ; he caus'd the Pictures in all the Churches to be defac'd ; he publish'd an Order whereby he commanded all the Inhabitants, especially those who had Care of Churches, to put in the Hands of his Officers all the Images, that by burning them all at once, he might purge the City. But the Execution prov'd so odious, not sparing Age or Sex, that at last it occasion'd the Loss of what was yet remaining in the West, to Leo and his Successors for ever ; for the Pope finding that it was not in his Power to reclaim this Prince, and being afraid lest sometime or other, he might do in the Western Provinces, what he heard with extreme Grief, he had done in those of the East ; he slacken'd the Reins by which hitherto he had kept the Romans in the Obedience to their Prince, and leaving them to their Choice, and to do what they thought fit ; at last he approv'd of that which hitherto he had endeavour'd to hinder, and what the People had already begun to do of themselves ; whereupon the Romans renouncing their Allegiance to Leo, withdrew themselves altogether from under his Dominion, paid him no more Tribute, and united themselves together under the Direction of Gregory as their Head, but not as their Prince.

SOME of our Writers, from the Authority of Theophanes, Cedrenus, Zonara, and Nicephorus, Greek Authors, who flourish'd long after Gregory and Paul Warnefride, and Anastafius Bibliothecarius, relate, that the Romans having shaken off the Yoke, elected Gregory for their Prince, by taking an Oath of Fidelity to him ; and that the Pope accepted the Principality of Rome, and order'd the Romans, and all the rest of Italy, to pay no more Tribute to the Emperor, and besides absolv'd the Vassals from the Oath to the Empire ; publicly and solemnly excommunicated the Emperor Leo, depriv'd him not only of his Dominions in Italy, but also of all the Empire : Whence the independent Dominion of the Pope over Rome and its Dukedom, had its rise ; which afterwards by the Bounty of Pepin and Charles the Great, extended itself to the Exarchate of Ravenna, Pentapolis, and many other Cities of Italy.

THE French Writers, and amongst the rest the Archbishop of Paris, *P. de Marca*², and those two famous Divines Natalis and *Du Pin*³, deny, that Gregory, a wise and prudent Pope, had given way to such an Excess ; the Letters of the same Pope⁴, Warnefride, Anastafius, Bibliothecarius, Damascenus ; the Letters likewise of Gregory III. and Charles the Great to Constantine and Irenæus, are convincing Proofs that these Stories are fabulous ; to wit, that Gregory excommunicated Leo, accepted of the Principality of Rome, absolv'd the Vassals from their Oath to the Empire, and from paying Tribute, and depos'd the Emperor ; and assure us, that Gregory, tho' in a thousand ways offended, was always very serviceable and faithful to Leo, and had on many Occasions hinder'd the People from revolting, and endeavour'd to keep them from rising against their Prince. 'Tis true he oppos'd the Edicts of Leo for abolishing the Images, commanding them not to be obey'd, and exhorting that Prince to give over the Design he had undertaken ; but we read not in so grave Authors that he excommunicated him. The first Pope who boasted of his having darted his Thunder-bolts at Imperial Heads, was the famous Hildebrand Gregory VII. which we shall observe in its Place, and not Gregory II. What Anastafius writes, is most clear⁵ ; he tells us, that after Leo had depos'd Germanus Patriarch of Constantinople, for his not consenting to the Edict, and appointed Anastafius the Iconoclaste in his Room, Gregory excommunicated Anastafius for persevering in his Error ; but only rebuk'd, admonish'd, and exhorted the Emperor by Letters to desist from his Enterprize, but did not excommunicate him, as Anastafius writes. And what is said of Gregory's having depos'd Leo, is yet more fabulous; for this Pope acknowledg'd Leo as Emperor as long as he liv'd; and Gregory III. his Successor, did the same, who had a Correspondence with him; and we read many of his Letters directed to the Emperor, full of great Humanity and Respect. 'Tis the more certain that he acknowledged him as such, because the Dates of his Letters bear the Years of his Empire, as that of Gregory directed to Boniface, Imperante Domino piissimo Augusto Leone, Imperii ejus XXIII. ¹

OUR Modern Latin Writers, misled by the Authority of these Greek, have taken their Fables for Truths; but they did not advert, that the Authority of our ancient Latin Writers, who flourish'd first, and related Things which fell out in Times and Places not so remote and distant from them, ought to have weigh'd more with them. They likewise did not advert, that the Greeks of these latter Times, besides the Character of their Nation, which has always obtruded Lyes and Fables upon the World, had all an Aversion for the Church of Rome; and in order to stir up the Minds of Men to a Hatred of, and to draw Envy on, the Roman Pontiffs, they represented them to the World as Authors of Innovations and Revolutions, by imputing to them the Ruin of the Empire of the East, calling them Innovators, Ambitious and Usurpers of the Temporal Authority of Princes; and that they, ill imitating our Head and Master Jesus Christ, from Priests, were become Princes.

THE Fables of these Greek Schismatics were afterwards greedily, and with pleasure swallow'd by our modern Innovators, and the most furious Hereticks of these our latter Times: Who likewise from the Authority of those, by all means will have it, that Gregory truly excommunicated Leo; that he absolv'd the Vassals of the Empire from their Oaths; that he depos'd the Emperor, order'd that no more Tribute should be paid him; and that being offer'd the Sovereignty of Rome by the rebellious Romans, he accepted, and became Prince thereof. Spanhemius ², amongst others, cries out mightily against the French Writers, who take these Accounts concerning Gregory to be fabulous; he says, that they writing in the Reign of Lewis the Great, were fain to deny these Facts, Ne sub Ludovico magno, Romano in Pontifice hujusmodi potestatem agnoscere viderentur: But they themselves by all means will have them to be true, in order to make a Comparison betwixt our Saviour Jesus Christ and the Pope. When the Multitude taken with his Miracles, offer'd to make our Saviour King, he immediately left them, and answer'd, That his Kingdom was not of this World; the Pope, when the rebellious Romans had shaken off the Yoke of Leo, and offer'd the Principality to Gregory, he immediately consented, and became their Prince. Christ expressly commanded Tribute to be paid to Cæsar; the Pope ordain'd, that no more Tribute should be paid to Leo: By these and the like Antitheses, and by such Methods, without either Rhime or Reason, they afterwards broke into that Blasphemy of making the Pope to be Anti-Christ.

WHO would believe, that the greatest Sticklers for the Greek Schismatics, and the greatest Abettors of these furious Hereticks, are now the modern Romans, and the Writers most addicted to that Court? These, tho' for another end, will likewise have it, that Gregory excommunicated Leo, depos'd him, order'd that Tribute should not be paid him, and, which is more, that being offer'd the Principality by the rebellious Romans, he accepted of it; whence sprung the Temporal Dominion of the Popes in Italy. Thus, not to mention others, our Jesuit Historian, Author of the new History of Naples, writes ³: Tum tandem Romani Orientalis Imperii jugum excusserunt, Gregorium Dominum salutarunt, eique Sacramentum dixerunt, &c. Gregorius oblatum ultro Principatum suscepit: Quem non arma, non humanæ vires, artesque, sed populorum studia, Anno 727. auspiciato contulerunt. Such a Beginning the Hereticks exactly give to the Temporal Dominion of the Popes, founding it upon the Rebellion of the Romans; and that Gregory, ill imitating our Saviour, did accept of the Principality, and the Servant of Servants became Lord and Master. But by what we shall relate hereafter, it will clearly appear, that altho' it did take its Rise from these slender Beginnings, nevertheless it was not then that the Pope acquir'd the Sovereignty of Rome, but many Years after; neither during all the Interreign which the Romans of their own Authority pretended to make, were there Officers of the Greek Emperor wanting in Rome; and we can demonstrate, that the first Acquisitions were in the Exarchate of Ravenna, in Pentapolis, and afterwards in the Roman Dukedom, and not in the City of Rome, on the Occasions which we shall presently relate.

S E C T. V.

Pope Gregory II. and his Successor Gregory III. were the first that had recourse to France for Succour.

THE Emperor Leo being advis'd of these most important Events, and more furiously inrag'd against the Pope, immediately confiscated all the Patrimonies which the Church of Rome had in Sicily, Calabria, and in all his other Dominions; and was preparing a powerful Army in order to chastise the Romans for their Rebellion; to recover the other Towns to his Obedience; and to revenge himself fully upon the Pope, whom he took to be the Author of all these Revolts: Wherefore Gregory dreading lest so considerable warlike Preparations might be design'd for crushing him, if he was not supported by a Power able to cope with Leo, resolv'd to pitch upon a Protector in whom he might find all the Support and Assistance necessary. He could not trust the Longobards, whose Designs and Treachery he knew from long Experience. The Venetians, tho' most zealous in the Defence of the Church, were not as yet so strong in Italy, as to be able alone to withstand all the Power of the Greek Emperor, especially when they were jealous of the Longobards, who were more troublesome Neighbours. And as for Spain, it was in a most lamentable Condition at that Time, being almost wholly ruin'd by the Saracens. Therefore he resolv'd to have recourse to the Power of the French, whose Constancy in the Catholick Faith had always been most firm. They had been now above fifteen Years govern'd by Charles Martel, who, on account of the Insufficiency and Pusillanimity of the King, being rais'd to be the Steward of the Household, the first Honour of the Kingdom, rul'd that Realm with an absolute Sway, and was become famous for a thousand glorious warlike Expeditions in France and Germany, and especially for the remarkable Overthrow given the Saracens in the Field of Tours; he was generally reputed the greatest Captain, and the true Hero of his Time.

GREGORY sent to this great Prince, which no other Pope had ever done before, a magnificent Embassy with many Relicks, to beg Assistance against the Attempts of Leo, and that he would take the Romans and the Church under his Protection¹. The Ambassadors were receiv'd by Charles with extraordinary Honours, and a Magnificency becoming the most august Prince of his Age; and in a short Time the Treaty was concluded, by which Charles oblig'd himself to go to Italy in order to defend the Church and the Romans, if they should be attack'd by the Greeks or Longobards; and the Romans on the other hand were to acknowledge him for their Protector, and to confer the Honour of Consulship, as had been done formerly by the Emperor Anastasius, to the great Clovis, after he had defeated the Astrogoths. And when the Ambassadors return'd, loaded with rich Presents, and pleas'd with so successful a Negotiation; Gregory having nothing more to fear concerning the Church, to which he left so powerful a Protector, ended his Days in the Year 731, with the Fame of singular and eminent Virtues, which made him deserve upon Earth, the Honours which are only ascrib'd to the Saints in Heaven.

GREGORY III. succeeded, and some have written², that it was he who sent this Embassy to Charles Martel, because Luitprand, after having defeated Trasimund Duke of Spolegium, who had rebell'd a second Time, taking Advantage of his Victories, had anew invaded the Roman Dukedom, and laid close Siege to Rome, being offended at Gregory for having entertain'd the Rebel; and when the Prayers and Eloquence of the Pope had not the same Effect as those of his Predecessor, at last he had recourse to the Assistance of Charles, by whose Mediation he obtain'd, that Luitprand being satisfied with four Cities only, should raise the Siege, and leave Rome, and the rest of the Dukedom, to the Romans and the Pope. But be this as it will, 'tis certain, that from the Pope's having recourse to France, the French began to concern themselves in the Affairs of Italy; the Consequence of which was, that by this mutual Assistance, each of the Parties plotting to advance their own Interest; at last the Longobards being driven out, the French came to rule in Italy: The Kingdom of France, from the Merovingian, was translated to the Carlovingian Race; and on the other hand, the Popes were establish'd in Rome and the Roman Dukedom, with a great Part of the Exarchate of Ravenna and Pentapolis, as we shall relate by-and-by.

Constantinus Copronimus, succeeds to his Father Leo. The Death of Luitprandus King of the Longobards.

THE Affairs of Italy being in so great Confusion, and by various Accidents the Power of the Emperor Leo always more and more declining, nothing but the Shadow of Authority remain'd there. The Exarchate of Ravenna being much curtail'd by the Conquest of the Longobards, was now ready to go to ruin, without Hopes of Recovery; the Dukedom of Rome was in the Hands of the Romans, and the Pope their Head, whom they obey'd; and tho' there were as yet some Vestiges of Sovereignty remaining in Rome, Leo having still his Officers there; nevertheless his Authority was so very weak, that it was evident it would in a very short Time be altogether abolish'd in that City; he had no full Power and Dominion but only in the Dukedom of Naples, in Calabria, the Bruttii, and in some other maritime Cities of the Kingdom, which had not as yet fallen into the Hands of the Beneventan Longobards. But Leo Isauricus dying in the Year 741, and his Son Constantinus Copronimus succeeding to him in the East, its Ruin was compleated; Constantine having none of the good Qualities of the Father, exceeded him infinitely in the Bad; and, if Credit may be given to the Greek Writers, he was the most wicked and ugly Monster that ever the Earth produc'd. He was no sooner sole Emperor, than he shew'd himself more furious against Images than his Father had been, and publish'd an Edict, by which he not only condemn'd the Images of the Saints, but likewise forbid the Invocation of them, and the very Title of Saints; and carrying his Fury further, he was also outrageous against their Relicks, by ordering the greatest Violence and Disrespect in the World should be offer'd them: Therefore he persecuted the Defenders of the Images, and on that account banish'd many Bishops. But he render'd himself much more impious, and abhor'd by all for the Hatred he had conceiv'd against the Mother of God, in prohibiting any Holy-Day whatsoever to be observ'd in Honour of her, and that none should implore the Assistance of God by her Intercession, asserting, that she had no Power either in Heaven or on Earth.

THIS execrable Impiety, together with many more wicked Instances of the same nature, and his abominable Vices, render'd him so odious to his Subjects, that he not only lost that Shadow of Dominion which he had in Rome and Ravenna, but was like to have lost the whole Empire.

IN the same Year that Leo died, Gregory III. likewise departed this Life, and was succeeded in the Pontificate by Zacharias; to him the Church of Rome ow'd her Temporal Dominion, much more than to the two Gregory's, for he knew how to raise it upon the Ruins of the Greek Empire, and to make greater Acquisitions; forasmuch as he no sooner had mounted the Chair, than he sent Ambassadors to Luitprandus, to demand the four Cities, which by the Mediation of Charles Martel had been given him when he rais'd the Siege of Rome for the second Time. And altho' the Ambassadors were honourably receiv'd by Luitprand, and got some Hopes of the Restitution, nevertheless Zachary observing that the Affair was protracted, and intending to imitate Gregory, went with all the Clergy of Rome to find the King, and being receiv'd with extraordinary Marks of Respect; his Motives were so strong and effectual, that he not only obtain'd from the Piety of this Prince, the Restitution requir'd, but likewise establish'd a Peace betwixt them for twenty Years: He also got the Sabinian Patrimony to be restor'd, and made many other Acquisitions beyond his Expectation. And this Pope was so successful with Luitprand, and so much in his Favour, that when in the latter end of his Reign, impatient of Repose, according to his wonted Custom, he design'd to attack Ravenna anew, Eutychius the Exarch had recourse to the Mediation of the Pope, who wrought so upon Luitprand, as to make him lay aside that Expedition, and even to restore some Places which he possess'd, especially Cesena.

BUT while these Things were transacting in Italy, Luitprand, after having reign'd 32 Years, ended his Days in Pavia, in the Month of July in the Year 743¹. A Death as sudden as doleful to the Longobards, and never enough to be lamented by them; he was bury'd in solemn Pomp in the Church of S. Adrian the Martyr, in Pavia, with the highest Commendation, and lofty Encomiums². A Prince, laying aside his excessive Ambition of Empire, indued with all the Perfections desirable in a King, either for Peace or War; he enlarg'd the Bounds of his Dominion³, and tho' brought up from a Child amongst Arms, had nothing of Pride or Cruelty in him, but was rather most courteous, and always inclin'd to use Clemency, even towards those who had offended him; he was more knowing and sufficient than all those of his Council. All his Laws were wise and prudent; and tho' he had not cultivated his Mind with Learning, yet by the Strength of his own natural Parts he had attain'd all the Force and Subtlety of a Philosopher.

THERE are remarkable Monuments of his Piety towards God still remaining; he was magnificent in founding of Churches and fine Monasteries, of which Warnefride gives us the Number⁴, and to this Day the Vestiges of them are admir'd; he was chaste, and compassionate to the Poor, and of so good natural Parts, that of all the Longobard Princes that reign'd in Italy, all Writers deservedly give him the greatest Commendation. He left the Kingdom to Hildebrand his Nephew, whom in the last Years of his Life he made his Partner; but his Government lasted but a short while, seven Months having scarcely pass'd⁵, when the Longobards finding that because of his Insufficiency they could not expect a happy and good Government, they turn'd him out of the Throne, and set up Rachis Duke of Friuli, a Prince adorn'd with excellent Qualities and uncommon Piety.

Of RACHIS King of the Longobards, and his Laws.

RACHIS, to the unspeakable Satisfaction of all, mounted the Royal Throne in the Year 744. In the Beginning of his Reign, he gave very evident Tokens of a quiet Disposition, and was inclinable by all means to live in Peace; he confirm'd the Peace with Zachary which had been made with Luitprandus some Years before; and following the Example of the other Longobard Kings, would likewise add new Laws to those of his Predecessors, and soften the Rigour of some of them. He having conven'd the States of the Kingdom in Pavia, in the Year 745, publish'd them by his Edict, which, after the manner of his Forefathers, he caus'd to be establish'd over all the Kingdom. We read this Edict as yet intire in the often mention'd Code of the Monastery of the Cave, which contains eleven Chapters. The first begins, Ut unus quisquis Judex in sua Civitate debeat quotidie in judicio residere; and the last has this Title, De Arimanno quomodo cum judice suo caballicare debeat. From this Edict the Compiler took only nine Laws, which we have in the Volume of the Longobard Laws. We have three in the first Book, one under the Title De Seditione contra judicem; and two under the other De Invasionibus. In the second Book we have four of them; one under the Title Debitis & Guadimoniis; another under the Title De Præscriptionibus; another under the Title De Officio Judicis; another under that Qualiter quis se defendere debeat; and two other in the third Book, one under the Title De his quæ secreta Regis inquirunt; and the other under this Ubi interdictum sit Legatum alicui mittere, wherein it is strictly forbidden, without the King's Licence, to send Ambassadors to Rome, Ravenna, Spoletium, Beneventum, to France, Bavaria, Germany, Greece and Navarre.

BUT after Rachis had so well improved the Arts of Peace, and so well settled his Kingdom with wise and provident Laws, there did not pass many Years, when he laid them aside; and being seiz'd with an Ambition of enlarging the Bounds of his Kingdom, as his Predecessor had done, whom he had a Mind to imitate, he rais'd an Army, and made War on Pentapolis, and having taken some Places in that Country, he advanc'd into the Roman Dukedom, and at last laid close Siege to *Perugia*¹.

IT was at this Time, that Pope Zachary had so many lucky Opportunities, which led him to so many renown'd and noble Undertakings, that his Name deserves gloriously to be extoll'd above all the other Roman Pontiffs; for he had the Art to lay such, and so deep Designs, in order to extend the Authority and Dominion of his See, that nothing like them had ever been so cunningly contriv'd.

The Translation of the Kingdom of France from the Merovingian to the Carolingian Line.

AFTER the Death of Charles Martel, Pepin and Carlomannus his Sons took upon them the Government of the Kingdom of France. Childerick the last King of the first Race, because of his Insufficiency, retain'd nothing but the Royal Title; but after seven Years had pass'd, Carlomannus renounc'd the Government to his Brother, and, accompanied with many French, came to Rome, and being inflam'd with a fervent Zeal for Religion, would have Zachary to inroll him amongst the Clergy; from thence he retir'd to Monte Soratte, and there founded a Monastery, which he dedicated to S. Sylvester the Pope; where 'tis reported this Pope had hid himself in the Time of the Persecution, before Constantine had embrac'd the Christian Religion. But this Place being continually frequented by the French, who came either of Purpose, or en passant to visit him, in order altogether to withdraw himself from worldly Affairs, he retir'd to Monte Cassino, where having dedicated himself to God, he turn'd Monk¹.

IN the mean Time Pepin continu'd to govern the French Monarchy alone, with the same Power and Authority, and rather more, than his Father Charles Martel had done; for Childerick III. the last of the Merovingian Race, by reason of his Folly and Unfitness, was less esteem'd than the Kings his Predecessors, who for about a hundred Years had enjoy'd nothing but the Royal Title, by basely allowing themselves to be govern'd by the Mayors of the Palace, who had all the Authority. On the contrary, Pepin by his noble Manners, and his glorious Actions, had gain'd the Hearts of all the French, who willingly would have acknowledged him for their King, rather than Childerick, a stupid and unfit Prince. Pepin did not let so fine an Opportunity slip, of transferring the Realm of France from the Race of the great Clovis to his own House, but made use of all the Art imaginable. But tho' the French seconded his Design, nevertheless they were not willing to do it of themselves, being perswaded that they had not sufficient Authority to transfer the Kingdom from the lawful Heir to another House, nor to absolve themselves from the Oath of Fidelity which they had taken to their Prince. Pepin weighing the Difficulty of the Matter, and that Charles Martel his Father, tho' formidable and renown'd for so many Victories, had not had the Boldness to undertake it; and besides, thinking that so great and so strange an Enterprize, could by no other Means be brought about, not to be thought odious, but rather commendable, than by having recourse to the Authority of the Apostolical See, which at this Time was reputed the Seminary of all Virtue and Sanctity; and if that See should not approve of the Fact, it was able to stir up so many Enemies against him, that he would not be in a Condition to withstand them with his own Forces; he therefore very prudently resolv'd, under the Cloak of the Papal Authority, to cover the Deformity of the Fact, and sent the Bishop of Vuitzburg to Rome to Pope Zachary, and caus'd him to lay before him his own Desire, and that of all the French, requesting his Opinion, whether it would not be for the common Benefit of the Kingdom, to transfer the Scepter from a stupid King, to Pepin a valiant and wise Prince². And after the Bishop had demonstrated, that by his approving of this Translation, he should acquire more Glory than Charles Martel had done by his Victory over the Saracens, he requested him to interpose his Authority, and to absolve the French from their Oaths, that they might be able to place Pepin on the Throne. This was the publick Commission of the Ambassador, but the private Instructions were, to promise if the Pope consented, to defend him against all his Enemies, and especially against the Longobards; and that he might rest secure, that Pepin would not only protect him, but also grant him greater Advantages to his See.

² Paul. Æmil. de reb. Franc.

ZACHARY did not let slip so fit and seasonable an Opportunity, which afforded him an Occasion to shew at the same Time, both the Greatness of his Authority, and not only to establish the Temporal Dominion which he began to have in Italy, but likewise to extend it beyond the Roman Dukedom, and the Exarchate of Ravenna. Whereupon he not only gave his Advice to do it, but that there might remain to Posterity, a solemn Document of his Authority, of himself, he likewise added a Decree, by which he made void the Right of Childerick, as an insufficient King, and absolv'd the French from the Religion of their Oath, and ordain'd that Pepin should be put in his Place. As soon as the French had obtain'd this, they met at Soissons, turn'd out Childerick, who shutting himself up in a Monastery, turn'd Monk, and they elected Pepin, who was solemnly crown'd by Boniface Archbishop of Mentz, from whom he also receiv'd the Holy Unction, that thereby he might be more respected by his Subjects; and he was the first King of France that made use of it.

SOME French Writers, and particularly *Du Pin*¹, clearly demonstrate, that the French sent this Embassy to Zachary, in order to consult him only as a Doctor and Father of the Christians, and that they requir'd nothing from him, except his Advice and Approbation, to make their Election the more plausible to all Christendom; so that Zachary had no other hand in it than by giving his Opinion and Advice. Others, from the Authority of *Eginardus*², Reginon, and from the Annals of France, relate, that this Pope did not only approve of the Election, but, as 'tis easy to do more than is requir'd, especially when it makes for the Inlargement of one's own Authority, even went further, and made a Decree for it; which however they say, was of no Consequence or Prejudice to them for the Time to come, as was made clear, when Two hundred and thirty-seven Years after, the French with common Consent elected and crown'd Hugh Capet, by turning out Charles of Lorraine, who was the lawful Heir of the Carlovingian Race, without being oblig'd to consult the Pope, as had been done by Pepin. Whatever be in this, 'tis certain, that these Matters and Treaties were transacted at this Time betwixt Zachary and Pepin; on the one hand Zachary consented to the Translation of the Kingdom, which Pepin wanted to be settled on his House, and gave him all Assistance; on the other hand, Pepin promis'd to protect the Apostolical See, and to defend it against its Enemies, and particularly the Longobards, and procure it greater Advantages³. It remains a Question, whether the Apostolical See reap'd more Benefit from Pepin and his Arms, which he employ'd in defending it against the Power of the Longobards, and establishing the Temporal Dominion in Italy; or Pepin, from the Authority of that See, which was so propitious to the French, that it made his Descendants Masters of Italy, and facilitated the driving the Longobards out of it.

Rachis abandons his Kingdom, and turns a Monk of Cassino.

I N the mean Time, before Zachary had concluded these Treaties with Pepin, he had not neglected the Interest of his See with Rachis, who having march'd thorough the Dukedom of Rome, and its Territories, had, as is said, laid close Siege to Perugia, and threatned to proceed further. The Emperor was at a Distance, and did not mind the Affairs of Italy; the Exarch was not in a Condition to defend himself in Ravenna, much less to oppose Rachis; so that Zachary, in order to ward off this Blow, was necessitated to have recourse to his own Authority and Courage: Therefore taking Heart, and well accompanied, he went in Person to the Camp, where Rachis was, under the Walls of Perugia; and being honourably receiv'd by this Prince, he spoke with such Force and Energy, as to instill so tender a Regard for Piety and Religion into him, that immediately he not only rais'd the Siege of Perugia, Perugia, but also yielded to Zachary some Castles of Pentapolis which he had possess'd. And this Speech made so deep Impression upon him, that being over-aw'd with the Majesty of the Pope, and overcome with the secret Force of Religion, a Year after he went to Rome, with Tasia his Wife, and Ratruda his Daughter, to visit him; and there prostrating himself at his Feet, and renouncing his Kingdom, he would turn a Monk of Cassino, together with his Wife and Daughter; and having taken the Habit from the Hands of the Pope, he retir'd to Monte Cassino, there to end his Days in that Monastery under the Rule of S. Benedict: Tasia and Ratruda follow'd his Example, who at their own Charges erected from the Foundation a magnificent Monastery of Virgins, not far from Cassino, where having put on the Monastick Habit, they led a holy Life¹.

RACHIS spent the rest of his Days in the Monastery of Cassino. A Prince remarkable for having govern'd the Kingdom with so much Prudence and Moderation, and made so many provident Laws; but what made him much more immortal and commendable in the Memories of Men, was his laying it down with so many Tokens of Piety and Religion; wherefore the Monks of that Monastery, worship him at this Day as a Saint. At the Time that Leo Ostiensis compos'd his Chronicle, there was seen near to that Monastery, a Vineyard, as Leo reports², which was commonly call'd the Vineyard of Rachis; the Monks of that Monastery affirming, that he planted and cultivated it. The Abbot of *Noce*³, afterward Archbishop of Rossano, while he was Abbot there, caus'd search to be made for that Spot, which he found altogether barren; he caus'd the Vineyard to be repair'd, of which there was not the least Vestige remaining, and caus'd likewise a Chapel to be built in Honour of him.

JOHN VILLANI, a *Fiorentine*⁴, was of Opinion, that the Statue of Metal, which is now to be seen in the Market Place of Barletta, and which is call'd Eracco, had been erected by the Beneventan Longobards to this Prince. The Authority of this Historian made *Beatillus*⁵ also, and, which is more, the Abbot of *Noce*⁶, and some others believe, that it really was the Statue of Rachis; which, if we consider the Extension of the Dukedom of Beneventum at this Time, would not seem impossible; seeing it extended its Bounds on this Side beyond Sipontum, to Bari; which Town was comprehended in the Dukedom of Beneventum; and tho' it had its own particular Dukes, who immediately govern'd it, nevertheless the Kingdom of the Longobards in Italy was made up, not only of that Tract of Country which we now call Lombardy, and of the other lesser Dukedoms, but especially of these three famous Dukedoms of Spoletium, Friuli, and this of Beneventum, greater than all the rest, which were subject to the Longobard Kings, who had their Seat in Pavia; it would not seem a strange Thing, that the Beneventan Longobards had erected that Statue to Rachis their King.

BUT two strong Reasons convince us of the fabulous and erroneous Opinion of Villani. The first is, that it appears altogether unlikely, that the Beneventan Longobards, would have plac'd a Statue so large and magnificent in Barletta, a Town at this Time so small and of no Account, and situated as it were on the Borders of their Dukedom, and not in Beneventum the Metropolis City; or in some other magnificent City of that Dukedom, of which they had many; such as Capua, Salernum, Bari, and so many others. Barletta at first was nothing else but a Tower plac'd in the Middle of the Way betwixt Trani, and the City of Cannæ, so famous for the signal Overthrow given the Romans there by Hannibal; it serv'd only for a lodging Place for Passengers; and, as is usual, had for a Sign a small Barrel. The Conveniency of the Situation, being seven Miles distant from each of these two Cities, drew some of their Citizens to live there, whence the Place afterwards took the Name of Barletta; and the Inhabitants always increasing under the Empire of Zeno, and the Pontificate of Galesius, S. Sabinus Bishop of Canosa thought it a fit Place to build a Church in for the Devotion of the Inhabitants, which was erected in Honour of St. Andrew the Apostle. 'Tis likewise said, that Pope Galesius being in Mount Garganus, on account of the miraculous Apparition of St. Michael, at the Request of Bishop Sabinus, about the Year 493, went down with Laurence Bishop of Sipontum, Palladius of Salpi, Eutychius of Trani, John of Ruvo, Eustorius of Venosa, and Roger Bishop of Canna, and consecrated it; after which Consecration, the Inhabitants increasing from Time to Time, it came to be a good Town, many Citizens of Canna going thither to live for greater Conveniency. Such was the State of Barletta in the Reign of Rachis; it increas'd, and many Ages after began to take the Form of a City, and under the Reign of the Suevi, Manfredus who lov'd that Part of Puglia very much, and where he liv'd for the most part, honour'd it sometimes with his Residence while he was employ'd in building of New Sipontum, which from him took the Name of Manfredonia. Barletta thus honour'd by this Prince, began to vie with its Mother Canna, and to dispute the Boundaries and Territories, which for many Years had been common to both; whereupon Charles I. of Anjou, to remove all Disputes which usually arise betwixt Neighbours, made a Division¹: It was then surrounded with Walls, and this King caus'd the Streets to be pav'd, and the Gates to be built. It was afterwards made the See of the Archbishop of Nazareth, and brought to that Magnificency in which we now see it. John Villani, who flourish'd in the Reign of Charles II. of Anjou, and Joan I. his Niece, when Barletta was become one of the considerable Cities of Puglia, believing it had been such in the Reign of Rachis, and seeing this Statue lying in the Port of this City, which the Inhabitants call'd corruptly, as they do to this Day, the Statue of Arachio, took it to be the Statue of this Longobard King. Whence also we see the Mistake of *Scipio Ammiratus*², who writes, that this Statue had been dedicated by the Barlettans to the Emperor Heraclius, as a Mark of Gratitude, for that Emperor's having made a Mole to their City, for the Conveniency of Merchants; whereas in the Time of Heraclius, Barletta was a small Village, and the Mole was made many Ages after Heraclius, by its own Citizens; who no sooner than the Year 1491, transported that Statue, which lay half broke to pieces in the Harbour, to the Market-Place within the City, where it stands at this Day, after they had new vamp'd it as we now see it.

THE other Reason, which proves that it is not the Statue of Rachis, is its being represented Beardless, and dress'd after the Greek Fashion, having in one Hand a Cross, in the other an Apple, a Symbol of the World. These Marks, as they prove it to be the Statue of some Emperor of the East, so they prove it not to be of Rachis, or any other Longobard King. In the so often mentioned Code of the Monastery of the Cave, where the Edicts of the Longobard Kings of Italy are, we see some Pictures in Miniature of some of these Kings, Authors of these Edicts, tho' somewhat spoil'd, and after the manner of Painting in those Times, coarse and simple; nevertheless they are represented with long Beards, military Garments, the Scepter in their Right Hand, and the Crown on their Head, but neither Cross nor Apple to be seen: Whence 'tis probable, that, according to the ancient Tradition of the People of Barletta, it may be the Statue of Heraclius Emperor of the East.

HE, say they, on account of the great Veneration, which not only he, but all the other Emperors of the East his Predecessors, paid to Michael the Archangel, to whom there were so many Churches and Altars erected in Constantinople; when the Sanctuary of Mount Garganus was become so famous in his Time, that it drew the Bounty of the most potent Kings of the Earth to it, likewise would send and offer to that Church many rich Presents, and among the rest his Statue, to the end that he might eternize the Remembrance of the Worship which he paid to that Saint. They add, that the Ship which carry'd these Presents, being toss'd in the Adriatick Sea with Winds and Storms, was wreck'd in that Sea near the Shore of Barletta, where the Statue lay for a long Time in the Water; and that at last it was discover'd and brought ashore to the Harbour of that City, where it lay likewise half shatter'd for many Years: In fine, the Barlettans in the Year 1491, carry'd it into the City, and plac'd it where we now see it. Certainly the shav'd Beard, the Greek Habit, the Cross and the Apple, prove it to be the Statue of some Greek Emperor; Tradition, and the Resemblance it bears to Heraclius, and the Name, tho' corrupted, by which it has always been call'd by the Barlettans, give Ground to believe it is the Statue of that Emperor. The Opinion of *Mazzella*³, who believ'd this Statue to be the Emperor Frederick II's, is so false and foolish, that 'tis not worth the while to confute it, as being repugnant to all History.

Of Astolphus King of the Longobards, his Expedition to Ravenna, and the End of that Exarchate.

THE Longobards, as soon as Rachis turn'd Monk, set Astolphus his Brother on the Throne; a Prince gallant in the Field, and wise in the Council, who brought his Kingdom to the highest Pitch of Grandeur; which was the Occasion of his own Fall, and the Ruin of the Longobards in Italy. In the Beginning of his Reign he discover'd an Inclination to be moderate and peaceable; he confirm'd the Peace formerly made betwixt Zachary and Luitprandus, and Rachis his Brother, and granted the Pope all those Conditions which had been stipulated with his Predecessors. This Pope, after having settled the Peace with Astolphus, and so advantageously adjusted the Interests of his See, departed this Life in the Year 752. A Pope to whom the Church of Rome is much beholden, who by his wise Conduct rais'd her to so much Grandeur, and augmented her Authority; he left to his Successors very solid and firm Foundations, on which in after Ages they have been able to raise such a towering Superstructure in all the Kingdoms of the West, as gave Jealousy to Princes, and struck a Terror into the People.

ZACHARY being dead, the Clergy and People of Rome chose Stephen II. but he held that See only three or four Days; for being oppress'd with a severe Lethargy three Days running, he died on the fourth. Immediately there was another chosen, likewise nam'd Stephen, who by the antient Writers is also call'd the Second, not reckoning his Predecessor, who died without being consecrated; for in those Times the Election alone did not make a Pope, but the Consecration; so that if any was elected and died without being consecrated, he was not put in the List and Number of the Popes: Thus we see, not to name others, Echerempertus, and *Ostiensis*¹, call this Stephen the II^d, and not the III^d. However, at present 'tis a settled Point, contrary to what antiently was believ'd, that by the Election of the Cardinals the Pope receives all Authority; and therefore the Writers of these latter Times have labour'd to put this Stephen in the Number and List, whereupon they have agreed to alter the Number of the subsequent Stephens, by calling the Second Third, and the Third Fourth, and so on to the Ninth, whom they call the Tenth, which occasions great Confusion in comparing the ancient and modern Writers, the latter stily maintaining this Point.

THIS Pope having mounted the Throne, and follow'd the Footsteps of his Predecessors, after three Months of his Pontificate, sent Legates to Astolphus with many Presents, in order to establish that Peace which he had already confirm'd with Zachary; Astolphus ratify'd it, and it was agreed on for other 40 Years.

BUT this Prince, who was no less ambitious than Luitprandus, confirm'd this Peace with the Pope, to the end that he might not divert him from the Design he had of subjecting Ravenna, with all the rest of the Exarchate, which was yet in the Possession of the Greeks, and was govern'd by the Exarch Eutychius. From the Time he mounted the Throne, in order to that Expedition, for the Space of two Years, he had gather'd together all his Forces, and made them more powerful than ever; and perceiving that Constantinus Copronimus, who at this Time had associated his Son Leo with him in the Throne, was employ'd in other Expeditions in Greece and Asia, and did not in the least mind the Affairs of Italy, and tho' ever so willing, yet could not so suddenly send Assistance; he in an instant march'd with all his Forces against Eutychius, and went directly towards Ravenna the Head of the Exarchate, and laid close Siege to that Imperial City. Eutychius being thus catch'd napping, and unable to bear an Assault, or defend himself against such a numerous Army, agreed to surrender the Place, without hopes of ever recovering it; being far from any Assistance, and unprovided of Men and Money, he abandon'd every Thing, and return'd to Greece. After Astolphus took Ravenna, and all the other Cities of the Exarchate, Pentapolis easily surrender'd to him; who now triumphing over his Enemies, join'd the Exarchate of Ravenna to his Kingdom, which his Predecessors had so often in vain attempted to do; for sometimes they gain'd it, sometimes lost it, but never could intirely and firmly unite it to their Crown.

THUS ended the Exarchate of Ravenna and its Exarch; a Magistrate who for the Space of 183 Years had maintain'd the Power and Authority of the Emperors of the East in Italy: Thus ended likewise the great Lustre and Splendor of that City, which, by the Emperors Honorius and Valentinian, who neglected Rome, had always had the Honour to be made the constant Place of their Residence, as it was afterwards the Residence of the Exarchs, whom the Dukes of Rome, Naples, and all the other Italian Cities of the Empire obey'd, and whose Bishops contended with those of Rome for Precedency; now being retaken by the Longobards from the Greeks, it chang'd its Fortune, and being reduc'd to the Form of a Dukedom, was no otherways treated than the other lesser Dukedoms, of which the Kingdom of the Longobards was made up; which was the Occasion of its fatal Ruin, and of the Condition we now see it in. Marquardus Freerus ¹, in the Chronology which he compil'd of the Exarchs of Ravenna, from Longinus the first Exarch, under Justin II. to the last, which was this Eutychius, writes, that this Exarchate continu'd 175 Years; but from the Computation of the Years which he himself has made of it, we see, that it having, as he says, begun from Longinus in the Year 568, and ended in Eutychius, after Astolphus had taken Ravenna according to him in the Year 751, the Exarchate lasted 183, and not 175 Years. And according to those who compute the Fall of Ravenna from the Year 752, the Exarchate lasted 184 Years.

The Expedition of Astolphus into the Roman Dukedom.

ASTOLPHUS after so great and glorious Undertakings, being full of high and elevated Thoughts, now threaten'd to extend his Empire over the miserable Remains which were yet left to the Emperors of the Greeks in Italy; he being Master of the Exarchate of Ravenna, and thinking he had a Right to all that belong'd to the Exarchate, which was the Superiority and Sovereignty over the Dukedom of Rome, and all the rest; pretended likewise to command the Cities of the Roman Dukedom, and especially the City of Rome, in which the Emperors of the East, after the Agreement made betwixt Luitprandus and Gregory II. had continu'd to have some Vestige of Superiority, by having their Officers still there. Therefore he threaten'd the Lands of the Dominion of the Church, and Rome itself, having broke and violated the so many Treaties of Peace concluded betwixt himself and his Predecessors, and the Roman Pontiffs, he march'd his Army towards Rome, and having taken Narni, sent Ambassadors with a severe Message to the Pope, telling him, that he would plunder Rome, and put all the Romans to the Sword, if they did not subject themselves to his Empire, by paying him a Yearly Tribute of a Crown for each Man.

Man¹. The Pope being much troubled at so terrible a Message, endeavour'd to pacify him by a conspicuous Embassy of two famous Abbots, who flourish'd at that Time; he sent to him the Abbots of Monte Cassino and S. Vincenzo, to Velturum, with a great many valuable Presents, charging them to put him in Mind of the Peace lately made, and by Reasoning and Intreaties endeavour to persuade him not to break it, but to turn his Arms another way².

THE Pope from the Beginning of the Irruption which Astolphus made upon Ravenna, foreseeing these Mischiefs, had acquainted the Emperor Constantine with the Designs of the Longobards, and had solicited him to send powerful Assistance to the Exarch, in order to put a Stop to them; but Constantine intending to cover his Weakness with the Cloak of Authority, gave him to understand, that that alone was enough to hinder the Longobards from such an Undertaking; instead of an Army, he sent a Gentleman of his Bedchamber, named Joannes Silenziarius, with Orders to the Pope to send his own Letters along with him to Astolphus, in order to oblige him to restore what he had taken³. The Pope not only sent Letters but also Legates to accompany John; but when they arriv'd in Ravenna where Astolphus was, and deliver'd the Message about restoring what he had taken, that Prince receiv'd it with Contempt, and they were immediately sent back without Success, as they might well have imagin'd; for which Cause the Pope's Legates went with John directly to Constantinople, to intreat the Emperor anew, in the Name of the Pope, to come himself into Italy with a powerful Army in order to save Rome, and the other Remains of his Empire in Italy, which the Longobards were still endeavouring to rob him of. But Constantine, who was embroil'd in other Wars, and who minded nothing else, except the calling a new Council this Year 753, consisting of 338 Bishops, for pulling down the Images; was in no Condition to quarrel with the Longobards.

THEREFORE Stephen seeing that it was in vain to have recourse to *Copronimus*⁴, who could not so much as defend himself against the Longobards, and was at a great Distance for protecting his Church; and that on the other hand Astolphus had enter'd the Roman Dukedom with an Army, was laying all the Country waste, and threatening the Romans with Slaughter and Slavery, if they did not surrender to him; at last resolv'd, after the Example of Zachary, and the two Gregories, to have recourse to the Protection of France, and to beg Pepin's Assistance. He sent privately a Messenger to France, by whom he laid open his Distress to Pepin, and his Desire of going to France in Person, if he would send him Ambassadors for conducting him thither in Safety. Pepin did not fail to send him immediately two of the principal Officers of his Court, Rodigandus a Bishop, and Duke Antony, in order to conduct him to France. The Bishop and Duke being arriv'd at Rome, found that the Army of the Longobards, after having taken all the Castles in the Neighbourhood of Rome, was ready to invest that City; and the Pope's two Legates, with the Emperor's Envoy being return'd from Constantinople, had brought nothing but a second Order for the Pope to go in Person to Astolphus, and urge him to restore Ravenna and the other Cities he had possess'd himself of. There was no likelihood that this Journey would turn to any Account, yet the Pope was willing to obey, in order to make the last Effort, to see if he could prevail with that Prince; but when he saw that all his Labour was lost, and that Astolphus, who had forbidden him to speak of any Restitution, was doing what he could to stop him, he suffer'd himself at last to be conducted to France by Pepin's Ambassadors.

Pope Stephen in France, his Negotiations with King Pepin, and the Donation of Pentapolis made by this Prince to the Church of Rome, and the Exarchate of Ravenna taken from the Longobards.

THE Pope being arriv'd in France, was receiv'd by Pepin with all Marks of Esteem and Veneration; he ador'd him as Pope and Father of Christianity, and paid him more Honour than he could have done to the most powerful King of the Earth. Stephen represented to the King the Necessities and Distress to which the Longobards had reduc'd him, and crav'd his Assistance and Protection, for which he offer'd to employ all the Authority of the Apostolical See to his Advantage. Pepin then, that he might make himself to be the more respected by his Subjects, and for the better establishing the Kingdom of France in his Person and Posterity, would have Stephen to consecrate him King with his own Hands, and to anoint him and his two Sons Charles and Carloman with the holy Unction, which was perform'd in the Church of S. Denis ¹. On the other hand Pepin, besides assuring him that he would curb the Insolence of the Longobards, and make them restore the Places they had possess'd themselves of in the Roman Dukedom, promised also to drive Astolphus out of the Exarchate of Ravenna and Pentapolis, and to restore those States when taken from the Longobards, not to the Greek Empire, to which they belong'd, but to St. Peter and his Vicar: Stephen commended the generous Offer which he made of other Peoples Goods, and also enlarg'd upon the great Advantage it would be to the Salvation of his Soul; whereupon the Donation was agreed and sworn to by Pepin, who likewise made his two Sons Charles and Carloman confirm it.

This Promise of the future Donation, in case Pepin succeeded in driving the Longobards from the Exarchate of Ravenna and Pentapolis, comprehended only these States. Leo Ostiensis ² confounds what Anastasius Bibliothecarius wrote concerning the Donation made afterwards by Charles the Great to Pope Adrian, with this promis'd by Pepin to Pope Stephen. Anastasius relates ³ that Charles the Great confirm'd, and perform'd what Pepin his Father had promis'd, and rather added to his Father's Donation: he says that Charles by a new Instrument gave to S. Peter and his Vicar, many Cities and Territories in Italy, fixing the Boundaries from Luna a City of Tuscany, situated on the Borders of Liguria, with the Island of Corfica, to Sorano and Monte Bordone, including Vecetri, Parma, Reggio, Mantua, and Monfelic; together with the Exarchate of Ravenna, as it was anciently, with the Provinces of Venice and Istria; and all the Dukedoms of Spoletium and Beneventum. Leo ⁴, as the Abbot de Noce likewise observes ⁵, speaking in the eighth Chapter, of the Donation of Pepin, makes use of the very same Words of Anastasius, which relate to the Donation of Charles his Son; and when afterwards in the twelfth Chapter he treats of the Deeds of Charles, and of this his Donation, he does not name the Places and Cities, as Anastasius does; but as if Charles had done nothing else but only confirm'd that of Pepin, supposing, that that comprehended all those Places describ'd by him in the eighth Chapter, he says, that Charles, bono ac libenti animo aliam Donationis promissionem instar prioris describi præcepit. But that this Donation of Pepin comprehended nothing else but Pentapolis, and the Exarchate of Ravenna, which were to be taken from Astolphus, is evidently known by the Execution, which was perform'd by Pepin himself, when, as we shall relate, he came to Italy, and taking them from the Longobards, made a Present of them to the Apostolical See; Leo writes the same ⁶, that Pepin, simul cum præfato Romano Pontifice Italian veniens, & Ravennam, & viginti alias Civitates supradicto Aistulpho abstulit, & sub jure Apostolicæ sedis redegit.

WE are likewise convinc'd of this from the Chronicle of the Monastery of S. Clement, in the Island of Pescara, which we now read printed in the sixth Tome of Ugbellus's Italia Sacra; where relating the same Transactions of Pope Stephen with Pepin, we read that Pepin having driven out Astolphus, and freed Ravenna, gave it to St. Peter, with twenty other Cities. When afterwards this Author speaks of the Donation of Charles, he says, that this Prince restituit beato Petro, quæ Pater ejus dederat, & Desiderius abstulerat, addens etiam Ducatum Spoletanum & Beneventanum, &c. But how true that may be which Anastasius relates of the Donation of Charles the Great, making it to comprehend Corfica, the Dukedoms of Spoletium, Beneventum, Venice, Istria, and a great many other Places, never taken or possess'd by Charles, we shall see by-and-by, when we shall have Occasion to treat of it.

AS soon as these Articles were agreed to betwixt Stephen and Pepin; this Prince, the Pope having continu'd with him in France, immediately interpos'd his most earnest good Offices with Astolphus, which he thrice repeated, to persuade him to restore the Places he had taken; but neither Intreaties nor Threatnings prevailing, at last, spurr'd on by the Pope, he resolv'd to march into Italy against him with all his Forces; and being follow'd by Stephen, he forc'd the Passage of the Alps, put Astolphus's Army that oppos'd him to Flight, and follow'd them at the Heels to the Gates of Pavia, where he besieg'd him, and constrain'd him at last to accept of hard Conditions, obliging him to give Hostages, and promise to restore the Lands of the Church which he held in the Roman Dukedom; he took Ravenna from him, and twenty other Cities, and in this Year 754, he added them to the Dominion of St. Peter, and quickly return'd to France.

BUT Pepin was no sooner return'd to France, than Astolphus, little minding the Hostages which he had put into Pepin's Hands, and breaking all the Oaths he had made to him, came with all the Forces of his Kingdom, and laid Siege to Rome, after he had terribly destroy'd the Country about it. Stephen now seeing himself reduc'd to the last Extremity, had recourse to his Protector in the strongest and most moving Terms possible; he wrote him those three Letters which we have to this Day¹, in the most submissive Stile that can be imagin'd; and without any Precedent address'd him in the Name of St. Peter, to whom the Donation had been made, directing the Letters to the King, his two Sons, and all the States of France, after this manner: Petrus vocatus Apostolus a Jesu Christo Dei vivi Filio, &c. Viris excellentissimis Pipino, Carolo & Carlomanno tribus Regibus, &c. where he brings in the Apostle speaking thus, *Ego Petrus Apostolus dum a Christo, Dei vivi Filio, vocatus sum supernæ clementiæ arbitrio, &c.*² and conjures him in the Name of God to come to his Relief, otherwise he would be debarr'd from the Kingdom of God, and Life eternal, and so goes on in such a Strain as was most apt to affect a Christian Heart.

LESS than this would have suffic'd to oblige Pepin to have recourse again to Arms. He had already assembled his Forces on the first News of the Motion of Astolphus; and with them marching anew towards Italy, he defeated Astolphus's Army, which design'd to have disputed the Passage of the Alps with him, and threatening their utter Ruin if he continu'd the Undertaking, he oblig'd him to raise the Siege of Rome, which had already lasted three Months, and to throw himself into Pavia with the Remains of his Army.

IN the mean Time Constantinus Coproninus being advis'd of these Transactions about his Dominions between Stephen and Pepin, and that Astolphus had yielded the Exarchate of Ravenna to Pepin, in order to give it to the Pope, sent immediately two Ambassadors to King Pepin, requiring the Restitution of it as belonging to the Empire; they being at Marseilles, whither they had come from Rome with a Legate of the Pope, heard that Pepin had already pass'd the Alps, and defeated the Army of the Longobards; whereupon one of the two immediately made the best of his way to King Pepin, who was not far from Pavia, and ready to besiege it, while the other remain'd with the Legate.

THE Ambassador was immediately introduc'd to an Audience of the King, in which, after having extoll'd Pepin for the two Victories he had obtain'd over the Longobards, the common Enemies of the Empire and France, and commended his glorious Actions in the Name of his Prince, he open'd his Commission¹, and represented to him, that without Dispute the Exarchate belong'd to the Empire, and was usurped from it by Astolphus, who took all Opportunities of aggrandizing himself at the Cost of his Neighbours, while his Prince was making War against the Saracens; that since the King had retaken it from the Usurper, it was just that he should likewise restore to the Emperor what was his; that in fine, the Pope was his Subject, and that seeing he suffer'd him to enjoy peaceably whatever had been given him by the Emperors and private Persons, for maintaining his Dignity, it would not be a just Thing in him likewise to usurp the Lands of his Sovereign; for the rest, Constantine, who desir'd nothing but Justice, was most ready also to practise it on his Part; and that seeing the King had been already at great Expences in this War, he offer'd him all that he could desire of an Emperor who was equally liberal and thankful.

THIS new Embassy had no sooner been laid before Pepin, who foresaw what the Ambassador was to demand of him, than he very courteously answer'd him, That the Exarchate belong'd to the Conqueror of the Longobards, who had acquir'd it Jure Belli, as their Predecessors had done a great Part of Italy from the Greek Emperors; that it was also notoriously known, that the greatest Part of these People being forc'd to change their Religion, had yielded themselves to King Luitprandus; that thus supposing the Right of the Longobards, of which there was no more reason to doubt, than of that of the French who had conquer'd Gallia from the Romans and Westrogoths, he was very well assur'd of his Right; and seeing he had oblig'd Astolphus by Force of Arms to yield the Exarchate, of which he was going to take Possession by the same Means, he could dispose of it as he thought fit²: And had judg'd it proper to give the Dominion of it to the Pope, that the Catholick Faith, which had been polluted with so many infamous Heresies of the Greeks, might be preserv'd in it intire; and that the ambitious and covetous Longobards might not possess it; on which Considerations he had taken Arms against those who oppress'd the Church³; and that for all the Treasure in the World he would not alter his Resolution, and that he would maintain the Pope and the Church in the Possession of what he had given them against all the World.

THEREFORE having dismiss'd the Ambassador immediately, without suffering him to reply, he went and laid Siege to Pavia, which he invested so strongly, that Astolphus not being able to resist any longer, was oblig'd to beg Peace of him, which he obtain'd, on Condition that he would immediately perform the Conditions of the Treaty made the preceding Year, in delivering up the Cities of the Exarchate, of Emilia, now call'd Romagna, and of Pentapolis, which we call *Marca d'Ancona*⁴, into the Hands of Fulradus Abbot of S. Denis who was appointed Pepin's Commissioner. Which was readily perform'd by Commissioners likewise appointed by Astolphus: Fulradus having made all the Longobards to evacuate the Exarchate and all the other Places, and receiv'd Hostages in all the Cities, went and carried the Keys to the Pope, which he laid upon the Sepulchre of the Holy Apostles, with the Donation of Pepin attested with all the Solemnity and Forms requisite, and which he likewise caus'd to be subscrib'd by Pepin's two Sons Charles and Carloman, as also the principal Barons and Prelates of France. The Exarchate, if we may give Credit to *Sigonius*⁵, comprehended the Cities of Ravenna, Bologna, Imola, Faenza, Forlim Popoli, Forli, Cesena, Bobbio, Ferrara, Commacchio, Adria, Cervia, and Secchia. All which were delivered to the Pope except Faenza and Ferrara.

PENTAPOLIS, or Marca d'Ancona, comprehended Arimini, Pesaro, Conca, Fano, Sinigallia, Ancona, Osimo, Umana, now demolish'd, Jesi, Fossombrone, Montefeltro, Urbino, the Balnesean Territory, Cagli, Luceoli and Eugubio, with the Castles and Territories belonging to them, as appears from the special Grant of Lewis the Pious, by which this Donation of Pepin was confirm'd; of the Truth of which we shall speak in its Place.

THE Pope being enrich'd with so many Cities and Dominions, committed the Administration of the Exarchate to the Archbishop of Ravenna; whence some have wrote, that the Archbishops of that City took also the Title of Exarchs, not as Archbishops, but as Officers of the Pope, now a Temporal Prince. Thus did the Popes begin to be potent Lords in Italy, by adding Principality to the Priesthood, and the Scepter to the Keys. Wherefore the Donation of Constantine the Great, particularly with regard to Rome and Italy, by what we have said in the Second Book of this History, and by what the most learned Historians, Civilians and Divines hold as unquestionable, was a gross Fiction of a noted Impostor of the tenth Century; or, according to P. de Marca, much earlier, in the Times of Adrian and Charles the Great. Neither, how true soever we may suppose it to be, had it any Effect, for the Emperors, and other foreign Kings who succeeded to them, were always from that Time Lords of Italy and Rome. Neither did the Popes pretend to any Thing in Italy but those Patrimonies, which they possess'd by the Bounty of some Prince or private Person, given them for their Maintenance, as is said, and as all other Ecclesiasticks held theirs in other States over all Christendom. It was truly Pepin, after the Popes had paved so convenient Ways for making themselves deserve so well at his Hands, who from the Lowness of a mean Fortune, enrich'd them with the Spoils of the Longobard Kings, and the Greek Emperors, by giving them Cities and Provinces; and, if the Truth was own'd, he was most liberal of them, as generally all those People are, who are not profuse of their own, but of other Peoples Goods. These certainly belong'd to Constantine Emperor of the East; and, truly speaking, this Donation ought to have been made, not by Pepin, but by Constantine, whose Right they were: Whence some have written¹, that this Donation was made in the Name of Constantine; which gave Rise to the Fable of the Donation of Constantine the Great. From this Time forth the Popes left off in their Letters and Bulls, to take notice of the Years Piissimorum Augustorum, as formerly they had done. And being assur'd of the Protection of France, they renounc'd their Obedience to the Emperors of the East, and would no longer be deem'd his Subjects: On the other hand, the Greatness of the Popes was of such Advantage to Pepin, that it brought to his Son Charles who succeeded him, not only the Kingdom of Italy, by driving out the Longobards, but also the Empire of the West, which the Pope would restore in the Person of Charles, as we shall shew in the following Book.

THE French, tho' willing to be reputed Authors of the Greatness and Temporal Dominion of the Apostolical See, which cannot be deny'd them, yet contend, that the Popes had only the Dominium Utile of these Cities, which were given to the Church by Pepin; but that the Sovereignty remain'd in Pepin, and the other Kings of France his Successors, which Sigonius in his History cannot deny; it being manifest, say they, that the Descendants of Pepin had the sovereign Authority, which they exercis'd almost over all Italy. And that it was long after that the Popes became Sovereigns of Rome and these Provinces; not by the pretended Cession which Charles the Bald made of his Claim, Rights and Prerogatives, but by the Declining of the Empire, after it was confin'd to Germany alone, just as so many other Princes of Italy lawfully possess, at this Day, the Sovereignty which they have acquir'd in the West.

*PETER DE MARCA*², lets us see how, and upon what Foundations the Popes by degrees took upon them the Sovereignty of Rome, which was certainly not in these Times. He says, as the Exarchate of Ravenna was yielded to the Pope by Pepin, by the same Rule, the Superintendency and Government of Rome likewise belong'd to him, as it had done to the Exarch of Ravenna, to whom the Greek Dukedoms, and also that of Rome had been subject; the Sovereignty belong'd to the Emperors of the East, the Administration to the Exarchs: Whence the Popes as Exarchs pretended to it. But Pepin and Charles the Great being made Patricians of Rome, the Patriciate imported the having the Care of that City, and we shall see the Pope and the Patrician together taking Care of the Government of it, as Pope Adrian and Charles the Great did. After Adrian's Death, Leo III. who succeeded him, left the sole Administration to Charles, who from the Patrician was now rais'd to the Imperial Dignity, which carried the Sovereignty of Rome along with it, and the Popes no more intermeddled in the Government of it, till the Authority of the Emperors, Successors of Charles, by piece-meal declining in Italy, at last Charles the Bald, in the Year 876, yielded all his Claim and Sovereignty over Rome to the Apostolical See: Whence it is, that *Constantinus Porphyrogenitus*¹, describing the State of Europe in his Time, about the Year 914, says, that Rome held of the Popes Jure Domini; whence began the Custom of marking the Years of the Popes in their Bulls, whereas formerly the Years of the Princes and Emperors were mention'd.

THE Abbot John Vignoli in our latter Times, to wit, in the Year 1709, has publish'd a small Book, intitled, Antiquiores Pontificum Romanorum denarii, wherein, contrary to the Opinion of the French, he endeavours to demonstrate, that the Senate and People of Rome, after having thrown off the Yoke of the Emperors of the East, subjected themselves to the Roman Pontiffs, by acknowledging them for their Sovereigns; and that they not only had the Dominium Utile of Rome, but likewise the Directum. He pretends to prove it from the Coins yet extant of the Princes; and tho' there may be some more ancient ones, yet he confines himself to those that are still to be seen, struck under Adrian I. Leo III. and other Popes; and tho' some of them, such as those of Leo III. and other Popes, bear the Names of the Emperors, to wit, Charles the Great, Lewis, Otho, &c. as well as the Names of the Popes; yet this gave Occasion to Le Blanc a Frenchman, to compile a Treatise with this Title, An Historical Dissertation upon some Coins of Charles the Great, Lewis the Pious, Lothaire, and their Successors, coin'd in Rome; wherein he confutes the Opinion of those, who pretend, that these Princes never had any Authority in Rome, but by the Consent of the Popes; notwithstanding this, the said Abbot Vignoli endeavours to demonstrate, that a great deal of the Popes Money had not the Names of the Emperors, such as one Piece of John VIII. which is only mark'd with that of this Pope: However that may be, Le Blanc's Work shews how doubtful the Opinion of Vignoli is, and how much better founded that of the French is.

The Laws of Astolphus, and his Death.

ASTOLPHUS notwithstanding these Losses and Discouragements, turn'd his Thoughts towards the Preservation of his Kingdom; for this end he made new Laws, adding them to those of his Predecessors, which he chang'd and alter'd as the Circumstances of the Times requir'd; therefore in the fifth Year of his Reign, having assembled in Pavia from diverse Parts the chief Lords and Magistrates of his Kingdom, after the Example of his Predecessors, he publish'd an Edict by which he establish'd many Laws. We have likewise this Edict of Astolphus in the Code of the Monastery of the Cave intire, which contains Twenty-two Chapters; the first begins, Donationes illæ, quæ factæ sunt a Rachi Rege, & Tassia conjuge; the last has for Title, Si quis in servitium cujuscunque pro bona voluntate introierit. The Compiler of the Longobard Laws inserted some of these Laws in those Books: we read of three of them in the First Book; one under the Title De Scandalis; another under the Title De Exercitalibus; and another under this De Jure Mulierum: Fifteen in the Second Book, one under the fourth Title; another under that De Successionibus; another under the Title De Ultimis volunt. Another under Tit. 20.; two under the Title De Manumissionibus; two other under that De Præscriptionibus; and seven under the Title Qualiter quis se defendere deb. And in the Third Book we also read one under Tit. 10. which is the last of the Longobard Kings; for Desiderius his Successor, in whom the Kingdom was extinguish'd, and conquer'd by the French,
A a a a being being employ'd in more troublesome Affairs, could not provide the Kingdom, which he was unfortunately to relinquish, with other Laws.

BUT whilst this Prince, by cruel Necessity having surrendered the Exarchate, and so many other Cities, was altogether intent on contriving new Ways whereby to revenge himself of the Oppression of the French, and to renew the War; he went one Day a Hunting, and was assaulted by a wild Boar, or, as others relate, fell accidentally from his Horse, or, as Erchempertus says¹, was struck with a Dart; but however that may be, the Case was so fatal to him, that in a few Days he died without Issue, leaving the Kingdom in the Year 756, full of Calamities and Jealousies.

The Neapolitan Dukedom, Calabria, Brutium, and some other Maritime Cities of these our Provinces, continue in their Allegiance to the Emperor Constantine, and Leo his Son.

NOTWITHSTANDING the great Blow which the Emperors of the East had got in Italy, the Neapolitan Dukedom, which at this Time had extended itself beyond its Limits, comprehending likewise Amalphis; the Dukedom of Gaeta, almost all Calabria and Brutium; continu'd steadfast in its Allegiance to its ancient Princes, and altho' the Exarchate was lost, and all that was subject to the Greek Empire in Italy, yet the Emperors of the East continued to have Dominion in these our Provinces. The Neapolitans remain'd under the Command of their Dukes, who were likewise call'd Masters of the Soldiers, a Title given the Dukes under the Emperors of the East¹. This was a Greek Magistrate, who was sent from Constantinople. Theodore was such in this Century in the Year 717, who left a Monument of himself in this City, being said to be the Founder of the Church of SS. Peter and Paul, now demolish'd, as was read on a Stone which was formerly there, and now in the Church of Donnaromata. Exbilaratus bore the same Office in Naples; as also did about this Time, after the Death of Astolphus, Stephen, who govern'd this Dukedom twelve Years, and after his Wife's Death, was likewise made Bishop of this City.

WHILST Stephen govern'd Naples in the Quality of Duke, the Emperor Constantine, as is said, call'd a Council in the Year 753, in Constantinople, of 338 Bishops, in which Council they made a Decree against the Worship of Images; Constantine and Leo his Son, who was associated with him in the Empire, by means of their Edicts supported the Decree, and likewise employ'd Force in making it to be observ'd over all the East; they also attempted to have it put in Execution in the West, whence arose those Disorders and Revolts which we have seen; by which the Contentions became more fierce, and the Enmity betwixt the Popes and the Em-perors of the East was the more exasperated: In this Year 757, Pope Stephen dying, was succeeded by Paul. He was no less hated than his Predecessors had been by the Emperors of the East, who endeavour'd to get the Decree of this Council likewise to be obey'd in the Dukedom of Naples; and all the other Places which had continu'd steadfast in their Allegiance to them. The Neapolitans, tho' averse to its being put in Execution, as being more addicted to the Worship of Images than any other People of Italy; nevertheless, that they might not be charg'd with Disobedience, were careful in all other Things to shew their Respect, and exact Adherence to the Will and Authority of their Sovereigns; insomuch, that their Bishop Calvus dying at this Time, and Paul a great Friend and Intimate of the Pope's being ordain'd Bishop of Naples by him, the Emperor excepted against him as an Adherent of the Pope's, forbidding him to be receiv'd into that Church, as one that had rendered all his Designs of having the Decree of the Council of Constantinople receiv'd in Naples abortive. In this the Neapolitans adhered to the Will of the Emperor and the Greeks, and stopp'd Paul from going to Rome to be consecrated by the Pope: Nine Months after, Paul went privately to Rome, where the Pope immediately consecrated him; but being returned to Naples, as Joannes Diaconus in his Chronicle of the Bishops of this City, relates, the Neapolitans would not receive him into the City, but having call'd a Council amongst themselves, they ordered him to go to the Church of S. Januarius, not far from the City, where he remain'd for the Space of 2 Years; in the mean Time the Clergy as well as the People generally obey'd him, and own'd him as their Pastor, and he dispos'd of all Matters relating to the Church without any Controul, and perform'd all the Episcopal Functions. At last the Nobles perceiving that by the Absence of their so worthy Pastor, the City languish'd, resolv'd to bring him into it, and with much Rejoycing and Solemnity went to receive him, and put him in Possession of his Bishoprick, who govern'd this Church for other two Years, and died. They excus'd themselves to the Emperor, by alledging, that they could no longer bear the Vacancy of their Church.

BY the Death of Paul, the Neapolitans in the Year 746, elected the said Duke Stephen for their Bishop; who altho' he was elected Bishop, did not quit the Dukedom, but govern'd it together with his Son Cesarius, whom he had made his Collegue. Cesarius died before his Father, so that Stephen govern'd it alone until the Year 791, in which he died. Theophylactus succeeded him in the Dukedom. He was his Son-in-Law, having marry'd his Daughter Euprassia. *Antimius*¹ succeeded to Theophylactus in the End of this Century, of whom 'tis said, that during his Consulship he built the Church of S. Paul the Apostle in Naples, and the Monastery of SS. Quiricus and Julitta. These were the Dukes who govern'd the Neapolitan Dukedom in this eighth Century for the Emperors of the East, to whom it was subject. They were likewise call'd Consuls. But how the Dukes of Naples came to be call'd Consuls, none of our Writers, so far as I know, have had the Curiosity to inquire into the Reason of it.

THE Title of Consul, which was had in so great Esteem by the Roman Emperors, and afterwards by those of the East, and which they look'd upon as an Honour to themselves, about the latter End of the Greek Empire, was at last altogether slighted by them and left off. What made them lay it aside was, because they saw the Princes, whom they reputed Barbarians and Usurpers of the Empire, make use of it. Charles the Great, to shew that he succeeded to all the Rights and Privileges of the ancient Emperors of the West, amongst his other Titles assum'd this to himself; the other French Emperors his Successors did the same: After their Example the Italian Emperors Berengarius Duke of Friuli, and Guido Duke of Spoletium took it likewise². In fine, even the Saracens after they had conquer'd Spain, in Imitation of the Emperors of Constantinople, would likewise be call'd Consuls. Abderamus King of the Saracens in Spain, who began to reign in Cordova in the Year 821. Mahomet his Son and Successor in the Kingdom, as the Works of S. Eulogius assure us³, in their Writs, mark'd not only the Years of their Empire, but likewise of their Consulship. But in the ninth Age of the Church, as the Emperors of the East made other honorary Consuls, so the Saracen Kings not only call'd themselves Consuls, but likewife the chief Magistrates of their Kingdom did the same¹: Whence it came to pass, that according to the Greek Vanity, which could not bear that such a specious Title should be usurp'd by foreign and barbarous Nations, the Emperors slighted it so much, by giving it to their inferior Magistrates, that at last, as the most accurate *Pagi*² proves, they left it off altogether about the Year 933; and only a Shadow and Image of that Dignity and Title was continued in many of their Officers, and was at last attributed even to private Persons.

THE Saracens were wont to give this Title to their Sea Admirals, whence afterwards it came to be given to those who had the Inspection of the Ports and Sea-Ports; and *Codinus*³, *Pachimeres*⁴, and *Gregoras*⁵ observe, that the Pisan and Anconitan Magistrates, who stay'd in Constantinople, were call'd Consuls. From whence comes the Consulship of the Sea; and from whence in the Authors of the later Ages, mentioned in the Glossary of Dufresne, we see it dispersed in Communities, amongst Judges and different Orders of Persons, down to Tradesmen. It ought not then to seem a new and strange Thing, if in this eighth Century, the Title of Consul, peculiar to the Emperors, and formerly so illustrious and renown'd, be given to the Dukes of Naples, who were Officers of the Greek Empire, to which this Dukedom was subject.

CHAP. IV.

Of Desiderius the last King of the Longobards.

Y the Death of Astolphus, who left no Issue, the Throne continu'd vacant, because Rachis his Brother, tho' alive, was become Monk. Desiderius Duke of Tuscany, whom Astolphus, besides his having that Dukedom, had likewise made Constable of the Kingdom, laid hold of this Opportunity to get himself proclaim'd King, by the Votes of his Tuscan Longobards. Rachis having heard this, was fill'd with Indignation, and gave way to such Extravagancy, that at any rate he would leave the Monastery, renounce Monachism, and return to his Kingdom; there were not wanting some who encourag'd him in this Resolution, and endeavour'd to have it take Effect: But Desiderius having recourse to Pope Stephen, to whom he offer'd as a Recompence, if he would assist him at this Juncture, Faenza, Ancona, Secchia, and Ferrara, Cities which had not been restor'd by Astolphus; the Pope had so much Influence on Rachis, that at last he made him easy, and lay aside his Resolution of leaving the Monastery; and as a Reward for his Mediation, receiv'd from Desiderius the promised Cities; and after Desiderius had been but a short Time fix'd in his Kingdom, Stephen ended his Days the 26th of April of this Year 757. A Pope, to whom the Church of Rome was much more beholden than to his Predecessors; he by his Management had enlarg'd it with so many fine Cities and States, and left its Affairs in so prosperous a Condition, that his Successors did not fail to improve it, as Paul did who succeeded him, and after him another Stephen; but Adrian much more, who by Treaties which he made with Charles the Great, brought its Power to a yet higher Pitch, as we shall see by-and-by.

DESIDERIUS

DESIDERIUS after he had reign'd two Years, would follow the Example of his Predecessors, in taking Adelgisus his Son for Collegue; but it was not long before Pope Stephen III. or be it IV. who succeeded to Paul, suspecting his Proceedings, and believing that all his Motions were in Prejudice of his Dominions, the usual Suspicions, and the accustom'd Jealousy arose betwixt them: At last it came to an open Rupture. King Desiderius having caus'd the Archbishoprick of Ravenna to be conferr'd on a certain Michael his Confident and Domestick, Stephen drove him from that See. The King out of Revenge order'd the Eyes of Cristophanus and Sergius, who had been sent by the Pope to Pavia, to demand the Estates which belong'd to the Church of Rome, to be put out; and foreseeing where these Disputes would end, sought to make a strit Alliance with the French, that they might not so readily give Ear to the continual Sollicitations of the Popes: At this Time Pepin was already dead, and his Sons Charles and Carloman had divided the Kingdom betwixt them; who, tho' they agreed well enough at first, yet afterwards became more jealous of one another. Desiderius reckon'd it would be a Security for him to enter into Affinity with these two Princes, by offering them his two Daughters in Marriage. Stephen having understood this, immediately wrote a very pithy Letter to Charles and Carloman, in order to dissuade them from these Marriages, threatening if they consented, *Anathematis vinculum, & æterni cum diabolo incendii pœnam*¹. But in spite of all he could do, they happily married the two Sisters, both Daughters of King Desiderius, who understood so well how to gain Bertrada the Mother of Charles and Carloman, that by her Persuasion the Marriages were concluded. The Displeasure of the Pope was no less than the Pleasure of Desiderius, who believ'd that by these Means he had put a stop to his getting Assistance. But this Alliance did not continue long, for there were not wanting Means to bring it about, that Charles should divorce the Princess his Spouse, under pretence of having found out an Infirmary in her, which made her incapable of having Children; neither was there wanting the Assistance and Authority of the Laws to support so strange a Fact, there being many Bishops ready to declare the Marriage null, and to allow Charles the Year following to marry Ildegarda of Suevia. King Desiderius was greatly incens'd at this Divorce, and the Death of Carloman happening soon after, Queen Berta being left a Widow with two Sons, and afraid that she was not safe in France, and that Charles might take an Opportunity of destroying his Nephews, as he had robb'd them of the Kingdom, went rashly and put herself and her two Sons under the Protection of Desiderius her Father, who willingly took hold of this Opportunity, in order to be able some Time or other to revenge himself upon Charles, for having a little before sent him back his Daughter.

DESIDERIUS, having the Sons of Carloman in his Hands, endeavour'd to form a powerful Party, and to divide and disconcert France, that being taken up with its own Misfortunes, it might not be in a Condition to mind the Affairs of Italy. In the mean time Stephen dying, Adrian I. was elected in the Year 772, who in the Beginning of his Pontificate treated of a Peace with Desiderius; and they agreed betwixt themselves not to disturb one another; therefore Desiderius believing that this new Pope would be of different Sentiments from his Predecessors, thought for the more easily attaining his Ends, to persuade him to consecrate the two Sons of Carloman Kings; he left no Stone unturn'd, both by Prayers and Promises, to oblige him to come and anoint the two young Princes, and to get them to be acknowledged Kings of Austrasia. After the Example of Pepin and his Sons, the Ceremony of Anointing had by Degrees been introduc'd amongst Christian Princes, which by the People was reputed a Mark and Token of Principality; and that those who had been anointed, ought to be acknowledg'd for just and lawful Kings, and by all own'd as such. But Adrian, who inwardly was harbouring the same Maxims with his Predecessors, and was no less suspicious of the Power of the Longobards in Italy, would by no means disgust King Charles, but was always Proof against the continual Instigations of Desiderius; therefore he being much offended, and at last losing all Patience, believing that he should be able to obtain by Force, what he had not succeeded in by Intreaties, invaded the Exarchate, and in an instant having taken Ferrara, Comachio, and Faenza, design'd to lay Siege to Ravenna. Adrian did not fail to smooth him by his Legates, and to endeavour to get Restitution by their Means, of the Cities; neither would Desiderius have been obstinate in refusing to do it, provided that the Pope would have come himself, with whom he was desirous to speak, and treat of a Peace. But Adrian rejecting the Invitation, and all Treaties, was obstinately resolv'd never to appear before him, until first he had got Restitution of the Cities he had seiz'd. Thus by Degrees the Popes began to deny that Respect and Honour to the Kings of Italy, which formerly their Predecessors vouchsafed to bestow upon them. Desiderius being more provok'd at this haughty Proceeding of Adrian, immediately commanded his Army to march into Pentapolis, where he ravag'd Sinigaglia, Urbino, and many other Cities of the Patrimony of St. Peter, even to the Neighbourhood of Rome. This was what hasten'd the fatal Ruin of the Longobards; for Adrian did not fail to have his recourse to France, and not only to demand Assistance from Charles, but also to invite that Prince to come and conquer Italy; and because the Longobards had stopp'd all the Passages by Land, he sent a Legate by Sea to urge his coming.

ON the other hand, Desiderius did not fail, as soon as he was advis'd of this recourse, to shew King Charles the Inclination, which, he said, he had always had to live in Peace with Adrian, complaining grievously of his Obstinacy, that he having offer'd him Peace, and desir'd to speak with him, the Pope refus'd to comply; and besides he did not neglect by his Letters to sundry Princes, and publick Manifesto's, to defend himself against the Accusations of Adrian, who had represented him to the French as the Destroyer of Tuscany, as barbarous, inhumane, fierce, cruel; and accused him as guilty of many Crimes: So that in order to purge himself of these Accusations, Desiderius found it necessary to send Ambassadors into France to Charles, to assure him that he had settled Peace with the Pope, and given him back all that he could pretend to.

BUT Charles, who wanted nothing more than so fair an Opportunity of revenging himself upon Desiderius, who by keeping his Nephews, did all he could to divide his Kingdom, and who could not expect to have a better Occasion of driving the Longobards out of Italy, receiv'd the Invitation made by Adrian with incredible Satisfaction. He was at this Time (on account of the so many Victories which he had gain'd in Aquitain, and in Saxony) famous and formidable in Thionville on the Banks of the Moselle; there he receiv'd the Pope's Legate, and withal gave Audience to the Ambassadors of Desiderius, of whom he soon rid himself, by sending them back without concluding any thing: He accepted of the Pope's Proposal with much pleasure, and immediately putting himself at the Head of a powerful Army, forced his Passage over the Alps at two different Places, by cutting in pieces the Longobards that oppos'd him.

DESIDERIUS on the other hand made haste himself in Person with his Army to stop him; but being met by Charles, the main Body of his Army was defeated, and forc'd to retire, whereupon he resolv'd to defend himself in Pavia, in which he shut himself up. Charles immediately laid close Siege to it; and in the mean time with a Part of his Army assaulted Verona, into which City Adalgisus had retir'd in order to defend it, together with Berta and her two Sons. When this Prince saw himself straiten'd, despairing of his Father's Condition, and of being able to defend the Place, he chose to leave it and fly, rather than to fall into the Hands of Charles, and after having wander'd up and down for a long Time, seeing at last, that all was lost to the Longobards, he made his Escape by Sea to Constantinople, where he was receiv'd by the Emperor Leo, Son of Copronimus, with much Satisfaction, and entertain'd by him. As soon as the People of Verona saw Adalgisus leave the Place, they surrender'd to Charles, who taking Berta and her two Sons, sent them immediately to France, and it was never known what became of these two unhappy Princes afterwards. All the other Cities of the Longobards being subverted by the Means and Contrivance of the Pope, yielded of themselves to Charles. Pavia only held out, which being defended by Desiderius, continu'd still in its Allegiance.

CHARLES having laid close Siege to Pavia, would go to Rome to keep the Feast of Easter; the Excess of Gladness which Adrian discover'd, the Honours which were done him by the Romans and the Clergy, every Thing being directed by the Pope, were incredible. He was proclaim'd King of France and of the Longobards at the same Time, and a Patrician of Rome, being met a Mile without the Gates of Rome, and receiv'd by all the Nobility and Magistrates, and by the Clergy in their several Orders, carrying Crosses, and singing Hymns. After the Rejoicings and Fasting they came to the main Point, Charles was requir'd by the Pope to confirm the Donations which Pepin his Father had made to the Church of Rome; which he did most frankly, and with a good Will, causing Eterius his Notary to draw up a new Instrument of Confirmation, subscrib'd by himself, by all the Bishops and Abbots, by the Dukes and Great Men that had come along with him, Super Altare B. Petri manu propria posuit, according to Ostiensis ¹.

ANASTASIUS BIBLIOTHECARIUS, as is said, magnifies this Donation of Charles very much; and to the Exarchate of Ravenna and Pentapolis, he adds the Island of Corfica, all that large Country which from Luna stretching along into Sorano and Monte Bordone, comprehends Vercetri, Parma, Reggio, Mantua, and Monfelize; the Provinces of Venice and Istria; and the Dukedom of Beneventum and Spoletium. The Chronicle of the Monastery of St. Clement relates, that Charles added to the Donation of Pepin only these two Dukedoms. Sigonius afterwards, and other more modern Writers, are not satisfy'd with that, they add the Sabinian Territory, situated betwixt Umbria and Latium, part of Tuscany and likewise of Campania. Peter de Marca ², which is wonderful, who also writes like the vain-glorious French, who so much magnify this Donation, in order to cry up the French Generosity, adds all Campania, and with it the City of Naples, Aprutium, and also Puglia; pointing by that at the Origin of our Papal Investiture. Others add to these Saxony likewise, at this Time subdued by Charles; moreover that he also gave away Provinces which were not his own, and which he never acquir'd, to wit, Sardinia and Sicily; and that of all these Provinces and Dukedoms, he only reserv'd the Sovereignty to himself. But neither the ancient Annals of France, nor the Series of subsequent Matters, nor the Archives of the Vatican have ever been able to shew us the Instrument of this Donation, on which many others of less Consequence depend; which is a Demonstration that all these Relations are fabulous, and that Charles did no more than confirm Pepin's Donation of the Exarchate and Pentapolis. Yet some again have written, that he likewise augmented it, because he made many Places of the Exarchate and Pentapolis which were possess'd by the Longobards, together with the Patrimonies which the Church of Rome had in the Dukedoms of Spoletium and Beneventum, in Tuscany, Campania, and elsewhere, which were likewise possess'd by the Longobards, to be restor'd. And in this Sense Paulus Æmilius ³, and other Authors have said, that Charles not only confirm'd the Gifts of Pepin his Father, but likewise augmented them; of which the History of Things that fell out afterwards is a convincing Proof; for Charles under the Name of the Kingdom of Italy possess'd Liguria, Corfica, Æmia, the Provinces of Venice, and of the Alpes Cottiae, Piemont, and the Genouese Country, which he had taken from the Longobards, and added to his own Dominions; neither do we read that this Part of Italy had ever been in the Possession of the Popes.

THIS will more evidently appear when we find that these three famous Dukedoms of Friuli, Spoletium, and our Beneventum were never in the Possession of the Popes; as shall be clearly shewn in the following Book of this History, to wit, that these three Dukedoms had their own Dukes; neither did Charles pretend to any Thing in them, but that Sovereignty which the Longobard Kings his Predecessors had had; but our Dukes of Beneventum threw off the Yoke altogether by denying any Allegiance to him, and liv'd free and independant; and it was very many Years after, that the City of Beneventum was exchang'd with the Church of Bamberg, and given to the See of Rome, but not the Dukedom, which was always possess'd by our Princes.

FROM Charles's having caus'd the Patrimonies which the Church of Rome possess'd in the Alpes Cottiae, the Dukedom of Spoletium and Beneventum to be restor'd, arose the Mistake of those Writers, who by confounding the Alpes Cottiae with the Province, the Patrimony of Beneventum with the Dukedom, have written that Charles gave these Dukedoms and that Province to St. Peter: So that what we read in S. Adrian's Letters concerning the Dukedoms of Spoletium and Beneventum being given to St. Peter, ought to be understood of nothing else but these Patrimonies; as when the Emperor Lewis the Pious, Otho III. and the other Otho, King of Germany, confirm'd the Beneventan, Salernitan, and Neapolitan Patrimonies, to Paschal I. and John XXII. as also the Emperor Henry IV. did to Paschal II. they meant nothing else but these Lands and Possessions, which the Roman Church, as the Patrimony of St. Peter, possess'd in these our Provinces, which our ancient Writers call'd Jusitias Ecclesiæ ¹. Therefore only the Exarchate of Ravenna, Pentapolis, and some other Places of the Roman Dukedom, became subject to the Dominion of the Church of Rome, Charles reserving the Sovereignty to himself; but in Rome itself, and the Roman Dukedom, there were in these Times Vestiges remaining of the Dominion of the Emperors of the East, who, weak as they were, kept always their Officers there, and were likewise acknowledg'd as Sovereigns until the Time of Leo III. the Successor of Adrian, that the People of Rome put themselves under the Allegiance and Subjection of King Charles, whom they raised from a Patrician to be Roman Emperor. I do not mention the Islands of Sicily and Sardinia, which were never conquer'd by Charles, but were long in the Possession of the Greek Emperors, till the Saracens robb'd them of them.

CHARLES then having thus satisfy'd the Pope and the Romans, return'd to the Camp before Pavia: Having nothing more to do but to reduce this City under his Obedience, he employ'd all his Power in order to make himself Master of it, because it being the chief City of the Kingdom, and once in his Hands, the Lombards would give over all Hopes of getting Footing again in the lost Cities. Therefore he besieg'd it more closely, stopping all the Passages by which it could expect Relief. Desiderius held it out to the utmost Extremity, the People being not only afflicted with Famine, but also with the Plague, which still consum'd them; at last in the Year 774, he was forc'd to surrender the Place, himself, his Wife and Children, to the Discretion of Charles, who sent them all to France, where they ended their Days in Corbie, never after having been heard of. Thus in one Campaign Charles made himself Master of the greatest Part of Italy, but not of these Provinces of which our Kingdom is now compos'd, nor of the Dukedoms of Beneventum and Naples, nor of the other Cities of Calabria and Brutium, which remain'd long under the Dominion of the Emperors of the East, as we shall see in the following Book.

THUS the Popes began to transfer Kingdoms from one People to another; whence it came to pass, that the same Footsteps being more cunningly and dextrously follow'd by their Successors, they became terrible to Princes, who in order to have them for their Friends, little minding the Sovereignty of their Dominions, and their own Dignity, subjected themselves to them so as to become their Vassals, and Tributaries to that See. Thus likewise ended the Kingdom of the Lombards in Italy; a Kingdom, tho' in its Beginning rude and unpolish'd, yet afterwards it became so mild and civiliz'd, that for the Space of Two hundred Years that it lasted, it was envied by all other Nations. Italy being once accusom'd to the Government of the Lombard Kings, did not look upon them any more as Strangers, but as its own natural Princes; for they had no other Kingdoms or Dominions in any other Part of the World, but Italy was now become their own Country; for which Reason it could not be said to be in Slavery, and ruled by a foreign Nation, as it was afterwards, when, by deplorable and frequent Changes, it was subjected to various Nations, and groan'd long under the heavy Yoke of Bondage. It was truly a wonderful Thing, says Paul Warnefride ², and also the Abbot of Wesperg, that in the Kingdom of the Lombards there was no Violence committed, no Treason hatch'd, no Body unjustly dispossest, none oppress'd with Taxes; there were no Robberies, no Theft, every Body went whither he pleas'd most secure. The Popes, and especially Adrian, who could not abide to see them in Italy, as being a

People who endeavour'd to break all their Measures, describ'd them to the World as cruel, inhumane, and barbarous; whence it was, that amongst the People and Writers of the following Century, they got the Name of unciviliz'd and cruel. But their very prudent and just Laws, which consuming Time hath left us, are sufficient Documents of their Humanity, Justice, and civil Prudence. It hath far'd with them as it did with the Roman Laws, that tho' the Empire was ruin'd, yet their Authority and Force were the same in the new Dominions which were establish'd in Europe; even so, tho' the Kingdom of the Longobards was at an End, yet their Laws remain'd in Force in Italy.

C H A P. V.

Although the Longobards were expell'd Italy, yet their Laws were preserv'd in it. Their Justice and Wisdom.

ALTHO' the Laws of the Longobards came short of the Roman, yet if we should put them into the Ballance with those of other Nations, which since the Fall of the Empire have had Dominion in Europe; they will be found to excel them all, if we consider either the Utility and Justice of them, the prudent Methods they took to establish them, or the Judgment of the most grave and prudent Writers who have commended them. The Methods they took, and the great Prudence and Maturity which their Kings practis'd when they had a Mind to establish them, deserve all Praise and Commendation. They, as we have seen, first conven'd the States of the Kingdom, to wit, the Nobles and Magistrates in Pavia; the Ecclesiastical State was not known amongst them, neither had it Place in the publick Deliberations; as little had the Commonalty, which as Cæsar said, speaking of the Gauls, Nulli adhibebatur Consilio: There they maturely and diligently examin'd what was most just and profitable; and that being once establish'd, was afterwards publish'd by their Kings in their Edicts. A Method, according to the Opinion of *Hugo Grotius*¹, perhaps better than what the Roman Emperors themselves took, whose Laws depending solely on their Will, which was liable to be impos'd upon and byass'd, occasion'd so much Inconstancy and Alterations, that we see Justinian alone, in one and the very same Thing, has alter'd his Opinion and Judgment three or four times. It was a Custom amongst the Longobards, before they made Edicts for publishing their Laws, to examine and discuss them by the States of the Kingdom; by which they reap'd many Advantages. First, that there was no Danger of their establishing any Thing that would prove hurtful to the Publick, when there were so many Eyes, and so many prudent Men present, from whom the Harm that might result, could not be conceal'd. Secondly, That what was establish'd by common Consent, was with a willing Mind observ'd by all. And lastly, That they were not so liable to be alter'd, but when a most urgent Cause requir'd it; as we have seen done by Rotaris's Successors, who, facto periculo, and after long Experience, knowing some of the Laws of their Predecessors to be a little harsh and severe, and not well adapted to their Times, which were become more docile and civiliz'd, alter'd and chang'd them, with the Advice of the States. Which wise and prudent Custom is highly praised and commended in the Sædes, a Northern People, by that wise Lady Brigid, to whom we now pay the Honours which are only due to Saints.

IF then we will consider the Justice and Utility, especially of those Laws which are adapted to the Affairs and Business of private Men, and their Security, such as Matrimony, Guardianship, Contracts, Alienations, Testaments, the Successions to those who die without making Wills, and the Security of Possessions; we cannot but reckon them both useful and prudent.

IN the second Book of that Volume¹, there are many provident Laws concerning Matrimony which are admir'd. The Well-dispos'd was not to be join'd to the Libertine, nor the Noble to the Ignoble; whence the Widows of Kings, who were of a Rank superior to all, did not match with any but those of Royal Dignity. But Justinian took Theodora from the Stage, to the great Dishonour of Princely Dignity. Those who were not born of lawful Wedlock, were not made Knights, nor admitted into the Magistracy, nor even to be Witnesses. Extravagant Gifts betwixt Man and Wife were forbidden; therefore most wise was that Law of Luitprandus, which put a Stop to the Morning Gifts which the Husbands were wont to give to their Wives the first Morning after their Marriage, which the Longobards call'd *Morgongap*²; the Husbands frequently, being inflam'd with Love, and intic'd with the Allurements of their new Spoules, were wont to give them all: *Luitprandus*³ prohibited so great Extravagancy, and ordain'd that they should not exceed the fourth Part of their Substance. And from the Example related by Du Cange, we see, that throughout the whole eleventh Century this Law was observ'd. And 'tis truly new and singular what the Abbot Fontani relates in his Book against P. Germonius, which he publish'd from Private Memoirs in the Year 1162, that a certain Folco, of Civildale in Friuli, gave to his Wife Gerlunt all he had, Omnia sua propter pretium in mane quando surrexit de lecto. Adulteries were severely punish'd. Marriages betwixt Kindred, according to the Prescription, not only of the Civil but of the Canon Laws, were prohibited; and *Luitprandus*⁴ himself bears Witness, that he was mov'd likewise to forbid them by his Laws, Quia, as he says, Deo teste, Papa urbis Romæ, qui in omni mundo caput Ecclesiarum Dei, & Sacerdotum est, per suam Epistolam nos adhortatus est, ut tale Conjugium fieri nullatenus permetteremus.

SOME are scandaliz'd, that in this second Book of the Laws of the *Longobards*⁵, Concubinage should be allow'd, it being forbidden to have at the same Time a Wife and a Concubine, as much as to have two Wives, all Polygamy being also prohibited amongst the Longobards. But besides that this Law was made by the Emperor Lotharius, and not by any of the Longobard Kings; this Wonder arises from the not knowing that amongst the Romans Concubinage was lawful⁶, and not only tolerated, but allow'd, and therefore it was call'd Semimatrimum, and the Concubine was on that account call'd *Semiconjux*⁷; and the Man might lawfully have for his Companion either a Wife or a Concubine, but not at the same Time both a Wife and a Concubine, because that was reckon'd Polygamy, as much as the having two Wives⁸. This Custom was likewise continu'd afterwards, when by the Means of Constantine the Great, the Empire had embrac'd our Religion, who tho' he put a Restraint upon Concubinage, yet he did not abolish it; and it was retain'd for many Ages by the Christians of many Nations of Europe; of which among others, a Council of Toledo makes us certain, where it was likewise enacted, that a Man, whether he be of the Laity or of the Clergy, shall content himself with one, either a Wife or a Concubine, but not to keep them both at the same time⁹. But tho' the Latin Church afterwards forbad Priests to marry, and consequently to keep Concubines, yet seeing the Ecclesiasticks, because of their Incontinency could not live single, they still kept Concubines. In order to abolish this Custom, their keeping of them was severely prohibited in several Councils; these Prohibitions had little Effect, and came to no account, so little were they observ'd; and the Priests could by no means wean themselves from this Practice, therefore the Prohibitions were repeated: There was not a Council that met, which did not with severe Threats always urge the same, hating Concubinage, and declaring openly that it was worse than Adultery, Incest, and more heinous than any other Vice: Whence in the following Age, the Name of Concubinage, which formerly had been reputed lawful, became odious and horrible, as much as it is at this Day. In the Kingdom of Italy, not only under the Longobards, but likewise when it came under the Dominion of the French, this Practice still continu'd. Concubinage was also reputed lawful amongst other Nations of Europe; and Cujacius testifies, that likewise in his Time, it was kept up amongst the Gascons and other People near the Pyrenean Mountains ¹. In the East Concubinage was prohibited by the Novellæ of Basilius of Macedon ², and of Leo; but these had no Force in the Provinces of Europe, which had shaken off the Yoke of the Empire, and obey'd their own Princes, independantly of the Emperors of the East; which would require to be treated of apart, but thus far is sufficient for our Purpose.

THERE was prudent Provision made concerning Guardianship; the Pupils were equally intrusted with the Kindred of the Father and of the Mother; but the King was the principal Tutor to noble Pupils ³: Whence proceeded the Law amongst us, by which the King appointed the Guardians of Barons, and the Writs of Guardianship were taken from him. They likewise gave to Women a perpetual Tutor on account of their Weakness, whom they call'd Mundualdo, who was much the same with that Tutor among the ancient Romans, under whose Authority the Women were, of what Age soever, and even tho' married; whence it is, that to this Day in some Places of our Kingdom there is some Vestige thereof remaining.

AS to Contracts, Equity and Justice was the main Scope, the Contracts of those come to Age, which Age of Majority was compleat at eighteen Years, were very firm, and not liable to Restitution. Creditors and Buyers were secure against being deceiv'd and deluded by tacit Hypothecs, or Mortgages, or by private Trustees; forasmuch as all Contracts, Sales, Pledges, and also Wills were executed in the Sight and Presence of the Magistrates, and in the View of the People. The Method of succeeding to those that died without making Wills was most plain; he that was nearest of Kin, was the same as the Heir, except only that the Children and their Descendants were prefer'd to Parents.

LAW Suits, which amongst the Romans were very expensive and troublesome, amongst the Longobards were soon determin'd, and not chargeable. The Forwardness of the Litigious was curb'd by Pledges and Sequestrations. Nothing was more easy and expeditious for the Judges; in Controversies about Matters of Fact the Plaintiff carried his Witnesses with him, and the Defendant his, and he gain'd the Cause who had the greatest Number and Authority on his Side. In doubtful and ambiguous Cases, they had recourse to the Sanctity of Oaths, which were administered to the Defendant, but with great Caution; that is to say, he produc'd Witnesses of his good Fame, who gave Oath, and attested his Probity and Religion, and that they themselves, without scruple, would give Credit to his Oath ⁴. It was seldom that there happen'd Questions of Law, and if there did, they were decided, not from the infinite Volumes of Interpreters, but from the plain and simple Meaning of their Laws, and the just and reasonable Part of them. The Remedy against being disturb'd in Possession was ready, and the Restitution quick, the Judge going to the Place to view the Damage, immediately gave Reparation.

IN taking Cognizance of Criminal Matters there were two Things wisely observ'd. The Violation of the Rights of Society, and of those of private Persons: For the last, there were two Penalties appointed; by the one the private Damage was repair'd, which they call'd Wedrigeldum, that is to say, what was given by Retaliation; by the other the Publick Peace was repair'd, which they on that account call'd Fedra, and it was given to the King, or the Community of any City. Hugo Grotius ⁵ commends this Custom of their not shedding the Blood of the People on slight Occasions, but only for heinous and capital Crimes and Offences. The lesser Crimes were compounded for Money, or the guilty Person was to be under Servitude to the Offended.

THE Estates of condemn'd Persons were safe to their Children, and were not liable to Confiscation. In criminal Cases they admitted of no Appeals, which did not surprize Grotius, because it ought to be so in other Cases, seeing that Equals were conscientiously and gently judg'd in the Courts by their Peers. Whence came that Law among us, that in Capital Cases Barons could not be judg'd but by those whom we call Pares Curiae.

THE Rites and Solemnities which they made use of in Manumissions and Adoptions were conformable to their Manners, bold and warlike. Manumissions, as Paul Warnefride relates, were made per Sagittam, Adoptions per Arma, as Alienations were per glebæ Festucæve conjectionem in sinum emptoris.

THAT ancient Custom of the Longobards displeas'd many, that in some doubtful and ambiguous Cases, and for heinous Offences, they committed the Decision of them to a single Combat, which they call'd a Duel. The Duel was truly a very ancient Custom amongst the Longobards, which afterwards passing into a Law, was for a long Time practis'd, not only by them, but by many other Nations who learn'd it from the Longobards. In effect, their History is full of these Duels; that of Adalulphus was remarkable, who had accus'd Queen Gundeberta of Adultery¹, and failing in the Proof, he, in order to be reveng'd of her, had recourse to Arioaldus her first Husband, to whom he accus'd her falsely, that she with Datus Duke of Tuscany had conspir'd against his Life and Kingdom, which caus'd that unfortunate Princess to be imprison'd. At which Clotbarius King of France, whose Kinswoman she was, being offended, he sent Ambassadors to Arioaldus, pressing him in the strongest Terms to set her at Liberty; to which the King answer'd, that he had most just Cause to keep her in Prison; and the Ambassadors denying what he had laid to the Queen's Charge, and urging that the Authors of such Falshoods were Lyars; at last Ansoaldus, one of them, desir'd the King to let the Doubt be decided by Duel. Caribertus appear'd for the Queen, and the Impostor Adalulphus for the King, the last was vanquish'd, the Queen was set at Liberty, and restor'd to her former Honour. This Manner of clearing one from an Imputation, was so much commended amongst all Nations, that *Cujacius*² says, even amongst Christians, as well in Civil as Criminal Cases, the Duel was long practis'd, and our French Normans whilst they held this Kingdom, frequently made use of it; altho' by the Longobard Kings themselves it was reputed a cruel and unreasonable Experiment; yet these People being long accusom'd to such a Practice, and thinking it less mischievous to allay the Wrath and Passions of those bold Spirits, by committing the Affair to the Hazard of a few, than to see whole Families go together by the Ears, look'd not on this Practice as a Grievance, but rather as necessary to be kept up. Luitprandus was a most prudent Prince, and knew better Things, but after the Example of Solon (who being ask'd if he had given to the Athenians the best Laws he could devise; answer'd, the best that could be suited to their Customs) he in one of his Laws plainly declares his Thoughts, saying, tho' he was uncertain of God's Approbation, and knew that many suffer'd unjustly by Duels, *Sed propter consuetudinem gentis nostræ Longobardorum legem impiam vetare non possumus*³. The Christian Religion put a Stop to this Custom afterwards, but has not been able to root it out altogether; so that the same is still practis'd to this Day: The Design of our Religion is to extirpate such bad Customs, but we resist, and hinder its taking Effect. Afterwards Frederick II. and the Kings his Successors, forbad it with us under severe Penalties, and other Princes did the like.

THAT other Trial by red hot Irons, boyling or frozen Water⁴ likewise displeas'd; but that ought not to be imputed to the Longobards only, but to all other Nations of Europe, and more to Christians than others, who retain'd it for a long Time, and more obstinately stuck to it; forasmuch as they believ'd they had the Custom from Moses himself, who commanded a certain Potion to be given to Women accus'd of Adultery, in order to know whether they were Guilty or Innocent. It was not then to be wonder'd at, if the Longobards by carrying the Thing further, establish'd Laws concerning it, by which in determining Controversies it was appointed to make use of red hot Plough-Shares, or cold or boiling Water. This Error was kept up by the Credulity and Stupidity of the People, who had such Confidence in this Tryal, that they easily gave credit to all the fabulous Accounts they met with in History, and took them for certain Truths. Strange and wonderful Things were told, which were not really true, but the Effects of Imagination, heated to that Degree, as made them fancy they saw People thrown into the Fire without being burnt, and plung'd into a River without being drown'd. Famous is that Fact amongst Historians of the innocent Countess, which happen'd during the Empire of Otho; who being falsely accus'd by the Empress, purg'd herself by red hot Iron, which did not hurt her. But that other is much more famous and remarkable, which fell out in Florence in the Time of Alexander II. of Aldobrandinus, who in the Sight of all the People came safe and sound out of the Flames, whence he got the Name of Pietro Igneo. It was not without reason then, that the Emperor Frederick amongst his military Laws, likewise order'd the Practice of this Proof in dubious Cases, as Radevicus and Cujacius testify ¹. But afterwards when the Uncertainty of it was more maturely consider'd, and that many innocent Persons suffer'd greater Punishment than could have been inflict'd upon them if they had been legally convicted as Guilty; and that on the other hand the Guilty escap'd free, and that it was a bold tempting of Providence: at last it was prohibited by the Popes. And Cujacius ² relates, that this Custom was left off and disus'd in Lombardy before it was so in any other Country. And with us it was likewise forgot; and tho' the People of Bari retain'd the Longobard Laws, from which the Book of their Customs was compil'd, yet they confess, that from the Time of King Roger such a Custom had been quite left off: Ferri igniti, aquæ ferventis, vel frigidæ, aut quod libet judicium, quod vulgo paribole nuncupatur, a nostris civibus penitus exulavit ³.

THE Custom of making Christians Prisoners, and taking a Ransom for their Liberty, appear'd to some to be both savage and cruel, as was practis'd by the Greeks on the Citizens of Croton and other Cities; of which S. Gregory loudly complain'd. But this Custom, as we have related in the foregoing Book, was at that Time indifferently practis'd every where; neither are there wanting Writers who maintain it as just.

FOR these Reasons we read in the most grave Authors, that the Longobards were commended above all other foreign Nations, for a wise and prudent People, and who knew better than any other how to make Laws with so much Judgment and Foresight. Not to mention Grotius ⁴ who prais'd them so much on that account, nor Paul Warnefride. Gunterus, who was Secretary to the Emperor Frederick I. and a famous Poet in those Times, sings thus of the Longobards in his Ligurina.

Gens astuta, sagax, prudens, industria, solers, Provida consilio, legum, jurisque perita.

NEITHER is the Stile in which these Laws are written, so insipid or unpolish'd, as our Writers have represented it: They were judg'd by the incomparable Grotius, a Subject well worthy of his Labour and bright Talents; he was preparing a Commentary on them, as also on all the Laws of the other Northern Nations; but being snatch'd from us by untimely Death, could not bring it to Perfection: yet he left us an Index ⁵ of all the Nouns, Verbs, and other Vocables of the Longobards, by which we may see the many Mistakes our Writers have fallen into, who have pretended to interpret them. And Jacobus Cujacius ⁶ in his Book of Fiefs, which in a great measure depend on these Laws, frequently shews us many Words of them which are reputed barbarous and unpolish'd by most Interpreters, who give them another Meaning, to be either Greek or Latin, or depending by true Analogy on these Languages; such as the Word arga, which we meet with frequently in these Laws, and which is reckon'd barbarous by them, and to signify cornutus, as Maxilla among others, in consuetud. De Bari ⁷ explains it, but P. Warnefride make it to signify iners, ineptus, stupidus, and inutilis, and derives the Word from the Greek ἀπῆς, which signifies the same according to Cujacius ¹, and he confirms it from the Authority of Didimus. And astalium facere which we often meet with in these Books, signifies nothing else but to deceive, and to fail in Duty, by not assisting the Prince or fellow Soldier in Time of Battel, when Assistance is most wanted, and they in danger of their Lives. So likewise to do a Thing asto animo, which we often read in these Laws, is the same as to do it animo vafro. Plautus in Pænulo.

Mea soror ita stupida est sine animo asto.

And Accius in Nonius :

Strigibus vivis convivis intestinaque exedunt.

which the Longobards by the proper Word of their Nation likewise call'd Masca, and which we now call Maga, or Strega.

THE Use of the Talenone, as explain'd by Festus, Vegetius, and Isidorus is likewise clearly expounded by these Laws ². The Talenone, as the Law declares, was nothing else but a Beam pois'd upon a Fork of Wood, by which they drew Water in Buckets from the Wells.

THE calling unmarried Women, Virgins in Hair, comes from the Custom of the Romans, who distinguish'd the Virgins from those who were married, because these cover'd the Head, and the Virgins went uncover'd, and let their Hair be seen.

GALEN believ'd that neither Horses, nor any fourfooted Animal except Dogs, could ever become mad. On the contrary, Absyrtus and Hierocles Mulomedici ⁴, and likewise Porphirius, in Opposition to his Opinion, wrote, that these likewise might be mad. The Longobards in their Laws were of their Opinion, and rejected that of Galen as false. Many such other Vestiges of their Erudition appear in these and many other Words of that kind, which to some seem barbarous, altho' they be deriv'd from the Greek and Latin Languages, and are scatter'd up and down in these Books, of which there's no need for making a longer Catalogue; every Body may see and observe them in the Index which Grotius made of them, which we lately mention'd.

The Laws of the Longobards retain'd long in the Dukedom of Beneventum, and afterwards spread over all the Provinces of which our Kingdom is now compos'd.

THE Excellency of these Laws above all others of foreign Nations, and their Justice and Wisdom, may easily be perceiv'd when we find, that tho' the Longobards were driven out of the Kingdom of Italy, and succeeded in it by the French, yet Charles King of France and Italy preserv'd them intire; so that he not only confirm'd them, but likewise to the Body of these added some of his own, which also as Longobard Laws he order'd to be observ'd in Lombardy, and the other Parts of Italy subject to him.

HE added many others to the Edicts of the Longobard Kings his Predecessors, which he establish'd not as Emperor or King of France, but as King of Italy, or of the Longobards. And as the Longobard Law was of no Force in France, so likewise the Salick or French Law was not introduc'd into Italy, by Charles or his Successors: Whence we see the Error of Sigonius ¹, who makes three Laws to flourish in the French Empire in Italy; the Roman, the Longobard, and the Salick. Unless perhaps he means, that among the French only, who came into Italy with Charles, this last had Force and Authority. Pepin his Son and Successor in the Kingdom of Italy, and the other Kings and Emperors who succeeded them, such as Lewis, Lothaire, Otho, Conrade, Henry, and Guido, not only preserv'd them intire and in force, but added other Laws of their own to them; for which Cause it was that the ancient Compiler of these Laws collected in three Books, not only the Laws of these five Longobard Kings, but likewise those of Charles the Great, and his Successors, down to Conrade, which they as Lords of Italy establish'd; all which were call'd Longobard Laws.

BUT with us they were preserv'd and long observ'd for other more important Reasons. In the Dukedom of Beneventum, which comprehended the greatest Part of these our Provinces, which now make up the Kingdom, under the Longobard Kings their Authors, they were obey'd with the utmost awful Respect. The Kings had the Sovereignty of it, and the Dukes who govern'd it were subordinate to them; and Desiderius the last King, as we have said, had created Arechis his Son-in-Law Duke of it. But tho' the Longobard Kings fail'd in Italy, yet the Dukes did not fail in the Dukedom of Beneventum; but Arechis, as we shall relate in the following Book, having thrown off all Subjection to the French, govern'd it with absolute and independent Authority. He took upon him to adorn himself with the Scepter, Crown, and Purple Garment, and made himself to be anointed, and rais'd to be a Sovereign Prince, wherefore he maintain'd it independent of any other Sovereign; by which means the Longobard Laws got the better footing and force in this Dukedom, in which they were constantly preserv'd by the succeeding Beneventan Princes. And the Principality being afterwards divided into three Parts, to wit the Beneventan, Salernitan, and Capuan, which comprehended almost all the Kingdom, the Longobard Laws were the more diffus'd. The Neapolitan Dukedom, and the other Cities of Calabria and Brutium, Gaeta, and some other maritime Cities, which continu'd for some Time under the Dominion of the Greeks, were later in receiving these Laws. These Places, as being subject to the Emperor of the East, were govern'd by their own Laws; and what these were shall be examin'd in the Seventh Book, where we shall treat of their Novellæ, and their so many other Collections. But when the Greeks were driven out by the Normans, and all these Provinces reduc'd under the Dominion of one single Person; the Normans having succeeded the Longobards, retain'd their Laws, and spread them over all, even in the Cities which they took from the Greeks, as we shall see in the following Books; whence it came to pass, that by these Laws, having been preserv'd in Italy under other Princes, who were not Longobards, they continu'd the longer, and took deeper Root in these our Provinces. Whence likewise it came to pass, that tho' the Roman Laws were preserv'd intire, and that every one could live under what Law he pleas'd, either Roman or Longobard ²; nevertheless, for many Ages, so great was the good Luck of the Longobard Laws, that it behov'd the Roman Laws to succumb to them; for in Italy, and these our Provinces, the Introduction of a great Number of feudal Tenures, and consequently of many Barons, who observ'd no other Laws but those of the Longobards, occasion'd all the Nobility, by their Example, to observe the same Laws; so that except the Ecclesiasticks, who in Obedience to the Edict of Lewis the Pious ³, liv'd (of what Nation soever they were) according to the Roman Laws only, all others, both by Tradition and ancient Custom, observ'd the Longobard Laws; and when by the Ignorance of the Age, all the Codes wherein they were registred were neglected, yet they continu'd amongst the common People, who are the last in laying aside the ancient Usages of their Forefathers, either in what concerns the Laws or the Customs, as we shall see more distinctly in the following Books.

AND whence it likewise came to pass, that in our Kingdom with regard to the new Constitutions which were afterwards introduc'd by the Norman, Suevian, and French Princes, the Longobard Law was call'd Jus Commune, like that of the *Romans*¹; but with this Difference, that the Jus Commune of the Longobards was the Predominant, and in greatest Force; that of the Romans of less Authority, and to which they had recourse when the Longobard fail'd, which happen'd but seldom. For this Cause it came likewise to pass, that the Longobard Law was quoted in the Tribunals, commended by all, and reckon'd the Source of all other Laws, which the new Princes were about establishing: So we see that the Popes made often use of them in their Decrees, and approv'd of them². The Feudal Law which now in all Nations of Europe is one of the most noble Parts of the Jus Commune, was founded upon, and supported by the Longobard Laws, as not only Andrea d'Isernia, and Bishop Liparulus among others have written, but the incomparable Hugo Grotius likewise observes.

THE very Constitutions of Frederick II. of our Kingdom, are almost all taken from the Longobard Laws, as besides our own Writers, Grotius likewise tells us³. The Customs of Bari are deriv'd from the Longobard Laws, as we shall shew when we shall have occasion to treat of them.

BUT 'tis worth our Observation, and what will more plainly shew us the Authority and Credit which they retain'd in these our Provinces for a long Time, to find that after the Roman Jurisprudence was again restor'd in the Academies of Italy, in the Time of Lothaire II.; and the Pandects had been found in Amalphis, and got footing likewise in our Academy, in the Reign of Frederick II. the Use and Authority of these Laws did not fail for all that. On the contrary, our Writers then more than ever took greater Pains and Care in commenting on them; just as Gregory and Hermogenian did, who, when they saw that Constantine the Great intended to abolish the ancient Heathen Roman Laws by new ones of his own, compil'd their Codes, by which they prevented the Loss of the ancient Roman Jurisprudence: So we see that Carlo di Tocco did not comment on them till the Reign of William King of Sicily; and that other Comment which we have on them of Andrea da Barletta, Attorney General to Frederick II. makes it evident, that to the Reign of this Prince, the Longobard Laws in our Kingdom were superior to the Roman; and in later Times still more, which may be gather'd from the Comment of Biase da Marcone, who flourish'd under King Robert.

IF our Writers had follow'd the Light of History, and distinguish'd the Times as they ought to have done, they had not stuffed their Commentaries with so much Trumpery, as to say (not knowing the Authors of those Laws) they were made by certain Kings, who were call'd Longobards, that is to say Apulians, who having come from Sardinia, at first settled in Romagna, and from thence went to Puglia, as Odofredus, Baldus, Alexander, and Franciscus de Curte have written, and, which is more surprizing, were follow'd by Nicolas Boerius, who chose rather to believe these Dreams, than to give ear to true History.

NEITHER would Luca di Penna, afterwards follow'd, as often falls out, inconsiderately by Carovita, Maranta, Fabio d'Anna, and others of our Writers, have had occasion to declaim against the Law of the Longobards, and to call it stupid, barbarous, and unpolish'd, and Riff-raff rather than Law. He did so, because he knew not how to distinguish the Times in which he wrote, from those of past Ages, in which these Laws were reputed the most polish'd and prudent of all that ever had flourish'd in Italy: He wrote in the later Times in the Reign of Queen Joan I. by whom in the Year 1366. he was made Judge of the High-Court, when the Authority and Splendor of the Roman Laws still increasing, it began then to be a Question among the Advocates which of the two Laws ought to have the Preference; whereupon he finding that some against his Opinion, stickled hard in favour of the Longobard, he baul'd out against them, and loaded these Laws with a multitude of reproachful Names. And it was not till the Reign of the Aragon Family, that these Laws came in disuse and fail'd intirely in our Kingdom, when the Roman were restor'd, of which Matthæus de Afflictis is a good Evidence; who, tho' he says, that in his Time he never observ'd the Longobard Law to get the better of the Roman in our Tribunals, yet declares to have heard from the old Advocates, that in ancient Times the contrary was observ'd. But in the Progress of this History we shall have more fit Opportunities to treat at large of the alternate Fortune of these Laws.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Ecclesiastical Polity.

IN this eighth Century the Churches of the West were in great Confusion, and that of Rome, which ought to be a bright Example to the rest, was in the greatest Disorder. Paul having died in the Year 767, Constantine Brother to Toto Count of Nepi, usurp'd the Chair; who by Violence and Management had got himself first to be elected Pope, and afterwards to be ordain'd Subdeacon, Deacon and Bishop: Some Officers of the Church of Rome, not able to suffer this Violence, had recourse to Desiderius King of the Longobards, and having got Assistance, return'd to Rome with a Band of arm'd Men. Toto attack'd them, but being kill'd in the Scuffle, Constantine was turn'd out, and Philip a Priest and Monk was elected in his Place; but he not being found sufficient for the Post, was oblig'd to retire into a Monastery, and Stephen IV. with common Consent, was elected in the Month of August of the Year 768. After whose Election, Constantine was ignominiously depos'd, and treated after a cruel manner, was imprison'd, and had his Eyes put out. Stephen not finding himself secure, sent a Deputy into France, in order to regulate what concern'd the Affairs of the Church of Rome. Charles and Carloman, to whom the Deputy, their Father Pepin being dead, consign'd the Letters, sent twelve Bishops to Rome, who convening a Council with one Italian Bishop, confirm'd Stephen, and declar'd Constantine's Election void. Stephen got Possession of the See; but grievous Disputes arising afterwards between him and Desiderius, on account of the Election of the Archbishop of Ravenna, and other Matters above related, Desiderius laid Siege to Rome, and exercis'd so much Severity, that the Pope being terrified, died the first Day of February in the Year 772, leaving Adrian his Successor.

NEITHER did there happen less Disorders in the Elections to other lesser Sees. The Favour of Princes, Violence, Sollicitations, and Simony had the greatest Share in them. Discipline was almost intirely laid aside; great Ignorance and Licentiousness prevail'd amongst the Bishops and the Clergy. There was no Lewdness which they were not guilty of; they kept Women in their Houses, went to the War, inroll'd themselves among the Soldiers, serving for Pay; and throwing off the Yoke, refus'd any more to obey their Bishops. The Popes becoming powerful Lords in Temporals, by the Donation made to the Church of Rome by Pepin and Charles his Successor, began to extend their Authority over Princes. Zacharias by having had a great hand in the Translation of the Kingdom of France to the Carlovingian Line, and Adrian of that of the Kingdom of Italy to the French, had made themselves dreadful. They set their Minds more on Temporal Matters than on Divine and Sacred; and the other Bishops following their Example, the ancient Discipline was corrupted, and altogether neglected.

ON the other hand, the Temporal Princes seeing so much Depravation of Manners, labour'd with all their Might to reform the Clergy and the Church; and besides that, having so fair an Opportunity, concern'd themselves more in the Election of Bishops, and other Ministers of the Church, and in disposing of their Revenues, than formerly. Leo Isauricus, and the other Emperors of the East his Successors, would have themselves esteem'd as Moderators, not only of the Ecclesiastical Polity and Discipline, but likewise of the Doctrine: They publish'd Edicts concerning the Adoration of Images; and except only the Ministry of Sacrificing, they would be reckon'd Monarchs and Presidents of the Church: They presided in the Synods, and gave them Sanction; made Laws, and regulated the Ecclesiastical Orders; made themselves Judges of Controversies, and of the Bishops and Clergy, how they were to proceed in Elections to vacant Sees, and how they were to give their Votes; translated Bishops from one See to another; advanc'd and degraded the Sees as they thought fit, from a Bishoprick to a Metropolitan and Archbishoprick, dispos'd of Dignities and Sees of the Hierarchy; divided the Diocesses after their own way, and erected Churches into new Bishopricks or Metropolitans. Whence began the assigning of many Churches to the Patriarchate of Constantinople by taking them from that of Rome, which was compleated in the following Century; among the rest, as shall be told in its Place, they took Sicily, Calabria, Puglia, and Campania, which that Patriarchate retain'd, till by the Means of our Normans, and particularly Roger I. King of Sicily, they were restor'd to that of Rome; and greater Extravagancies were seen in the following Times when their Empire began to decline, when they endeavour'd intirely to subject the Priesthood to the Empire, concerning which we may see *Joannes Philosacus*¹, and *Tomasinus*², who discourse at large of it.

ALTHO' the Princes of the West were not so daring, nevertheless under the specious Pretence of reforming the Irregularities of the Clergy, and the lost Discipline, they concern'd themselves much more than became them in the Protection and Guardianship of their Churches; and in the Beginning of this Century they no less deform'd the State of them than the Ecclesiasticks had done. Charles Martel, after having taken upon him the Government of the Kingdom of France, instead of remedying the Disorders that prevail'd, seiz'd on the Goods of the Churches; he gave the Abbacies and Bishopricks to Laicks; gave the Tythes to the Soldiers; and suffer'd the Ecclesiasticks and Monks to go on in their Lewdness.

IN Italy and these our Provinces which were subject to the Dukes of Beneventum, the Longobard Kings and Dukes, on account of the continual Hatred they bore the Popes, as first Favourers of the Greeks, and afterwards of the French, occasion'd no less Disorders. King Desiderius by reason of the Disputes he had with Stephen IV. about the Election of Michael to the Archbishoprick of Ravenna, whom the Pope turn'd out; in order to be reveng'd upon him, caus'd the Eyes of Christophanus and Sergius his Creatures, to be put out, and afterwards put Christophanus to Death, and so frighted the Pope, that it hasten'd his Death.

THE Longobards as well as the Goths and the Emperors of the East their Predecessors, were very careful in retaining all the Prerogatives which the Right to Empire gave them. It was in their Power to declare the Churches Sanctuaries, and to prescribe Laws for what Crimes the Subjects could claim Sanctuary, and for what those that fled to them could be protected in them. King Luitprandus, imitating the Emperors of the West, of whom there are many Constitutions remaining in the Theodosian and Justinian Codes concerning that Matter; ordain'd likewise, that Homicides, and others guilty of Capital Crimes, should not have the Benefit of Sanctuary³. He injoin'd the Bishops, Abbots, and other Governors of Churches or Monasteries not to receive them, nor to hinder the Secular Magistrate from taking them out, nor to be assistant in making their Escape, nor conceal them; and that if they hinder'd their being taken out, they were to pay a pecuniary Mulct of 600 *Soldi*⁴. Our Longobard Kings likewise retain'd the Power of making Laws concerning Matrimony⁵, of putting a Stop to it, where either Decency, Kindred or Affinity were Obstacles, and of prescribing the Age fit for contracting it; and of declaring the Illegality of Marriages and Contracts, and the Bastardy of Children, and of establishing whatsoever regarded the greater Decorum and Decency of these Matters, as is clear from their Laws ¹.

THE Emperors of the East, who at this Time govern'd the Dukedom of Naples, a great Part of Calabria, Puglia, and many maritime Cities of these our Provinces, which were likewise Enemies to the Popes, exercis'd an absolute Authority over the Churches of those Cities which were subject to them. Constantine and Leo his Son, would have their Edicts for abolishing Images obey'd in them; they would not allow Paul elected Bishop of Naples to be admitted, because he was a Favourite of the Popes, which was the reason that the Neapolitans did not receive him within their City: Neither was there ever greater Deformity seen in the Church of Naples than at this Time. We find Stephen at the same time that he was Duke of it, and govern'd the Dukedom under the Emperor, when his Wife died, was made Bishop, and not laying down this other Charge, administred both divine and human Things at the same Time. Theophilactus his Son-in-Law succeeded him in the Dukedom; when a new Pastor was to be chosen, Esprassia the Daughter of Stephen, and Wife of Theophilactus, being offended with the Clergy, who had shewn much Gladness and Contentment upon the Death of her Father, swore that none of them should be elected Bishop; and the Duke her Husband, whether it was in order not to vex her, or for Covetousness sake, delay'd the Election; so that the Neapolitans, both Clergy and People, being wearied with the long Vacancy of their Church, went in a Body, and call'd out aloud before the Ducal Palace, that they might give them for Bishop whomsoever they pleas'd. Then Esprassia, full of Indignation and Rage, pitch'd upon a Laick from among the People, call'd Paul, whom she gave them for Bishop, neither durst any of them be so bold as to contradict it; they took Paul, and having shav'd him, elected him Bishop, who went to Rome, and the Pope, through the Corruption of the Age, made no Difficulty to consecrate and confirm him ².

THERE being such Depravation of Manners, and Things having gone to such Excess, not only the Prelates of the Church, but likewise the Secular Princes rous'd themselves at last in order to apply a Remedy. After the Death of Charles Martel in France, Carloman and Pepin his Sons having divided the Kingdom, tho' they had not the Dignity of Kings, contriv'd to order Matters so, that in some measure Discipline might be restor'd. Carloman Prince of Austrasia, in the Year 742. caus'd a Council to be call'd in Germany, where, with the Consent of the Bishops, he publish'd many Regulations for reforming the Discipline and Manners; he forbid the Ecclesiasticks to go to War; order'd the Curates to be submissive to their Bishops; caus'd some Ecclesiasticks convicted of the Crime of Uncleaness to be degraded, and to undergo Penance: And in the other Assembly which he caus'd to be held in Lestines near to Cambray, besides confirming all these, he likewise prohibited Adultery, Incest, unlawful Marriages, and Pagan Superstition.

PEPIN Prince of Neustrasia, likewise for his Part labour'd all he could in order to reform the Ecclesiastical Discipline; he call'd a Meeting of 23 Bishops, and many Great Men in Soissons, in the Year 744, in which all the Canons of the preceding Councils were confirm'd; and he ordain'd that they should be inviolably observ'd; that Synods should meet every Year; that Priests ought to be subject to their Bishops; that the Clergy should have no Women in their Houses, except their Mothers, Sisters, or Nieces; nor Laicks Virgins dedicated to God. In the following Years 752, 755, 756, and 757, such other Assemblies were held, in which were establish'd other Regulations concerning Discipline. And Carloman especially caus'd such Assemblies to meet, in which also were establish'd many Points for the maintaining of Discipline, by reviving the ancient Canons, and making of new Rules concerning the pressing Affairs of the Church. These Assemblies were not properly Councils, they were not only compos'd of Bishops, but likewise of the Lords and Great Men of the Kingdom call'd by the Princes. The Bishops drew up the Articles for the Ecclesiastical Polity, and the Lords those that concern'd the State; and afterwards they were authoriz'd and publish'd by the Princes, that they might have the Force of Laws. These Articles were call'd Acts or Decrees. And this was the manner in which the Discipline of the Church of France, and likewise that of Germany was regulated under the second Race of those Kings in this Century.

IN Italy also there were many Canons establish'd by some Popes for restoring the decay'd Discipline. Pope Zachary held two Councils for that end in Rome, the one in the Year 743, compos'd of about 40 Italian Bishops, wherein was renew'd the Prohibition so often made against Bishops, Priests and Deacons cohabiting with Women, and other Provisions were made; the other was in the Year 745, compos'd of seven Bishops, and some Priests, wherein were discuss'd some Accusations against the Bishops, and some Opinions concerning Idolatry were handled; and it was declared, that the Names of many Angels that were invoc'd were unknown, and that they knew the Names of three only, to wit, Michael, Raphael, and Gabriel. Likewise Paulinus Bishop of Aquileja held a Council there in the Year 791, wherein, after a Confession of Faith he establish'd 14 Canons concerning the Discipline of the Clergy, Matrimony, and the Duty of Monks, and other Affairs.

IN the East, after the Empress Irene took the Government of the Empire upon her, she set about restoring of Discipline; she resolv'd to have a new Council call'd, in order to examine what had been ordain'd in that which Constantinus Copronymus had conven'd in the Year 753, concerning the Worship of Images; with which she acquainted Pope Adrian, that he might give his Consent to it, to which he sent two Priests as his Representatives. The Meeting of the Council began in Constantinople in the Year 786; but being disturb'd by the Officers of the Army and the Soldiers, who were stirr'd up to it by the Bishops who were against the Worship of Images, it was translated to Nice in the Year 787.

THE Pope's Legates had the first Place there; Tarasius Patriarch of Constantinople the Second; the Deputies of the Bishops of the East the Third: After these Agapetus Bishop of Cesarea in Cappadocia, John Bishop of Ephesus, Constantine Metropolitan of Cyprus, with 250 Archbishops and Bishops, and more than a hundred Priests and Monks. Two Commissioners likewise from the Emperor and Empress assisted there, and in many Speeches the Doctrine of Image Worship was fully debated, and many Regulations were establish'd concerning it. There were 22 Canons made, as well concerning Doctrine as Ecclesiastical Discipline; there was a Rule laid down for the Examination of Bishops, prescribing their not to be admitted if they were not qualified to instruct the People, and if they were not skill'd in the Psalter, the Evangelists, and the Epistles of St. Paul and the Canons. All Elections of Bishops or Priests made by Princes were declared void; and the Election of a Bishop was committed to the neighbouring Bishops; those Bishops were to be severely proceeded against, who should take Money for deposing, or fulminating Excommunications. It was ordain'd that all Churches and Monasteries should have Oeconomists; that Bishops and Abbots could not sell or give away the Possessions of their Churches or Monasteries without Necessity. That the Houses of Bishops and Monasteries should not be us'd as Inns; that a Clergyman could not be appointed to two Churches; that Bishops and other Ecclesiasticks were not to wear gaudy Apparel. The Building of Oratories or Chapels was forbid, if there were not a sufficient Fund for defraying the Charges. Women were discharg'd from living in Bishops Houses, or Monasteries of Men. The taking any Thing for Orders, or for being admitted into Monasteries was prohibited, under the Pain of Deposition with respect to Bishops and Priests: As for Abbesses, and Abbots who were not Priests, they were to be turn'd out of the Monasteries; however, those who were receiv'd into the Monasteries, or their Relations, were allow'd to give voluntarily either Money or any Thing else; nevertheless under this Condition, that those Gifts were to remain with the Monastery, whether the Person entering continu'd in the Monastery or left it, provided that the Superiors were not the Cause of his leaving it. Monasteries of the one half Men, and the other half Women were forbidden to be erected, but with regard to those already establish'd; the Monks and Nuns were order'd to live in two different Houses, that they might not see, nor have Familiarity with one another. Monks were not allow'd to leave their own Monasteries and go to others; and lastly eating with Women, when it was not for the Good of their Souls, or when they entertain'd a Relation, or travell'd, was prohibited.

SUCH and so many Provisions were made at this Time, in order to restore the decay'd Discipline in some measure: Where Vice abounded, there was need of many Laws for suppressing it; but these were not sufficient to cure so many Diseases: Therefore some Bishops, in order to reform their Clergy, made their Priests live in common in a Cloister, to whose Care the Church is indebted for the Order of the Regular Canons, of which Codegandus Bishop of Metz seems to have been the Institutor or Restorer. The Churches of our Provinces, part of which were under the Emperors of the East, and part under the Lombard Dukes, had recover'd a little Discipline, but not so much, but that by reason of the Rudeness and Ignorance of the Age, they were likewise in great Disorder, and few Vestiges of the ancient Discipline remain'd in them.

S E C T. I.

Of the Collection of the Canons.

WE must place the Collection of Isidore Mercator or Peccator in this Century; it is in Latin, and compos'd of various Canons of Councils held in Greece, Africa, France, and Spain, and of many Decretal Letters of diverse Popes, down to Zachary, who died in the Year 752¹. *David Blondell*² shews the Imposture of many of these Letters attributed to sundry Popes, whose they are not; and *Peter de Marca*³, tho' he condemns the Method of this Author as too severe, however he confesses the Forgery and Imposture. 'Tis likewise doubtful who the Author of this Collection was: *Hincmar*⁴ Archbishop of Rheims, makes Isidore of Sevil Author of it; and relates, that Ricolphus Bishop of Mentz, who govern'd that Church from the Year 787 to the Year 814, carried it from Spain to France, where, under the Reign of Charles the Great, many Copies were made, and spread over all. But by what we have said in the foregoing Book, and by what Baronius himself and Marca say, Isidore Bishop of Sevil cannot be said to be the Author of it, for he died in the Year 636, seeing this Collection likewise comprehended the Epistles of Zachary, who died in the Year 752. Others⁵ therefore ascribe it to Isidore Bishop of Sepulveda, who died in the Year 805; who, according to the Custom of those Times in which the Bishops out of Humility were wont to subscribe themselves in Councils and elsewhere Peccatores, has been call'd Peccator; and afterwards through the Fault of the Transcribers, in some Copies of this Collection, instead of Peccator, we read Mercator. *Emanuel Gonzalez*⁶ relates, that this Collection of Isidore Mercator, was publish'd under the Name of Isidore of Sevil, in order to give it the greater Authority, or because there was truly another Collection begun by him, which afterwards was compleated by Mercator, who inserted many other Letters into it down to the Time of Zachary.

THIS new Collection of Isidore did not only appear at this Time, but there was another likewise seen under the Title Capitula Papæ Adriani, which was publish'd in France by Ingilramnus Bishop of Metz, in the Year 785. But this Collection, as Hincmar Archbishop of Rheims testifies⁷, was not receiv'd in the Rank of Canons, for which we ought to consult *Peter de Marca*⁸. In Rome likewise in this same Century there appear'd another Collection of the ancient Formula, intitled, Diurnus Romanorum Pontificum; which the Popes made use of only in their Dispatches.

Of Monks and Temporalities.

OUR Princes and Great Men did not leave off making great Donations to the Churches, and founding new Monasteries, and enriching those already built. This was truly the Age of Monks; the Ignorance of the Laicks as well as of Priests was at its highest Pitch: There remain'd only a little Learning amongst the Monks, when they easily led the People by the Nose to do whatsoever they pleas'd; the many Miracles, the so many new invented Devotions to some particular Saint, their instructing the People, by reason of the Ignorance and Lewdness of the Priests, had such Effect, that it drew them the awful Regard and Respect of every Body. King Luitprandus not only built many Churches where he used to stay at any time, but likewise large Monasteries. It was he that built the Monastery of St. Peter without the Walls of Pavia, which in the Time of *Paul Warnefride*¹, on account of its Riches, was call'd Celum aureum. He likewise built in Bardum, on the Top of the Alps, the Monastery of Berceto; and besides that, he built a Church of admirable Workmanship in Holoma, in Honour of S. Athanasius the Martyr, where he also caus'd a large Monastery to be erected. With great Magnificence he appointed Churches in all Places; and he was the first that built a Chapel within his own Palace, in Honour of our Saviour, and appointed Priests and Clerks, who every Day sung the Holy Offices there: Whence the Royal Chapels began to shine with greater Dignity and Splendor with us, and afterwards were adorn'd with many Prerogatives and Immunities by the Popes, in order to please the Princes; and not only the Chapels but their Chaplains were rais'd to that Pitch, which we shall see in the following Books of this History.

OUR Dukes of Benevento, following the Example of their Kings, founded not only in Benevento, but likewise in all their large Dukedom, new Monasteries, and enrich'd those already built, and especially that of Monte Cassino. Arechis enlarg'd that of S. Sophia in Benevento, and heap'd profuse Donations upon it. At this Time in the Year 707, the famous Monastery of S. Vincent in *Vulturno*² was so magnificently built by those three renown'd noble Beneventan Longobards, Paldo, Taso, and Tato, that in after-times it even vied with that of M. Cassino, and its Abbots were rais'd to so great Dignity, that they were employ'd in the most important Affairs of the See of Rome, and of the most potent Monarchs of the West. No less did the Monasteries multiply in this Dukedom, than in that of Naples, and in the other Cities subject to the Emperors of the East, as well those of the Order of S. Benedict, as those of S. Basil; not only of Men, but likewise of Women. In Naples Duke Stephen, who was also Bishop, built many Churches and Monasteries, and endow'd them with ample Privileges and Revenues; such as that of S. Festus the Martyr, now annex'd to that of S. Marcellinus, as also that of S. Pantaleon, of which there's no Vestige remaining; and rebuilt that of S. Gaudiosus in a more magnificent Form³. Antimius Consul and Duke founded others, to wit, those of SS. Quiricus and Falitta, the Church of St. Paul, which he annex'd to the Monastery of St. Andrew; and thus did not only the Bishops and Dukes of Naples, but also the other Officers and Prelates of the other Cities of these Provinces of which the Kingdom is now compos'd, which may be seen in Ugbella's elaborate Work of Italia Sacra. By which means the Monks and their Riches increas'd exceedingly; and the Growth of their Power and Reputation, by reason of the Ignorance of others, and the Learning which they preserv'd among them, the best way they could, in a Time of such gross Ignorance, was no less.

³ Chioc. de Epif. Neap. in Steph. A. 764.

SO many Monasteries therefore being founded, the Monks become very rich, and seeing themselves so considerable, endeavour'd now more than ever altogether to shake off the Yoke of the Bishops. 'Tis true the Monasteries began in the preceding Century to exempt themselves from the Jurisdiction of the Bishops; but, according to *Alteferra*¹, that was practis'd but very seldom. The Instance which Zachary gave in this Century of the Monastery of M. Cassino, was the Occasion that the rest from time to time made themselves all free. The Splendor of this Monastery in those Days inhanc'd all the Favour of the Popes; who, as if they had been so many Conjurors, to know that out of it, as out of the Trojan Horse, so many Popes their Successors were to come, never gave over heaping Privileges and Prerogatives upon it. What made it the more august was, that besides Rachis, Carloman, and many Royal and Illustrious Personages had been Monks in it; therefore Pertinax countenanc'd by the two Gregory's the Second and the Third, repair'd it in that magnificent manner; and Zachary, vying with his Predecessors, would needs endow it with greater Privileges. With his own Hand he would consecrate it, and having gone thither accompanied with thirteen Archbishops, and Sixty-eight Bishops, he made the Consecration the more august and magnificent. The Monks were ready to receive him, who was to exempt so famous and illustrious a Monastery altogether from the Jurisdiction of the Bishop of the Diocese in which it was; Zachary willingly granted it ample Immunity, and caus'd a special Grant to be drawn up, by which not only that Monastery, but every Thing that belong'd to it, wheresoever situated, was exempted from the Jurisdiction of all Bishops, ita ut nullius juri subjaceat, nisi solius Romani Pontificis, which are the Words of *Leo Ostiensis*². Besides which he likewise adorn'd it with other Pre-eminences; that in all Councils the Abbot of Cassino should not only take Place of all the other Abbots, but likewise give his Vote before them; that being elected by the Monks he should be consecrated by the Pope; that the Bishop entering within his Jurisdiction could not celebrate or perform any Sacerdotal Function, unless he was invited by the Abbot, or the Overseer; that it should not be allow'd to exact Tythes of him, nor to interdict his Priests, nor to call them to Synodal Councils; that the Abbots of this Monastery could confer Orders, consecrate Altars, and receive the Chrism from any Bishop whatsoever. He moreover confirm'd to them by his Præcept, the Possession of all Goods and Lands which had been acquir'd by the Bounty of so many Longobard Princes, and sundry Great Men. The other Popes his Successors, following his Footsteps, augmented these Privileges, of which the Abbot *de Noce*³ has compos'd a long List.

THE other Monasteries under other Rules, and their Abbots of no less Fame and Worth, easily obtain'd of the Popes to be receiv'd into the Protection of St. Peter, and to be immediately subject to the Pope, because that Exemption added much to the Power of the Popes, and greatly extended their Authority over all the Nations of the West; for the Erection of many great Monasteries, govern'd by famous Abbots, who on account of their Erudition eclips'd the Bishops, occasion'd Disputes among them; therefore the Abbots, in order to free themselves of their Subjection, had recourse to the Pope, and easily obtain'd Exemptions, by putting themselves immediately under the Papal Jurisdiction. They got other Privileges besides this, such as of making the Lectors of their Monasteries, of being ordain'd by the Chorepiscopi, and a great many more. Whence it came that the Popes acquir'd many Defenders of their Authority and Power; for the Monks, by obtaining so many Privileges and Prerogatives, in order to preserve them, were oblig'd to support the Authority of the Granter; which the Monks, who were the most learn'd Set of Men of the Age, did to very good Purpose; by which means in a few Years all the Monasteries were exempted. And in process of Time the Chapters of Cathedral Churches, being for the most part Regular Clergy, on the same Pretences likewise obtain'd Exemption; and in fine the Clinian and Cistercian Congregations were all intirely exempted, which makes a great Addition to the Authority of the Popes, who came to have their own Subjects in every Place, how distant soever from Rome, who, as they were defended and protected by the Papacy, in return were zealous Defenders and Protectors of the Pope's Authority. *S. ward, tho' a Cistercian, did not approve of the Expedient; and often complain'd of such Irregularities, not only to Arrigus Archbishop of *Sens*¹, but likewise desir'd Pope Eugene III. himself to consider, that all these Doings were gross Abuses, and that he ought not to approve that an Abbot should refuse to submit himself to his Bishop, or a Bishop to his Metropolitan. Richard Archbishop of *Canterbury*², exclaim'd against the same to Alexander III. But these Gentlemen not being acquainted with State Politicks, were not minded, nor any Ear given to their Complaints: On the contrary, in after-times by keeping on in the same Course, they went further; for afterwards the Mendicant Orders not only obtain'd full Exemption from Episcopal Authority, wheresoever they might happen to be, but likewise Power to build Churches in any Place, and also to administer the Sacraments in them: And in the latter Ages they carried this so far, that every private Priest, with little Charges, obtain'd Exemption from the Superiority of his Bishop, not only in Cases of Correction, but also to get himself ordain'd by whomsoever he pleas'd; and in short not to own the Bishop on any account: And altho' in the Council of Constance, on the earnest and repeated Complaints of the famous *Gerson*³, very many Exemptions were annull'd; and last of all in the Council of *Trent*⁴, so many Grievances were in some measure redress'd: Nevertheless the Court of Rome has not wanted Ways and Means, salva auctoritate Concilii, to put Matters on the Footing we see them yet stand on.

THIS aggrandizing of the Monastick State, brought not only great Riches to the Monks, but consequently much greater to the Court of Rome, where they at last center'd. The Popes not only encourag'd them in their Acquisitions, and kept the Sources always open, but likewise by severe Anathema's prohibited the Alienation of them, and threatned those who should dare to disturb them. Through the Ignorance and Superstition of the People, Pilgrimages were more frequent; Prayers and Sacrifices, in order to liberate the Souls of the Dead from Purgatory, were much more recommended and practis'd. Therefore in this Age great Care was taken about Singing, Ceremonies, and Officiating well: Bells began to be common in all Churches and Monasteries. And the particular Devotions to Saints, of whom there were innumerable Lives and Miracles compos'd, drew many in to make Donations to their Churches and Monasteries. But the Monks, not satisfied with this, but being encourag'd by the Popes, incroach'd likewise upon the Tythes due to the Bishops and the Parish Priests. They pretended, and made their credulous Votaries believe, that seeing they apply'd themselves much more than the Priests to the Care of their Souls, as knowing better how to instruct them in the Christian Doctrine by Preaching and Sermons; therefore they ought not to pay the Tythes to the Priests, but to them; and in effect for a long Time they made a very great Havock, not inferior to that which Charles Martel made in France; so that in the following Centuries it cost a great Struggle to recover them, and restore them to their proper Priests, from whom they had been purloin'd.

NO other Province of the World, has made appear so much, of what Importance the Riches of the Monks were to Rome, as ours has done; the greatest Commendams, the greatest Benefices which she bestows on her Cardinals and other Prelates, for maintaining the Pomp and Splendor of her Court, proceed, and have their Rise from nothing else but from the Profusion of our Princes and devout People. The richest Monasteries are given for that end in Commendam: Those which Time has consum'd, have remain'd Funds for the great Revenues which they draw out of them; and the Rents of so many Monasteries of which there are scarcely any Vestiges remaining, are all carried to Rome. Whence the Popes, vying with the Princes, who invest their Vassals with their Feodal Tenures, bestow Benefices on theirs; and as we have got a new Body of Laws concerning Fiefs, so likewise we have got a new Jurisprudence concerning Benefices, which takes up as many Volumes as the Feudal; but of that in a more proper Place.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K VI.

THE Kingdom of Italy being transferr'd from the Longobards to the French under the Dominion of Charles King of France, whom we shall henceforth likewise call King of Italy, or of the Longobards, was no ways alter'd with respect to its Government and Polity by this Prince; he pretended nothing else but to govern it after the same manner in which he had found it; he ordain'd that every Man might live under the same Roman or Longobard Laws as they thought best: But he added Laws of his own to the Longobard. He did not disturb the Greeks in the Possession of those Cities of Brutium and Calabria, which were subject to the Emperors of the East; neither did he attempt any Thing against the Dukedom of Naples, nor those of Amalphis and Gaeta which belong'd to the Greeks. As for the three famous Dukedoms of Friuli, Spoletto, and Benevento, he pretended only, that as they were formerly subject to the Longobard Kings, and receiv'd their Laws, they should continue, with the rest of Italy, to be a Part of the Commonwealth; so likewise they were to acknowledge him to be King of Italy, protesting that he would allow them to have the same

Power

Power and Authority which they had enjoy'd under the Longobard Kings his Predecessors. He retain'd only the Sovereignty of the Exarchate of Ravenna, Pentapolis, and the Roman Dukedom, which he adjudg'd to the Church of Rome. All the other Provinces, such as Lyguria, Æmia, Venetia, Tuscania, and the Alpes Cottie, he retain'd under the Title of a Kingdom¹, which is that Part of Italy that afterwards was call'd Lombardy.

HE allow'd the other lesser Dukes the free Government of their Dukedoms, contenting himself with the Oath of Fidelity which they swore to him; neither did he give away their Dukedoms to others, but for Felony, or in case they died without Sons; and when this Conveyance from one to another was made, it was call'd Investiture: Whence it came, that Fiefs were not granted but by Investiture, as was afterwards observ'd with respect to other Feudatories and Vassals, Counts, Captains, and others, who were call'd Vavasours. The Cities of those Provinces, of which his Kingdom, afterwards call'd Lombardy, was compos'd, were govern'd by Counts, to whom he granted all Jurisdiction. For preserving the Borders of the Kingdom those Magistrates were likewise appointed, from whom some will have it, that the Title of Marquis had its rise; for the French and Germans call their Borders Marches: The Counts who were appointed to govern them, were likewise afterwards call'd Marquises; tho' some say, that this Word is otherwise deriv'd, as we shall relate by-and-by. These were the ordinary Magistrates that were appointed for the Government of the Cities, and the Borders of the Kingdom. There were likewise some extraordinary Magistrates, to whom greater Authority and Jurisdiction was given, than commonly was allow'd to the Counts; they had the Inspection of the Administration over all the Kingdom, and were call'd Messengers. They divided and distinguish'd the Fields of each City, which under the Longobards were too confus'd, and occasion'd many Disputes among the People about their Boundaries; they appointed every one its own, and for the most part, by following Nature, caus'd Mountains, Bogs, Rivers, Rivulets, Valleys, or other perpetual and lasting Limits to serve for Marches, that Time might not alter and confound them.

HE likewise oblig'd the Cities to take an Oath of Fidelity to him; and impos'd a kind of Tribute upon them, and upon the Fiefs, Churches and Monasteries, which they were to pay him, particularly when the Kings came from France to Italy: These Tributes were call'd, Foderum, Paratam, & Mansionaticum, which afterwards were in part, and at last altogether remitted for him and his Successors, by his Generosity. He likewise had a Mind that Italy should retain some Shadow of Liberty; and as the Custom of France was, that when the King resolv'd to deliberate upon weighty Matters, which concern'd the Good of the Kingdom, he conven'd all the States, as well the Ecclesiastick, as that of the Barons and Great Men of the Realm, so he also introduc'd it into Italy; thus every time that he return'd hither, he was wont to call a general Parliament of the Bishops, Abbots, and Barons of Italy, in which the weighty Affairs of the Kingdom were consult'd. The Longobards had only one State, compos'd of Barons and Judges. The French in the Time of Charles the Great had two, that of the Ecclesiasticks, and of the Nobility; the third State has been added since. Which Custom lasted in Italy till the Time of the Emperor Frederick I. whence it was, that the Emperors of the West, upon their Arrival in Italy, were wont frequently to call those Assemblies, and often at Roncaglia, a Place not far distant from *Placentia*², where they publish'd many Laws, as shall be shewn more particularly in the Progress of this History.

THE Affairs of Italy being thus settled by Charles, he left a strong Garrison in Parva, and in the Year 774. return'd to France, whither he carried Desiderius and his Wife, in order to make his Triumph more Majestick. Every Body would have believ'd that Italy under the Government of so great a Prince, and when the Arms of the French were so famous and formidable over all Europe, would have continu'd long in Peace and Quiet. But the three famous Dukes of Friuli, Spoletum, and especially our Duke of Beneventum, scorning to be subject to foreign Kings, and thinking that it ill suited with their Dignity, the Kingdom of the Longobards being extinct in Italy, to be under the Government of the French, resolv'd to shake off the Yoke intirely, and to make the Dominion of their Dukedoms which they held under the Longobard Kings, from Dependent, Absolute and Sovereign. Besides they were Favourers of Adalgisus, the Son of Desiderius, who had retir'd to Constantinople, where he stay'd with the Greek Emperor, by whom he had been honour'd with the Title of Patrician; and they keeping a secret Correspondence with him, he had engag'd the Emperor to furnish him a Fleet in order to come to Italy.

THE first was Rodgandus Duke of Friuli, who whilst Charles was employ'd in the Wars with the Saxons, renounc'd his Allegiance, and set up for Sovereign in his Dukedom. But the King being disengag'd from the Saxon War, and return'd to France, considering that this Revolt might be of dangerous Consequence, if he did not crush it in the Bud, resolv'd to go to Italy anew, and being arriv'd in Friuli with a powerful Army, defeated that of the Rebel, and Rodgandus being taken, he caus'd him to be beheaded for an Example to others. He did not give the Dukedom to another, but for that Time extinguish'd it, and added the Cities of it to his Kingdom, giving each of them a Count for Governor, as he had done to all the other Cities of Lombardy. Thus ended the Dukedom of Friuli, the first that was erected under Alboinus; the first likewise that was extinguish'd by Charles the Great. However 'tis true, if we may give credit to *Paulus Æmilius*¹, that Charles restor'd this Dukedom, by making a certain Henry, a Frenchman, Duke of it; but it did not last long, neither is it so much mention'd afterwards as those of Spoletto and our Benevento.

HILDEBRAND Duke of Spoletto, being frighted by so terrible an Example, and induc'd by the Prosperity of Charles, who had gain'd innumerable Victories, both in Spain and Saxony, thought it his best way, by paying him extraordinary Respect, to keep himself in his Favour, and subject himself to him, as formerly he had done to the Longobard Kings his Predecessors.

CHAP. I.

Of the Dukedom of Benevento, its Extent and Polity.

THE Dukedom of Benevento was the only one, which will appear incredible, that could not be subdu'd by so potent and glorious a Prince; it alone remain'd free from the Dominion of the French, tho' Charles and Pepin his Son, whom the Father made King of Italy, had often employ'd their Power and all their Art to reduce it. But if we will consider its flourishing Condition, its Extent, and the Power it had attain'd to in those Days; it will appear neither strange nor wonderful, that the French were not able to conquer it.

WHEN Desiderius and the Longobards were vanquish'd in Italy, the Dukedom of Benevento was govern'd by Arechis his Son-in-Law; its Borders had never been so far extended as they were during his Government; it comprehended almost all that which we now call the Kingdom of Naples; and excepting Gaeta, the Dukedom of Naples, whose Dominion reach'd only from Cuma to Amalphis, and some other Cities of Brutium and Calabria, which were as yet subject to the Emperor of the East, all was under the Dominion of the Beneventan Longobards. According to the Limits which the most careful *Pellegrinus*¹ has assign'd it, towards the West it reach'd to the Confines of the Dukedoms of Rome and Spoletto, comprehending Sora, Arpino, Acre, Aquino, and Cassino; and the Longobards would have extended its Limits further that way, had it not been that the Popes, sometimes with Gifts, sometimes with Intreaties, had stopp'd them, and made them desist from making any further Progress.

TOWARDS the South it had Gaeta for its Boundary; which City had never been conquer'd by the Longobards; it had hitherto, with many other maritime Cities, continu'd under the Dominion of the *Greeks*¹; and tho' Charles the Great took it from them, yet he gave it to the Church of Rome, as he was wont to do with the Spoils of the Greeks: Nevertheless by the Means of Archis it was again restor'd to the Greeks; whence proceeded the many Complaints which Pope *Adrian*² made of the Longobards to Charles the Great. But many Years had not pass'd, when the Popes, who are very careful in keeping what they once get Possession of, pretended that it belong'd to them; so that John VIII. tho' it was in the Possession of the Greeks, did not stick to give it to Pandolphus Count of Capua; and Terracina, which likewise belong'd to the Consulship of our Campania, as we have seen, and subject to the Greeks, was also given to the Popes, of which we shall have occasion to discourse particularly. Nevertheless the Dukedom of Benevento on this Side reach'd to Cuma, comprehending Minturno, Vulturno, and Patria, by the Ancients call'd Clanum, Places not far from Capua, which was now under the Dominion of the Dukes of Benevento, and govern'd by Counts whom they sent thither. The Beneventans once invaded and took Cuma, but as we have said, were with a great Slaughter repuls'd, and it was retaken. They could not take Miseno, altho' not far distant from their Borders; nor the other Cities of the Tyrrhenian Sea, such as Stabia, Sorrento, and Amalphis, which at this Time were united to the Neapolitan Dukedom; but all the other Cities and inland Places of Campania, from the Time of Grimoaldus, were subjected to the Dukedom of Benevento, such as Teano, Caudio, Sarno, Nola, which at this Time was call'd Cimiterium, and likewise Salerno. It also extended its Confines from Salerno beyond Cosenza, excepting Acropolis and the Promontory, which is now commonly call'd the Cape of Licosa, and the other maritime Places with Reggio, which continu'd under the Dominion of the Greeks; all the other inland Places of Lucania and Bruttium, to wit Pesto, Conca, Cassano, Cosenza, and Laino, and other Cities, were subjected to the Dukedom of Beneventum.

IT extended itself no less towards the East: Once Autaris carried his victorious Banner to Reggio; but, as we have said, this was an Incurfion like that which the Longobards afterwards made to Crotone. This Point of Italy was always preserv'd by the Greeks, neither did the Beneventan Longobards extend their Dukedom on this Side further than Cosenza and Cassano; but on the other Side they possess'd Taranto, and had likewise a great Part of Calabria, and excepting Gallipoli and Otranto, they reach'd as far as Brindisi.

TOWARDS the North they possess'd all Puglia, not only the Inland but likewise the maritime Places, from Bari to Siponto, and the Promontory of Gargano, with all the adjacent Country, was under their Dominion. On this Side they could not conquer the Island of Tremiti, because the Longobards not having Sea Forces could not come at it. Charles the Great got it afterwards, whither he sent P. Diaconus into Exile. Their Borders were extended further on this Side; for besides the inland Places of Puglia, such as Lucera, Termoli, Ortona, and some maritime Cities, and all that Part which we now call Apruzzi, all was subject to this Dukedom, as was Chieti with the adjacent Country, and all the other inland Places of that Part of Sannio, which afterwards was call'd the Contado di Molise, such as Supino, Bojano, Isernia, and other Cities, and all the County of the Marsi, which bounded with that of Sora.

THESE were the Boundaries of the Dukedom of Benevento; it comprehended almost all these four Provinces into which this Part of Italy was divided by Constantine the Great, and the other Emperors his Successors; to wit, Campania, Sannio, Puglia and Calabria, Lucania and the Bruttii: In short, excepting the Neapolitan Dukedom, Amalphis, Gaeta, and some other maritime Cities of Calabria and the Bruttii, it comprehended all that is now call'd the Kingdom of Naples; and of the twelve Provinces, of which this Kingdom is now compos'd, nine were comprehended in the Dukedom of Benevento: These are now Terra di Lavoro, the Contado di Molise; the hither Abruzzo, Capitanata, Terra di Bari, Basilicata, the hither Calabria, and both the Principalities. Therefore this Part on account of its Extent was call'd by the Greeks, and Latin Writers of this Age, Italia Cistiberina, and the Greeks were wont also to call it Longobardia Minor, to distinguish it from the greater, which in Gallia Cisalpina, on both Sides the Po, was subject to the Longobards, which at this Day retains the Name of Lombardy. Thus did *Constantinus Porphyrogenitus*¹, Cedrenus in many Places, and Zonara on Basilius Macedo call it; and Porphyrogenitus in his *Themata*² speaking of the Irruption of the Saracens into Bari, calls it simply Longobardia: Whence it came to pass, that Beneventum being exalted to be the Head of so large a Dukedom, as Pavia, the Head and Seat of the Longobard Kings, was by the Latins call'd Ticinum; so this City, as being the Head and Seat of the lesser Lombardy, by the Latin Writers of this and the following Age, was also call'd Ticinum, which the most accurate Pellegrinus in his Preface to the Anonymous³ Salernitanus shews.

AT this Time *P. Diaconus*⁴ thought Beneventum deserv'd to be call'd Civitas Opulentissima, and Head of many Provinces; a City reputed then the most polite and magnificent of all the Cities of our Provinces; and it rais'd its Head much higher, when Archis by building the Citta Nova close by it, made it much larger, and more populous. And when Learning was almost quite lost in Italy, and except among the Monks, there was nothing but gross Ignorance; Beneventum alone, in the midst of so much Barbarity, took care to preserve Learning. The Anonymous *Salernitanus*⁵ relates, that in the Time of the Emperor Lewis, there flourish'd Thirty-two Philosophers in Beneventum: Tempore quo Lodovicus præerat Samnitibus, triginta duos Philosophos Beneventum habebat. Not that they were truly such, as the careful Pellegrinus observes, but according to the Custom of those Times, all those were call'd Philosophers who profess'd human Learning. P. Warnefride, Deacon of the Church of Aquileja, notwithstanding his being so much attach'd to his Longobards, by which he had so often offended Charles the Great, yet in Consideration of his Learning always found Favour, and had no other Punishment inflicted upon him, but Banishment to Tremiti. From the Name then of so magnificent a City this vast Dukedom took its own; whence likewise it came to be call'd the Province of Beneventum by *Leo*⁶ Ostiensis, or absolutely Beneventum, according to *Erchempertus*⁷: Whence those Bishops who were sent by Archis to meet Charles the Great, in order to soften him, are call'd by the Anonymous Salernitanus, Beneventani Antistites, just so as S. Gregory the Great call'd those who were set over the Churches of the Dukedom of Naples, Neapolitani Episcopi.

THIS Extent, with respect to the Administration, likewise occasion'd a new Polity, and a Division of the Dukedom into small Provinces, which were call'd Contadi, or Gastaldati, each of which had a separate Government, and the Cities of the Dukedom were under the Direction of many Officers, it being impossible for the Duke alone to have the immediate Direction of them; therefore the Administration of many of them was given to the Longobard Lords who had signaliz'd and distinguish'd themselves in the Wars, and these were call'd Comites or Gastaldi, inferior however to the Dukes, on whom they depended; whence the Counts had their Rise in our Country. Mitola having behav'd himself so well in the War against Constans, for a Reward of his Valour was made Count of Capua by Grimoaldus, as we have said: And thus from Time to Time many Cities of this Dukedom were given to Counts, to be govern'd by them with full, tho' dependent Authority; neither were they remov'd from the Government and Administration of them, but for Felony, or at Death: And in process of Time it became a Custom, that if their Male-Line was not extinct, the Counties were not transferr'd to another Family.

IN this manner were the Counties and Fiefs introduc'd among us: Formerly the Word Count did not denote Dominion, but Office; they were call'd Counts, because their particular Office was to preside in the Assemblies, or Meetings of Men who were sent upon some Expedition; they distributed Justice, and presided in the Publick Courts for deciding Controversies amongst the People committed to their Charge, which is clear from the Longobard Laws ¹. The Government of the Cities and the Country about them, was given to them, not as Proprietors, but Officers: Sometimes Counties were given for Life, and sometimes for a certain and determinate Time; however the Longobard Princes were wont to confirm them Yearly, in order to keep them always in Subjection and Dependent, that being Tenants at Will, they might not be induc'd to plot any Thing in prejudice of the State. But when by long Experience they were sure of their Fidelity, and that the County committed to their Charge had been govern'd with great Uprightness and Justice, it began to be a Custom among the Princes, of whom they deserv'd well, to give them in Fief and Dominion, that which formerly they held as Officers; however this was restricted to their own Persons: Whence, as our Marinus Frescia well observes ², the Counties did not go to Heirs; therefore we often read in old Charters such a one call'd Comes & Dominus, which imports, that for his signal Service and Fidelity he had obtain'd the County in Fief and Seignory, which formerly he had only the Administration of. Afterwards in process of Time, out of Compassion, it became usual, that the Fief went to Sons, but never to Heirs; for if the Fiefs were taken from the Sons, they would be reduc'd in an instant to extreme Misery and Poverty, which would ill suit with the Nobleness of Blood: On the contrary, would stain and extinguish it altogether. Thus did Fiefs and Counties begin in these our Provinces under the Beneventan Longobard Princes, before they were in those which were subject to the Greeks. Therefore the Counties into which the Beneventan Dukedom was divided, multiplied very much afterwards; the first was the County of Capua, which, as we shall shew, became thereafter a very large and noble Principality; next to it the Counties of Marsi, Sora, Molise, Apruzzi, Consa, and many others which gave Names to the Provinces into which the Kingdom is now divided. Therefore the Princes of Beneventum, by reason of the Number of their Counts, appear'd in greater Splendor; from many of which the most illustrious Families of the Kingdom derive their Origin; such as the Counts of Aquino, Tiano, Penna, Acerenza, S. Agata, Alife, Albi, Bojano, Cajazza, Calvi, Capua, Celano, Cbieti, Consa, Carinola, Fondi, Isernia, Larino, Lefina, Marsi, Mignano, Molise, Morono, Penna, Pietrabbondante, Pontecorvo, Presenzano, Sangro, Sesto, Sora, Telesse, Termoli, Trajetto, Valve, and Venafro; that as Charles the Great was said to have been the greatest Maker of Count Palatines, so were our Beneventan Princes the greatest Makers of Counts.

FROM the Time of the coming of Alczecus Duke of Bulgaria, the Castaldati were also introduc'd; the Castaldi were inferior to Counts, and as the incomparable Cujacius accurately observes, they were not properly Feudatories; they were as Guardians who got the Cities or Villages jure Gastaldia; they held them not jure Feudi, as if they were perpetually to enjoy the Profits of them, but the Government and Administration of them were given for a Time, with this Clause, during Pleasure; and it was in the Option of the Granter to resume them at Pleasure, as Grimoaldus did when he gave Supino, Bojano, Isernia, and some other Places in their Neighbourhood in Castaldato to Alczecus, and therefore he would not allow him to be call'd Duke, but Castaldus: whence we often read in Erchempertus ³, and Ostiensis, that those who were made Castaldi aspir'd afterwards to be Counts, as Atenulphus pretended, who from being Castaldus of Capua, by the Help of Athanasius Bishop and Duke of Naples, was made Count of that City ⁴. Whence we clearly see, that the Office of the Castaldi was not so mean, and confin'd only to the Government of the Kings Houses or Courts, or Villages and Farms, but likewise extended to that of Cities. Those to whom the Charge of Farms and Villages was committed were also wont to be call'd Castaldi; and of this Sort the Longobard Laws make mention in many Places ⁵, as also our feudal Laws: This Title came likewise to be given to those who had the Charge of the Revenues of the Church, who by Urban II. ⁶ are call'd Administrators of the Ecclesiastical State; whence the Monasteries of Nuns also had their Castaldi, of which besides more ancient Instances related by Pellegrinus, John Boccacio can give us sufficient Testimony, with which Office, as a Reward of his continual Labour, Masetto da Lamporechio was honour'd by the Nuns of that Place; besides, those were call'd also Castaldi, who were set over particular Cities by publick Authority, and who had the Care and Civil Government of them; and besides the Charge of publick Affairs, they were wont to preside in the Courts of Justice, for which they had Salaries appointed by the Publick, and some Revenues assign'd them, which were by our Feodal Laws said to be due to them nomine Gastaldie. They were by their Office to do Justice to, and oversee the People under their Command, and to decide their Controversies after the same manner that the Counts did, which is evident from the *Longobard Laws*¹; which they did not do without the Advice of one or more Lawyers², who were their Assessors: Therefore the Custom which continues in our Kingdom, of giving Assessors or Judges to Governors, is more ancient than some have believ'd. But the Castaldi, besides the Civil Power, had sometimes likewise the Military, which is manifest from a Law of *Rotaris's*³, and from what Anastasius Bibliothecarius relates of the War of Cuma, in which near Three hundred Longobards with their Castaldus who led them on, and had the Charge of that Expedition, were kill'd by the Duke of Naples: By all which, if we will not believe what Cujacius says of the Difference betwixt these Castaldi and real Feudatories; to wit, that those as Guardians were appointed for a Time, and not perpetually, we shall not know how to distinguish the Counts from the Castaldi by more clear Marks. And tho' Camillus Pellegrinus, not liking the Opinion of Cujacius, has endeavour'd to distinguish them by saying, that tho' the Castaldi agreed with the Counts in many Things, nevertheless their proper Office was to have the Inspection of publick Matters, deriving it from the Etymology of the Words Gast and Halden, Words of the German Idiom, which the Longobards often made use of⁴, which means nothing else but Hospitum tenere, which Vito Amerpachio observes in his Notes on the Capitularia of Charles the Great; and Hospitum not being applicable to a private House, but to that of the Magistrates or Town-Hall, therefore he is of Opinion, that the particular Charge of the Gastaldus relating to publick, and not to private Matters, he was by that distinguish'd from the Count: Nevertheless be that Derivation as it will, and tho' originally this had been the Office of the Castaldi, yet seeing afterwards they were put over intire Cities, with the adjacent Countries, and had, as we have seen, all Power both Civil and Military committed to them as the Counts had; these two Offices will always be confounded, if we say not, that the one was for a Time, and the other perpetual, and given proprio Jure Feudi; and tho' in the Beginning they were on the same Footing with the Counts as to the Duration of their Office, nevertheless in process of Time, the Counts were not depriv'd of the County, but either for Felony or Death, and afterwards it was seen to descend to their Male Children. There was also another Mark whereby they were distinguish'd, for the Title of Count denoted Dignity, and that of Castaldus Office; whence we often read in old Charters, Dignitate Comes, munere Castaldus.

HOWEVER tho' the Dukedom of Beneventum was divided into many Counties, and Castaldati, as it was into Provinces, which is manifest from the Capitularia of Radelchisis Prince of Beneventum; yet their Number and Extent have not appear'd from Historians: however the most remarkable were those of Taranto, Cassano, Cosenza, Laino, Lucania, or Pesto, Montella, Salerno, and that of Capua; the largest were those of Capua and Cosenza; that of Capua reach'd towards the West to Sora; that of Cosenza, on the other hand as far as S. Euphemia and Tropea. There was also the Castaldatus of Chieti, which comprehended many Cities and Towns; that of Bojano with the adjacent Places, establish'd by Grimaldus in the Person of Alczecus the Bulgarian, which Two hundred Years thereafter, was possess'd by *Guandalpertus*⁵. This special Grant was transferr'd from Bojano to Molise, in its Neighbourhood; whence it was first call'd the County of Molise, and afterwards the Province of the County of Molise, which Title it retains to this Day. There were those of Telesse, S. Agata, Avellino, and Accrenza, Bari, Lucera, and Siponto; and in short, there were Castaldi, or Counts appointed to all the most conspicuous Cities of this Dukedom; in the Distribution of which there is no regard had to the ancient Polity or Disposition of the Provinces, according to the Division made of them under Constantine and his Successors; that fail'd altogether, and a new one arose.

IN this flourishing Condition was the Dukedom of Beneventum when the Longobards were vanquish'd and defeated in Parva. But Military Discipline had not decay'd among the Beneventan Longobards; they had always been kept in Exercise by the Neapolitan Greeks, with whom they had continually cruel and obstinate Wars; for the Longobards always endeavour'd to reduce the Dukedom of Naples under their Dominion, as they had done almost all the other Parts of these Provinces, which now make this Kingdom; the Power and Bravery of the Neapolitans was the more conspicuous, in that they were oblig'd to fight with unequal Forces, and to contend with an Enemy as near, as numerous and powerful: They resisted with so much Intrepidity and Valour, that the Beneventans were not able to subdue this Dukedom; and it was but in the latter Times that they made it Tributary. After having shewn in what State the Beneventan Longobards were, when their Kings were driven out of Italy, it will now be fit that we likewise give an Account of the Fate and Dominion of the Greeks, which they as yet had in these Parts, and which they continu'd to keep in the same manner that the Beneventans did, after that Charles the Great had made himself King of Italy.

C H A P. II.

Of the Dukedom of Naples, its Extent and Polity.

THE Empire of the East, after the Invasion of the Barbarians, who had made themselves Masters of Egypt, Africa, Syria, Persia, and other large Provinces of Asia, was confin'd to Asia Minor, Greece, Thrace, and a small Part of Italy, with the neighbouring Islands; and there was no further regard had to the ancient Distribution of its Provinces, for its Form being chang'd, new Divisions into Districts, some greater, some lesser, were introduc'd, and were call'd Themata, which had their particular Governors. Constantinus Porphyrogenitus ¹ compos'd two Books of them; in the first he number'd the Themata, or Provinces of Asia, which were seventeen; in the second those of Europe, whose Number was twelve. Amongst the Themata of Europe, Sicily is the tenth, and Lombardy eleventh. Which Name of Lombardy the Greeks gave to that small Remnant which they had of Italy, according to their Vanity and Custom of retaining the Name at least of what others had made themselves Masters of in that Empire; as for the rest, the greater Lombardy had been possessed by the French, as the lesser by the Beneventan Longobards. The Countries which Constantinus ² reckon'd under the Thema of Lombardy, which were subject to the Empire of the East, are those of the Dukedom of Naples, which City he therefore likewise honours with the Title of Metropolis, as being the Head of a not despicable Dukedom, and the ancient Calabria, which it still was Master of. The Brutii together with Reggio, Girace, Sancta Severina, Crotone, and other Cities, quibus Prætor Calabriae dominatur, which are his Words ³, are ascrib'd to the Thema of Sicily.

³ Const. loc. cit. Them. X.

AFTER the Exarchate of Ravenna, which was the chief Magistracy that the Emperors of the East had remaining in these Western Provinces, and on which all the other Dukedoms depended, was extinguish'd in Italy; the Greeks not having any other Thing left in the West, but Sicily, Calabria, the Dukedom of Naples, that of Gaeta, and some other maritime Cities, appointed a new Magistrate for the Government and Administration of these Countries, whom they call'd Patrician or Deputy; and to each Thema they sent a particular Patrician to govern it. Constantine himself in his other Book De Administrando Imperio, jumbling as usual, true Facts with fabulous; and not remembering what he had wrote in the second Book of his Themata, says, that from the Time that the Seat of the Empire was translated to Constantinople, there were two Patricians sent to Italy by the Emperor of Constantinople, one to govern Sicily, Calabria, Naples, and Amalphis; and the other, Beneventum, Capua, Pavia, and the other Places of that Province; and that each of them paid a yearly Tribute to the Emperor's Exchequer: He adds likewise, that Naples was the ancient Seat of the Patricians, and that whoever govern'd this City, had also Sicily under his Jurisdiction; and that when the Patrician came to Naples, the Duke of Naples went to Sicily. Altho' this Account be repugnant to all History, for after the Imperial Seat was translated to Constantinople, Italy was not govern'd by Patricians, but Consulares, Correctores, and Præsides, all of them under the Præfectus of Italy or of Rome; and it was not till towards the End of the Empire of Justin, that its Polity was alter'd, when the Dukes were introduc'd, and the Exarchate of Ravenna establish'd by Longinus, neither did the Duke of Naples ever afterwards concern himself in the Government of Sicily; this Dukedom being comprehended, together with the ancient Calabria, in the Thema of Lombardy: Nevertheless, what he says of the Patrician who was appointed for Sicily, his having likewise the Administration and Government of Calabria, and of all the other Places which were yet subject to the Emperors of the East, if we will have regard to the Time of Charles the Great, in which we now are, is not at all fabulous.

FROM the Extent of the Dukedom of Beneventum as above describ'd, we may easily know what was remaining to the Greeks in ancient Calabria and the Brutii, and how far the Dukedoms of Naples and Gaeta extended, which for a long Time continu'd under their Dominion. In ancient Calabria the Greeks had at this Time remaining, after they lost Taranto and Brindisi, only the Cities of Gallipoli and Otranto; but in the Brutii, besides Reggio they possess'd many other Cities, such as Gerace, Sancta Severina, Crotone, and other Towns of that Province. They as yet likewise possess'd Amantea, Agripoli, and the Promontory which we now call the Cape of Licosa. All these Places, tho' they had particular Magistrates, by whom they were immediately govern'd, yet they were at this Time intirely assign'd to the Government of the Patrician of Sicily; for formerly only the Brutii on the Mediterranean or Lower Sea, on this Side of the Fare belong'd to Sicily, as being nearest to it; forasmuch as the ancient Calabrians of the Upper Sea, which we now call the Adriatick, as also Naples and Amalphis, were not of that Thema, but as PorphYROGENITUS himself says in the second Book of his Themata, they belong'd to the Thema of Lombardy; but the Greeks having afterwards lost Taranto and Brindisi, and (excepting Gallipoli and Otranto) all the other Towns of ancient Calabria; the Cities which they had in this Province, with those remaining to them in the Brutii, and in that Part of ancient Lucania, which we now call the Hither Calabria, and in the Dukedom of Naples, belong'd to the Thema of *Sicily*², together with Gaeta; so that the Patrician who was appointed for the Government of it, as PorphYROGENITUS says, had also the Superintendency of Calabria, Naples, and Amalphis; which, however strange it may seem with respect to Amalphis and Naples, yet it is not to be doubted as to Gaeta, which is evident from the Epistles of Pope Adrian, who, after Charles the Great had yielded Gaeta to him, which a little before he had taken from the Greeks, and which Arechis had got to be restor'd to them, writing to Charles the Great, complains of the Beneventan Longobards, calling them Nefandissimi, who being Confederates of the Patrician of Sicily, had robb'd him of that City, and subjected it to that Patrician, who resided then in *Gaeta*³. Neither could the most accurate Pellegrinus deny, in relating this Place of Adrian, but that then, besides that Island, many other Cities on this Side of the Fare belong'd to the Government of the Patrician of Sicily, and of which he had the Superintendency. But as for Naples 'tis said, that by the Death of Antimius, who succeeded Theophilus in the Neapolitan Dukedom, Disputes having arisen about the Election of a new Duke; the Neapolitans being divided into Factions, in order to appease them they were forc'd to have recourse, not to the Exarch of Ravenna, as formerly, but, there being no such Officer, to the Patrician of Sicily, who in order to quell the Disturbance sent Theoclistus to be their Duke; but he was soon turn'd out by the Emperor, for these Disputes reach'd Constantinople, and Theodorus Protospatarius was quickly sent to be Duke, to whom Theoclistus was oblig'd to yield the Place. Whence Capacius, or whoever was the Author of the Latin History of Naples, infers, that our Dukes were either directly sent from Constantinople, or were chosen by the Neapolitans, who expected the Confirmation of their Election from the Emperor; which Camillus Pellegrinus has clearly demonstrated.

FROM this Superintendency, which in those Times we see belong'd to the Patrician of Sicily, over these Provinces on this Side of the Fare, I believe, if it be allow'd to make Conjectures about Things so obscure, that afterwards our Norman and Suevian Princes deriv'd the Custom of calling this Part on this Side of the Fare also by the Name of Sicily; whence afterwards the Popes, for the clearer Distinction, call'd this Kingdom Sicily on this Side of the Fare, and the other Sicily beyond the Fare. From the Time of the Normans the Name of Sicily was certainly common to both these Kingdoms; and if there be not an Error in that Charter of Roger the Norman, related by Ughellus ¹, which was granted about the Year of Christ 1115, and written in the Greek Language, in Favour of the Church of S. Severina in Calabria, we see from that Time the Name of Sicily citra Farum, was in use; for Roger is there call'd Comes Calabriae, & Siciliae citra Farum. Which afterwards our Norman Kings, and commonly the Suevian follow'd, for in the Time of these Kings, the Name of the Kingdom of Sicily comprehended not only that Island, but likewise this our Kingdom; of which in another Place we shall discourse more at large.

NEITHER ought we to pass over in this Place another strong Conjecture of the most accurate Pellegrinus, who suspects that the Change and Transferring of the Names of these two Provinces comes from this, to wit, that what according to the ancient Distribution was call'd Brutium, and Part of Lucania was afterwards call'd Calabria; and on the other hand, the ancient Calabria losing its old Name, was first call'd Longobardia, or Puglia, and afterwards Terra d'Otranto, and Terra di Bari; for as we have said, the Greeks before the coming of the Emperor Constans to Beneventum, had Possession of Sicily and the neighbouring Brutii, and extended their Dominion, besides Cosenza, over all this Coast as far as Agripoli, and the maritime Cities of Campania, Amalphis, Sorrento, Stabia, Naples and Cuma, to Gaeta on the Coast of the lower Sea; and on that of the upper Sea, they retain'd almost all the ancient Calabria, and its maritime Cities, Taranto, Brindisi, Otranto, and Gallipoli, as far as Bari; all these Places were describ'd in two Themata, and divided into two Provinces. The I. was Sicily, and the neighbouring Brutii. The II. comprehended all the other Places, tho' much separated and divided from one another, which pass'd under the Name of the ancient Calabria, and afterwards Lombardy, which at this Time was the richest and largest Province they possess'd. But after Constans was defeated, and his Army put to Flight by Grimoaldus, the Greeks were almost intirely ruin'd in that Province; for except Gallipoli and Otranto, all the Cities of Calabria, as well Inland as Maritime, were possess'd by Romualdus Duke of Beneventum, and incorporated into his Dukedom. But the Emperors who succeeded Constans, according to the wonted Vanity of the Greeks, that the Provinces of the Empire might not seem to be diminish'd in Number, the ancient Calabria not being intirely lost, there remaining still Otranto and Gallipoli, they retain'd the same Name, and applied it to the neighbouring Brutii. And since the Seat of the Prætors of this Province had been settled by the Greeks in Taranto, which City was now possess'd by the Beneventan Longobards, it behov'd them to translate it elsewhere, and to a Place where their Dominion was largest, whereupon it was remov'd to Reggio amongst the Brutii; thus Reggio being appointed the Seat of the chief Magistrate who govern'd that Province, Brutium likewise got the Name of Calabria, as did also a Part of Lucania; so that in the following Times they were oblig'd to divide it into two Provinces, which were call'd the Hither and Further Calabria; and thus was Brutium call'd Calabria by the Greeks. The Longobards, as it happens amongst Neighbours, after their Example call'd those inland Places which they possess'd in Brutium, likewise Calabria; and the Places of the ancient Calabria, from Taranto to Brindisi, which they had taken from the Greeks, they call'd no more by this Name, but Puglia, as being adjacent to the ancient Puglia, which was before in their Possession: And on the other hand, what the Greeks had lost in the ancient Calabria on the upper Sea, and which was in the Hands of the Longobards, they call'd no more Calabria, but Lombardy; and thus did this Province lose its ancient Name, which was given to another.

SUCH in these Times was the Distribution and Polity which the Greeks practis'd in the Places that had remain'd to them in these Provinces. But now it remains that we give a particular Account of the State of the Neapolitan Dukedom in this Century, and how far it extended its Borders, and how it has been able to contend with the Beneventans for its Liberty.

THE Dukedom of Naples, after Theodorus, Sergius, Crispanus, Joannes, Exbiteratus, and Petrus, had successively govern'd it, was at this Time under the Administration of Stephen Duke and Consul, who, as we have said in the foregoing Book, after his Wife's Death was by the Neapolitans elected, and by Stephen III. confirm'd Bishop of Naples, who, notwithstanding this new Dignity, not very consistent with that of Duke, did not give up the Government of the Dukedom; but only for aiding and supporting him in his Old Age, he procur'd from the Emperor Constantine, Son of Irene, who at that Time reign'd in the East, that his Son Cesarius should be given him for his Colleague and Successor; but altho' he had him for Colleague, he could not be his Successor, being snatch'd away by untimely Death, in the Flower of his Age, which was a great Affliction to his Father; who for a Monument of his Grief erected him a Tomb, on which in Acrostick Verses (for in these, at this Time, all the Sharpness of Wit and Skill of Poets consisted) he laments his Misfortune, and extols the Praise and Worth of his beloved Son. The Stone of this Tomb was formerly seen in the Churchyard of S. Januarius without the Walls of this City, and is not as yet lost, as the late Writer of the Latin History of Naples believes, but by some unknown Accident has been transported to Salerno, and is to be seen in the Church of the Minor Conventuals; and tho' he had never read *Chioccarelli*¹, Camillus Pellegrinus, and Maza, who relate it, he might have seen it with his own Eyes in Salerno, not far from Sorrento.

UNDER the Government of Stephen, the Borders of this Dukedom reach'd towards the West as far as Cuma; the Islands Enaria, now call'd Ischia, Nisita, and Procida, with the other maritime Places of that Neighbourhood, such as Pozzuolo, Baja, Miseno, and the fabulous Mouths of the Stygian and Avernian Lakes, and the Elysian Fields were comprehended within its Limits. Towards the South the maritime Cities of that Coast, such as Stabia, which is now call'd Castellamare, Sorrento, and Amalphis, with the Island of Caprea, were included in it.

AMALPHIS, as also Sorrento, were not only in the Time of Arechis, but even to the Time of Sicardus Prince of Beneventum, comprehended in the Neapolitan Dukedom. Amalphis had not as yet been disjoin'd from it, as it was afterwards, when being made a separate Dukedom, it extended its Bounds so much, that it became one of the most flourishing and powerful States that was in all these Provinces, whose Inhabitants were famous and renown'd for their Skill in Navigation, over all the Nations of the East, of which we shall have a more fit Occasion to discourse elsewhere. Hitherto, and for many Years after, laying aside idle Stories, 'tis clear, that Amalphis was united to the Neapolitan Dukedom, and under the Government of the Dukes of Naples; for one of the Efforts which Arechis made upon the Dukedom of Naples, was the Expedition against Amalphis, to which he laid close Siege with a powerful Army, and burnt all the open Places in its Neighbourhood; and if the Neapolitans had not gone to the Relief of that City, which was in their Dukedom, and with incredible Valour had not put to flight, and dispers'd the Beneventans, part of whom they made Prisoners, and kill'd a great many, certainly Amalphis had been taken and subjected to Arechis. Adrian, who took this Attempt of the Longo- bards against the Greeks in ill Part, gave a distinct Account of the Success of it to Charles the Great, which Letter of his is to be seen at this Day ¹, in which he calls the People of Amalphis plainly of the Dukedom of Naples. For which Cause the Neapolitans run to their Assistance.

IN the Time of Sicardus Prince of Beneventum, Amalphis as well as Sorrento was subject to the Dukedom of Naples, which is manifest from the Capitularia of this Prince, printed among the Monuments of our Longobard Princes, by Camillus Pellegrinus, wherein Sicardus promises to the Duke of Naples to observe those Capitulations, which had been agreed upon after a bloody War, as well for Naples, as for his other Cities, to wit Sorrento, Amalphis, and for all the other Castles subject to the Duke of Naples. And in Erchempertus ² we likewise read, that the Duke of Naples sent the Inhabitants of Amalphis to fight against the Capuan Longobards, in order to oblige the Prince of Salerno, with whom he had entred into a Confederacy against the Capuans. The Anonymous Salernitanus, in a History not as yet printed, in many Places takes it for granted, and says, that the Amalphitans had their annual Counts, who were appointed to govern the City, and were subject to the Dukes of Naples, as the most accurate Pellegrinus also testifies. However 'tis certain, that Sorrento was afterwards subject to the Longobards, because we read, that Landulphus created a Son of his Duke of this City ³.

BUT how far the Dukedom of Naples reach'd towards the East and North, may be easily determin'd, for it could not extend itself over the inland Places Northwards, as being all possess'd already by the Beneventans; and Capua being likewise in their Possession, much confin'd its Limits on that Side; and on the other hand Nola, Sarno, and Salerno were also subject to them. It could only keep these open Fields and some Places round about, which by the Garrison of the City, and the Strength of their Arms they were able to defend. Only Nocera, which we now call Nocera de Pagani, an inland City, maintain'd itself under the Dukedom of Naples, so that in the Year 839, Radelchisus Prince of Beneventum having sent Dauserius into Exile, he went to Nocera, ut potè urbi tunc Juris Ducatus Neapolitani, as Pellegrinus says ⁴: Just so as the Romans, who being exil'd, fulfill'd their Sentence in going to Naples, and other confederated Cities. The maritime Cities of this Province stood their Ground, because they were defended by the Sea, and by reason of their Situation, were inaccessible to the Longobards, who had no Naval Forces, for which Cause they made their greatest Conquests over the inland Cities.

THIS Dukedom retain'd also a Polity like unto that of Beneventum; for its Cities had their particular Rectores, by whom they were immediately govern'd, who were likewise call'd Counts, and were subordinate to the Dukes of Naples; the Anonymous Salernitanus says the same of Amalphis: S. Gregory the Great gives us a certain Testimony of the Count of Miseno, and he makes mention of this Count in one of his Epistles ⁵; as for Sorrento, Stabia, Cuma, and the other Places, tho' we meet with no Vestige of it in Authors, however we ought to believe, that they were also govern'd by such a Magistrate. The Dukes of Naples certainly appointed the Count of Aversa in the Time of the Normans, because they founded that City. But these Counts were not Feudatories, as they were in the Dukedom of Beneventum: They were purely Officers, and for a certain Time, because Fiefs were not known among the Greeks; whence it came that the Provinces of Calabria and Bru-tium, as well as Naples, knew them later than those which compos'd the Dukedom of Beneventum. But with what Laws Naples and its Dukedom, and the other Cities which were under the Dominion of the Emperors of the East, were govern'd in these Times, whether by those of Justinian, whose Pandects were afterwards found in Amalphis, or by the Laws of the other Emperors of the East his Successors, we shall have a more fit Opportunity to relate in another Place, when we shall give an Account of the new Compilations made by the Emperors of the East in Emulation of Justinian.

SUCH was the State of these Provinces which now make up the Kingdom of Naples, when Charles King of France, after having vanquish'd and subdu'd the Longobards in Pavia, and put in Fetters Desiderius the last King of that Nation, took upon him the Title of King of Italy, and of the Longobards, whereby he pretended to exercise all that Sovereignty over the Dukedom of Beneventum, which the other Longobard Kings his Predecessors had done.

C H A P. III.

How Arechis chang'd the Dukedom of Beneventum into a Principality, and endeavour'd to free himself altogether from Subjection to the French.

ARECHIS, to whom Desiderius had given Adelperga his Daughter in Marriage, and created him Duke of Beneventum, disdaining to be Vassal to Charles, as he had been to his Father-in-Law, and as his Predecessors had been to the preceding Kings of the Longobards, and scorning to subject himself to foreign Princes, shook off the Yoke, and trusting to the Strength of his own State, and the Hearts of his Longobards, dropt the Title of Duke, and assum'd that of Prince, that thereby he might the more plainly declare his Sentiments, which were to be free, and not subject to another. He was the first who call'd himself Prince of Beneventum, and it was the first Time that this Title was introduc'd into these our Provinces, which as to Antiquity is posterior to that of Duke, Count, or Marquis, but in Dignity and Prerogative much superior. The Anonymous Salernitanus ¹, tho' not a fabulous Writer, as Baronius ² unjustly accuses him, yet with respect to some Facts, of a Childish Wit and Learning, relates of Arechis, that when he was but a private Man, there happen'd to him a prodigious Accident, which prognosticated this new Dignity of Prince, to which he was to be advanc'd; he says, that one Day in the Church of St. Stephen in Old Capua, when many Longobard Barons, according to their Custom, all arm'd with Swords, were assembled with Duke Luitprandus, who at that Time govern'd Beneventum; among the rest Arechis, then a Youth, was present, and when every one was praying, Arechis began with a low Voice to repeat the Miserere; and being come to this Versicle, Spiritu principali confirma me, he perceiv'd his Sword to tremble, as if some Body had shaken it: Arechis, full of Astonishment and Fear, after the Prayer was ended, told his Friends what had happen'd to him. Upon which one, who was reputed the wisest, broke Silence, and said to him: Thou art not to leave this unstable Life, for what I can foresee, before the Lord advance thee to a principal Dignity. Which afterwards, adds the Salernitan, the Event prov'd, for after the Death of Luitprandus, Arechis was unanimously proclaim'd Prince of Beneventum, and rais'd to that illustrious Dignity.

BUT, whoever may take Pleasure in these and the like Puerilities, with which the Salernitan has stuffed his History, 'tis evident from Erchempertus ³, Ostiensis ⁴, and all the Chronicles which we have of the Dukes and Princes of Beneventum, that Arechis was the first among us, that assum'd the Title of Prince. He did not stop there, but in order to give the greater Proof of his absolute Empire, adorn'd himself with Royal Badges; cloathing himself with Purple and the Royal Mantle, grasping the Scepter, and putting the Crown upon his Head; and that nothing of Royal Dignity might be wanting, he likewise caus'd himself to be anointed by his Bishops, as the Kings of France and Spain were us'd to do; and in fine, he ordain'd, that the Dates of his Writs should be marked after this manner: Dat. in Sacratissimo nostro Palatio. And as on the solemn Proclamation of Christian Princes, the Custom was to place their Images in the Churches, in which these Ceremonies were perform'd, so likewise Arechis caus'd his Pictures with a Crown upon them, to be plac'd in the Churches of his Dominions; and with an absolute and independent Sway he began to govern these Provinces. He likewise assum'd the Power of making Laws, and we have as yet his Capitularia, in which he made many Regulations; in some Heads conforming himself to the Longobard Laws, and in others derogating from them; and what the Longobard Kings did over all Italy, he pretended to practise in his Principality.

IN the Code of the Monastery of the Cave several Times mention'd, among the Edicts of the Longobard Kings, we also read one of this Prince, which contains seventeen Chapters. The first begins, Si quis homo; and the last ends, Si quis hominum. *Camillus Pellegrinus*¹ translated it intirely in his History of the Longobard Princes, marking wherein it was conformable to, and wherein it was different from the Longobard Laws. The other Princes his Successors follow'd his Example, such as Adelchis, Sicardus, Radelchisus, and others, as may be seen in their Capitularia, printed by *Pellegrinus*²; so that to the Laws of the Longobards Kings were annex'd those of the Princes of Beneventum, by which these our Provinces were govern'd, and according to which the Judges decided Controversies, and administer'd Justice. The consulting about War, or Alliances, or Peace, was reserv'd to Prince Arechis; he had many Wars with the Neapolitans, and many more with the French; he assum'd to himself alone the making of Magistrates and Officers of State; the holding of Courts of Justice; the coining of Money with his own Image on it; and all the great and supreme Royal Privileges: In short, the whole Care of the State, as well Political as Military, with all the Rights of Sovereignty, was conferr'd on Arechis.

CHARLES King of France, who, after having in the Year 781. declar'd Pepin his Son King of Italy, was employ'd in other Expeditions, having heard that Arechis had thrown off the Yoke, and taken upon himself all the Royal Badges, and rul'd in Beneventum as Sovereign, and being likewise spurr'd on by Pope Adrian, who was very jealous of these Steps of the Beneventans, in the Year 786. return'd to Italy with a powerful Army; and afterwards in the Month of April of the following Year 787, he invaded the Principality of Beneventum, and threaten'd to besiege that City. Arechis this same Year 787. was involv'd in a War with the Neapolitans about the Fields of Nola, but hearing of the Arrival of Charles, who with a formidable Army was destroying his Country, he immediately concluded a Peace with the Neapolitans, being afraid they would join with the French, and granted them some Subsidies, or Diaria, as Erchempertus calls them³, in Liburia and Cemiterium, Fields about Nola most fertile in Corn and Wine.

WHEN the French Army came to Beneventum, Arechis at first made a strong and obstinate Resistance; but not having sufficient Forces to encounter a vast Army, which like Locusts were destroying every Thing in their way; he fortified Beneventum the best way he could, with strong Ramparts, and retir'd to Salerno; and it was then that this Prince surrounded this City with high Towers and strong Walls, and that our Longobards began to fortify the maritime Cities, in order to secure themselves from the Irruptions of the French, from which they were not so safe in the inland Places, as in those on the Sea-Coast, the French not having at this Time any Naval Forces to attack them; they had been taught by the Example of Desiderius, who for not having had the like Precaution, was made a miserable Prisoner in Pavia. In the mean time Charles's Army wasted the Country, and having over-run every where as far as Capua, did great Damage to the Fields, especially to those of Capua. Arechis then preferring the Safety of his Subjects to the Love of his Children, sent many Beneventan Bishops to treat with Charles, and to offer him Grimoaldus and *Adelgis*a for Hostages, and to ask Peace of him. The Conference which the Anonymous *Salernitanus*⁴ makes to have pass'd betwixt Charles and these Bishops, is so entertaining, that it deserves to be related: The King upbraided the Bishops as too audacious to appear before him, after they had anointed and put the Crown upon the Head of Arechis their Prince, which so non-plus'd them, that they knew not what Answer to make, but full of Fear, prostrated themselves with their Faces on the Ground at his Feet: The merciful King, laying aside all Wrath, treated them civilly, and made them rise up; and said to them, I see the Shepherds, but without their Flock: To which the Bishops, presuming too much on Charles's good Nature, did not stick to answer, The Wolf came, and has dispersed the Flock; the King ask'd who was that Wolf? and they answer'd, Thou art he. In fine, after a thousand idle Stories, they intreated him to accept of the Hostages, and to give them Peace, in pardoning Arechis and his People; but Charles reply'd, That he could not put a Stop to the War, having sworn, that he would live no longer, if he did not sink his Scepter into Arechis's Breast. Then one of them call'd Rodopertus, Bishop of Salerno, advis'd him to break his Oath, and gave him for an Example that of Herod, with which the King was not satisfied, but requir'd better Advice of them; the Bishops sought to put a Trick upon him, for they promis'd to deliver up Arechis to him, provided that after he had fulfill'd his Oath, he would allow him to reign in his Dominions. Whilst Charles was carried from Place to Place by the Bishops, in order to perform their Promise, at last they led him into S. Stephen's Church, where they shew'd him a very large Picture of Arechis, which was in a Corner of the Church: Behold Arechis, said they, whom thou seekest. Upon which the King being full of Indignation and Fury, threaten'd to banish them into France if they did not perform what they had promis'd; but the Bishops being terrified, prostrated themselves anew upon the Ground, began to ask Mercy, and by many Passages out of the Scriptures sought to allay his Wrath; the Anonymous Salernitanus relates, that they wrought so effectually upon him, that at last the inrag'd King going to the Picture of Arechis, and striking it strongly with his Scepter, which he had in his Hand, and giving it many Strokes on the Breast, and on the Head where the Crown was painted, said, This shall be the Fate of him who shall arrogate to himself what is not his Due; which done, the Bishops prostrated themselves again, and begg'd Peace for Arechis. Charles at last, by the Intercession of so many, granted it. Let who will believe these Puerilities; 'tis plain however according to Erchempertus, that Charles went no further than Capua, and that there being satisfied with the Hostages, he concluded Peace with Arechis, and left the Dukedom of Beneventum to be govern'd by him. The Conditions were, that Arechis should oblige himself to pay a yearly Tribute; that Grimoaldus and Adelgisa, should remain as Hostages; that he should deliver up his Treasure: All which was agreed to; and Charles sending one of his Gentlemen to Salernum, where Arechis was, to get them confirm'd, it was immediately done, and the Hostages with the Treasure were consign'd to the King. After which he return'd to France, and carried Grimoaldus along with him; but after many Intreaties Adelgisa was restor'd to her Father in Salernum. And if that be true, as it is most certain, that Charles went no further than Capua, and from thence return'd to France, and never came back to these Parts, I don't know from whence Scipio Mazzella has taken it, that Charles, in the Year 802. instituted a College in Salernum, as he had done in Paris and Bologna; for this City had never been under his Dominion, but was always a safe Refuge for the Beneventan Princes during the many Wars which they afterwards had with Pepin, whom his Father had left King of Italy.

BUT King Charles had no sooner left Capua, and return'd to France, than Arechis, little minding the Pledges given, began to treat of a League with Constantine Son of Irene, Emperor of the East, and enter'd into a strict Confederacy against Charles, and sent Ambassadors to Constantinople to seek Assistance from Constantine, together with the Honour of Patriciate; and, what was of greater Importance, he demanded of him likewise the Dukedom of Naples, with all the Places belonging to it, and that he would send him Adalgisus his Kinsman, Son of King Desiderius, who, as we have said, retir'd to Constantinople after his Father had been made Prisoner by Charles, with a strong Army; promising on his Part to subject himself to his Empire, which he would not do to Charles, and to live after the manner of the Greeks, as well in the Tonsure, as Apparel¹.

CONSTANTINE agreeing to his Demand, sent immediately two Ambassadors to Naples in order to create him Patrician, who brought him the Mantle of Cloth of Gold, the Sword, the Comb, and the Sandals, that Arcbis might put them on, and get himself shav'd as he had promis'd; requiring nothing else of him, but that he should give his other Son Romualdus as Hostage. The Ambassadors being arriv'd at Naples, were receiv'd by the Neapolitans with great Solemnity, cum bandis, & signis, says *Adrian*¹; but all these Designs came to nothing by two untimely Deaths. While these Things were transacting, in the Month of July of this Year 787, Romualdus, who had been promis'd as Hostage to the Emperor, died, whose untimely Death hasten'd that of his unhappy Father, and was never enough to be lamented by the Beneventans; David their Bishop caus'd to be engraven on the Tomb erected for him, those Verses recorded by *Camillus Pellegrinus*² in his Book of the Tombs of the Longobard Princes. A short Time after this Death follow'd that of Arcbis his Father, who after having reign'd Thirty Years in Beneventum, in the following Month of August in the same Year, was snatch'd from the Beneventans, at a Time when they stood most in need of him, leaving them in so deplorable a Condition, that being without a Head, they were, as shall be related, out of cruel Necessity forc'd to have recourse to the good Will of Charles, submitting themselves to him under too hard and heavy Conditions, in order to get him to send back Grimoaldus whom he had in Hostage. The Beneventans lamented him bitterly, and erected him a majestick Tomb in their City, whither Paul Warnefride had gone for Shelter after his Exile, who likewise bemoan'd their Misfortune, and extoll'd the shining Virtues of this Prince in many Verses, which we also read in Pellegrinus. There remain as yet some Laws of this Prince, which may be seen in his Capitularia, printed by the same Author; amongst which we ought not to pass unmention'd, that by which he prohibited the House-Monks, otherwise call'd Hypocritical Puritans. King Luitprandus had admitted them into his Kingdom, and in one of his Laws³ commended the Institution. But Arcbis having perceiv'd that under that Cloke they defil'd themselves with a thousand abominable Lusts, forbid the Cheat under severe Penalties, and order'd them to be shut up in Monasteries. Arcbis was a Prince of great Courage and Generosity, and in him Piety, Justice, Fortitude, and all the other Virtues strove which should have the Upper-hand. He with great Magnificence finish'd in Beneventum the Church of S. Sophia, begun by Gilulphus. He erected two stately Palaces, the one in Beneventum, and the other in Salernum, surrounding that City with high Towers, and very strong Walls. He was a Lover of Learning, and very much caref'd the learn'd Men of those Times, and had them in great Esteem and Veneration. He entertain'd Paul Warnefride with great Marks of Respect, when he fled from Tremiti, whither he had been exil'd by Charles the Great, and came for shelter to Beneventum; he receiv'd him graciously, and esteem'd him amongst the dearest and most faithful of his Friends; wherefore Paul, in Token of his Gratitude, compos'd that Elogy, which he caus'd to be engrav'd upon his Tomb.

C H A P. IV.

Of Grimoaldus II. Prince of Beneventum, and of the Wars he maintain'd against Pepin King of Italy.

AFTER the Death of Arechis, the Beneventans sent Ambassadors to King Charles, demanding Grimoaldus, with great Submission and Intreaties: They arriv'd in Time before the Confederacy which Arechis had enter'd into with Constantine Emperor of the East had been discover'd to the King, of which, not till a Year after, he was advis'd by Pope Adrian, which he had discover'd by the means of a Capuan Priest call'd Gregory ¹, for which Cause they could bring the King with less Difficulty to consent to their Request of granting Grimoaldus for their Prince; but before he departed, he bound him to these Conditions: That he should oblige his Longobards to shave their Beards; that in Writs, and on the Money his Name should be put first, and after it that of Grimoaldus; and that he should cause the Walls of Salernum, Acerenza, and Consa to be demolish'd from the Foundation. The King could have exacted many more, and much harder Conditions from Grimoaldus while he was in his Power. Grimoaldus being return'd to Beneventum, and receiv'd by the Beneventans with infinite Gladness; for some Time he caused the Money and Writs pass with the Name of Charles, in order to shew him that he design'd to perform the Promises he had made, and that in these Matters he would comply with him, tho' he had no Mind to dismantle the Cities; and to remove all Jealousy, after Charles had discover'd the Treaties of his Father Arechis, and the Emperor Constantine had sent Adalgisus in the Year 788. into Sicily with some Troops, that from thence he might go to Calabria, and by the Assistance of the Beneventans get himself to be proclaim'd King of Italy, (the Emperor was likewise offended with Charles, who had promis'd him his Daughter in Marriage, and afterwards refus'd to give her) did not only not concur with the Designs of Adalgisus his Uncle, but advis'd Pepin of this Expedition, by which he meant to gain his Favour, and also Hildebrand's Duke of Spoletto sent by Pepin; the unfortunate Adalgisus after having landed with many Greeks in Calabria, fighting gallantly was defeated, and amongst the rest of the Spoils he became a Prey to the Enemy, who unmercifully put him to a cruel Death by Torture, as Sigonius ² relates. But the Continuator of Aimoinus ³, Maimburg ⁴, and those who have read Theophanes in Greek, write, that it was not Adalgisus that was put to Death by Torture, but John General of the Greek Army; for this unfortunate Prince made his Escape after the Battle, and return'd with a few Followers to Constantinople, where he liv'd to be an old Man; and at last submitting to his Fortune as his Father had done, he passed the Remainder of his Life quietly in the Quality of Patrician; and indeed 'tis the usual Fate of dethron'd Princes, to meet with Pity and Compassion from those they have recourse to, who allow them the empty Title of what they once were; but either for want of Courage or Inclination, when they have it in their Power, never undertake any Thing for their Restoration, but enter into other Measures which they reckon more advantageous and convenient.

NEVERTHELESS tho' Grimoaldus, in order to remove all Suspicion from Pepin and Charles his Father, by laying aside all Ties of Blood and Nature, had thus behav'd himself, yet he still retain'd the same Designs with his Father in his Heart, and bent all his Thoughts on putting himself in a Condition to be able to govern the Principality of Beneventum with an absolute and independant Authority; he gave over all Thoughts of demolishing Salernum, Acerenza, and Consa, according to the Conditions stipulated with Charles; by Degrees he left off putting Charles's Name on the Money, and in the Writs; and having married Wanzia Niece of the Greek Emperor, made himself the more suspected. Thus a new War broke out with the French, which prov'd of long Continuance, for tho' Charles was employ'd elsewhere, Pepin, a sprightly forward Youth, who was King of Italy, could by no means suffer that absolute Empire which Grimoaldus assum'd over the Principality of Beneventum; therefore in the Year 793. he march'd with a great Army of French against him, which furrounded him on all Sides, and threaten'd him with a cruel War. Then Grimoaldus bethought himself of removing all Shadow of Suspicion, which his having a little before married Wanzia could occasion; he repudiated her, as barren, and, with unheard-of Inhumanity, sent her back again to Greece by Force. But that Dissimulation and Cunning, was of no stead to Grimoaldus; for Charles, besides his having commanded Pepin to fight him, had likewise sent Lewis his Brother to his Assistance, who went from Aquitaine to Italy, and having join'd their Forces, they march'd into the Principality of Beneventum, where they made War for many Years; and *Erchempertus*¹ relates, that tho' Charles and his Sons, whom he had now made Kings, had employ'd their best Troops in order to subdue Grimoaldus and his Beneventan Longobards; yet they were not able to put their Designs in Execution against this gallant Prince: On the contrary, the Plague having seiz'd their Armies, they were oblig'd to retire, to their great Reproach. In the Space of seven Years, and after so many bold and obstinate Contests, in the Years 800 and 801. they were only able to take Cbieti in Abbruzzo, with some Places in the Neighbourhood; and tho' the following Year they also took Lucera in Puglia, it was soon retaken by Grimoaldus, and Guinichisus Duke of Spoletto, with all the Garrison which Pepin had left for the Guard of that City, were made Prisoners. In short, all the Time that Pepin reign'd in Parva, and Grimoaldus in Beneventum, Erchempertus says², that there was not one Moment of Peace betwixt them; forasmuch as these two Princes being both young, and bent upon War, each of them thought his Honour engag'd to carry the Point. Pepin, by seeing himself furrounded by so many couragious and gallant Captains, and so powerful Armies, Grimoaldus being supported by the Forces of his greatest Barons, and by the many Cities which he had likewise fortify'd and garrison'd, mock'd the Power of his Enemy, and contemn'd and undervalu'd his Armies. Pepin was wont frequently to send Ambassadors to Grimoaldus with this Message: Volo quidem, & ita potenter disponere conor, ut sicuti Arechis genitor illius subjectus fuit quondam Desiderio Regi Italiae, ita sit mihi, & Grimoadt; to which Message Grimoaldus answer'd in these Verses.

*Liber & ingenuus sum natus utroque parente,
Semper ero liber, credo, tuente Deo.*

THUS did Grimoaldus check the Boldness and Power of the French whilst he reign'd in Beneventum. This invincible Prince died in the Year 806, without leaving Male-Children, Gothofredus his Son dying before him, whose Tomb is to be seen in the Church of St. Sophia in Beneventum, also mention'd by *Pellegrinus*³. The Beneventans after they had bitterly lamented him, as they had done Arechis, erected a magnificent Tomb to his Memory, extolling and engraving on it his heroick and famous Deeds. He was always Victorious both over the French and the Greeks; and the Verses upon his Tomb⁴ shew as yet his Valour against the French, who never could boast of having subdu'd him.

*Pertulit adversas Francorum sæpe Phalangas

Charles the Great, from a Patrician became Roman Emperor: His Election, and what Part Pope Leo III. acted in it.

WHILST the French under Pepin with so much Cruelty and Boldness were making War against the Beneventans under Grimoaldus, Charles the Great, after having subdu'd the Saxons, and visited many Places of his vast Empire, at last in the Year 795. he stopp'd in Aix la Chapelle, with which City, on account of the Pleasantness of its Situation, and the Places about it, he was so delighted, that he adorn'd it with a magnificent Church; while he was here, the News was brought him of the Death of Adrian, which fell out in Rome in the Year 796. He was exceedingly lamented by Charles, and so great was his Grief, that he publish'd it by an Elogy which he compos'd himself, and caus'd it to be put on his Tomb. He likewise heard a little after, that the Roman People and Clergy had in his Room elected Leo a Cardinal Priest, who was call'd Leo III. and who notified his Election to him by his Legates, declaring likewise his Resolution of following the Footsteps of his Predecessors, in acknowledging none other but him, for his own and the Church's Protector: Moreover, as Charles was a Patrician of Rome, he sent him the Standard of the City, with many other Presents, at the same time intreating him to send one of the Lords of his Court, to receive from him the Oath of Fidelity, which the People of Rome was willing to take to him¹, who a long Time before had begun to shake off the Yoke of the Greeks, and who intended now to set themselves altogether free of it. Charles accepted of the Presents and the Homage, which the Chief City of the World offer'd him, and he chose his Son-in-Law Angilbertus, for taking the Oath of the Romans, that they would acknowledge him for their Lord: In effect, by Virtue of these Treaties which Leo had made with Charles, the Patriciate was converted into Sovereignty; and from this Time it was, that he exercis'd sovereign Power in Rome, administering Justice by his Commissaries, and himself, as was judiciously observ'd by *Peter de Marca*²; and besides that, out of his Royal Bounty and Generosity, he sent the Pope by Angilbertus a great Part of the immense Treasure which he had got in the War against the Huns, which he had a little before finish'd with the Conquest of Pannonia; and upon Occasions that offer'd, imitating his Father Pepin, he made it his Business to assist him in all the Persecutions which he suffer'd, and to protect and advance the Church of Rome with all his Might, as he had done by Adrian his Predecessor. Pascal and Compelus, Nephews of Adrian, and many principal Lords of that Party, were Leo's Enemies, who took it in ill Part that the new Pope had alter'd many Things done by Adrian; and besides, accus'd him as guilty of many abominable Crimes, but not being able afterwards to shew any Vouchers for them, one Day while he was altogether intent on a Publick and sacred Function, fell upon him, and gave him many mortal Wounds, dragg'd him thorough the Streets, and did what they could to put out his Eyes, and cut out his Tongue; but he defended himself the best way he could, and being all over Bloody, he was shut up in close Prison in the Monastery of S. Gerasini; but was afterwards set at Liberty by his Partisans, and Guinigisus Duke of Spoletto, who after having convey'd him to Spoletto, sent him with many Bishops to Charles, together with many Noblemen that were willing to bear him Company. He was receiv'd by Charles in Paderbone, with the same Respect that his Father Pepin had receiv'd Stephen, and was treated with exceeding great Honour, and the utmost Magnificence; where Leo was at full liberty to shew his Innocence, and what he had wrongfully suffer'd, and wherein he had been falsely accus'd by his Enemies.

BUT at the same Time the Conspirators at Rome, by the Absence of the Pope, were become more haughty, and did what they could to baffle Leo; they sent many Accusations to Charles, by which they charg'd Leo as guilty of many grievous Crimes. The King thought it best to send him back to Rome with a magnificent Retinue, in order to have a judicial Cognizance taken of the Merits of this Cause, and he sent along with him ten Commissioners, two Archbishops, five Bishops, three Counts, and many Frenchmen, who were to be Judges of this Affair. The Pope was receiv'd in Rome with solemn Acclamations, and much Pomp; and when the Charge brought against Leo by Pascal and Compolus, and their Adherents, in order to excuse their horrible Attempt upon his Person, came to be examin'd into, it was found that they could prove nothing of what they had accus'd him of; therefore the Commissioners sent the Accusers under a strong Guard to the King. Charles, after having gloriously triumph'd over the Huns, was already on his March towards Italy, being invited by Pepin, who alone could not humble the Pride of Grimoaldus, who now govern'd the Principality of Beneventum with an absolute Sway; and being arriv'd in Italy, would go in Person to Rome, in order to try this Cause, and to give the Pope that Justice which he demanded of him.

CHARLES was receiv'd by Leo, the Clergy and People of Rome, on the 24th Day of November, in the Year 799, with greater Marks of Respect and Esteem than ever had been shewn; and this Prince a few Days after his Arrival caus'd an Assembly of the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, and all the Roman and French Lords, to meet in St. Peter's Church, and himself and the Pope being present, he order'd this Business to be examin'd, and a strict Inquiry made into the Crimes wherewith Leo had been charg'd; but on the one hand there appearing no Proof, nor Testimony for supporting these Calumnies; and on the other hand, all the Prelates protesting, that neither the Holy See, nor the Pope ought to be judg'd by any Person, and that it belong'd to himself to be his own Judge; then the Pope said, that according to the Example of his Predecessors, he was ready to judge himself after the same manner that they had done more than once; therefore the next Day he mounted the Pulpit, and holding in his Hand the Book of the Holy Evangelists, in the Sight of all, by a solemn Oath he clear'd himself, and loudly protested, and swore, that he was innocent of all the Crimes laid to his Charge by his Persecutors. Upon which all the Church echo'd again with the Acclamations of so august an Assembly, who receiv'd this Protestation and Oath of the Pope as an Oracle, and were fully convinc'd of his Innocence. Thus Leo being justified in the Opinion of every Body, which was the Thing Charles thought of greatest Importance, the Trial of Pascal and his Accomplices was put off to another Assembly.

THIS Pope lying under so many Obligations to Charles, bethought himself how he might be able to make suitable Returns¹, and for the Time to come engage the King's Protection and Assistance to the Church of Rome, seeing there was nothing to be expected from the Emperor of the East, but much to be fear'd. For this end he hit upon the best Thought that a Man could have imagin'd, to bind this Prince more than ever to the Apostolical See; and tho' at that Time it was look'd upon as a Piece of pure Form and Ceremony, it has been since interpreted as one of the most powerful Claims to the Temporal Dominion over the Catholick World, the Popes can boast of; and the Flatterers of that Court have so cunningly colour'd and varnish'd it over, as for many Ages to persuade all Italy, and a great Part of the West, of the Truth of it. The Story was, he rais'd Charles from a Patrician, to Roman Emperor, which they call'd a Translation of the Empire of the West to the French; tho' in reality it added nothing to Charles but a more specious and august Title, which Theodorick and the other Kings of Italy might have assum'd, but never minded it.

SOME French Writers ¹ would have us believe, that Charles as little minded this specious Title as Theoderick did; and that Leo, so much beholden to him, was the chief Manager, who concerting the whole with the Romans, and the other People who were then in Rome, without Charles's Knowledge, proclaim'd him Roman Emperor, and put on him the Purple and the Imperial Crown, whilst he was in the Church celebrating the Feast of the Holy Nativity: But let those that are simple and ignorant of the Circumstances which preceded this Action, believe it; 'tis manifest that Charles upon other Occasions, which remain upon Record ², aspir'd after this Title, which in some respect was due to his Merit, and the vast Empire he had acquir'd partly by Right of Succession, and partly by Arms, as we shall shew anon.

SURELY the great Theodorick King of Italy, perhaps with greater Reason, might have assum'd this Title of Emperor of the West, to which he would likewise have obtain'd the Consent of Leo Emperor of the East; but he, as we have said in the Third Book of this History, laying aside the Gothick Dress, would not put on the Imperial Diadem, but only the Kingly Ensigns, and would only be proclaim'd King of the Goths and Romans; and Procopius relates, that there was nothing wanting to this Prince but only the Title of Emperor, which he would not assume, but in reality he was such, as well with respect to the Sovereignty of his Empire, as the Extent of his Dominions. He not only, after the Example of the other Emperors of the West, had fix'd his Seat in Ravenna, governing there all Italy, but he had likewise under his Dominion Sicily, Rhetia, Noricum, Dalmatia, with Liburnia and Istria, and a Part of Suevia, and that Part of Pannonia where Sigetinum and Sirmium stood. He also possess'd a Part of Gallia, for which he was often at War with the French: And lastly, as Tutor to Amalarick, his Nephew, he govern'd Spain; therefore if Theodorick had been willing to assume this Title, and go to Rome to get the Pope, who was his Subject, to crown and anoint him, as the Practice then was amongst the Christian Princes, it would likewise have been said, that the Popes had transferr'd the Empire of the West from the Romans to the Goths, as is now said of this Translation made to the French.

SEEING by this Fact Charles acquir'd nothing else but the bare Title of Roman Emperor, and the Romans and the Pope who proclaim'd him, neither did, nor could give him more; 'tis clear that this Title imply'd nothing of Right in it over the other States and Kingdoms of the West, which for a long Series of Years had been under the Dominion of other Princes; we ought to consider, that a long time before this Prince was call'd Emperor, the Greek Emperor had already lost the Dominion of almost all the Provinces of the West, which had pass'd Jure Belli, under the Dominion of other Princes, and of Charles himself for the greatest part; so that as this Title made him nothing the Richer, neither did it take any Thing from the Emperor of the East, or the other Princes, in the Kingdoms and States which they possess'd.

CHARLES had already driven the Longobards out of Italy, who had been Lords of it, and had subjected it to his Empire. Rome, which had once been the Seat of the Empire of the West, from the Time of Leo Isauricus, had begun to shake off the Yoke; and tho' the Greeks had preserv'd a Shadow of their Dominion in it, yet it was at last given to Charles the Great, who receiv'd the Oath of Fidelity by Angilbertus, as is recorded by the gravest Historians; and before he assum'd this new Title, he had exercis'd the Rights of Sovereign in it, which is evident to whoever will but consider the Accusations laid against Leo; for tho' he allow'd the Romans to be govern'd by their own Laws, and the same Magistrates, yet the supreme Power was reserv'd to him as Patrician, and which he afterwards retain'd as Emperor; and tho' the Exarchate of Ravenna, which formerly was the Seat of the Emperors of the West, and afterwards of the Exarchs, who were the chief Magistrates of the Emperors of the East in Italy, had been taken from the Longobards, and given to the Church of Rome, yet both Pepin and Charles the Great retain'd the Right of Sovereignty and chief Dominion in it: In short, almost all Italy, except these our Provinces, was already under the Dominion of Charles before he assum'd this Title. 'Tis likewise certain, that this Prince, both by Succession and Conquest, possess'd as large Dominions in the West, as ever any Emperor had from the Time of the Divi-front of the Empire; for besides the Gallia, in which he reign'd by Succession, as King of France, he had conquer'd Part of Spain, as far as the Ebro. By the same Right of Conquest he possess'd Istria, Dalmatia, all Pannonia to the Confines of Bulgaria and Thrace, and likewise all Dacia, containing Walachia, Moldavia, and Transylvania. And tho' he had not that Part of Spain on the other Side of the Ebro, and that Part of Africa which belong'd to the Empire of the West, before the Vandals, and a long time after the Saracens had possess'd themselves of it; yet on this Side he had what the Romans could never conquer, to wit, all that vast Extent of Country which lies betwixt the Rhine and the Vistola, the Northern Ocean and the Danube, which is now divided amongst so many Princes, free Cities, and Commonwealths, one Part of which only makes now what we call the Roman Empire; and *Eginardus*¹ writes, that the Kings who at that Time reign'd in Great-Britain, were so submissive to him, that in their Letters they always call'd him their Lord, and subscrib'd themselves his Servants and Subjects.

THE Empire then of the West having ceas'd for three Ages, and being divided into so many Principalities and Kingdoms, many of which being united in the Person of Charles, some by Right of Succession, and very many by that of Conquest, he came to possess much more in the West than the other Emperors of the West, particularly those from Honorius down to Augustulus; and we ought not to think it strange, that the Subjects of Charles, who were properly such, proclaim'd him likewise Emperor, and gave him that august Title, very proper and agreeable to his vast Empire which he had in the West. In effect, this Title was not only given him by the Pope, who carried on this Affair, and the Romans, but likewise by all the People of the different Nations that Charles brought to Italy with him. *Paulus Æmilius*², and many other Writers more ancient than he, relate, that this Prince was accompanied into Italy, not only by a great many French Lords, but also by an infinite Number of others of different Nations that were subject to him, such as Saxons, Burgundians, Teutones, Dalmatians, Bulgarians, Pannonians, Transylvanians, and others.

AND it is most certain from the same Authors, that the third Day after the Cause of Leo had been discuss'd, being that on which the Birth-Day of our Saviour was celebrated, this Prince went to the Church of St. Peter, in order to solemnize the same with great Pomp, and enter'd the Church attended by the Pope and many Prelates, and Roman Magistrates, and accompanied by all the French and Roman Noblemen, with a great Train of other Followers, where he found an infinite Multitude of People, not only Romans, but of many other Nations. Charles had no sooner ended his Prayers at the Sepulchre of the Holy Apostles, than the Pope, who for that end had ready prepared the Imperial Mantle, and a rich Crown of Gold, made a Signal to the Roman Magistrates, and the Barons that were about him, who were intent on what he was about to do, and put the Crown upon his Head, and began with all the rest to cry out: To Charles the August, crown'd by God, the great and pacifick Emperor of the Romans, Life and Victory³; and these Words ecchoing from all Corners, the Pope, the Senate, the Romans, the French, and the mixt Multitude of all Nations, unanimously with one Voice, and the same Spirit began to cry aloud with all their Strength, the same Words, which they repeated three times⁴. After the Acclamation of the People was over, Leo, who had prepar'd every Thing for so august a Ceremony, gave him the sacred Unction, which thereafter never any Emperor of the West receiv'd, and cloathed him with a long Imperial Mantle, after the Roman Fashion; he likewise anointed Pepin, who was present at this Solemnity, as King of Italy: And after Charles had receiv'd from the Pope, the Senate, and all the rest that were present, all the Honours which were wont to be paid to the ancient Roman Emperors, by acknowledging him for their Sovereign; he for his Part swore, that he would always be the Protector and Defender of the Holy Roman Church, to his Knowledge and Power; from that Time forth, laying aside the Title of Patrician, he took that of Augustus and Emperor, which he transmitted to his Posterity⁵.

BEHOLD what is call'd the Translation of the Empire of the West to the French, whence the Popes can infer nothing for supporting their high Pretensions; for tho' Leo, as one of the chief Men of the City of Rome, had carried on this Affair, to whom it was of greater Importance than to any other Person, in order to oblige Charles the more to protect his Church, and likewise to yield intirely all that his Predecessors had gain'd over Rome, yet 'tis very well known to those who understand the Augustan History, that anciently the Roman Emperors were wont to be proclaim'd no otherwise. The Acclamations were made by the People and the Soldiers, but the Person who was thus to be proclaim'd, was propos'd to them by some private Men; therefore no Body dream'd of attributing the Election to those few who propos'd the Person, and not to the People and Soldiers who proclaim'd and saluted him Emperor; and besides, those Acclamations denoted not only the present, but likewise the previous Consent of the People. Much less can they support their Claim by the Coronation and Unction of Charles by Leo; for we believe it has ever been evident to all the World, that these were but pure Ceremonies, and did not in the least belong to the Essentials of Empire; at that rate it may be said, that they who perform them, by the very Action give the Empire or Kingdom. These Ceremonies were introduc'd by the Christian Princes, perhaps in imitation of the ancient Kings of Judea, who caused themselves to be anointed by the Priests; and the first who introduc'd them into the West, were the Kings of Spain, and those of France, follow'd by others afterwards, and those of the East likewise began to use them'. In France the most Christian King receives this Ceremony from the Bishop of Rheims. The King of Spain from the Bishop of Toledo. The Kings of Italy were wont to be anointed and crown'd by the Archbishops of Milan; those of England by the Archbishop of Canterbury; those of Hungary by the Bishop of Strigonium; and other Kings by their own Bishops: In fine, our Archbis, Prince of Beneventum, as we have seen, would have himself anointed and crown'd by his Beneventan Bishops; and he would be void of all Sense who would say, that these Bishops made or appointed so many Princes, Kings, or Emperors.

LIKEWISE in the East in the sixth Century, the Emperor Justin made himself to be crown'd by *John*² Patriarch of Constantinople; and also this Emperor six Years after would be crown'd anew by Pope John. Many Princes, not once, but many times would have this Ceremony perform'd; Pepin Father of Charles the Great, caus'd himself to be anointed, the first Time by Boniface Archbishop of Mentz; and three Years after by Pope Stephen. Charles himself was twice anointed and crown'd; and in imitation of his Father, caus'd the same to be done to his Sons Pepin King of Italy, and Lewis King of *Aquitaine*³. These Ceremonies then do not confer Empires or Kingdoms, but suppose him who useth them to be already Emperor or King; in like manner, it would be absurd to infer from the Oath which Charles took, to protect and defend the Church of Rome to the utmost of his Power, that it was an Oath of Fidelity or Vassallage, as some have likewise dream'd.

BUT as the Popes can draw nothing from this Fact, much less can Charles himself, or the other Emperors his Successors, reap any Advantage from so august and specious a Title, with respect to other Princes that were not subject to him. No Right could accrue to him anew with regard to others; and therefore those Princes retain'd their Kingdoms free and independent, whence with Reason they reckon themselves true Monarchs, and their States as true Monarchies: Therefore the Kings of Spain, as being always free and absolute Lords of their Dominions, value themselves justly on their Kingdom's being a Monarchy, in no respect subject to the Empire of the West. *Cujacius*⁴, and some French Writers say, that the Kingdom of England once acknowledg'd itself as Feudatory to the Empire, but *Arthur Duck*⁵, and other English Writers, constantly deny it. Charles himself, and all the other Emperors his Successors, exercis'd Sovereign Authority in Italy, not by Virtue of the Imperial Title, but as King of Italy, which he and his Successors were, and therefore caus'd themselves to be proclaim'd such in Milan, and anointed and crown'd such by the Archbishop of that City; and they added their own to the Longobard Laws, not as Emperors, but as Kings of Italy, and Successors to the Longobard Kings. Charles had a Design, as Paulus Æmilius relates ¹, of uniting France to the Empire, and of subjecting her to its Laws; but the Grandees of France abhorr'd such an Union: Cur milites tuos, said they, Regnum tuum, Franciam tuam, Imperii Provinciam facere studes, Imperioque subdicere? Whence the French pretend, that the Empire was rather a Member of the French Monarchy, than France of the Empire.

HOWEVER that may be, with regard to our Purpose, 'tis worthy of Observation, that Charles the Great, notwithstanding his august Title of Emperor, gain'd nothing over our Dukedom of Beneventum, or that of Naples, or over that which the Greeks yet retain'd in these our Provinces; whence it is, that this Kingdom was always reputed distinct from, and independent of the Empire newly started up in the West, and therefore justly boasts of the Honour of a true Monarchy. Though Charles the Great was now become more august than ever, both in Titles and noble Actions, yet Grimoaldus Prince of Beneventum, would not subject himself to his Empire. The War made by him and Pepin his Son against Grimoaldus, was now more obstinately and cruelly prosecuted than ever; and Grimoaldus boldly vow'd that he would continue free as he was born, and always resisted the French, as he did Pepin who had undertaken to humble him, and, tho' in vain, to reduce Beneventum under his Obedience. And not only the People of those Cities of our Kingdom, that had continu'd under the Empire of the Greeks, did not acknowledge Charles for Roman Emperor, looking upon that Title as belonging to the Emperor of Constantinople; but the Beneventans themselves were of the same Mind, so that the Anonymous Salernitanus did not deserve those Reproaches from Pellegrinus, because in his History, speaking of those Bishops who gave that Title to Charles the Great, he says, they gave it him, because all his Courtiers and Followers call'd him so; for, says he, none can be call'd Emperor, but he who governs the Roman Kingdom, that is to say, the Constantinopolitan; and the Kings of France at that Time usurp'd this Title, which formerly they never claim'd ²; a Title which for a long Series of Years was always disputed with Charles's Successors, by the Emperors of the East; for tho' the Empress Irene, and afterwards Nicephorus, had entred into an Alliance with Charles, and in settling the Bounds of the two Empires, in order to establish fix'd Limits, and remove all Occasion of Dispute, had reckon'd upon having the Principality of Beneventum as a Boundary and Barrier, and by the Treaty concluded betwixt them, had confirm'd the Title of Emperor to Charles the Great: nevertheless the Emperors of the East, Successors to Nicephorus, broke thro' all these Treaties, and made War against his Successors, not only for the Provinces, which they pretended had been taken from their Empire, but also for this Title of Emperor, which by no means they would allow them; neither were they ever nam'd Emperors, or Kings of Italy by them, but only Kings of France. On the contrary, the Emperor Basilus, having had some Letters brought him by the Legates of Pope Adrian II. in which King Lewis call'd himself Emperor, he order'd the Title of Emperor to be raz'd out of them, and sent an Ambassador to Lewis, whom he exhorted by his Letters, that for the future he would abstain from taking the Title of Emperor; but Lewis answer'd the Complaints of Basilus by a very grave and bold Letter, which is recorded by Baronius ³ in his Annals, and by Frederick Morelli ⁴, in his Notes on the Themata of Constantinus Porphyrogenitus, who likewise imitating the Example of Basilus his Grandfather, never gave the Title of Emperors to the Successors of Charles, but call'd them simply Kings of France. These our Provinces then continu'd, from the Time of the Rise of this new Empire of the West, disjoin'd from, and independent of the Empire, while it was govern'd by the French, and much more when it was confin'd to a part of Germany, and fell into the Hands of the Germans and other Nations, as shall be clearly shewn in the Course of this History.

CHARLES, at the Intercession of Leo, having sent his Accusers into Exile, (tho' they had been condemn'd to Capital Punishment) spent the Beginning of this Year 801. in Rome, and in the Month of April left that City, and went to Pavia, where to the Edicts of the Longobard Kings his Predecessors he added new Laws, more suitable and necessary to the present Circumstances of Italy. He made many other Laws concerning Ecclesiastical Matters; and after the Custom of France, before he publish'd them, he not only conven'd the State of the Nobles, Magistrates and Judges, as the Longobards used to do, but likewise the Ecclesiastical State of Bishops, Abbots, and other Prelates of the Church; for at this Time the third State of the Kingdom had not as yet any Share in the Publick Affairs and Deliberations in *France*¹. These his Laws, which he establish'd in Pavia as King of Italy, are to be read as yet in the Code of the Monastery of the Cave, after the Edicts of the other Longobard Kings his Predecessors; whence it is, that in the three Books of the Longobard Laws, the Compiler of them has likewise inserted some of those, amongst which there's one², wherein not only the Romans, but also the Longobards, hadt heir Laws left intire to them; and *Charles Sigonius*³ declares, that these Laws are likewise preserv'd in Modena, the Preamble of which he relates to be such as those which the Longobard Kings were wont to put before their Edicts. What the Goths and Longobards call'd Edicta, the French call'd Capitularia. They were so call'd, because, as *Doviat*⁴ says, they were dispos'd into Chapters or Heads. And after their Example other Princes likewise call'd their Laws Capitularia: Our Longobard Princes, however cruel and obstinate Enemies they were to the French, yet they did not think it below them to imitate them in that; whence the Laws that were establish'd in the Principality of Beneventum, by these Princes, were call'd Capitularia; and therefore we read in Camillus Pellegrinus, the Capitularia of Arechis, Sicardus, Radelchisus, Adelchis, and other Beneventan Princes.

CHARLES not only left the Roman and Longobard Laws intire, but as far as the Circumstances of those barbarous and dark Times could bear, he endeavour'd to restore the Roman Jurisprudence to some Lustre. In doing of which he did not consult the Books of Justinian, which at that Time were little known, and of less Authority in the West, but the Theodosian Code and its Compend compil'd by Alarick; and tho' his Application to military Affairs, the want of Professors, and the Ignorance of the Age, hinder'd him from accomplishing his Design, yet he corrected, the best way he could, the Compend of Alarick, from which the Roman Law was quoted in the Courts before the Judges.

PEPIN King of Italy follow'd the Example of his Father; we have as yet his *Capitularia*⁵, which he publish'd as King of Italy, which likewise, after the Edicts of the Longobard Kings, we read in the abovemention'd Code of the Monastery of the Cave; and we find many of his Laws extracted from it, inserted in the Volume of the Longobard Laws⁶; whence we clearly see, that the Laws which Charles, and the other Emperors of the West his Successors, establish'd as Kings of Italy, and which are inserted in the Body of the Longobard Laws, had Force and Vigour in Italy, not because they were made by them as Emperors, but as they were Kings of Italy. Thus Pepin, who never was Emperor (therefore these Inscriptions in the Volume of the Longobard Laws ought to be corrected, which some of his Laws bear, of Imperator Pipinus) but made King of Italy while his Father Charles was alive, made his Laws, which were in full Force there (as being only King) and they were reckon'd amongst the Longobard Laws of the Kings of Italy.

PEPIN died about the End of the Year 810, after Charles his Father had concluded Peace in Aix la Chapelle, with Nicephorus, and he died very young, at the Age of Thirty-three, in the 29th Year of his Reign, leaving only one natural Son call'd Bernard, about twelve or thirteen Years old, who two Years after was by his Grandfather created King of Italy.

ABOUT the End of the Year 811, Charles, eldest Son of the Emperor, likewise died, to whom his Father had design'd to have given France, with Touraine, and a Part of the Kingdom of Burgundy: He left no Children; so that of three Sons which he had design'd as Successors in his Dominions, there remain'd only Lewis King of Aquitaine; therefore he made him his Collegue in the Empire, and caus'd him to be crown'd in Aix la Chapelle, in the Month of September of the following Year 813. At last the Invincible Charles likewise died, in the 70th Year of his Age, and the 47th of his Reign, a Prince who fill'd the World with his Fame, and who deservedly acquir'd the Surname of Great; he died in Aix la Chapelle, in the Year 814, the 28th Day of January, leaving for Successor in the Empire, and Kingdoms of France, Aquitaine, and Germany, Lewis his Son, surnam'd the Pious or Good, and Bernard his Grandchild King of Italy.

C H A P. VI.

Of Grimoaldus II. Sico, and Sicardus, Princes of Beneventum, and the Peace which they made with the French, and of their Wars with the Neapolitans.

IN the mean time, by the Death of Grimoaldus, which fell out in the Year 806, without leaving Male-Issue (Gottifredus having died before him) another Grimoaldus was advanc'd to the Principality of Beneventum, who had been his Treasurer; therefore Sigonius made a palpable Error in reckoning these two but one Grimoaldus. This was a Prince of a very different Genius from that of his Predecessor, of a courteous Behaviour, and much inclin'd to Peace, who in order to free his State from the continual Incurfions of the French, resolv'd to agree upon a settled Peace with them; and Pepin being dead, for that end he sent Ambassadors to the Emperor, who had not as yet declared Bernard his Grandchild King of Italy. Charles, who was at this Time employ'd against the Rebels in Britany and the Sclavonians, hearken'd to it, and contenting himself with the Tribute offer'd by Grimoaldus, concluded a Peace with him¹. From this Time forth the Principality of Beneventum continu'd Tributary to the Emperors of the West as Kings of Italy, and the Beneventans were for a long time in Peace with the French.

ON the other hand Grimoaldus gave Peace to the Neapolitans; these two People the Beneventans and Neapolitans were almost always disputing together, and being Rivals and Neighbours, never wanted Pretexts for War. This Prince made Peace betwixt them; but his Destiny had ordain'd, that it should not be of long Duration, by an Occasion which we shall relate. At this Time the Dukedom of Naples was govern'd under the Emperor Leo, surnam'd the Armenian, by Theodore Duke and Master of the Soldiers, who having made Peace with Grimoaldus, manag'd the Dukedom with the utmost Ease and Tranquillity; but a noble Beneventan call'd Dauserius, and on account of a Defect in his Speech, surnam'd the Stammerer, of a turbulent Nature, and an ambitious Temper, disturb'd this settled Tranquillity, and basely conspir'd against Grimoaldus, who had a great Esteem for him, and resolv'd to throw that Prince into the Sea², as he cross'd a Bridge near to Salernum; but the Conspiracy being discover'd, and he having pass'd the Bridge safely, the Conspirators were immediately imprison'd: Dauserius, who was not present, hearing of it, forthwith fled to Naples, where he was made welcome by the Neapolitans, and Duke Theodore took him under his Protection. At which Prince Grimoaldus was very much offended, whereupon in order to revenge himself of the Injury, he quickly assembled, the best way he could, both his Land and Sea-Forces, and march'd towards Naples; and being come near the Walls, he saw a Multitude of People in Arms ready to repulse him. Then Grimoaldus, inflam'd with Indignation and Revenge, resolv'd to fight them. The Battle was cruel both by Sea and Land, and the Slaughter of the Neapolitans so great, that for upwards of seven Days, the Water on the Sea-shore was stain'd with the Blood of the Dead; Erchempertus relates ¹, that in his Time, the Graves where the Heaps of the dead Bodies of the kill'd had been laid, were to be seen, Five thousand having been kill'd on the Spot in this Battle; only Duke Theodore, and the infamous Dauserius made their Escape by flight; and being pursu'd, they at last got within the Walls of the City; but they were not quite out of Danger there, for tho' they were full of Rage, and had their Arms in their Hands, the Neapolitan Women, whose Husbands had been kill'd in the Battle, fell upon them, calling them infamous Traytors, and bidding them restore their Husbands, who by their means had been kill'd in the unjust War against the Beneventans.

IN the mean time Grimoaldus pursu'd the Runaways till he came to the Capuan Port, and finding it shut, struck it with his Rapier, there being none there to resist him. The Neapolitans having lock'd all the Ports, shut themselves up in the City, designing to defend themselves the best way they could. In the mean time the Duke having quieted the Tumults, and silenc'd the Clamours of the Women, began to sollicite for Peace; and so great was his Cunning and Influence, that he prevail'd with Grimoaldus, a mild and merciful Prince, to consent and be satisfisd with 8000 Crowns of Gold, as a Ransom, and that Dauserius should be deliver'd to him; and so great was his Clemency, that he not only pardon'd all his Treason and Villainy, but likewise receiv'd him into his former Favour.

BUT this was not the last Misfortune that this Prince's Fate had carv'd out for him; for altho' he had escap'd this Conspiracy, yet a few Years after another irreparable one was hatch'd, in which the Conspirators at last prevail'd in murdering him. The Heads of this Conspiracy were Radechis Count of Consa, and Sico Castaldus of Acerenza. Sico was a Man of great Authority in Spoletto, and for having oppos'd the Designs of Pepin, was in Disgrace with him; so that being afraid of him, he retir'd to Beneventum, as a safe Sanctuary, where he was kindly receiv'd by Prince Arechis, who made him Castaldus of Acerenza, and entertain'd him with so much Affection and Favour, that he put him in hopes of being made his Successor ²: Grimoaldus his Son likewise lov'd him; but afterwards he seeing this Grimoaldus II. preferr'd to himself, he bore it very impatiently, because he aspir'd to the Principality; and having join'd with Radechis, they surpriz'd this unhappy Prince, whom they kill'd in the Year 817, and Radechis managing the whole, Sico, tho' a Stranger, was by the Beneventans advanc'd to the Principality of Beneventum. Radechis afterwards repenting of so great a Villainy, became a Monk in Monte Cassino ³.

Of SICO IV. Prince of Beneventum.

SICO the IVth Prince of Beneventum, in order to govern with the more Security, and extend his Principality by incroaching on the Neapolitans, in the first Year of his Reign renew'd the Peace formerly made by Grimoaldus with the French; and in this Year 818. he confirm'd it with Lewis the Good, who, by the Death of Bernard, had likewise succeeded in the Kingdom of Italy, and promis'd to pay pay him Tribute. Afterwards, out of his turbulent and ambitious Temper, he made a sharp and cruel War with the Neapolitans; in the mean time he assum'd Sicardo his Son for Collegue, who married the Daughter of Dausferius ¹.

'TIS said the Pretence for this War was, becaule the Neapolitans had drove away their Duke Theodore, his intimate and dear Friend, and had elected Stephen in his Room. He invested Naples both by Sea and Land with a close Siege, and having beat down a part of the Walls towards the Sea, was already preparing to enter at that Breach in Triumph; and he certainly would have succeeded at this Time in subjecting Naples to his Principality, which none of his Predecessors ever could accomplish, if the Craftiness and Deceit of Duke Stephen and the Neapolitans had not prevented him; for the Duke having desir'd Peace of him, by offering to deliver up the City, which had already yielded to the Conqueror, begg'd him to delay his Entry till the next Morning, when he would be in a Condition to make a more glorious and triumphant Entry ²; and that Sico might give Credit to what he said, he sent him as Hostages, dear enough Pledges, his own Mother, and his two Sons. Sico believ'd him, and the next Morning, whilst he was preparing to enter the City in Pomp and Triumph; the Neapolitans having in all haste in the Night-time repair'd the Wall, appear'd very early ready to defend it. Sico and Sicardus his Son mightily inrag'd, batter'd the City more furiously and obstinately, in order to oblige it to surrender; but the Neapolitans equally obstinate, repuls'd the Attacks with the same Boldness and Fury, so that for a long time after, this War continu'd much more bloody and cruel. The Neapolitans, forc'd by cruel Necessity, and seeing themselves in the utmost Danger, at last thought of having recourse to foreign Assistance; that of the Emperor of the East was at a great Distance, who being engag'd in other Undertakings, thought of nothing less than of assisting the Neapolitans: Therefore having resolv'd to have recourse to the French, they applied themselves to the Emperor Lewis, who sent them Assistance, and tho' but small, yet it was such, that for some time they were able to defend themselves, and render all the Attempts of Sico fruitless. But the Assistance of foreign Princes being so precarious, and apt to be withdrawn on any emergent Occasion of their own; and besides, perceiving that the Boldness and Obstinacy of Sico was not in the least abated; the Neapolitans, not able to hold out the Siege any longer, by the Means of their Bishop Orso, endeavour'd to obtain Peace from Sico on the best Terms they possibly could. This Prelate took so effectual Methods, and us'd such Intreaties, that he brought Sico at last to grant it on these Conditions; That from thenceforth the Neapolitans should pay a yearly Tribute to the Princes of Beneventum, which they call'd Collatam; and that the Body of S. Januarius the Bishop, who had been a Beneventan, that was kept in the great Church of this Saint, without the Walls, and which Sico had already taken, should be carried to Beneventum. The Conditions were agreed to, and Hostages given; the Duke and the Neapolitans with a solemn Oath promising to pay the yearly Tribute agreed on betwixt them. Thus did the Dukedom of Naples become Tributary to the Principality of Beneventum, as it continu'd to be for many Years after under the succeeding Princes. Sico return'd to Beneventum, whither with great Rejoycing he carried the Body of S. Januarius, which was worshipp'd there for a long time ³. Others add, that Duke Stephen was chas'd from Naples, and by the Means of Sico was kill'd by the Neapolitans themselves, who in his Room created Bonus their Duke.

The first Invasion of the Saracens into these our Provinces.

ABOUT the same Time (as Erchempertus a Contemporary Writer relates) the Incursions of the Saracens into these our Provinces began, who coming from Africa, like Swarms of Bees infested Sicily, and after having taken Palermo, and laid waste the Cities and strong Holds of that Island, they cross'd the Sea, and landing first in Taranto, they attack'd these Countries, and occasion'd the so many Revolutions and Confusions, first among the Greeks, and then among the Beneventan Longobards, which miserably afflicted these our Provinces.

'TIS certain the Saracens are come of those Arabs, who were the Off-spring of Ishmael the Son of the Servant-Maid Hagar, for which they were call'd Ishmaelites, or Hagarens; therefore in order to conceal this their Origin, with which they were reproach'd, they took a more honourable Name, and call'd themselves Saracens, as if Ishmael their Forefather had been come of Sarah the Wife of Abraham; so says a Greek Author¹; tho' the Learned in the *Arabian*² Language and History, reckon that the Arabians took this Name from one of the most noble Parts of their Country nam'd Sarac. Others have said, that the Arabs took the Name of Saracens from their Pastoral and Vagrant manner of Life, which they led in the Fields among the dismal Sands of Beriara, and as their Pasture fail'd, chang'd their Habitations.

BEFORE Mahomet they were divided into many small Kingdoms, and likewise profess'd different Religions; some of them had embrac'd Judaism, others were Samaritans, there were also some Christians among them, and the greatest Part were Pagans. But after this Impostor, in the Year 623, had publish'd his Law, and with force of Arms establish'd it, they all receiv'd it at last, and subjected themselves to his Empire, acknowledging him not only for their Lord and Master, but likewise their Prophet.

AFTER the Death of this famous Impostor, which fell out in the Year 632, the Arabian Princes his Successors, invaded the Provinces of the Empire, and in a few Years made themselves Masters of Palestine, Judea, Syria, Phenicia, and Egypt. Afterwards they subdu'd Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Persia; whereupon being become more powerful and formidable, they added Armenia to their Dominion, from whence they spread themselves over Asia Minor; and having likewise made themselves powerful at Sea, they conquer'd the Islands of Cyprus and Rhodes: On the other hand towards the South, having gone from Egypt into Africa, they drove the Greeks out of it, and at last took Carthage. From whence in a very short time, having made themselves Masters of the whole Country, and being reinforc'd with an innumerable Multitude of African Moors, who embrac'd Mahometism, they laid hold of the Opportunity which presented itself of invading Spain.

HAVING likewise gone from Africa to Sicily, in the Year 820, they wasted that Island, burnt, pillag'd, and carried off the Christians into Slavery. They spread the Laws of the Alcoran over all the conquer'd Provinces: From Abubeker, Ali Mortoza, Omar, and Odonan, who were the immediate Successors of Mahomet, and the Explainers of his Alcoran, sprung the four Sects; the first was embrac'd by the Arabs and Moors; the second by the Persians; the third by the Turks; and the fourth by the Tartars.

FROM Sicily they landed at Taranto, from whence they drove the Greeks, and fill'd that Province with Terror and Confusion; but the Calamities were greater, when, by the intestine Broils of our Princes, they were made their Auxiliaries, which spread Ruin and Desolation over all, as we shall relate hereafter.

IN the mean time the Emperor Lewis in a general Meeting held in Aix la Chapelle, in the Year 817, having associated Lothaire his eldest Son in the Empire, and also declar'd him King of Italy, to his other two Sons, Pepin and Lewis, he gave Aquitaine and Bavaria. He afterwards confirm'd that Partition in another Meeting held in Nimeghen in the Year 821; but this Partition having occasion'd great Discord in the Royal Family, the Empire became so weaken'd, that at last having departed from the French, it was confin'd to a part of Germany, under Princes of other Nations. Besides, Lewis after having divided his Dominions among his said three Sons, born to him by Hermengarda, he married Judith his second Wife, and had by her another Son nam'd Charles, to whom by her Persuasion he assign'd Germany, Rhetia, and Burgundy; which so diminish'd the Shares of the rest, that it bred ill Blood, which was the Ground of the cruel Wars they made against their own Father and their Mother-in-Law, which turn'd not only France, but likewise Germany topsy-turvy. Afterwards the Death of Pepin King of Aquitaine, which happen'd in the Year 838, put the Empire again in Confusion, which had been for some time in Peace and Quiet; he having left two Sons Pepin and Charles, the Empress Judith had resolv'd to deprive them of the Kingdom of Aquitaine, and divide it betwixt her Sons Charles and Lothaire, without giving any Part of it to Lewis of Bavaria. But Lewis putting himself at the Head of his Army, endeavour'd to frustrate her Designs; and on the other hand the *Aquitani*ans proclaim'd one of the Sons of Pepin their King; and on the contrary the Emperor Lewis came and made them acknowledge Charles for their King, in an Assembly held in Clermont; afterwards having left his Wife and Son Charles in Poitiers, he went to Aix la Chapelle, from whence he enter'd Thuringia, and oblig'd Lewis to retire to Bavaria. He afterwards call'd a Meeting in Wormes, where he fell sick, and having caus'd himself to be transported to an Island over-against Ingolheim, near to Mentz, he died there the 20th of June in the Year 840, and before he died he sent to Lothaire the Sword and Scepter, the Ensigns of the Imperial Dignity, which he renounc'd in his Favour.

WE have as yet remaining some of the Capitularia of the Emperor Lewis the Pious, as King of Italy, which he added to those of Charles the Great his Father, and the Edicts of the other Longobard Kings of Italy his Predecessors; and we find them in the foremention'd Code of the Monastery of the Cave, with those of Lothaire his Son and Successor in the Empire, and Kingdom of Italy, which were establish'd in the Pontificate of Pope Eugene II. Stephen Balutius collected many other Capitularia of Lewis the Pious, which as Emperor he made in Aix la Chapelle; neither did he forget those, which he establish'd as King of Italy, and which are reckon'd among the *Longobard Laws*¹.

IN the mean time, tho' our Beneventan Princes, had made this Peace with the Neapolitans, it was not long before they broke it anew, by committing Acts of Hostility. Sico, under pretence that the Neapolitans were backward in paying the Tribute, renew'd the War, which continu'd all his Days. Sico died in the Year 832, after having reign'd fifteen Years in Beneventum; and the Beneventans erected him a magnificent Tomb, which they plac'd before the Door of the Cathedral Church of Beneventum, on which in many Verses they extol his glorious Deeds, which we read likewise in Pellegrinus amongst the Monuments of the other Beneventan Princes².

Of SICARDUS Vth Prince of Beneventum.

SICARDUS his Son, who during his Father's Life-time was Partner in the Government, succeeded in the Principality: Now that he reign'd alone, he had a mind to exceed his Father far in Cruelty. He prosecuted the War against the Neapolitans under pretence that they did not pay the Tribute, who however made such Resistance under Bonus their Duke, who had succeeded to Stephen, that the Beneventans having fortified themselves in Acerra and Atella, they raz'd these Forts, and put the Garrisons to flight. During the short Reign of Bonus, which lasted only one one Year and a half, under the Empire of Theophilus, who by the Death of Michael the Stammerer, his Father, govern'd at this Time in the East, the Affairs of the Greeks in these our Provinces and in Lombardy, on this Side of the Tyber, went on very prosperously¹; but this Duke dying in the Year 834, the Neapolitans were under as great Distress as ever, therefore they lamented so great a Loss, and for a Monument of their Grief they erected him a magnificent Tomb, on which in Acrostick Verses they mightily extoll'd his Virtues, and his exceeding Valour, in having repuls'd the Beneventans, tho' formidable, and much superior in Forces to the Neapolitans, and in having driven them out of Atella and Acerra, Places which they had so well garrison'd and fortified. This Tomb is yet to be seen in Naples in the Church of S. Mary, on the Market-Place of the Ward of Forcella, and which is also recorded by *Chioccarelli*², and by Pellegrinus in the History of the Longobard Princes. After the Death of Bonus, Leo his Son was created Duke, who govern'd the Dukedom of Naples only six Months, being driven out by Andrew his Father-in-Law.

BUT as the Neapolitans enjoy'd only for a short while the so many Virtues of Bonus, so on the contrary, the Beneventans for a long time were expos'd to the Cruelty and barbarous Behaviour of Sicardus, who blindly giving himself up to be guided by his Kinsman Roffridus, the Son of the infamous Dausferius, who exceeded his Father in Wickedness, by his bad Advice he carried himself so cruelly towards the Beneventans, that he put them in the utmost Despair. Roffridus by his deceitful Arts, and cunning Ways, had gain'd the Heart of Sicardus, who was so much at his Devotion, that he did nothing without his Advice. Roffridus was the Author of all the Mischief that Prince was guilty of; first by his deceitful Address, he induc'd him, without any Ground, to send Siconolphus, Sicardus's own Brother, into perpetual Banishment; he caus'd almost all the noble Beneventans to be imprison'd, and many of them to be condemn'd to Death; with this wicked Intent, that Sicardus being depriv'd both of his Kinsmen and Barons, and intirely at his Beck, he might the more easily one Day put him to Death, and possess the Principality. For the same wicked Ends, he oblig'd Sicardus to cause Majo his Kinsman to be shav'd, and shut up in a Monastery; he caus'd Alphanus, the most faithful, gallant, and illustrious Man of that Age to be strangled; so that the Beneventans not being able longer to bear such Indignities, and cruel Tyranny, at last resolv'd to kill their own Prince.

IN the mean time Sicardus vigorously carried on the War against the Neapolitans, who at last, not being able to defend themselves against the Forces of so powerful and cruel an Enemy, resolv'd by the Mediation of John their Bishop, and the Authority of Lothaire I. Emperor and King of Italy, to whom they had had recourse, to renew the Peace with the Beneventans. The Pains and Diligence of the Bishop were so effectual, that tho' he could not obtain a perpetual Peace of Sicardus, yet he got it for five Years. Neither would he have so far comply'd, if Andrew, who then govern'd the Neapolitan Dukedom, had not call'd the Saracens to his Assistance, the Fear of whom made him condescend to conclude it³; as was plain by the Event, because no sooner had Andrew sent back the Saracens, than Sicardus sought to put off the Conclusion of it; but the Neapolitans having recourse to Lothaire, he sent them Contardus, who wrought so, that the Peace was effectually settled (after sixteen Years continual and cruel War) in the Year 836, and the Conditions were punctually agreed to with John the Bishop, and Duke Andrew.

THE Instrument of which Peace, or the Capitularia of Sicardus, we owe to the Care of *Camillus Pellegrinus*⁴, in which we meet with many remarkable Things concerning the Customs and Laws of those People. 'Tis also clear from this Instrument, how far the Bounds of the Neapolitan Dukedom were extended in those Days, and what were the adjacent Places subject to it. 'Tis evident, that besides Sorrento, and some other neighbouring Castles, it likewise comprehended Amalphis; that the Conditions and Stipulations were regulated according to the Longobard Laws, which in those Times had the Ascendant. It was also expressly agreed, that the Neapoli- tans, according to the Tenor of the former Peace made with Sico the Father of Sicardus, should continue to pay to the Princes of Beneventum the wonted yearly Tribute, otherwise they should be liable to be distrain'd. That during those five Years of Peace, there should be a perfect Friendship betwixt both Nations, and that neither of them should disturb the other's Business or Traffick, either by Sea, Rivers, or Land; that Fugitives and their Goods should be punctually deliver'd up on both Sides; and therein we read many other Capitulations, which 'tis needless to relate here.

THIS Peace being concluded, 'tis said, that the Saracens having landed from Sicily at Brindisi, possess'd themselves of that City, and ravag'd all the Neighbourhood: but Sicardus hasten'd to repel that Irruption; and tho' at the first Onset he was repuls'd, yet having put his Army in better Order, he went anew to attack them; whereupon the Saracens, seeing they could not resist him, after having pillag'd and burnt Brindisi, and made many of the Citizens Slaves, return'd with their Booty to Sicily.

'TIS likewise said, that about the same Time, great Dissention having arisen amongst the People of Amalphis, many Families of that City went to dwell in Salerno, where they were kindly receiv'd by Sicardus; who taking Advantage of the Juncture, and seeing that City void of Inhabitants, order'd the same Troops which he had conven'd against the Saracens to besiege Amalphis, and breaking the Peace made with the Neapolitans, went and ravag'd the Borders of that Dukedom; at which Duke Andrew was cruelly offended, and seeing that with his own Forces he could not withstand the Boldness of the Enemy, he again sent Ambassadors to the Emperor Lothaire, begging his Assistance (he likewise had recourse to the Emperors of the West; those of the East, by reason of the Revolutions of the Court of Constantinople, could give him no Relief, and besides it was slow and at a great Distance) whom Lothaire receiv'd very graciously, and sent back Contardus to Naples; but on his Arrival there, he found that all the Danger was over, by the Death of Sicardus, which fell out very seasonably¹, who a little before had been kill'd by the Beneventans themselves, because of his Cruelty, Tyranny, and extreme Covetousness, to which Crimes he was exceedingly addicted. The Love of Money had made him imprison Deusdedit the famous Abbot of Monte Cassino; he had robb'd many Churches and Monasteries of their Goods; he had taken by Force the Estates of many Noblemen, as also of People of lower Condition; and he had ravish'd a noble Beneventan Lady. To which was added the Pride of Adelchisa his Wife, and the Ignominy to which she expos'd many Beneventan Ladies, whom she caus'd to be expos'd naked publicly to be laugh'd at by the People, out of Revenge, because that one Day she herself had been seen naked by a Beneventan.

IN the mean time the Beneventans being reduc'd to the utmost Despair, resolv'd to kill him; and having laid their Plot well, the Tyrant was murder'd in a most cruel manner, in the Year 839, by those who had been most familiar with him, as a just Reward; as Sico his Father had caus'd Grimoaldus to be murder'd, so Sicardus his Son was justly punish'd for the Fault of the Father, and his own Cruelty and Wick- edness. He was not lamented by the Beneventans, and therefore we read of no Monument of his amongst those of the other Beneventan Princes. The Tyrant then being dead, Radelchisus was unanimously elected Prince of Beneventum, who had been Treasurer to Sicardus, a Prince of a noble Behaviour, and a Conversation adorn'd with all Virtues; in whose Reign the Affairs of our Longobards began to decline; not only by reason of the Incurfions of foreign Nations, but much more by the intestine Dissentions of the Longobard Princes themselves, which occasion'd the Division of that Principality into three Dynasties, and was the Origin of the Fall of the Longobards in these our Provinces, as, after having related the Ecclesiastical Polity of these Times, we shall see in the following Book of this History.

C H A P. VIII.

The Ecclesiastical Polity of the Churches and Monasteries of the Principality of Beneventum.

THE Greek Church being divided from the Latin, and the Occasions of an irreconcilable Separation increasing more and more, and many Cities of these our Provinces remaining under the Greek Empire, the Polity of our Churches was not at all uniform, but very different and disagreeing; the Polity of the Church adapting itself to that of the Empire. The Kingdom of Italy having pass'd from the Longobards to the French, under Charles the Great, who was likewise elected Emperor of the West, was govern'd by this Prince, not so much by Virtue of this specious Title, as by his being King thereof; for he lov'd no less to be call'd King of Italy, or of the Longobards, than of France and Emperor. Whence it was, tho' our Beneventan Princes oppos'd the Sovereignty that he, as King of Italy, and who had succeeded in the Room of the Longobard Kings, pretended to over the Principality of Beneventum; yet the Title of Emperor making him more august and formidable; and the Opportunities which presented themselves, both to him, and the Emperors Lewis and Lothaire his Successors, rendering our Beneventan Longobard Princes Tributaries to the Emperors of the West; it came to pass, that the Polity of all the Churches that were within the Bounds of so vast and ample a Principality, was adapted to that of the Empire of the West, and to the Order which Charles the Great, and the Emperors his Successors settled in the Western Churches, of which, and also of those that were in the Principality of Beneventum, they took the Care and Protection. Consequently the Churches of this Principality were subject to the Latin Church, and were rul'd and govern'd as formerly by the Patriarch of the West; the Power and Ambition of the Patriarch of the East not being able to prevail in them.

CHARLES the Great then being elected Emperor of the West, and by signal Services deserving so well of the Church of Rome, Adrian and Leo III. Roman Pontiffs, loaded him with greater Honours than ever had been heard of. There was a mutual Emulation of Generosity and Courtesy betwixt them. Charles squander'd away Provinces, Cities, Jurisdictions, and other Temporal Riches on the Popes; they on the other hand repay'd him with their Spiritual Gifts. Thus the two Powers were so confounded and jumbled together, that their Boundaries, which were clear and distinct before, could never be well distinguish'd and ascertain'd thereafter; so that it has been the Opinion of wise Men¹, that Charles the Great went further Lengths than Constantine the Great in ruining the Political State of the Empire, and corrupting the ancient Discipline of the Church.

ALTHO' *Baronius*² and *Peter de Marca*³ reckon the Council of Lateran as fabulous, which *Sigebert*⁴ relates to have been conven'd in Rome by Adrian, after Charles had triumph'd over King Desiderius, and which *Gratian*⁵ upon the Faith of Sigebert believ'd to be a true one, wherein 'tis said that Charles the Great had the Power of electing the Pope, and disposing of the Apostolical See conferr'd upon him ; nevetheless if such a Power was not expressely granted to Charles by Adrian in that Synod, as Leo VIII. did afterwards to Otho I. yet he had really that Power, that no Pope could be consecrated without his Consent and Permission ; whether this was introduc'd by Custom, as *Florus Magister*¹ says, who liv'd in the Time of Lewis the Pious ; or whether it was by the Concession of Pope Zachary, as *Lupus of Ferrara*² believ'd ; or whether it was because he would not be thought inferior to the Emperors of the East, who had the Power of confirming the Pope elected, nor could he be consecrated until the Emperor had approv'd of him ; 'tis certain that Charles dispos'd of the Apostolical See as he thought fit, with the good Will of the Popes themselves, who approv'd of it, both to shew their Gratitude to Charles for the so many signal good Offices they had receiv'd from him, and to cut off altogether all hopes from the Emperors of the East of ever regaining that Prerogative over the Church of Rome, which with the Exarchate and Rome they had lost.

THEREFORE Charles settled the Election of the Pope in the same manner exactly as it had been, when the Emperors of the East govern'd Rome, to wit, that the Pope should be elected by the Clergy and People, and the Decree of Election sent to the Emperor, and if he approv'd of him, the Elected should be consecrated. After Charles's Death, his Successors Lewis the Pious and Lothaire kept Possession of the same Prerogative. 'Tis true, sometimes the Popes elected by the Clergy and People were consecrated, without waiting for the Emperor's Decree, as was the Case of Paschal ; but he sent to excuse himself to Lewis the Son of Charles, that it was not done with his Consent, but that the People forc'd it upon him, because they would have it so. Lewis by his Capitularia restor'd the Freedom of Elections, not only of the Popes, but also of all Bishops ; but for all that he did not derogate from the Assent and Approbation of the Prince, as the Archbishop of *Paris*³ very well proves ; for this excellent Writer, from the Testimony of Florus Magister, a cotemporary Author, demonstrates, that the Assent of Lewis was always requir'd, neither did he allow of the Consecration without his Permission ; he likewise relates, that after the Year 820, Gregory IV. having been elected, was not ordain'd until the Election had first been examin'd by the Emperor's Ambassador ; so far is it from being true, that some who have been misled by the Apocryphal C. *Ego Lodovicus*⁴, have said, that Lewis renounc'd this Power of confirming the Pope elected ; that it is certain, that not only Lewis, but likewise Lothaire his Son, and Lewis II. his Grandchild, confirm'd all the Popes elected in their Time⁵ ; and it was not before the Posterity of Charles the Great was extinct in Italy, in the Year 884, that Adrian III. made a Decree, that the Pope should be consecrated without the Emperor's Consent.

CHARLES likewise regulated the Churches of the West by his Capitularia, calling Synods by his own Authority, wherein he not only order'd the Prelates of the Church to be present, but also the Secular Lords, establishing Rules not only concerning the Temporality, but the very Discipline of the Churches, making sundry Ecclesiastical Laws for the Distribution of the Revenues and Possessions of the Churches and the Tythes, reviving many of the ancient Canons that had been diffus'd.

BUT Charles was no sooner elected Emperor, than he assum'd much greater Authority in the Elections and Ordinations of Bishops, and he did all by the Permission of the Popes themselves. Altho' he restor'd the Liberty to the People and Clergy of electing the Bishops, yet he prescrib'd many Laws concerning Elections ; that they should elect one of their own Church or Diocess ; that the Monks should elect their Abbot from their own Monastery, and with the Authority of the Apostolical See, and the Consent of the Bishops ; the Emperor after the elected Bishop or Abbot was presented to him, and approv'd by him, was to invest them, by delivering to them the Crozier and Ring⁶, then they were to be consecrated by the neighbouring Bishops ; whence arose the Right of Investiture, on account of which so many Quarrels and Contentions ensu'd in the following Centuries betwixt the Popes and the Emperors.

HIS Intention was, by thus bringing the Bishops and Abbots under his Allegiance, to fix his Empire the better, and to keep his Subjects with stronger Ties under his Obedience. Therefore, besides having so much advanc'd the Church of Rome, and made her Mistress of so many Cities and Lands, he likewise enrich'd the other Churches and Monasteries with Baronies, Counties, and very ample and rich Fiefs, by making the Bishops and Abbots Temporal Lords of the Places where they had their Benefices, by uniting the Temporal to the Spiritual Dignity, as accessory to, and depending on it; and investing them in the Temporality with the Ring and Crosier, wherefore he took their Oaths, and oblig'd them to many Performances and Taxes, as also military Services, like any other Feudatory; which by *William of Malmsbury*¹ was reckon'd a Piece of fine Policy, who said, that Charles omnes pene terras ecclesiis conferebat, consiliosissime perpendens, nolle sacri ordinis homines tam facile quam laicos fidelitatem dominii sui rejicere. Præterea, si laici rebelarent, illos posse excommunicationis auctoritate, & potentia severitate compescere.

CHARLES likewise enlarg'd the Power of Cognizance in the Bishops, and much more in the Bishop of Rome; he gave them Territorium, and the *Jus Carceris*²; which before Charles's Time the Popes never had had in Rome itself; and other Princes in imitation of him granted the same to the Bishops of their Cities. Moreover Charles in his Capitularia ordain'd, that none of the Clergy, Monks or Nuns could be accus'd before the Secular Magistrates, but only before the Bishop; and in Civil Matters they could require to have all Causes remitted to the Bishop³. This Privilege was afterwards generally confirm'd in all Causes both Civil and Criminal by the Emperor Frederick I. and his Ordinance was inserted in the *Justinian Code*⁴, so that it pass'd for a common Law; whence came the Distinction afterwards between the Clergy and Laicks; the Laicks were under the Secular Jurisdiction, and the Clergy under the Ecclesiastical. And if they had kept within these Bounds the Thing might have been bore with; but in process of Time, besides the prodigious Increase of the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, for Reasons which shall be taken Notice of in the Progress of this History; the Popes and Bishops, to whom Princes had granted Fiefs and Jurisdiction, wrested the Investiture out of their Hands, disclaim'd their Assent to their Elections, and retain'd both the Fiefs and Jurisdictions; boasting besides, that it was not by the Concession of Princes that they exercis'd Jurisdiction over Ecclesiastical Persons, but by Divine Right.

AFTER Charles's Death the same Favours were continu'd by his Successors descended of him, to the Ecclesiastical State; and Lothaire I. granted them Jurisdiction over their Patrimonies, allowing them at the Desire of the Abbots, and others who had the Charge of Churches, a particular Judge in these Places, whom they call'd Defender, who had the Cognizance of Causes, and forbidding the Publick Magistrate to intermeddle in them⁵.

TO this blending of the Secular and Spiritual Powers were owing the monstrous Disorders which appear'd in this and the following Century; the Bishops and chief Prelates frequented the Courts of Princes, and were of their Council; and as Feudatories commanded Armies; meddled in the Government and Consultations of State; neither was it reckon'd unbecoming in those Times, to see the same Person both Bishop and Duke of Naples; and likewise the same Person both Bishop and Count of Capua; which made them look on the Exercise of their Sacred and Spiritual Office as beneath their Dignity.

WHENCE the Monasteries and Churches in the Provinces of the Principality of Beneventum tributary to the Emperor of the West, following the same Example, began to acquire Fiefs and Baronies; for before Charles's Time the Longobard Kings gave Fiefs⁶ neither to Monks nor Clergy, thinking that it did not suit with their Office, but the Popes found no Inconsistency in it, neither did they refuse Charles's Bounty, nor that of other Princes, who after his Example enrich'd the Churches and Monasteries; and Arnaldo da Brescia having had the Boldness to maintain, that Fiefs could not be given to Churches, was condemn'd in the Lateran Council as a Heretick⁷.

IT was not thought inconsistent, that the Temporal Power should be annex'd to, and made dependent on the Priesthood; and that the Churches and Monasteries invested in Fiefs with respect to Temporalities, should acknowledge the Prince as Sovereign Lord of what they were invested in; and as to Spirituals, and in all other Things, they should own the Pope as their Head and Moderator. Whence in process of Time it was seen, particularly in *Germany*¹, that many Bishops, Abbots, and Priors were Temporal Lords of the Cities, Villages, and Places where their Benefices were situated; in which they exercis'd in their own Names, and under their own Authority, all Civil and Criminal Jurisdiction as Temporal Lords. And because it appear'd something odd for themselves to exercise Criminal Jurisdiction, therefore they made their Officers do it, who by the Laws of our Kingdom, as was practis'd in France, ought to be Laicks. For which Cause these their Temporal Lordships were govern'd by the same Rules as those that were in the Hands of Seculars; and there is no Difference, but that the former being Ecclesiastical Possessions, are neither Vendible nor Hereditary, but always go along with the Offices; and in order to preserve the Sovereignty, and the Rights accruing thereby to the Prince, there being no room left for Devolution, they are tied down to the same Services and Payments with other Barons, and in place of Fines, the *Quindennia*², or Fifteenths are exacted. Whence likewise comes the Custom, that with us, according to the Practice of France, Appeals that are made from their Temporal Jurisdictions, are brought before the Secular, and not the Ecclesiastical Courts³; and ought to be judg'd according to our Constitutions, the Ordinances of the King, and the Custom of Places, and not according to the Canon Law⁴.

THE first among us, that by the Concession of our Longobard Princes, got Possession of Castles and Baronies, was the Monastery of Monte Cassino, whence its Abbot now justly boasts of being the first Baron of the Kingdom, and that in the general Parliaments, among all the Barons the first Place is due to him⁵. *Marinus Freccia*⁶, perhaps by giving credit to the Fables of *Petrus Diaconus*⁷, the Continuator of the Chronicle of Leo Ostiensis, wrote, that the Emperor Justinian had given many Cities and Lands in the Kingdom to this Monastery; tho' Leo, in his Chronicle seems to have had no other Design, but to make an Inventory of all the Donations and Concessions made to that Monastery by diverse Princes and Lords, and likewise by private Men, and mentions Things of small Moment, yet not one Word of that; besides Petrus Diaconus mentions special Grants not only of Justinian, but likewise of Justin the Elder, who reign'd in the East, when all Italy was under the Dominion of the Goths, and when S. Benedict was not as yet come into our Campania, nor had been at Cassino. Gisulphus Duke of Benevento, as we have said, was the first who enrich'd this Monastery with Castles and Baronies; whence in process of Time, by the Bounty of other Princes it got the Lordship of the City of Cassino itself, and possess'd also Fiefs in other Provinces, such as Cetraro in Calabria; S. Pietro di Avellana, in the County of Molise; Serra de Monaci in Aprutium; and many more in other Places, of which the Register of Abbot Bernard, and the Chronicle of Leo are good Vouchers. Therefore the Abbots of the Monastery of Monte Cassino took an Oath of Fidelity to the Emperors of the West, from whom they obtain'd the Confirmation, or Præcepta, call'd likewise Mundeburda, of the said Concessions, as they did to the Emperor Lothaire II.; and therefore that Monastery was esteem'd an Imperial Chamber⁸; and in the Division made betwixt Radelchisus and Siconolphus, was excepted, as being immediately under the Protection of the Emperor; and Henry VI. exempted the Abbot Rofridus from furnishing Soldiers, to which he was bound as a Feudatory; which King William the Good afterwards did not do, who for the Expedition to the Holy Land, got from that Monastery sixty Soldiers, and Two hundred Servants⁹.

IN process of Time, not only the Monasteries of the Order of S. Benedict, but also all the other Orders, became Lords of Castles and Baronies under our Norman Princes. The Greeks being intirely driven out of these our Provinces, and the use of Fiefs common every where; the Monasteries under the Order of S. Basil, and other Orders, likewise got Fiefs. That of S. Elias of the Order of S. Basil got the Town of Carbone with respect to Civil Matters. The Abbots of S. Mark in Lamis, of S. Demetrius, and many others, the Orders of S. John of Jerusalem, of S. Stephen, and many others of different Orders, which may be seen in Ughellus, hold Baronies.

OUR Churches and Bishops were no less plentifully enrich'd than the Monasteries. The Archbishop of Salerno once possess'd the Towns of Olibano and Mount Corvino; the Archbishop of Taranto got the Town Delle Grottaglie as to Civil Matters; and the Archbishop of Consa likewise as to Civil Matters got the Towns of S. Menajo and S. Andrea; the Archbishop of Bari had once Bitritto, Cassano, Casamassima, Modugno, Laterza, and other Towns¹; the Archbishop of Brundisi got the Town of S. Pancratio; the Archbishop of Reggio retains to this Day the Castles of Bova and Castellace; and the Archbishop of Otranto got other Towns. The Bishop of Lecce had S. Petro in Lama, Vernotico, and other Fiefs; the Bishop of Bojano once possess'd the Town of S. Polo; the Bishop of Tricarico had the Town of Montemuro, and many other Churches, such as those of Cassano, Teramo, S. Nicholas of Bari, and others, possess many Fiefs and Castles; which, that we may shun making a longer Catalogue of them here, may be seen in Ughellus's Italia Sacra. For which Cause, tho' in our Kingdom the Ecclesiastical State makes not a distinct State, as in France, yet at the general Parliaments the Bishops and Abbots, as Barons and Lords, and not as Ecclesiasticks, send their Proxies.

SUCH was the Polity of the Churches and Monasteries of the Principality of Benevento in this ninth Century, which depended as formerly on the Patriarch of the West, and in every Thing were united to the Latin Church. The Monastick State was still advancing in Splendor and Greatness; many other Monasteries of the Order of S. Benedict were still building there by the Bounty of the Beneventan Princes, and of the Emperors of the West themselves. In the Year 872. the Monastery of S. Clement in the Island of Pescara, of the Order of S. Benedict, was built by the Emperor *Lewis*². In Gargano and Siponto, those of Calena and Pulsano were erected, of which at present there's scarcely any Vestige remaining.

BENEVENTUM was likewise adorn'd with a new Sanctuary; for the Saracens having made themselves Masters of Sicily, and in the Year 831. destroy'd the Island of Lipari, whither 'tis said that the Bones of the Apostle Bartholomew had been brought from the Indies, they likewise violated the holy Shrine, by scattering the blessed Bones upon the Ground, which by the Revelation of the Saint himself, were gathered by a certain Monk, and transported from Lipari to *Beneventum*³; Prince Sicardus receiv'd them with the utmost Esteem and Veneration, and for a long time they were ador'd there; and the Beneventans being perswaded that they were not afterwards carried to Rome by Otho, pay them still the same Honours and Adoration.

S E C T. II.

The Ecclesiastical Polity of the Neapolitan Churches, and of the other Cities subject to the Greek Empire.

ALTHO' in the Greek Church there was not so great Deformity and Looseness of Manners, and so great Ignorance as in the Latin, both in Priests and Monks; neither did her Bishops nor Abbots possess Castles and Baronies, the Greeks having no Fiefs; nevertheless the Separation betwixt the two Churches grew so wide through the Ambition of the Patriarch of Constantinople, and some Doctrines and Opinions maintain'd in the Greek Church different from those which the Latin Church taught, not to mention some Points of Discipline, and their different Rites and Ceremonies, that at last it became irreconcilable. The Greeks oppos'd the Primacy of the Bishop of Rome, to whom they had a mind to prefer the Bishop of Constantinople, or at least to put him upon the same Level. Therefore there arose various Debates concerning the Bounds of their Patriarchates; whereupon that of Constantinople usurp'd many Provinces which belong'd to the Patriarchate of Rome. There was a great Dispute about Bulgaria, the Patriarchs of the East pretending, that that Country having been taken from the Greeks, and at first govern'd by Greek Bishops, ought to belong to the Patriarch of Constantinople; they were likewise favour'd in this by the Emperor Basilus, and his Son Leo, whom he had associated in the Empire; so that Bulgaria, notwithstanding the Opposition and Protestations of the Pope's Legates, was adjudg'd to the Greeks, and the Latin Bishops and Priests were expell'd.

THE Ambition of the Patriarchs of Constantinople being seconded by the Power of the Emperors of the East, took many other Churches from the Patriarchate of the West, which were assign'd to that of Constantinople; whence it came, that as there was a new Division made of the Provinces of the Eastern Empire, into many Themata, of which Constantine Porphyrogenitus compos'd two Books, and a new Description of the Officers of the Palace and Court of Constantinople, of which *Codinus*¹ and *Joannes Curapalata*² have made a long List; so with respect to the Polity of the Greek Church, and the Constantinopolitan See, their Patriarchs obtain'd from the same Emperors of the East, that there should be a new Division made, as well of the Churches subject to the Constantinopolitan See, many of which had been taken from that of Rome, as of the Officers of the great Church of Constantinople, of which Codinus and Curapalata, and others according to *Leunclavius*³ have likewise given the Names and Offices; to the End that those Churches, which were taken from the Patriarchate of the West, by such a Disposition or Notitia's being made by the Authority of the Emperor, might remain firmly united to, and dependent on their See.

THIS commonly believ'd, that about the Year 887, in the Time of Leo surnam'd the Philosopher, after the Patriarch Photius had been turn'd out of the Chair of Constantinople, such a Disposition was made; and *Leunclavius*⁴ records it among the Novellæ of Leo the Philosopher; but *Leo Allacci*⁵ maintains, that it was made some Years before in 813, under the Empire of Leo the Armenian; however that may be, by this Disposition we see, how much in those Times the Patriarchs of the East had extended their Authority over many Churches, and particularly over these in our Provinces, which formerly belong'd to the See of Rome as Suburbicarian Provinces.

THE Abbot Nilo, surnam'd Doxapatrius, in his Treatise *De quinque Thronis Patriarchalibus*⁶, which he wrote in the Year 1143, to Roger I. King of Sicily, upon an Occasion which we shall relate when we come to discourse of the Deeds of that Prince, lets us see how much the Roman Patriarch possess'd formerly, and what has been since taken from him by that of Constantinople. He possess'd, says he, all Europe, Spain as far as Hercules's Pillars, with the Islands of the Western Sea, the two Gallia's, the British Islands, Pannonia, all Illyricum, Peloponnesus, the Avari, Sclavonia, Scythia to the Danube, Macedonia, Thessalonica, Thracia as far as Byzantium, Mauritania, the Mediterranean Islands, Creta, Sicilia, Sardinia, and Majorca. All Italy, to wit, Superiores Alpes, & quæ ultra eas extenduntur: nec non inferiores Gallias, quæ Italiæ sunt, sive Lombardiam, quæ nunc dicitur Longibardia, & Apuliam, & Calabriam, & Campaniam omnem; & Venetiam, & Provincias quæ ultra sinum Hadriaticum se se effundunt. And concludes, Hæc omnia Romano subdebantur.

BUT afterwards there were many Provinces and Cities, as well in the East as the West, subjected to the Constantinopolitan See. The Metropolitans of Thessalonica and Corinth subjected themselves to the Patriarch of Constantinople, and many Nihilominus Pontifex viles quasdam partes, & Episcopatus nonnullos in Sicilia, & Calabria habere deprehenditur. Metropoles enim, & urbes in eadem illustriores, & digniores, Constantinopolitanus possedebat, usque ad Francorum adventum; meaning the Normans, who having driven the Greeks out of these Provinces, restor'd to the See of Rome all those Churches which had been taken by the Greeks from that Patriarchate, as we shall relate in its Place.

Si autem, adds Nilo, in Longobardia & Apulia, & in omnibus his Regionibus, maritimas Metropoles antea possedebat Constantinopolitanus, reliquas Romanus, ut Regionem illæ per partes possiderentur. Namque Melodus ac Poeta Dominus Marcus, Hydruntum a Constantinopolitano missus fuisse comperitur. THE Disposition or Notitia of the Metropolitans, and of the Bishops their Suffragans, subject to the See of Constantinople, describ'd to us by the Novella of Leo recorded by Leunclavius, is exactly the same with what Nilo has written. He made the Plan of it in the following Order.

Ordo præsentia Metropolitānorum, qui subsunt Apostolico Throno Constantinopolis, & subiectorum eis Episcoporum.

HE numbers all the Metropolitans with their Suffragan Bishops, and puts in the first Place the Metropolitan of Cesarea in Cappadocia: In the second the Ephebian in Asia, and successively all the rest to the Number of LVII. SEEING the Greeks could not advance Bifhops to be Metropolitans, becaufe perhaps it was not for their Intereft to take the Churches from the old neighbouring Metropolitans, and give them to a new one; when they had a mind to advance any Bifhop, they were wont to dignify him with the Title of Archbishop, with which (it being only a Title of Dignity, not of Power, like that of Metropolitan) they who were dignified acquir'd nothing but greater Splendor, and a Pre-eminency above the other Bifhops of that Province, of whom they had the Preference and Place. *Quosdam Antiftites, fays Balsamon, non propterea vocari Archiepifcopos, quod Epifcoporum Principes, & Ordinatores fint: Sed quod primi Epifcoporum habeantur*¹. Whence in the Difpofition of the Churches fubjected to the See of Constantinople, befides the Degrees of Metropolitans, we read in the fame Novella of Leo, and likewife in the Book of the Synodical Decrees alfo printed by *Leunclavius*², a Lift of Archbifhops fubjected to the Patriarch of the Eaft, and among the reft in XIV Place we find the Archbishop of Naples, and after him the Archbishop of Meffina in this manner.

Archiepifcopatus:

- XIV. Neapolis.
XV. Meffana.

THE Polity and Government of the Churches of the Dukedom of Naples, as being comprehended in Campania, a Suburbicarian Province, belong'd by Right to the Patriarch of Rome, who, in effect, as is manifelt from the Letters of S. Gregory the Great, exercis'd all Patriarchal Power in it, tho' the Political and Temporal belong'd to the Empire of the Eaft; but afterwards the Patriarchs of Constantinople, fupported by the Power of the Greek Emperors, began to dignify the Bifhops of Naples a Metropolis City of a Dukedom of no fmall Figure, with the pompous and fhining Titles of Archbifhops, and to afcribe Honours and Prerogatives to them, by which they were diftinguifh'd from all the other Bifhops of the Dukedom. We find that Sergius Bifhop of Naples, took the Title of Archbishop from the Patriarch of Constantinople, but being rebuk'd for it by the Pope, he repented him of his Error, and ask'd Pardon ¹.

THE Popes oppos'd these Incroachments of the Patriarchs of Constantinople with all their Might, but after the Times of Leo Isauricus, and Constantinus Copronymus Emperors of the East, when the Discord betwixt those two Churches increas'd, the Patriarchs of Constantinople becoming more bold by the Power and Favour of the Emperors, who were implacable Enemies of the Popes, pretended that the Bishops of those Churches that had continu'd under the Greek Empire, ought to acknowledge them for their Patriarchs; that they ought to take their Bulls of Confirmation and Consecration from them, and obey them in all Spiritual Matters, as they obey'd the Emperors of the East in Temporals. And tho' Bari, Taranto, Brindisi, and other Cities of Puglia and Calabria, were now under the Dominion of the Longobards; nevertheless, being afterwards retaken by the Greeks, and restor'd to the Empire of the East, as we shall shew in the following Books; the Greeks likewise subjected the Churches of these Cities to the Patriarchate of Constantinople.

THE Church of Naples then, if regard be had to what the Patriarchs of Constantinople took upon them to do, from this Time became Archiepiscopal, but not Metropolitan, because that Title of Dignity was only given by these Patriarchs for Honour's sake. It was erected into a Metropolis afterwards in the tenth Century by Pope John, as shall be told in its Place; and for that Reason in the Novella of Leo, and the Book of the Synodical Decrees, Naples is not plac'd in the Number of the Metropolitan Cities subject to the See of Constantinople, but amongst the Archiepiscopal, which the Patriarch of the East pretended were subject to him. But notwithstanding this Claim, he never pretended to consecrate the Bishops of Naples, who were no sooner elected by the Clergy and People, than they went, as formerly, to Rome to get themselves consecrated by the Popes.

FOR this Reason the Church of Naples was never separated from the Latin Church; but being in a City subject to the Greeks, and by the continual Commerce with the Eastern People, much frequented by the Greeks, had Priests and Clergy of both Communions; there were two Chapters, the one Greek ², and the other Latin; and many Parishes and Churches, as well Latin as Greek were erected, which for the Reason just now mention'd happen'd in this Century, and not in the Time of Constantine the Great. There were reckon'd six Greek Parochial Churches; that of S. George ad Forum; that of S. Januarius ad Diaconiam; the Churches of SS. John and Paul, of S. Andrew ad Nidum, of S. Maria Rotunda, and of S. Maria in Cosmedin ³; in which the Priests celebrated the Sacrifices and Divine Offices according to the Rites of the Greek Church; but upon certain appointed Days, assembled with the Latins in the great Church, and with promiscuous Rites, and Latin and Greek Songs prais'd the Lord ⁴.

FROM Naples having had two Clergies, the one Latin and the other Greek, our Chioccarelli ⁵ believ'd, there likewise had been two Bishops in it, the one Greek and the other Latin, as Cyprus is said to have had two Archbishops in the Time of Pope Innocent IV. the one Latin and the other Greek; thus does he interpret the Acts of the Life of S. Athanasius Bishop of Naples. But this is repugnant to all History, and the so many Catalogues which we have of the Bishops of this City, in which there's no such Deformity to be found in this Church; wherefore P. Caracciolus ⁶ censur'd this Error, and explain'd the Ambiguity of the Acts of that Saint compos'd by P. Diaconus of Cassino, who had led Chioccarelli into the Mistake.

THE Bishop of Naples then, tho' dignify'd by the Patriarch of Constantinople with the Title of Archbishop, did not exercise any Power of a Metropolitan over the Bishops of his Dukedom: He only had the Precedency in Honour and Dignity, as Bishop of the Ducal City; and in this Age the Bishops of this Dukedom were those of Cuma, Miseno, Baja, Pozzuoli, Nola, Stabia, Sorrento, and Amalphis; in process of Time Sorrento and Amalphis were advanc'd to be Metropolis's; and Cuma, Miseno, Baja, and Stabia were destroy'd. But tho' Naples lost these Cities, when it was made a Metropolis, it got Aversa built by the Normans, Ischia, Acerra, Nola, Pozzuoli, that were for a long time Suffragans to its See.

IN the other Churches of the Cities subject to the Greek Empire, the Patriarchs of Constantinople exercis'd greater Authority, and particularly in the Churches of Reggio, S. Severina, and Otranto; and after the Greeks had recover'd Taranto, Brindisi and Bari, and other Cities of Puglia and Calabria, they pretended the same Authority over them.

THEY made Reggio a Metropolis, and appointed thirteen Suffragan Bishops to it, as we have seen. They erected S. Severina into a Metropolis, and subjected five Bishops to its See. To the Metropolitan of Otranto they gave none; but in the Time of Nicephorus Phocas, about the Year 968, while Polieutus was Patriarch of Constantinople, the Bishops of Acerenza, Turtico, Gravina, Matera, and Tricarico, were made Suffragans to it, the Consecration of which Bishops, as Luitprandus Bishop of *Cremona*¹ relates, he would have to belong to the Metropolitan of Otranto; and Nicephorus so much enlarg'd the Bounds of this Metropolis, and the Greek Rites, that he commanded the Divine Offices to be celebrated no more in Latin, but in Greek, over all Puglia and Calabria; and other most ample Privileges were granted to it, which may be seen in *Ughellus's Italia Sacra*².

BRINDISI and Taranto, after they were restor'd to the Greek Empire; A Constantinopolitano Sacerdotes accipiebant, says Nilo.

WHEN the Greeks retook Bari, Trani, and other Cities of Puglia from the Saracens and Longobards, their Churches were likewise subjected to that Patriarch. Theodore Balsamon in the Account which he gave of the Sees subject to the Patriarchate of Constantinople, in the Reign of the Emperor Andronicus Paleologus the Elder, besides the Eastern Churches, reckons amongst the Western the Church of Bari to be Number 31; that of Trani 44; that of Otranto 66; and that of Reggio in Calabria 38.

WHENCE according to the Testimonies of *Beatillus*³ and *Chioccarelli*⁴, there are many Original Greek Bulls preserv'd in the Archives of the Cathedral Church of Bari, sent by the Patriarchs of Constantinople to the Archbishops of that City, by which the Elections of the Archbishops are confirm'd; which continu'd all the Time that Bari (being likewise made a Metropolis of a considerable Dukedom, where the Greek Magistrate resided) with Puglia, were subject to the Greek Empire, and until the Greeks were driven out of that Province by our valiant Normans. Whence to this Day all these Cities retain many Vestiges of the Greek Rites and Customs; and they likewise keep up many Greek Titles denoting Dignity and Offices, as Reggio retains yet the Protopapa, and other Cities the Cimeliarchæ, and the Clergy as well Greek as Latin. And whence likewise, as Leo Allaci also observes⁵, for a long time the Doctrine of the Eastern Church was maintain'd in our Kingdom by the Monks, particularly by the Order of S. Basil, for which the famous Barlaam became renown'd with us, of whom we shall speak in his Place.

WHEN the Otbo's govern'd in the West, these Emperors endeavour'd to free our Churches in Puglia and Calabria from that Servitude, and to reduce them all as formerly under the Patriarch of the West. For that end Luitprandus Bishop of Cremona, about the Year 968, was sent to the Emperor Nicephorus Phocas, but to no purpose; for the Reduction of all our Churches under the Pope, was reserv'd to our Norman Princes, who having driven not only the Saracens, but likewise the Greeks out of Sicily and these our Provinces, made themselves so well deserving of the Church of Rome, that besides the important Services they did her, they united all our Churches, as they were formerly, under the Direction and Disposal of the Pope, to whom by Right they belong'd; as shall be seen in the following Books of this History.

THE
CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of NAPLES.

BOOK VII.

THE Fall of our Longobard Princes, and the rising up again of the Greeks, the Incursions of the Saracens, and the so many Mischiefs and Calamities which these our Provinces have suffer'd, shall be the Subject of this Book. We are going to relate the sad and unfortunate Events which reduc'd them to a very miserable and lamentable Condition. The Longobard Princes being divided amongst themselves, their intestine Broils ruin'd their State: Their Quarrels render'd the Authority of the Emperors of the West of greater Force, who from Tributaries made them Feudatories. On the other hand, the Saracens being invited by our Princes themselves, compleated their Destruction. The Principality of Benevento, all in Confusion and torn to pieces, gave a fit Opportunity to other Nations, who taking advantage of so many Revolutions and Disorders, invaded it on all Sides, which ended in their being subjected to the Dominion of another People. The Stubbornness of the Capuans was the Origin of so many Calamities, but much more the Villany of Landulphus their Castaldus.

THE

THE Capuans hearing of the Election of Radelchisus to be Prince of Benevento, were much dissatisfy'd; they were afraid that this Prince would not bear with their Treachery, and they were much more afraid of Landulphus. This last was accus'd of being privy to a Conspiracy, which Adelchisus the Son of Roffridus had fram'd against Radelchisus, who having discover'd it, caus'd Adelchisus to be thrown out of a Window, and endeavour'd to get hold of Landulphus, who having notice thereof, immediately fled. On the other hand Siconolphus Brother of Sicardus had been confin'd to a close Prison by his Brother, but soon after had made his Escape and for a long time was kept conceal'd by Ursus Count of Consa, his Kinsman, at last having got to Taranto, he remain'd there; and Radelchisus was no sooner advanc'd to the Principality of Benevento, than he sent Dauferius into Exile, who went to Nocera a City of the Dukedom of Naples, and began to sollicite the Salernitans to join with Landulphus Count of Capua against Radelchisus, in order to set Siconolphus the Brother of Sicardus on the Throne¹.

THE Capuans having likewise drawn in some Beneventans to their Party, call'd Siconolphus from Taranto, and made him come to Salerno, whither both the Capuans and Beneventans went and proclaim'd and elected him Prince in the Year 840. Landulphus join'd with him, took possession of Sicopolis, and at the same time made a strict Confederacy with the Neapolitans, who greedily embrac'd the Opportunity, in order to revenge themselves of the Beneventans their old and obstinate Enemies. Siconolphus became more bold by the Addition of so great Strength, made himself Master of Salerno, by defeating Radelchisus's Army, and forthwith possess'd himself of Calabria, and a great Part of Puglia, which he subjected to his Dominion; from whence carrying his victorious Standard towards Benevento, he took many Cities and Castles in that Neighbourhood, and likewise had the Boldness at last, being transported with such a prosperous Run of Success, to besiege Benevento itself; but being boldly repuls'd by the Beneventans, he return'd to Salerno.

S E C T. I.

The Division of the Principality of Benevento, from which the Principality of Salerno had its Rise.

RADELCHISIUS seeing his State overturn'd, full of Rage and Fury march'd with all his Forces against Siconolphus, swearing openly, that he would live no longer if he did not extirpate him out of the Earth; but perceiving that his own Forces, and those of his Beneventans were not sufficient for suppressing so powerful an Enemy, who was daily gathering more Strength; being transported with Fury, and not minding the grievous Calamities to which he expos'd his State, design'd to apply worse Remedies to so great Mischiefs. As we have said, many Saracens had come from Sicily in order to destroy us, who under their Leader Calphus were ravaging Japygia, and the Neighbourhood of Bari. Pandon was Governor of that City under Radelchisus, who commanded him to invite the Saracens to his Assistance, which he obeying, got a great Number of them to come, whom he lodg'd without the Walls of Bari, on the Sea-shore; but the subtle Saracens knew well how to take Advantage of the Juncture, for they observing the Garrison of the City, and its Situation, found they could master it: One Night on a sudden they enter'd Bari by some hidden Places, made a terrible Slaughter of the Christians, and possess'd themselves of the City. Thus Bari from the Longobards came under the Dominion of the Saracens, afterwards the Greeks drove out the Saracens, and possess'd it for a long time.

RADELCHISIUS on the one hand desirous to have Siconolphus humbled, after he was engag'd in that Undertaking, not being able to carry on another War against the Saracens for turning them out of Bari, wink'd at the Fact, and besides made made them his Auxiliaries; therefore he invited them to make War against Siconolphus, whereupon having join'd his Forces with those of the Saracens, they began so cruel and obstinate a War, that they miserably afflicted these our Provinces; Siconolphus on the other hand, with the same Rage and Fury, resolv'd to oppose the Forces of Radelchisus cost what it would. He stood his Ground at first, and afterwards made a worse Step than Radelchisus, by inviting the Saracens from Spain to his Assistance, which compleated the Ruin of them both. There never had been seen in this our Country more cruel and terrible Slaughter, than what was made at this Time by the Saracens of both Sides; they laid Capua in Ashes, burnt and destroy'd many Cities; and those who kept Possession of Bari, having taking Taranto, laid Calabria and Puglia waste, and went as far as Salerno and Benevento. All was full of Slaughter and dead Bodies; the Saracens, like a Deluge, over-run our beautiful Country. These Calamities continued for the Space of twelve Years; so that the Beneventans themselves, being sensible of their own Misery, and too late convinc'd of their Error, were forc'd, in order to calm so furious a Tempest, to have recourse to the Assistance of the French, for driving out the Saracens, and making Peace betwixt these two Princes.

AT this Time the Emperor Lothaire govern'd the Empire of the West and Italy, as we have said, who had elected Lothaire II. his Son King of Italy, who afterwards succeeded him in the Empire. King Lewis was humbly intreated by Landon Count of Capua, the Son of Landolphus, and by Adimarus and Bassacius the renown'd Abbot of Monte Cassino (which during these Troubles had been often pillag'd) that he would be pleas'd to march to the Principality of Benevento with a powerful Army in order to drive out the Saracens, and make Peace betwixt these two Princes: Lewis, tho' but a Stripling, influenc'd by the Love of Glory, easily consented to their Request, and immediately march'd to Benevento; from whence having driven the Saracens, and confin'd them to Bari, now their Seat, he purg'd the other Provinces of Benevento of this Plague. Afterwards interposing his Authority, he was altogether bent on reconciling these Princes, whom at last he brought to a settled Agreement, by dividing betwixt them all the Provinces of Benevento, so that two Principalities were made out of one; that of Benevento was kept by Radelchisus, the other of Salerno was confirm'd to Siconolphus, both of them taking an Oath of Fidelity to Lewis, whom at last they acknowledg'd for their Sovereign. Thus were these our Provinces, excepting the Dukedom of Naples, and those Cities that were subject to the Greek Emperors, brought under the Dominion of the Emperors of the West, who as Kings of Italy pretended to exercise the same Authority over them, as the Longobard Kings had done.

THESE were the pernicious Consequences which our Beneventans brought upon themselves by the Civil Wars which they carried on and maintain'd in their own Country. I. Their being oblig'd to acknowledge Lewis for their Sovereign, and swear Fealty to him, which Charles the Great himself, nor Pepin his Son could not obtain from Arechis nor Grimoaldus. And tho' the other Grimoaldus third Prince of Benevento, and Sico and Sicardus who succeeded him, made themselves Tributaries to the French, yet they never went so far as to make themselves Feudatories. Which, tho' it did not derogate from their still being Sovereigns of their Principalities, because sworn Fealty, and Assistance in War, neither diminish the Liberty of the Vassal as to himself, nor the absolute Power which he has over his Subjects; yet (which can't be deny'd) it debases and impairs the Splendor of a Sovereign State, which without doubt, is not so pure and majestick when it's clogg'd with these Burdens; so that *Bodin*¹ is of Opinion, that tho' tributary Princes, or those under Protection, ought to be reputed Sovereigns, yet for all that, Feudatories are not to be esteem'd such; of which we shall have a more fit Opportunity to discourse. II. To see a Principality divided into two, which of consequence brought on a second Division, that of Capua starting up, and which of course must ruin them at last, and they become a Prey to other Nations. III. Their having brought a most troublesome Thorn within their own Bowels, such as the Saracens were, who being fix'd in Bari, it was not long before they over-run both the Principalities anew; so that their own Forces not being sufficient, they were necessitated to have recourse to foreign Assistance in order to suppress them, and by that means render'd the Authority that the French had acquir'd over them the greater.

THIS Division was made in the Year 851, betwixt Adelcbisius and Siconolphus, to which almost all the Counts and Castaldi of the Principality of Benevento likewise consented, and very many of them, together with these two Princes, seal'd it. We read to this Day the Articles of this Division made by Radalcbisius in Pellegrinus, wherein the Bounds of these two Principalities are distinctly describ'd.

UNDER the Principality of Salerno many Castaldati and Castles were comprehended; Taranto, Latiniano, Cassano, Cossenza, Laino, Lucania, by some call'd Pesò, Consa, Montella, Rota, Salerno, Sarno, Cimiterium, Furculo, Capua, Teano, Sora, and the half of the Castaldatus of Acerenza, on that Side where it joins Latiniano and Consa.

St. ANGELO ad Cerros, which includes the Rocks of Monte Virgine, as far as the Place call'd Fenestella, was made the Boundary betwixt Benevento and Capua. Betwixt Benevento and Salerno, the Place call'd Alli Pellegrini was made the Limit; and betwixt Benevento and Consa Staffilo was the Boundary.

THE whole Province of Benevento being divided after this manner, the North Part, which joins to the Adriatick Sea, remain'd to Radalcbisius Prince of Benevento; the South Part, which joins to the Tyrrbenian Sea, fell to Siconolphus Prince of Salerno. Whereupon Salerno being made the Seat of Princes, began to raise its Head above the other Cities of this Province; a City in those Days very strong and well provided, which Archbis, as we have said, had fortified and surrounded with very strong Towers and Walls, in order to have it for a Place of Refuge and Safeguard in case of Distress.

THERE were likewise many other Conditions agreed to in this Division, amongst which the most Material and Principal were, that Radalcbisius promis'd not to disturb the Principality of Salerno, and to acknowledge for lawful Princes, Siconolphus, and whoever he should chuse for his Successor; to join their Forces together for driving the Saracens out of their Dominions; that no Hostilities should be committed by the People of the Principalities on either Side, but every one allow'd to live where they thought fit, and to return to the Cities and Castles where their Habitations were, every one to enjoy quietly their own Possessions; and that those who were desirous to go from the Principality of Salerno, to the Sanctuary of St. Michael in Mount Gargano, comprehended in the Principality of Benevento, should not be molested, but be allow'd to pass without Opposition or Damage; that all Bishops, Abbots, and the inferior Clergy, should return to the Bishopricks of their own Diocesses, and to their Churches and Monasteries; and if they should refuse, not having a lawful Excuse, they were to be oblig'd by force to return to their Places of Residence, as well the Bishops as all the other Clergy, excepting those however, who serv'd the Prince in his Palace, or those who had been compell'd to take Orders; that all Monks and Nuns should return to their Monasteries where they formerly liv'd, excepting those who to please others had enter'd by Force, and those who should be employ'd in the Palace; that all the Goods of the Churches, Bishopricks, and Monasteries, that were under Rules, or belong'd to Hospitals, should be taken account of, and according to their Value should pay the wonted Tax to the Prince; excepting nevertheless the Monasteries of Monte Cassino, and St. Vincent in Vulturno, which being immediately under the Protection of the Emperor Lothaire, and King Lewis his Son, were to keep their Privileges, Prerogatives, and Superiorities intire; excepting also the Goods of the Abbots and Canons who serve in the Palace. Many other Stipulations were agreed to, each of them promising Performance with solemn Oaths; and for the greater Security, the Authority of the Emperor was likewise interpos'd: They gave also their Paroles to Lewis, who was present, and to Lothaire his Father, calling him Our Emperor (by reason of the Oath of Fealty) faithfully to observe these Stipulations. The Peace being concluded, the Prisoners were deliver'd up, Peter the Son of Landon was deliver'd to Siconolphus, and also Poldefrit the Son of Pandulphus; and on the other hand, Adelgisus and Ladelgisus the Sons of Radalcbisius were deliver'd to him, with Poto his Nephew. And Lewis thinking that he had quieted all the Disturbances of these Provinces, return'd to France.

THO' this Peace had been thus settled, yet Siconolphus Prince of Salerno did not long enjoy the Fruits of it, for soon after, in the same Year 851. Siconolphus the first Prince of Salerno died, after ten Years and some Months uneasy and imbroil'd Reign from the Day of his being proclaim'd Prince, which was in the Year 840; he was a Prince of extraordinary Valour, but Death robb'd him of the Enjoyment of the Fruits of his so many Fatigues. He left Sico his only Son, as yet a sucking Child, Heir to his Principality, and left him Peter ¹ for his Tutor.

SOME Months after Radalchisus likewise died; the Beneventans did not fail to erect him a magnificent Tomb, on which in many Verses they set forth his Virtues. They did the same to Caretruda his Wife, by whom Radalchisus had twelve Children: Radelgarius was elected in his Room, who govern'd a few Years, and died in the Year 854, to whom the Beneventans likewise erected a stately Tomb ². Ajo ³ another of his Sons was Bishop of Benevento; and Adelgisus on the Death of his Brother succeeded: The rest were Counts and valiant Captains.

BUT in the mean time, about the Year 852, the Saracens who had fix'd their Residence in Bari, over-running Puglia and Calabria, advanced to Salerno and Benevento; neither were the Forces of Radelgarius and Sico sufficient to repulse such a furious Attack; they were oblig'd anew to have recourse to Lewis, for which purpose the two famous Abbots Bassacius of St. Benedict, and James of St. Vincent were appointed, who having represented the cruel Slaughter which the Saracens had made of the Beneventans, they intreated him that he would come and drive them away; for which the Beneventans offer'd to become his most faithful Servants, and to give him Power of subjecting them to the meanest of his People ⁴. Lewis came immediately to Italy, and march'd directly to Bari; but the Capuans and Salernitans, unmindful of their Promises, having withdrawn all the Assistance necessary for carrying on the War against the Saracens, had hid themselves; at which Lewis was much offended, and being well appris'd of their Treachery, he us'd them very severely; and seeing that Sico, by reason of his tender Age, was unfit for Government, he committed the Principality to the Government of Ademarus, a gallant and famous Captain, the Son of the abovenam'd Peter ⁵, and return'd to France, taking along with him Sico yet an Infant.

THUS did our Longobard Princes begin to feel the heavy Burden of a foreign Yoke, by which their Dominions came not only to be dispos'd of, but transferr'd from one Family to another; for Ademarus not long after, in the Year 856, Sico being dead, began absolutely to usurp the Principality, which he held for near six Years, until the Year 861, when, by the Instigation of Count Landon and Landulphus Bishop of Capua, he was imprison'd by Guaiferius the Son of Dauferius the Stammerer, who succeeded him, and afterwards in the Year 866, when the Emperor Lewis II. return'd to the Hither Italy, had his Eyes put out.

S E C T. II.

The Origin of the Principality of Capua.

THE disjoining of Capua from the Principality of Salerno was the Occasion of greater Mischiefs; for Landulphus Castaldus of Capua would no longer obey the Prince of Salerno, to which his Castaldatus was subject, according to the Division of Radalchisus; but making himself Lord of it, one Principality became three, that of Benevento, Salerno, and Capua; tho' Landulphus did not assume the Title of Prince, but of Count, so that the Race of the Counts of Capua began in him; nevertheless nevertheless he govern'd his County with absolute Authority ; and dying in the Year 342, Landulphus his Son, who succeeded him, likewise govern'd the County thirteen Years and nine Months with absolute and independent Sway. He transported the Inhabitants from the ancient Capua, also call'd Sicopolis, to the new, which he erected in the Year 856. near to the Bridge Cassilino, three Miles distant from the Ancient ; and it is the same which is now fortified with strong Towers and Walls, and reckon'd the strongest Bulwark in the Kingdom.

THE other Landon his Son, third Count of Capua, govern'd the County as his Grandfather and Father had done, independently of the Princes of Salerno ; and thus thereafter thorough a long Succession of Counts governing this County with absolute Sway, it continu'd disjoin'd from the two Principalities of Benevento and Salerno ; so that we read ¹, that Landulphus, on the last Day of his Life, with his last Breath, call'd his Sons to him, and left them this Command, That they should always make it their Business to foment Dissention and Quarrels betwixt the Princes of Benevento and Salerno, because otherwise they could not expect to preserve long the State which he had acquir'd from the Spoils of those two Principalities. In effect the Sons carefully observ'd their Father's Command, tho' it was contrary to that which Christ gave to his Disciples ; for after his Death, they, as is said, threw off the Yoke altogether, and by no means would obey Siconolphus Prince of Salerno, and especially Landonulphus one of the said Sons, was always in Opposition to him, and ungrateful ; and they not only observ'd this Command, but they transmitted it to their Posterity as a perpetual Deed of Trust, leaving it as an Inheritance to their Successors ².

THUS the Principality of Benevento being divided, a new Polity was introduc'd, and new Disturbances began to confound and turn these our Provinces topsy-turvy, because Emulation and Quarrels beginning betwixt these Princes, Wars often follow'd, and by fighting amongst themselves they gave fresh Occasions for the frequent returning of the French, and encourag'd the Saracens to make War with them, and to make themselves more powerful in those Places which they had possess'd.

THE Disorders did not end here, forasmuch as the Neapolitans taking Advantage of these Divisions, and refusing to pay Tribute to the Beneventans, and because they were often assisted by the Rival Princes, became more daring, and thereby the Feuds continu'd to be the more irreconcilable and cruel.

THE Polity which by Degrees was afterwards introduc'd was worse, for tho' formerly the Principality of Benevento was divided into many Counties and Castaldati, yet each of them was govern'd as formerly by one single Prince ; but afterwards the Princes of Benevento, those of Salerno, and especially the Counts of Capua, divided the Castaldati and the Counties among their Sons ; thus each Principality being split into many Counties, the Counts, tho' Subjects, began to set up for themselves, which was the Occasion that the Fiefs were increas'd in our Kingdom after so many different manners. Thus did Landulphus both Count and Bishop of Capua divide that County so imprudently amongst the Sons of his three Brothers, that for ever after there arose endless Quarrels and Wars.

The Expedition of the Emperor Lewis against the Saracens ; and his Imprisonment in Benevento.

THE Saracens took Advantage of so great Confusion, who from Bari frequently over-running the Province of Benevento putting all to Fire and Sword, oblig'd the Beneventans to have recourse to the French. But being unable to defend themselves with their own Forces and those of the French, they likewise had recourse recourse to others for Assistance; Majelpotus Castaldus of Telese, and Guandelpertus Castaldus of Bojan, with humble Submission and Prayers, had recourse to Lampertus Duke of Spoleta, for suppressing the Power of the Saracens, who notwithstanding all these Auxiliaries turn'd their Castaldati topsy-turvy, and defeated them.

FOR this Reason the Beneventans and Capuans were oblig'd to have recourse anew to the Emperor Lewis, who going to Benevento by the way of Sora, was met by the Ambassadors of many Cities imploring his Assistance. Landulphus Bishop and Count of Capua, who had succeeded his Brother Landon III. Count of Capua, with his Nephews, likewise came to meet him. He was receiv'd by Guaiferius who had succeeded Ademarus in Salerno, and at last by Adelgisus in Benevento.

THUS Lewis in the Year 867. at the Head of a powerful Army compos'd of his own Troops and those of our Longobard Princes, march'd towards Bari, defeated the Saracens, imprison'd Scodan their King, took Bari, which he restor'd to the Prince of Benevento; took Matera, garrison'd Canosa, and carried his victorious Arms to Taranto, where the Saracens had fortified themselves, to which City he laid close Siege; from whence full of Glory and Triumphant he return'd to Benevento. And being spurr'd on by the Run of his Fortune, he likewise pretended to exercise his Sovereignty over the Amalphitans, and the Dukedom of Naples itself, taking them under his Protection, and giving Assistance sometimes to the one, and sometimes to the other, at which Basilus Macedo, Emperor of the East, to whom the Neapolitan Dukedom and the Amalphitans were subject, was justly offended; he complain'd grievously of Lewis, accusing his imperious way of treating those People, as if he had a mind to subject them to his Dominion. Lewis, who did not think it proper at this Juncture to draw new Quarrels upon himself with the Greeks, in order to quiet the Mind of Basilus, wrote him a civil Letter, in which he protested, that he had no Design any manner of way to incroach upon the Dukedom of Naples which belong'd to the Greek Empire; and that he had only meddled in these Affairs for assisting the Oppress'd.

BUT whilst Lewis staid in Benevento, there happen'd to him an Adventure, the like of which had never fallen out to any Emperor of the West. The French being puffed up with their present Prosperity, not knowing how to keep themselves within Bounds, ill treated the Beneventans, and us'd them insolently and too severely; which they not being able to bear, at last brought their Prince Adelgisus to think of shaking off the shameful Yoke, and having Lewis within their City, resolv'd to arrest him, and make him Prisoner. Others relate, that Adelgisus was mov'd so to do, not so much at the Instigation of his Beneventans, as by the Persuasion of the Emperor Basilus, who was no ways pleas'd with the Progress of Lewis; however that may be, Lewis having disbanded his Army, remain'd in Benevento with a small Garrison; so that in the Month of August in the Year 871, on a sudden he was arrested by the Beneventans, and put in a secure Prison¹; his Goods were seiz'd, and the French that were upon Guard, after having been plunder'd, were oblig'd to flee; Lewis was kept in Prison forty Days, neither did they think of setting him at liberty until the Saracens having anew over-run the Province of Salerno, and their Number increasing to Thirty thousand, they laid Siege to Salerno, and struck Terror in all the Longobard Princes, and especially in Adelgisus. Upon such a Revolution of Affairs Lewis was set at Liberty, but Adelgisus first made him promise by a solemn Oath, never to enter within the Bounds of Benevento all the Days of his Life, and that he should never revenge himself upon the Beneventans for what he had suffer'd at this Time, which Lewis promis'd multis adjunctis execrationibus, swearing upon the Relicts of the Saints, and God's holy Evangelists.

LEWIS left Benevento about the End of the Year 871, and stopp'd eleven Months in Veroli; during which time he went to Rome and was crown'd Anno 872, by Adrian II. the Year before that Pope died, as Aimoinus will have it²; tho' some Modern Writers assert it to have been the preceding Year that he was crown'd by Adrian. Altho' Lewis took the Crown but at this Time, yet he had been advanc'd to the Empire from the Year 856, when the Emperor Lothaire his Father became Monk, and divided the Empire amongst his three Sons, assigning Rome and Italy to Lewis; Austrasia to Lothaire, whence afterwards it was call'd Lotharingia; and Burgundy to Charles, as we have said.

NOTWITHSTANDING Lewis with solemn Oaths had promis'd never more to enter within the Limits of Benevento, yet in the Beginning of the Year 873. he broke that Agreement, and with a strong Army advanc'd as far as Capua.

IN those Times Princes were so influenc'd by Religion, that they never or seldom broke their Oaths; but from the Time of Gregory II. and Zachary, the Popes had found ways and means to break those Chains, and absolve their Consciences; whence afterwards not only the Popes, but also the Bishops assum'd to themselves a Power of absolving from Judicial, or other Oaths. By this, and by granting Dispensations in matrimonial Cases, which formerly were granted by the Princes, they became both terrible and necessary to Princes. Lewis who had no mind to return to Benevento contrary to his Oath, was immediately made easy by John VIII. who a little before had succeeded to Adrian II. He told him, that Oaths, extorted by Force, and with so much Indignity, were no ways binding, therefore he absolv'd him from all the Promises made to the Beneventans. There are some who write, that Lewis notwithstanding this Absolution, that he might not be reckon'd perjurd, would not put himself at the Head of his Army, but cheating himself, substituted his Wife Engilberga in his Place, that in his Name, and under his Authority she might carry on the War. He came to Capua, and on his March defeated the Saracens, and confining them to Taranto, he went to revenge himself of Adelgisus, and endeavour'd to make himself Master of Benevento. Some again have written, that being seiz'd with Fear, he fled to the Island of Corfica; but whether he did not succeed in it, as Erchempertus relates, or that many Counts, and the Pope himself interpos'd for agreeing them, there was a Peace concluded betwixt them, and Adelgisus with those of his Party were restor'd to Lewis's Favour. Landulphus Count and Bishop of Capua, who had assisted powerfully in these Skirmishes with the Saracens, was likewise pardon'd.

SO great was the Intimacy which Landulphus contracted with the Emperor, that besides his having obtain'd from him the chief Honours, he claim'd the whole Province of Benevento, and that Capua should be made a Metropolis; which, as Erchempertus relates, he could not bring to bear, for Capua did not get that Pre-eminency before the Year 968. from Pope John XIII.; and Benevento a Year after by the same Pope was erected into a Metropolis; the Custom was afterwards introduc'd into these our Provinces, that the Popes, and not the Princes, rais'd Bishops to be Metropolitans, and Cities Metropolis's, of which we shall have a more proper Opportunity to discourse.

LEWIS after having continu'd a Year in Capua and these our Provinces, and given many and terrible Defeats to the Saracens, the following Year 874. went to France, with a Resolution never to return any more to these our Parts; for in this Year, as some have said, or in the following according to the Annals of France, and the Modern Authors, he ended his Days in France, and not in Milan. A most glorious Prince, and to whom these our Provinces are so much beholden, that if he had not so often reliev'd them from the frequent and great Incursions of the Saracens, they had been totally and effectually subjected to their Dominion. We have many Monuments of the Piety of this Prince, in the many Monasteries of the Order of St. Benedict founded by him in Abruzzo, which Leo Ostiensis does not forget in his Chronicle. The Donation, or rather Confirmation of former Donations, made by Peppin and Charles the Great to the Church of Rome, ought not to be attributed to this Lewis, as the Abbot of *Noce*² believ'd, but to Lewis the Pious, Son of Charles the Great, in the Time of Paschal I.; neither does it include any more than what Peppin and Charles gave, which is manifest from the Chronicle of *Leo Ostiensis*³.

BY Lewis's Death falling out in the Year 874, or the following, we clearly see the Error of those who believ'd, that Lewis having retaken Bari from the Saracens, had restor'd it to Basilus Emperor of the East; for the Saracens, as soon as Lewis had left Italy, and gone to France, immediately sallied out of Taranto, to which they had been confin'd, and went and ravag'd Bari and the neighbouring Places; whereupon the People of Bari in the Year 876. after Lewis's Death, not being able to bear the Cruelty of these Barbarians, invited Gregory Governor of Otranto, and brought him and his Greeks into their City, as Erchempertus ¹, and Lupus Protospata ² relate.

CHAP. I.

Charles the Bald succeeds in the Empire of the West: New Incursions of the Saracens, accompanied with other Revolutions and Disorders.

THE Death of Lewis occasion'd such Confusion, that not only these our Provinces, but a great Part of Italy were thereby afflicted, and fill'd with new Calamities. From the Time of Charles the Great till now, there had been no Disturbances on account of the Succession to the Empire. The last Wills of the Princes laying aside all ambiguous and subtle Quirks now in use, were receiv'd with the utmost Respect by the Successors; whatever they commanded was readily obey'd; and if the reigning Emperor in his Life-time appointed a Colleague, or at his Death a Successor, his Will was an inviolable Law. Thus did Charles the Great by Pepin and Lewis; Lewis by Lotbair, and at last Lotbair by the other Lewis. Hitherto for the Election of the Emperor of the West there was no need of calling Assemblies or Comitia; out of a bare and pure Ceremony introduc'd by Custom, they had recourse to the Popes for Consecration and Coronation. But Lewis having left no Male Issue, the French and our Italians began to contend for the Empire. In France the most stickling Pretenders were Charles the Bald, King of France, the Son of Judith, and Brother to Lotbair the Father of Lewis, and Lewis King of Germany, Brother to the same Lotbair, to whose Share, according to the Division made, Germany had fallen, and a Part of Lorraine, which a few Years before had by an Agreement been divided betwixt him and his Brother Charles, so that both the Pretenders were Uncles to the deceas'd Lewis.

AT other times in the Course of this History we have on many Occasions seen, that the Quarrels of Princes have always ended in the Increase of the Dignity and Authority of the Popes; which is more clear and evident from this than any preceding Event. In this Competition for the Empire of the West, there were two Things necessary to be compass'd by the Rivals, in order to succeed in the Matter; to wit, first to enter Italy with an Army, and next to procure the Good Will of the Pope, because by the Solemnity of the Coronation he could immediately make the Matter easy, it being a Ceremony which by the People was reckon'd the most certain Sign of being assum'd to the Imperial Throne. Charles the Bald was no sooner appriz'd of the Death of his Nephew, than he immediately enter'd Italy, and prevented his Brother Lewis, who had sent his Sons Charles the Gross and Carloman to put a Stop to Charles's March, but they came too late and could do nothing; at which Lewis being much inrag'd, he with his third Son Lewis invaded France, where he vented his Passion in a most Hostile manner.

IN the mean time Charles the Bald having solicited Pope John VIII. to favour his Undertaking, advanc'd towards Rome; this Pope was unwilling to lose so fair an Opportunity, by which he might reap both Advantages to himself and his See: after having brought the Romans to his beck, he sent two Bishops to invite Charles to Rome to take the Imperial Crown, which he had ready for him, having made Choice of him above all the Pretenders. Charles came to Rome, and in the Church of the Vatican, with great Acclamations and Solemnity, was crown'd by John on Christmas Day, in the Year 875, and proclaim'd Augustus, and took an Oath always to employ his Arms against the Enemies of the See, and to defend it with all his Power. The Pope by this Fact assum'd much more to himself than ever any of his Predecessors had done on the like Occasion, for if that Oration made to the Bishops be his, as we read in *Sigonius*¹, he speaks in such a Stile as if Charles had absolutely receiv'd the Empire from him, and his Election had solely belong'd to him; so that from that Time forward it has been pretended by the Popes, that the Title of Emperor was a pure and downright Favour bestow'd by the Pope, and therefore they began to number the Years of the Empire from the Day of the Pontifical Consecration; and John's Successors have had the Assurance to tell the Emperors of the West to their Face, that the Empire was their free Gift: but of this more in another Place.

'TIS likewise said, that Charles in return for the so many Favours he had receiv'd from the Pope on this Occasion, besides his having adorn'd the Church of St. Peter with Gifts of great Value, yielded to the Pope the Sovereignty of Rome, which the other French Emperors his Predecessors had always reserv'd, and that it was not before this Time that this City was put under the independent and absolute Dominion of the Pope; but all these Accounts appear to be Fables, when we consider what the Otho's, Emperors of the West, did in Rome, as we shall shew by-and-by.

AS soon as Charles had dispatch'd his Affairs in Rome, according to the Custom of the other Kings of Italy, he went to Parva, and there, as his Predecessors had been, he was crown'd by the Archbishop of Milan, and proclaim'd King of Italy; whereupon soon after in the same City he establish'd many Laws for the good Government of it.

CHARLES during all his Life-time enjoy'd the Empire, and the Kingdoms of Italy and France without any Dispute, for Lewis of Germany his Brother, who died in Frankfort on the 28th Day of August in the Year 876, left subject Matter enough for his Sons to make War elsewhere. Lewis left three Sons, amongst whom, according to the dangerous Custom introduc'd into France, he divided the paternal Kingdom. Bavaria, Bohemia, Carinthia, Sclavonia, Austria, and a Part of Hungary fell to Carlomann's Share. To Lewis, Franconia, Saxony, Frisia, Thuringia, the Lower Loraine, Cologne, and many other Cities upon the Banks of the Rhine. To Charles the Gross, Germany from the Main to the Alps, and the other Part of Loraine.

BUT whilst the Emperor Charles govern'd France and Italy, the Saracens, whom Lewis II. had coop'd up in Taranto, return'd anew to plague these our Provinces, and over-running as far as Bari, threaten'd Slaughter and Destruction to the other Provinces likewise. Therefore the Neapolitans, the Amalpbians and Salernitans, having none to whom they could have recourse for Relief against the threatening Irruptions, which they could not withstand with their own Forces, were oblig'd to treat with the Saracens for a Peace the best way they could, which they would not hear of, but upon Condition that they should all join their Forces together, and with their united Troops march against the Roman Dukedom, and Rome itself; the Confederacy was agreed to on these hard Conditions², of which Pope John being appriz'd, had immediately recourse to the Emperor, who sent to his Assistance Lambertus Duke of Spoleto, and Guido his Brother. The Pope himself in the Year 876. came to Naples accompanied by them, and in these our Provinces commanded the Expedition. This was the first Time that a Pope was seen at the Head of an Army, in all Appearance on a very pious Occasion, for suppressing the Cruelty of the Saracens, who had a Mind to overturn his State, and overthrow the Pontificate. John us'd all Means possible in order to break this Confederacy, and to draw to his own Side those Princes who were confederated with the Saracens; and so instant was he with Guaiferius Prince of Salerno, that he not only made him leave the Confederacy, but turn his Arms against the obstinate Neapolitans.

SERGIUS was this Year Duke of Naples, who for having imprison'd Athanasius his Uncle, Bishop of Naples, was hated by many; he on no account would break off from the Saracens, notwithstanding the Rebukes of the Pope; therefore he was immediately excommunicated by the same Pope, and Guaiferius march'd against him, fought with the Neapolitans, and made two and twenty of them Prisoners, whom the Pope caused all to be beheaded ¹.

AT this Time Athanasius Brother to Sergius was Bishop of Naples, who had succeeded the other Athanasius his Uncle in that See, who, in order to do a Thing acceptable to the Pope, laying aside the Ties of Blood and Nature, being likewise spurr'd on by Ambition, imprison'd his own Brother, and having put out his Eyes, presented him to the Pope in Rome. John lik'd the Present much, and kept him in Rome, where he miserably ended his Days ². Athanasius afterwards got himself to be elected Duke in the Room of Sergius; and thus, according to some late Precedents, he became both Bishop and Duke of that City. This Athanasius was a Man of a turbulent Spirit, and who during his Government disturb'd all the other Princes his Neighbours, and turn'd these our Provinces upside down. He, in order to save his own Dukedom, not minding his Episcopal Dignity, nor regarding any Thing but his own Ambition, made no scruple to renew the League with the Saracens; he prepar'd Quarters for them near Naples, and join'd them with his Neapolitans, and put the Beneventans, the Capuans, and the Salernitans into the utmost Confusion, by making Inroads to the very Borders of Rome, where there was nothing that was barbarous but he attempted, plundering where-ever he went.

THE Pope seeing this, fulminated his terrible Anathema's against Athanasius, and in the Year 881. excommunicated and curs'd him; and according to Erchempertus, did the same by the City of Naples: Which the Letters of this Pope, yet extant, testify ³. He likewise excommunicated the Amalphytans ⁴. The same had happen'd to the Salernitans and Guaiferius their Prince, if, being terrified by such Thunderings, they had not broke off from the League. And besides the Pope seeing that the Saracens in great Shoals over-run the Country on all Sides, likewise wrote many Letters, and sent many Ambassadors to Charles the Bald, whom he put in mind of the many Favours done him, which hasten'd him immediately, after the Example of Lewis his Predecessor, to come to Italy with a powerful Army, in order to drive them away, otherwise all had gone to Ruin, and Rome had fallen into the Hands of the Barbarians, to the irreparable Ruin of that See, of which he had sworn to be the Defender.

THESE Examples ought to convince us that the Opinion of those is very disputable, who have written, that general local Interdictions were not older than the Time of Gregory VII.; and that this Pope was the first that introduc'd them into the Church, by punishing the People for the Wickedness of the Princes; for if what Erchempertus relates be true, who flourish'd about the same Time, or a little after, the City of Naples actually underwent such a Misfortune on account of the Treachery and wicked Practices of its Bishop and Duke, who oblig'd the Neapolitans to enter into a Confederacy with the Saracens. Besides, not to mention more ancient Examples of other Countries, we have another remarkable Instance in the Principality of Benevento, where the Emperor Henry II. had appointed Pandulphus to be Governor; because the Beneventans would not obey him, the Emperor, who was in concert with Pope Clement, in the Year 1010. got him to excommunicate the Beneventans; from which they were not absolv'd till ten Years after, when Leo IX. who succeeded Clement, having come to Benevento, took off the Interdiction.

BUT at the same Time that Charles was on his March to Italy to assist the Pope, when he came to Paſſua with a small Number of Troops, whither the Pope went to meet him, he found that Carlomann was got before him, who having arrived in Italy with a powerful Army, endeavour'd to drive Charles out of it, and possess himself of the Empire and Kingdom of Italy. Charles being surpriz'd at his having got the start of him, return'd towards France, and being come to the Alps, was taken ill of a Fever, not without suspicion of Poison, where he ended his Days on the 6th Day of April in the Year 877, the 54th Year of his Age: His Body was interr'd at Vercelli, and seven Years thereafter was transported to St. Denis.

S E C T. I.

Greater Confusion and Calamities in these our Provinces by the Death of Charles the Bald, in the Reign of Carlomann.

CHARLES being dead, and succeeded in Italy by Carlomann, Confusion and Calamities increas'd; Carlomann was not in a Condition to relieve our Provinces, being employ'd in other Undertakings, and the Saracens growing much more cruel, all went to Wreck and Desolation.

THE Broils betwixt our own Princes was a great Addition to these Miseries; for the Capuans by the Death of Landulphus, which fell out in the Year 879, were divided into Factions. He left many Grandchildren, who greatly hasten'd the Ruin of that Province, by dividing it equally amongst them. There fell to the Share of Pandonulphus Count of Capua, who succeeded him, Tiano and Casamirta, which some call Caserta. To Landon, Berolassi and Sessa. To the other Landon, Calinio and *Gajazza*¹; and thus of one State many were made, by its being divided into small Portions, which at last was the Ruin of our Longobard Princes, because the Division of their Estates occasion'd Factions and intestine Wars, which gave Opportunities to other Nations to take Advantage of their Quarrels and Confusions. For that ancient Custom took place amongst them, not to prefer the elder Brother in the Succession to Fiefs before the younger, but all shar'd equally², contrary to the Custom of the French, who prefer the Eldest to prevent the Division of the State; from whence in our Kingdom that Distinction was introduc'd, that in Successions, some Fiefs are regulated according to the Law of the Longobards, others according to the Jus Francorum, which at last prevail'd, as being the most provident and prudent, which we shall shew in a more proper Place.

AND tho' Gasta had been given to Pandonulphus by John VIII., yet the Capuans did not treat the Gaetans so mildly, as to prevent new Quarrels and Revolutions in it and his whole State; for which Cause, three Years and eight Months afterwards, Pandonulphus was driven out of it, and Landon in the Year 882. was elected in his Room, who governing Capua indiscreetly, held it only two Years: Atemulphus his Brother taking Advantage of his bad Conduct, invaded it, and in the Year 887. this valiant Captain having driven him out of it, restor'd the County of Capua to a better Form of Government, and so demean'd himself in his Prosperity, that he was advanc'd to the Principality of Benevento, by which, after a Course of many Years he united these two States under one Person, as we shall relate.

THE Confusions in the Principality of Benevento were no less, for whilst Adelchisus, altogether over-joy'd, was returning to Benevento, after the taking of Castello Trabentense, which some call Trivento, by the Conspiracy of his Nephews and Friends, in the Year 878. was cruelly murder'd, after having reign'd in Benevento 24 Years and a half; we read of no Tomb erected for this Prince, as there had been for the rest, as Pellegrinus writes. But the same Author gives us one of his Capitularia, wherein he establishes many Laws, some conformable to those old Laws of the Longobard Kings, others not.

THE Murder of this Prince occasion'd terrible Confusion in the State, for Gaidaris his Nephew, and Son of Radelgarius succeeded him in the Principality; and out of Ambition excluded Radelchisis the eldest Son of Adelghisus, who had been murder'd: The Beneventans two Years and a half afterwards depos'd him, and sent him Prisoner to France, and set Radelchisis the Son of Adelghisus on the Throne; but not long after, Gaidaris having made his Escape out of France, retir'd to Bari, under the Protection of the Greeks; for this City, which formerly had been govern'd by Castaldi, sent thither by the Princes of Benevento, because it had often been in the Hands of the Saracens, considering that the Beneventans had frequently lost it, and could not defend it against their continual Incursions, had come under the Dominion of the Greeks, when the Inhabitants, as we have said, deliver'd themselves up to Gregory, whom they invited from Otranto, whereof he was Governor, which City had likewise return'd under the Dominion of the Greeks. And Gaidaris having gone to Constantinople to the Emperor Basilus, was courteously receiv'd by him, and got the Government of the City of Oria during Life, from whence he continually molested the Beneventans, who had driven him from that Dominion.

RADELCHIS being beset with Enemies on all Sides, enjoy'd little Quiet in his Principality; for not long after a War breaking out betwixt the Neapolitans and the Amalphytans on the one hand, and betwixt the Capuans and Beneventans on the other, all went to Confusion; and after a Reign of a few Years, in the Year 883. he was driven out of it, and Ajo his Brother put in his Room. Neither did this Prince long enjoy his State in quiet, for being taken Prisoner by Guido Duke of Spoletto; tho' by the Means of the Sipontins, who on this Occasion shew'd great Fidelity to their Prince, he had been set at Liberty, and restor'd to Benevento; yet Gaidaris, who possess'd the City of Oria, stirr'd up the Greeks against him, with whom he had many Battles. And he dying after a troublesome Reign of seven Years, Orso his Son, who was but ten Years old, succeeding him in the Year 890, compleated the Ruin of the Longobard Princes in Benevento; and at last this City being taken by the Greeks, after the Longobards had held it 330 Years, it came under the Dominion of Leo Emperor of the East, the Son of Basilus; for this Prince being much incens'd against Ajo, and push'd on by Gaidaris, the Year following 891, sent a most formidable Army into these our Provinces, under the Command of Simbaticius Protospatarius in order to subdue Benevento, who having laid close Siege to it, in the Space of three Months made himself Master of it, with all the other Places under its Dominion, and expell'd the unfortunate Orso, who had held it only one Year. Thus Benevento, after 330 Years from Zoto the first Duke, to Orso, was subjected to the Emperors of the East, and govern'd for a Year by the same Simbaticius who had conquer'd it; after which George a Patrician was sent by the Emperor to be his Successor, who govern'd it till the Year 895.

Calamities in the Principality of SALERNO.

BUT more grievous and lamentable were the Calamities of Salerno, which being often invaded by the Saracens, suffer'd cruel Slaughter, and incredible Devastation, insomuch that the Inhabitants with their whole Families were often oblig'd to go and seek Shelter elsewhere. Not only the Saracens but our Princes themselves themselves likewise join'd in ruining them, and especially Athanasius Duke of Naples, in Confederacy with these Barbarians, laid all the Country waste, and reduc'd Guaimarus, who succeeded his Father Guiferius in the Principality of Salerno in the Year 880, to such Distress, that in order to be able to make a Stand against so many Incursions, his own Forces not being sufficient, out of cruel Necessity he was forc'd to have recourse so far as the East for Assistance, from the Emperor Leo and Alexander, the Sons of Basilus, by whom he was seasonably supply'd¹; and besides, they sent him a Charter, also recorded by *Summontes*², by which they confirm'd to him the Principality of Salerno, in the same manner as the Division had been made betwixt Siconolphus and *Radelchisus*³.

THERE was not a more perfidious and faithless Man on Earth than this Athanasius, who sometimes entering into Alliance with the Saracens, and sometimes breaking off from them, according as the Necessity of his Affairs requir'd, put these our Provinces into Confusion; when the Saracens were over-running the neighbouring Principalities, and were every where successful, he, in order to extinguish the Fire which he saw in his neighbouring States, fearing lest it should seize on his own, made a shift to join and assist the neighbouring Princes; at other times, when they were worsted by the Greeks or Longobards, and he saw himself out of Danger, he left them and join'd the Saracens again. Thus it once happen'd, that a great Body of Saracens being in Quarters at the Foot of Vesuvius, he sent into Sicily to invite King Suchaim to come and put himself at their Head; but it falling out afterwards that this King began to destroy Athanasius's own Country, and outrageously to spoil and rob the Neapolitans, he, inrag'd at such ill Usage, immediately resolv'd to join and make Alliance with Guaimarus Prince of Salerno, and the Capuans, in order to drive them away, in which he was successful. Erchempertus relates⁴, that being troubled in his Conscience, he had made this League for driving out the Saracens, that by so Pious an Undertaking he might merit Absolution from the Censures of the Pope, by which he and his City of Naples had been interdicted from the Month of April in the Year 881.

THUS by the Ambition and Quarrels of our Princes, these Provinces which now make the Kingdom, never saw more calamitous Times than those, in which they were assaulted and torn to pieces, not only by our own Princes, but likewise by foreign Nations. The Beneventans, Capuans, Salernitans, Neapolitans, Amalaphitans, and the Greeks fought with one another; and when they were wearied of their own Calamities and gave over, the Saracens were always ready prepar'd, who being spread over all, and having in many Places of the Kingdom, fix'd, strong, and secure Garrisons, such as Gariigliano, Taranto, Bari, and at last in Mount Gargano, they so miserably afflicted these Provinces, that there was no Place free from War, Pillage, Calamity and Death; so that not only the two famous and rich Monasteries of Cassino and St. Vincent many times suffer'd Desolation and Burning, but also the most conspicuous Cities and whole Provinces underwent the same Calamities.

THERE was no Assistance or Relief to be expected any where: the Forces of the Emperors of the East were at a distance and weak; much less could any be expected from the Emperors of the West. Lewis II. was dead, who had made himself famous in the World for having so often driven the Saracens out of these Provinces, and pent them up in the furthest Cities; and no Assistance was to be expected from his Successors, because Charles the Bald who succeeded him, being prevented by Carlomann his Competitor, was forc'd to turn his Arms another way. And Carlomann, who after Charles's Death possess'd the Kingdom of Italy three Years, having other Undertakings on his Hands, and being oblig'd to oppose the Forces of Lewis the Stammerer, Son of Charles the Bald, who laid Claim to Italy, could not mind these our remote Parts.

Besides these, Italy was oppress'd with other Calamities ; for by the Death of Charles the Bald, the Empire being vacant, though Carlomann was in Possession of the Kingdom of Italy, which he soon made himself Master of: Lambertus, Duke of Spoletto, surpriz'd Rome, and claim'd the Imperial Crown from the Pope. The Pope fled to France, and got Assistance from Lewis III. surnam'd the Stammerer, and in return for so many Favours received on this Occasion, consecrated him Emperor in France, and caus'd him to be proclaim'd Augustus. But Lewis, though he was proclaim'd Emperor, had no Dominion in Italy, for Carlomann was in Possession of the Kingdom of Italy, though he was not Emperor: Which is an evident Confirmation of what we have said in this History, that the Emperors of the West, after the Restoration of the Empire, did not Rule in Italy as Emperors, but as they were Kings of it ; neither did Charles the Great add Italy to the Empire, any more than he made France a Member of it ; and their Laws, which were long observ'd in Italy, and which were added to those of the Longobards, were not in Force as Laws of the Emperors ; but as being Laws of its own Kings. Indeed, our ancient Writers, in the Catalogue of the Longobard Laws, summing up the Laws of the Kings of Italy after those establish'd by the Longobard Kings, reckon those from Pepin to Conrade, as Laws made by Kings, and not by Emperors.

BUT these two supreme Dignities were soon united in the Person of Charles the Gross ; for his Brother Carlomann dying in the Year 880, he, in all haste, went to Italy, where being kindly received by the Italians, according to Custom, he was crown'd and anointed King of Italy, by the Archbishop of Milan ; and not long after being invited again to Italy by Pope John, on Christmas Day, in the Year 881, he was crown'd with the Imperial Crown by that Pope, and proclaim'd Emperor.

CHARLES the Gross was often invited by the Pope to come and assist these Provinces, which were still molested by the Saracens, and though he came as far as Ravenna for that End, yet he was forced to return again to France, whither the impending Ruin of the Nation recall'd him. It was at this time, that the Normans were first heard of ; they had come from the utmost Parts of Scandinavia, and over-running and putting all France into Confusion, had laid Siege to Paris, so that in order to pacify them, Charles was forc'd to assign them Neustria for a Place to settle in, which Province to this Day retains the Name of Normandy.

THE Disorders of that Kingdom were worse, on account of the Contentions which arose after the Death of Lewis King of France, and afterwards of Carlomann his Brother, which at last occasion'd the Translation of the Empire from the French to the Italians. It was at this Time, that our Italians seeing France ruin'd and divided, began to think, that if Charles the Gross should die without leaving Male-Issue, the best thing they could do, was to chuse an Italian Emperor, who not being diverted by other Governments, and in other distant Countries, could better govern Italy, and defend the Apostolical See, which by the frequent IncurSIONs of the Saracens, even to the Gates of Rome, was often seen to be in great Danger ; they look'd upon the ancient Valour not to be yet quite extinct in Italy, and that there were still such Persons who could support that Dignity. Therefore they perswaded Adrian III. who then govern'd the Apostolical See, to make, at their Request (if we may give Credit to Sigonius ¹ who relates the Words of it) this Decree: Ut moriente Rege Crasso sine filiis, Regnum Italicis Principibus una cum titulo Imperii traderetur. As he actually died in the Month of January, of the Year 888, who in his own Person alone, had united the Three most renowned Kingdoms of Europe, to wit, Germany, Italy and France, and thereby equall'd the Grandeur of Charles the Great : Our Italians, by undertaking to restore the Kingdom of Italy, and the August Title of Emperor to their own Nation, and thereby thinking to re-establish its Provinces better, brought upon themselves such Revolutions and Confusion, that Italy had never been so miserably afflicted, nor in such Disorder, by the intestine Broils of the People, and the Treachery and Wickedness of the Princes, as it was in these Times, when it was under the Berengarii, and the Guidi, the one Duke of Friuli, and the other of Spoletto, as we shall have occasion to relate.

C H A P. II.

The Condition to which the Jurisprudence, and other Parts of Learning were reduc'd in these Times, and of the new Collection of the Laws made by the Emperors of the East.

BE H O L D the unhappy and lamentable Condition to which these our Provinces were reduc'd about the End of the Ninth Century; would to God their Disasters had ended there: It would truly be absurd to imagine, that in such wicked Times, amidst so great Confusion, Discipline could be maintained in its Purity and Force. All was Disorder, all Confusion; only in Rome, which was altogether owing to the Popes, the Monks, and the Clergy, some Learning was preserv'd, and the Latin Tongue was not quite extinct, at least in Writings: Whence Men of Letters have since been call'd Clergy, and the Illiterate, Laicks; for in the Writers of the last Age, such as Dante, Puffavanti and others, by Clergy, is understood learned Men, and by Laicks, the Illiterate. For which they are so much the more Praise-worthy, that tho' Pope Gregory I. had forbidden them to imploy their Studies on heathen Authors, in order to blot out all Memory of ancient Learning, and therefore rebuk'd Didicius, Bishop of Vienna, very severely, for teaching *Grammar*¹, yet amidst the so many Inundations of Barbarians, the Church of Rome, as much as the Circumstances of the Times would allow, retain'd some Remains of the gentile Learning, which otherwise would have been altogether lost and extinguish'd². Who would believe, that Philosophy, Physick, Astrology, and so many other Sciences had been restor'd amongst us in these Times by the Saracens, by the Application they gave to the Books of Aristotle, Galen and other Authors; whereby Averroes, Avicenna, and many others made themselves so famous and renown'd? But hence it came to pass, that for a long time, the Sciences, Philosophy and Physick, &c. were so ill manag'd and cultivated in our Schools by Aristotle's being only in Vogue, and the so many other Philosophers neglected, that the Streams of Theology, Mathematicks, and other Sciences, run very muddy, as we shall shew in a more fit Place.

A N D as to what relates to our Jurisprudence, the Books of Justinian had been banish'd, and scarce known in Italy, and the Roman Law had only remain'd by Tradition amongst the Commonalty, who are the last in laying aside ancient Customs, and the Laws of their Fore-fathers; only the Novellæ of Justinian had been retain'd by the Ecclesiasticks, and often quoted by the Popes³: There was some use made of the Theodosian Code, as having been valu'd and corrected by Charles the Great. On the contrary, the Lombard Laws were in vogue, to which those that had been publish'd by Charles the Great and his Successors, as Kings of Italy, being added, they had full Authority and Force in our Tribunals; and by these all Law Pleas were decided.

A N D because by degrees, Fiefs had crept in and multiplied in these Provinces, the Feodal Customs, not Laws, began to get Footing; for the first amongst us who publish'd written Laws on them, was Conrade the Salick, as we shall relate.

² Bacon de Verulam. de Augum. Scient. lib. 1. | ³ Jo. VIII. Epist. 163. V. Struv. hist. jur. Justin. cap. 5. §. 7.

Their Rules and Customs were, for the most part taken, as we have said, from the Longobard Laws; but the Laws and Customs of other Nations had likewise their Share in them: From the Saxons and the Thuringians, the perpetual Exclusion of Women from Succession: From the Normans and Burgundians, the Custom of preferring the eldest Sons; from the same Normans, the Custom of paying Fines on the renewing the ancient Investiture: From the Longobards, the preferring the maiden Sister, whom they call'd in Capillis, to the married Sister, who had got her Portion, in Places where Women (as in our Kingdom) are capable of succeeding to Fiefs. The Custom of Juries, and the determin'd Number of Twelve, was taken both from the Longobards, and the Ripuarii. Our Fore-fathers likewise learn'd from the Germans, the Necessity of having the Pares Curie present when Judgment was to be given in Cases of new Investitures, or Deprivation of Fiefs; and their Successions were regulated according to the Custom of Places, and not by written Laws, by which the Rights of Succession became so various and diverse, that the Compilers of this Law wisely call'd them Consuetudines; of which we shall have occasion to discourse more at length, when we come to treat of the Collection of the Feudal Books. It was owing to this likewise, that the Roman Law was in such disuse, that it was only preserv'd amongst the Commonalty, as an old Custom; for these our Provinces, by the multiplicity of Fiefs, were filled with a vast number of Barons, and the Longobard Laws, and Feudal Customs, which in a great Part were taken from them, were only respected and observed; and it was look'd upon as a Mark of Nobility to live according to the Longobard, and not the Roman Laws. And though Charles the Great, Pepin, Lothaire and Lewis, had left the People of the Provinces to live under whatever Law they thought best, yet the greatest Part chose the Longobard. Besides, when a Woman was married, though she had liv'd under the Roman Law, yet afterwards she was to be under the Longobard, according to which the Husband constantly liv'd, of which we have a clear and singular Example in Doviat^a.

BUT the Longobard Laws, and the Feudal Customs were in Force and Authority only in those Provinces that were subject to the Longobard Princes; for hitherto they had not obtain'd in the Dukedom of Naples, nor the other Cities and Places where the Dominion of the Greeks continu'd, who neither acknowledg'd the Longobard nor the Feudal Laws: Therefore, perhaps some may think, that at least, in these Times, in the Dukedom of Naples, Amalphis, Gaeta, and all the other Countries subject to the Greeks, they liv'd according to the Laws of Justinian, and especially in those Times, in which the Greeks had re-taken many Places from our Longobard Princes, such as Bari, Taranto, and Benevento.

BUT they will be surpriz'd to hear, that the Books of Justinian had no better Fortune in the East than in the West, and therefore were not acknowledg'd in the Cities and Provinces that maintain'd themselves under the Dominion of the Greeks. This was owing partly to Remissness in Justin, who succeeded to Justinian; but much more to the Envy that the succeeding Emperors bore to the Glory of Justinian, who endeavour'd, by the means of new Constitutions and Novellæ, and new Collections, to eclipse his Books. And the greatest Blow they got, was in the Ninth Century, in which we now are, when in the Year 870, the Emperor Basilus, and shortly after, Leo and Constantine his Sons, order'd, That so famous Collection of the Basilicæ to be made. Therefore it will be proper that we treat at large of the many Collections made by the Greeks, and the Works of their Lawyers, who bestowed their Labour on that Subject, by which the true Causes shall be discover'd, why the Laws of Justinian had not that Force and Authority in the Dukedom of Naples, and all the other Cities subject to the Greeks, which they had afterwards in these Provinces, when they were restor'd again in Italy in the Time of Lothaire II. and were expounded in our Academies, and acquir'd that Force in our Tribunals, which continues to this Day. And I am induc'd the more willingly to do it in this Place, because being tir'd with these many preceding Disasters and Calamities, I would gladly refresh myself a little with Learning, which at this Time was not altogether lost and extinct in Greece, as it was in Italy.

S E C T. I.

New Collections of Laws made in Greece ; and their Use amongst us in those Cities that were subject to the Greeks.

THE Books of Justinian, that is to say, the Collections of the Pandects, Codes, and other Constitutions, call'd Novellæ ; as soon as their Author died, underwent such strange Alterations among the Greeks themselves, that at last being laid aside, the Roman Law was not comprehended in them, but in other Volumes. This Neglect of them in the East, was chiefly owing to two Causes ; the First, was the so many other new Constitutions, which, by the succeeding Emperors (beginning from Justin the Younger, from the Year 566, to Michael Paleologus in the Year 1260.) from time to time were publish'd, which by altering and correcting what Justinian had establish'd in his Books, were the Cause of so many Changes and Novelties, that the Professors and Advocates studied only these new Constitutions, as containing what was necessary for the Practice of the Courts of Justice, and the Decision of Causes, and did not regard the Justinian Code, the Laws of which by the so many Corrections that had happen'd to them, were of little or no Authority, and therefore were altogether laid aside.

THE other Cause, was the so many Collections or Compilations made afterwards by the succeeding Emperors, some more compendious, others more full, which eclips'd those made by Justinian. The more compendious Collections being of various Sorts, got various Names : Some were call'd Prochyra, that is to say, Promptuaria ; others Enchiridia, that is to say, Manualia : Some others Eclogæ, which signifies Delectus, or Collections of the most choice Things, and by other Names, such as Synopsis, Epitome, or Compendium. The more full Collections went all under the same Name of Basilicæ, that is to say, Imperial, not, as some believed, that they took their Name from the Emperor Basilus, under whom they were first compiled. Among the Greeks, Basileus is the same as King or Emperor, therefore the Collections, which contain'd their Constitutions, were call'd Basilicæ, that is to say, Imperial.

WITH regard to the first Cause, viz. the so many Imperial Constitutions, in order to remove all Confusion, we must divide them into two Classes. Those establish'd by Justin the Younger, down to Basilus Macedo and his Sons, must be separated from the following publish'd after Basilus, which at first going under the Name of Novellæ, were at last collected together, for the most part, according to the Order of the Times they were publish'd in.

THERE were Twelve Emperors reckon'd, by whom the First were publish'd ; these were Justin the Younger, Tiberius, likewise, the Younger, Heraclius, Constantine V. Pogonatus, Leo III. Iconomachus, Leo V. Armenus, Theophilus, and Basilus Macedo, with Leo and Constantine his Sons. For Forty Years after the Death of Justinian, under the Emperors Justin, Tiberius and Mauritius, the Books of Justinian in Latin, in which Language they were written, had all Force and Authority in the Academies of Constantinople ¹ ; but Phocas, a most foolish Prince, succeeded in the Empire of the East, who neither could suppress the Invasions of so many foreign Nations, who possess'd a great Part of his Empire, nor preserve the Laws ; so that though the Books of Justinian did not altogether lose their Authority, yet they were transform'd and translated into the Greek Language, and by the Greek Lawyers were reputed as a new Body of Greek Law ; from which and the Novellæ that were still publishing, the Laws were quoted in the Courts of Justice ; so that the Justinian Codes began to lose their antient Force. ²

BUT they receiv'd a greater Blow by the so many other Novellæ Constitutiones, which follow'd after Basilus and his Sons. There are Seventeen Emperors reckon'd, who during their Empire, had establish'd them. These were Constantine VIII. Porphyrogenitus, Romanus Lecapenus the Elder, Romanus Porphyrogenitus the Younger, Nicephorus II. Phocas, Basilus the Younger, Romanus IV. Argyrophilus, Zoe the Empress, Isaacius Comnenus, Michael VII. Dux, Nicephorus Botoniates, Alexius Comnenus, Joannes Comnenus, commonly call'd Calo Joannes, Emanuel Comnenus, Alexius III. Comnenus, Isaacius Angelus, Joannes III. Dux, who reign'd in Asia Minor, and in Nicea, while the French possess'd Constantinople, and Michael Paleologus, who having driven out the Latins, recover'd Constantinople.

THE Knowledge of these Novellæ did not reach us till many Ages after; when Sciences and Learning were restor'd in France and Italy, then it was that they were unveil'd and brought to light, not by one single Person, and all at once, but by degrees by many learned Writers, Lovers of Antiquity. They had no Force or Authority in these our Provinces, neither at the Time they were publish'd, as being all local, and concerning the Government of Constantinople, and other Cities of the East, neither till after the Books of Justinian were restor'd in Italy; for they are not to be found in the ancient Volumes, which by degrees began to be first receiv'd into the Academies of Europe, and afterwards by the Force of Reason, into the Tribunals. Our first Restorers of Learning had no Knowledge of them, and it was many Ages after, that they were found again by some learned Men, who translated them into Latin, and afterwards got them joined to the new Editions, which from time to time happen'd to be made of the vulgar Codes. Eimondus Bonafides caus'd many of them to be publish'd, and Joannes Leunclavius and Carolus Labbeus many others; and a great many of them, both Greek and Latin, may be read in Leunclavius, and in the Corpus of Dionysius Gothofredus, who join'd them to his Volumes, as they were interpreted, partly by Henricus Agileus, and partly by Bonafides. For which Reasons he would bear a Loss, that would make use of them now a-days, in our Tribunals for deciding of Causes, they never having acquir'd the Force of Laws in these our Parts; and the same may be said of the *Basilicæ*¹. They are well worthy of Praise, who dug them out of the Darkness wherein they had been buried, and presented them to the Light of the World, because they often make clear those already received, and give greater Light to what relates to the History of the Times, and the Transactions of those Nations; and this is the only Use and Advantage that can be made of them and the Basilicæ; neither ought our Lawyers to expect any other from them. Thus we have many Novellæ of those Emperors concerning the Greek Customs and Usages, and other such things belonging to the Greeks, publish'd in some Places, and certain Cities, and particular Provinces, and which were not in Force, nor had Authority any where else².

AMONGST all the other Emperors of the East, there was not one that publish'd so many Constitutions, and made so many Innovations, as Leo VI. Son of Basilus. This Prince was a great Lover of Learning, who, by the Study, and great Knowledge of the Laws, History and Philosophy, acquir'd as Antoninus did, the Surname of Philosopher. There are reckon'd One hundred and Thirteen Novellæ publish'd by this Emperor about the Year 890, which Agileus translated into Latin; but the greatest Part of them were not in Force, nor had Authority, but in the Tribunals of Constantinople, and very many of them were in disuse in Leo's own Time³. Many Monuments of this Prince's Erudition, and his Love of Arts and Sciences are extant, such as the many Books which he compos'd, which being kept from the Injury of Time, were long preserv'd in the Palatine Library, and that of Constantinople. He wrote many Books concerning military Discipline, which deserv'd to be translated into the Latin and Italian Languages: A Book about Hunting; besides diverse Oracles and Prophecies relating to Rome and Constantinople, and some small Theological and Historical Treatises; but above all, he applied himself most to the Study of the Laws, because vying with Justinian, who endeavour'd to outstrip Theodosius the Younger, he strove to excel him by his new Collections, and his Basilicæ and Promptuaria, which he and his Father Basilius put in a better Method, and a more noble Form¹, in order to eclipse the Fame of Justinian.

THE first then (to come to the 2d Cause of the Neglect of Justinian's Books) who put the greatest Damp upon Justinian's Laws by the means of new Collections, was Basilius Macedo. Basilius, by a strange Turn of Fortune in the Year 866. being proclaim'd Emperor, was a Prince of so great Spirit, that he often defeated the Saracens, and by his Prudence re-establish'd the Empire, which had been ruin'd by Michael his Predecessor; and having associated Constantine in the Empire, and given the Title of Cæsar to Leo and Alexander his Sons; afterwards in the Year 879, he gave the Title of Emperor to Leo. By his noble Exploits, having acquir'd great Fame, he design'd to excel Justinian in Glory, and by the means of new Collections to eclipse his Name and Books: For which end, in the Year 870 (associating with him in this Work, Constantine and Leo his Sons) he ordered a Promptuarium to be compiled; or, as the the Greeks call it, Prochyron of Laws, in which, from many Volumes were compendiz'd the principal Sources of the Law, from whence the lesser Rivulets originally come. According to *Armenopolus*² it consisted of Forty Titles, and not Sixty as Cujacius writes; and we find it as yet among the Manuscripts in the Vatican Library, whither it was remov'd from that of the Palatine. It passes sometimes under the Names of Basilius, Leo and Constantine; sometimes under the Names of Leo and Constantine only, and also under that of Leo alone, with various and different Prefaces; so that 'tis very probable this Work was revis'd again by Leo the Philosopher, and reduc'd to a better Form.

LEO, not content with having put his Father's Prochyron into a better Form, and fill'd the East with so many Novellæ; put forth likewise the Compend of the Laws, a very elegant Work, which was made up purely of Definitions and Rules; but he employ'd his Study and Thoughts more in framing the Basilicæ: This great Work was compil'd about the Year 886, divided into Sixty Books, and, for the greater Conveniency, into Six Volumes. Cedrenus relates, that this Work was begun by Basilius, but finish'd by Leo his Son, who, by the Advice of Sabbatizius Protospatarius (perhaps the same as we have said, who was sent into our Provinces, in order to drive away the Saracens) caus'd it to be publish'd, according to Antonius Augustinus, who takes it from Matheus Blastares.

IN this new Compilation he did nothing else but for the most part follow the same Order which Justinian had observ'd in his Laws, from whose Books, Edicts, and Novellæ Constitutiones, and the Constitutions of the succeeding Emperors down to Basilius, he took his subject Matter; he retrench'd all that was thought superfluous, and what had been disus'd by the Custom of After-times was left out; and moreover he added what had been establish'd by the new Constitutions of the succeeding Emperors; from which Work, comprehended in six Volumes, and divided into sixty Books, a new Body of Law nam'd Basilicæ started up, and which was written in the Greek Language: So that what Justinian had written on each Subject separately in many Books, to wit, the Institutions, the Pandects, the Code, and other Books of Novellæ, was put under one Title, and in the same Order which Tribonianus was pleas'd to observe in the Disposition of his subject Matter.

THESE were the Laws call'd Basilicæ, and nam'd Priores, because the Work did not end here; for Constantine VIII. Son of Leo, surnam'd Porphyrogenitus likewise bestow'd great Pains and Application on this Subject: Constantine, out of a Desire of Glory, like his Grandfather and Father, design'd to abolish altogether the Memory of Justinian's Books³, and by his Skill in Law and History, to convince the World that he was a Man who had Learning chiefly at Heart. Having revis'd the Work of the Basilicæ, he corrected it in many Places, and in the Year 920, he publish'd another De repetita Prælectione, more refin'd and correct, of which he would have himself reputed the Author, and that the Basilicæ Priores should no more be minded, but that in the Courts of Justice and Schools, his own, which therefore he call'd Posteriores, should be in Force, and made use of by the Students and Lawyers of the East. Indeed this new Collection of the Basilicæ was receiv'd in the East, and continu'd to be the Foundation of the Jus Græcum, to the End of the Greek Empire¹; and Constantine was reputed to be the first Author of it, which both Luitprandus and Erveus acknowledge. These were always reckon'd to be the true Books of the Basilicæ, to which Constantine himself made a new Prochyron, or Introduction, which is to be seen at this Day; and they are the same, which, after a Series of so many Ages, have been reviv'd by the Care and Diligence of some deserving Men, Lovers of our Jurisprudence, such as Gentianus Erveus, and *Hannibal Fabrottus*², and which the Greek Interpreters have taken great Pains to comment on, and illustrate.

THIS Prince acquir'd no less Fame by his other renown'd Works concerning History, which are extant to this Day; he caus'd all the Historians to be collected into one Body, and dispos'd them into 53 common Places, tho' the History of Porphyrogenitus, according to the usual Custom of the Greeks, in many Places be reckon'd fabulous, frequent Instances of which may be seen in this History.

MANY Greek Interpreters bestow'd their Labours on these Basilicæ, so that they had as great a Crowd of Greek Commentators in the East, as the Books of Justinian, after they were reviv'd in the West, had of Latin Commentators and Expounders. Cujacius mentions a great many of them, such as Stephanus, Niceus, Taleleus, Isidorus, Eustathius, Eudoxius, Gobidas, Cumms, Joannes, Agiotheodoretus, Doxapater, Gregorius, Garidas, Bestes, Baphius, Theophilus, Calocirus, Sestus, Callistratus, Leo, Phocas, Modestinus, and Domnius; to which Freerus adds, Patzus, Theopholitzén, Phobenus, Theodorus, Hermopolita, Demetrius, and Cartophilaces. In what precise Times these flourish'd we have no Certainty: Nevertheless if Taleleus be reckon'd amongst the Lawyers who commented on the Basilicæ, he must be another Taleleus, and not he who flourish'd long before in the Time of Justinian, who assisted in making the Pandects, as we have said elsewhere.

SO likewise this must be another Stephanus, and not he, who at the Command of the same Justinian bestow'd his Labour on the Digests, which he also translated into the Greek Language; neither can Theodorus and Isidorus be the same, who long before were employ'd by Justinian among those seventeen in composing the Latin Digests.

MUCH less can it be this Theophilus, who together with Tribonianus and Dorotheus compos'd the Institutions; and this Phocas can't be one of the twelve appointed for framing of the Latin Code. As for Callistratus and Modestinus, 'tis unquestionably certain, that these Civilians flourish'd not only long before Porphyrogenitus, but even before Justinian himself. Therefore if it be not granted, that there have been several Lawyers at different Times of the same Name, these cannot surely be reckon'd amongst the Interpreters of the Basilicæ; altho' some of them had formerly been employ'd in translating the Volumes of Justinian into the Greek Language, as *Stephanus*³ (if we may believe Mathæus Blastares on the Testimony of Antonius Augustinus) did the Pandects, or at least Taleleus, as *Suares*⁴ and *Struvius*⁵ believ'd, and as Taleleus certainly did the Code; whose Example was follow'd by Cyrillus in the Digests, by Theodorus in the Code, and Theophilus in the Institutions.

BESIDES these, there were others of uncertain Names; such as the Anonymous Basilicus, whom Cujacius believes to be the Interpreter of the same Collection of the Basilicæ, Evantiophanes, who made a Collection of the Laws that clash'd with one another, or the Antinomies, whom the Bishop of Frejus believ'd to be Photius, who in his Nomocanon writes that he had compos'd such a Book⁶.

CUJACIUS believes Dorotheus to be the Author of that prolix Paraphrase which goes under the Name of an Index; but Gotofredus takes it to be the Work of several Persons, such as Basilicus and Baphius, whom Constantine made use of, and regarded as much as Justinian did Tribonianus; for the last added many Things to that Index.

THEREFORE the Study of the Roman Laws was no less cultivated among the Greeks in the East, than it was afterwards among the Latins. For which end many of them began to comment upon them, and to interpret them variously, little minding the Prohibition of Justinian, who allow'd them only to be translated into Greek, and the Paratitli; some added Scholia, Paraphrases and Glosses; others again loaded them with huge Commentaries; but their Works have never been publish'd among us, and the greatest Part of them have been destroy'd by Time, or are preserv'd in the Libraries of Princes and Learned Men. Those Works that have been publish'd, and are at present abroad in the World, are the Nomocanon of Photius Patriarch of Constantinople, which near to this very Time was publish'd in the Year 877, and divided into 14 Titles, to which Theodorus Balsamon added his Scholia.

THERE is the Ecloga of the Basilicæ, which by some is also call'd Synopsis; some, according to *Cujacius*¹, take Romanus the Younger, Son of Porphyrogenitus, and Grandchild of Romanus Lecapenus, who reign'd about the Year 962, to have been the Author of it. This Work was found by Joannes Sambucus in our *Taranto*², a City, in the Time of Romanus, subject to the Greeks. *Antonius Galateus*³ relates, that Nicetas a Philosopher of Otranto, afterwards a Monk of St. Basil, collected many Codes from Greece, and therewith enrich'd the Library of his Monastery, which being under the Rule of St. Basil, not far from Otranto, became very famous and conspicuous in these our Parts.

JOANNES LEUNCLAVIUS caus'd this Ecloga to be printed in Basil in the Year 1575, and translated it into Latin; and Carolus Labbeus added the Corrections and Observations⁴ to it. In the same *Leunclavius*⁵ we read likewise of another Synopsis of Michael Attaliatus Proconsul and Judge, made in the Year 1071, by the Order of the Emperor Michael Dux, which goes under the Name of Pragmatica. A little after, in the Year 1071, Michael Psellus, famous for his Skill in the Laws and Philosophy, compos'd another Synopsis in Verse, which he dedicated to the same Emperor Michael.

LASTLY, Constantinus Armenopolus, a Thessalonian Judge, about the Year 1143, in the Reign of Emanuel Comnenus publish'd the Epitome of the Civil Laws, which he first caus'd to be printed in Greek at Paris in the Year 1540, by Adam Suallemberg; it was afterwards translated into Latin, and printed in the Year 1547. and 1549, by Bernard Rey, and again in Lyons by John Mercer, in the Year 1556: The Manuscript is yet preserv'd in the Vatican and Palatine Libraries.

CUJACIUS to all this likewise adds the Treatise of Eustatbius Antecessor de Temporum intervallis, which may be seen printed amongst his Works. Antonius Augustinus, Freerus, and others, give us Account of other such Greek Writings⁶; and Leunclavius gives us many Military, Rural, and Maritime Laws, as Carolus Labbeus, gives the Paratitli.

FROM which may be gather'd, that at the same time, when the Study of the Roman Laws was laid aside by the Latins in Italy, by reason of the Incurfions of the Saracens and other Nations, and on account of the Dissentions among our own Princes, the Greeks continued to cultivate it with the utmost Care to the very last, until Constantinople was subdu'd by barbarous Nations, and the Empire of the East was utterly ruin'd. And tho' their Labour was not bestow'd on the Books of Justinian, yet they did not spare it on the other Collections made afterwards in Emulation of him, the Substance of which was taken out of his Books; but tho' they took much out of them, yet they added much more to them.

FOR these Reasons it was, that tho' the Dukedom of Naples, and many Maritime Cities of these Provinces maintain'd themselves long under the Dominion of the Greeks, yet nevertheless the Books of Justinian were not receiv'd in them; and tho' in the Time of the Emperor Lothaire II. the Pandects were found in Amalphis, a City once belonging to the Dukedom of Naples, and subject to the Emperors of the East, yet they were not taken for a Body of Greek Laws, by which the Amalphitans were govern'd; but their being found in this City was owing to the frequent Voyages which the Amalphitans made to Constantinople, after they became so exquisite in the Art of Navigation, and by continual Commerce made themselves known all over the Levant; for as there was no Vestige of Justinian's Books to be found in the other Cities of these Provinces subject to the Greeks, so neither would any have been found in Amalphis, had it not been for the said Commerce with the East ; and what Summontes says, and with greater Assurance Francisco Pietri, that the Pandects were likewise found in Naples, is such an impudent Untruth, that 'tis surprizing to find Men so brazen-fac'd, as not to blush to affirm it so boldly, without the Authority of any Writer to vouch it. Only from the Letters of Ivo of Chartres, and the Decree of Gratian we may gather, that in the tenth and eleventh Centuries, some other Copy must have been handed about in France, for Ivo often in his Letters ¹, and Gratian in his Decree, not only quote the Digests, but also the Institutions, the Novellæ and the Code ². They were not known in these our Provinces which now make the Kingdom, before their being found in Amalphis; and with our Longobard Princes their own Laws prevail'd; neither were the Roman Laws heard of, but so far as they had continu'd by Tradition amongst the Country People, and what could be collected from the Theodosian Code corrected by Charles the Great.

NEVERTHELESS 'tis probable, that the Basilicæ, and the Works of these Greek Lawyers lately mention'd, were rather us'd in the Further Calabria; seeing Joannes Sambucus found the Ecloga of the Basilicæ in Taranto; and Galateus assures us, that in the Monastery of the Monks of St. Basil in Otranto, many Greek Books were found after the taking of Constantinople, and afterwards carried to Rome and put in the Vatican Library; whence we may conclude, that in Naples and the other Cities subject to the Greeks, the Novellæ Constitutiones, publish'd by the last Emperors of the East after Justinian, and those their last Collections, from which the Jus Græcum was fram'd, had more Force than the Books of Justinian; and that perhaps the Neapolitan Usages take their Rise from these last Laws of the Greeks, and not from the Ancient, as Summontes thought, which we shall take notice of when we come to discourse of the Collections of them.

THIS is said with regard to the State of those Times in which the Greeks had again become powerful in these our Provinces; for afterwards when their Power among us was at a very low Ebb, and particularly in the Dukedom of Naples, where the Emperors of the East had only a Shadow of Authority left, because the Dukes govern'd this Dukedom too absolutely and independently; but especially when the Normans appear'd among us, by whom the Greeks were driven out, neither they nor their Laws were any more regarded; for the Neapolitans being in the Neighbourhood of the Longobards, conform'd themselves to the Longobard and the ancient Roman Laws, and not to the Greek, as all the other Provinces of which the Kingdom is now compos'd did; for the Normans having driven out the Greeks, retain'd the Longobard Laws, and commanded not only the Roman, but likewise the Longobard Laws to be observ'd every where, but gave greater Authority and Force to the latter. Thus we see, that before the coming of the Normans, in the Peace made in the Year 911, betwixt Gregory Duke of Naples, and Atenulphus Prince of Benevento, which was afterwards rencw'd in the Year 933. by Duke John his Nephew with Landulphus I.; among other Things it was agreed, that in the Cases or Differences that might arise betwixt the Longobards and Neapolitans, Judgment should be given absque omni dilatione secundum legem Romanorum, aut Longobardorum, absque maliciosa occasione ³, which was practis'd in the other Provinces and Cities of the Kingdom, where both the Roman and the Longobard Laws were observ'd by the Inhabitants in their Differences; for we read in Leo Ostiensis ⁴, that about the Year 1017, there having a Dispute arisen betwixt the Monastery of Monte Cassino, and the Dukes of Gaeta and the Counts of Trajetto, concerning the Right to some Lands and Woods within the Limits of Aquino, which was to be decided by the Prince of Capua; it was determin'd in Favour of Monte Cassino, tam ex Romanis legibus, quam ex Longobardis. From two Records of two Sentences pronounc'd in the Time of the Normans, the first in the Year 1149, in the Reign of King Roger, and the second in 1171, in that of King William, which we owe to the Care of Camillus Pellegrinus ⁵, we see, that the Longobard Law was embrac'd by all, and in the Decision of Cases, greater Strcs was laid upon it than upon the Roman Law; the same was practis'd afterwards under Princes of other Nations who govern'd this Kingdom, as in the Course of this History we shall continue to take notice of.

C H A P. III.

The Kingdom of Italy passes from the French to the Italians : Greater Revolutions happen on that account in these our Provinces ; and the Rise of the Dukedom of Amalphis.

CHARLES the Gross dying without leaving Male Issue, and the Italian Princes being resolv'd not to part with the Kingdom of Italy and the Title of Emperor, left no Stone unturn'd in order to keep it amongst themselves ; above all the rest Berengarius Duke of Friuli, and Guido Duke of Spoletto, both of them equally powerful, and assisted by numerous Parties, aspir'd to the Kingdom ; our Prince of Benevento could not attempt it, tho' formerly he could have more easily accomplish'd it than they, but his Principality was now much on the declining Hand ; and by being divided into so many Shares, had suffered many Calamities and Troubles. Berengarius and Guido then, in order to prevent Confusion betwixt them, and that the one might not obstruct the Designs of the other, propos'd two different Expeditions ; Berengarius was to invade Italy, and Guido France. Accordingly upon Charles's Death, Berengarius being supported by his Party, immediately without any Opposition possess'd himself of the Kingdom of Italy ; but it was not so easy for Guido to make himself Master of France, because the French had timely appointed Eudo Count of Paris, who was afterwards King of that Realm, as Tutor to Charles the Simple. Guido seeing himself prevented, return'd to Spoletto, and began to think of turning out Berengarius, who had already peaceably gone to Pavia, and, according to Custom, had made himself to be crown'd by Anselm Bishop of Milan, and fix'd his Royal Seat in that City, as his Predecessors had formerly done. In the mean time Guido having procur'd the Favour of the Pope and the Romans, and supported by a numerous Party in Opposition to Berengarius, got himself to be proclaim'd King of Italy. Thus by a most wicked and pernicious Example Italy became divided into two Factions, and the People being divided betwixt the two Parties acknowledg'd two Kings. Altho' Berengarius's Cause was the most just, nevertheless Guido's Faction, being favour'd by the Pope and the Romans, increas'd very much ; whereupon having rais'd a powerful Army, he march'd out of Spoletto fully resolv'd to drive out his Enemy. They made a cruel War against one another, and after various Success, Berengarius being routed, was at last forc'd to quit the Kingdom. Guido in the Year 890. having enter'd Pavia, easily made himself Master of all Lombardy, and being proclaim'd over all Italy, the following Year 891. he was also advanc'd to the Imperial Dignity ; for having gone to Rome he was crown'd Emperor by Pope Stephen, and proclaim'd Augustus. Thus after so many Revolutions the Empire fell into the Hands of the Italians ; and 'tis said, that Guido in return for such signal Service, confirm'd to the Pope all the Donations and Prerogatives which Pepin, Charles the Great, and Lewis the Pious had granted to the Church of Rome.

UPON his Return to Pavia, according to the Custom of the other Kings of Italy, he having conven'd the States both Ecclesiastical and Secular, granted many Privileges to the Churches and Cities ; and in order to establish his Kingdom of Italy in a better Form, in the Month of May this Year 891, he publish'd many Laws in Pavia. We have as yet to this Day some of the Laws of the Emperor Guido in the Volume of the Longobard Laws, which the Compilers added to that Volume, as being establish'd by him as King of Italy, which had all Force and Authority there: we read one of them in the first Book under the Title De Convictis; another in the same Book De Invasiōibus; another in the second Book under the tenth Title; another in the same Book under the Title De Successiōibus; and two others in the third Book under the twelfth and thirteenth Titles.

BY the Death of Pope Stephen V. which fell out this same Year 891, and the Election of Sergius in his Room, the Troubles in Italy and Rome increas'd; for some of a contrary Faction elected Formosus; and as Guido favour'd the Faction of Sergius, so on the other hand Berengarius declar'd for Formosus. Berengarius had had recourse for Assistance to Arnolphus King of Germany, natural Son of Carleman, who had likewise declar'd for Pope Formosus, that by joining their Forces together he might recover the Kingdom; and this Prince who aspir'd to the Empire of the West, laid hold of the Opportunity with pleasure, and sent Zuendebaldus his Son into Italy with a powerful Army; but these Forces could do nothing against Guido, because after several Encounters they were always worsted, and at last Zuendebaldus being forc'd to quit the Undertaking, return'd to Germany, and Guido, flush'd with this Victory, associated his Son Lambertus with himself in the Empire.

BUT Guido did not continue long in this prosperous State, for Berengarius returning to Worms, where Arnolphus had caus'd a Diet to be conven'd, so order'd Matters, that he engag'd this Prince to go to Italy in Person in order to drive out Guido, and to restore himself to the Kingdom of Italy; this Expedition at this Time was attended with Success, he took Bergamo, the Milanese, and Parvia and Placentia yielded without Resistance; and he sent Otho the Grandfather of Otho the Great, whom we shall frequently have occasion to mention, to Milan, and restor'd Berengarius to the Kingdom. Guido with his Son flying towards Spoletto, was pursu'd by his Victorious Arms; but dying soon after in the Year 894. by a sudden vomiting of Blood, Berengarius could the better fix himself on his Throne; wherefore he made Parvia the Place of his Residence, and was wholly intent on settling his Kingdom.

BUT the Disputes did not end in Italy on the Death of Guido, forasmuch as those of his Faction persisting obstinately in their Engagements, combin'd more closely with his Son Lambertus, who had retir'd to Spoletto, and solicited him to accept of their Assistance against Berengarius.

NEITHER was their Effort in vain, for Berengarius being deserted by his Party, and press'd hard by Lambertus, was forc'd to quit Parvia, which was immediately possess'd by Lambertus, where, with great Rejoicings, he was proclaim'd King by his own Party. But Berengarius being driven out, had his recourse anew to Arnolphus, whom Pope Formosus had solicited on the same Head. Arnolphus being urg'd by these two, was at last resolv'd to go again into Italy, where being arriv'd, he took Rome, drove Sergius and his Faction out of it, and in the Year 896. was crown'd Emperor by Pope Formosus, who took an Oath of Fealty to him. This was the first German who had been Emperor of the West after the French and Italians; and in a short Time there were three Emperors seen in Italy, Guido, Arnolphus, and Lambertus, for Berengarius hitherto had been sole King of Italy; Arnolphus afterwards pursu'd Lambertus, but after various Turns of Fortune, Pope Formosus dying, and his Party declining, and on the contrary the opposite Faction increasing, Stephen VI. was elected, who exterminated the Faction of Pope Formosus, and disannulling all that he had done, condemn'd him as guilty of Simony, and his Body was thrown into the Tyber by those of Sergius's Faction. He declar'd the Election of the Emperor Arnolphus void, and on the contrary anointed Lambertus Emperor; but afterwards his Party declining, Stephen was imprison'd by the Romans, and about the End of the Year 900. he was strangled, and Romanus elected in his Room. He revers'd all that his Predecessor had done, caus'd to be condemn'd and declar'd void all that had been done against Formosus; and having held the See but few Months, Theodorus succeeded him, who following the Footsteps of Romanus, restor'd all those whom Stephen had banish'd. Rome never was seen in so great Confusion and Disorder, as in these truly deplorable Times. Neither had the Church of Rome ever been in so pitiful a Condition as now, when the Popes were elected by Factions; and all Historians agree, that she was in a terrible Disorder; and Cardinal Baronius himself says, that she had fallen under the Dominion of two lewd Women, who plac'd their Gallants in St. Peter's Chair, that were unworthy unworthy of bearing the Name of Popes ; and that therefore the Church was many Years without a visible Head, but that she was preserv'd by our Lord Jesus Christ, who will never forsake her.

NO less were the Revolutions and Disorders among the Secular Princes. The Empire of Lambertus being become grievous to the Italians, they again plung'd themselves anew into Seditions ; Lambertus was kill'd, and Berengarius restor'd, who immediately took Possession of the Kingdom. Every Body would have believ'd, that at least those of Lambertus's Party ought now to have put an end to Factions, and join'd with Berengarius ; but the Event happen'd contrary to all Expectation : that there might not be wanting a Pretender, they set up Lewis, who at this Time reign'd in Provence, and was Nephew to the Emperor Lewis II. and invited him to come to Italy, and promis'd, that if he would drive out Berengarius they would proclaim him King. Lewis presently came to Italy, and having driven out Berengarius, who retir'd to Bavaria for Shelter, and being crown'd King of Italy by the Archbishop of Milan, was afterwards also proclaim'd Emperor, and magnificently receiv'd by Adelbertus Marquis of Tuscany.

IN the mean time Berengarius having march'd from Bavaria with a powerful Army, return'd to Italy, fought Lewis, imprison'd him, and caus'd his Eyes to be put out, but spar'd his Life. Thus did he reign alone in Italy ; and afterwards in the Year 915. he was crown'd Emperor by Pope John X. The Levity of the Italians did not end here ; for being soon weary'd of the Government of Berengarius, they invited Rodolphus King of Burgundy, and in Opposition to Berengarius proclaim'd him King of Italy ; whereupon a bloody and cruel War ensu'd betwixt these two Princes, and at last Berengarius was kill'd by Rodolphus's Party in Verona. But Rodolphus enjoy'd the Kingdom but a short Time, for Disorders and intestine Factions prevailing, the Italians invited another Prince into Italy to rival him ; this was Hugo Count of Provence, Nephew of Lothaire King of Lorraine ; who being come into Italy, and having chas'd away Rodolphus, was immediately crown'd King by Lambertus Archbishop of Milan, in the Year 926, and restor'd the Kingdom to better Order ; and to secure it to himself the longer, being frighted by the Examples of his Predecessors, he enter'd into a strict Alliance with Henry King of Germany, and Romanus Emperor of the East. Afterwards he associated Lothaire his Son in the Kingdom, that so in his own Life-time he might establish him in Italy : but all these Endeavours were in vain ; Rodolphus was invited again, but that he might not expose himself to the Vicissitude of Fortune, he refus'd to come. Notwithstanding which, they did not want one to whom they had recourse, Berengarius II. born of a Daughter of Berengarius I. was the Person pitch'd upon, who being invited by the Italians, was proclaim'd King in Opposition to Hugo, against whom they had conceiv'd an implacable Hatred. Lothaire his Son lamenting the Misfortune of his Father, at last prevail'd with the People of the Milanese to accept of him for their Sovereign ; but his Reign was very short, for he died soon after, in the Year 949, and Berengarius with Adelbertus his Son were crown'd Kings of Italy. Neither would the Miseries and Afflictions of Italy have ended here, if at last the Italians, provok'd by the Tyranny of Berengarius, and guided by better Counsel, had not, by the Advice and Direction of the Pope, apply'd themselves to a potent and glorious Prince, who drove out those Tyrants rather than Kings, and put a Stop to so many Mischiefs : This was the great Otho King of Germany, whose glorious Exploits will give occasion to mention him frequently in the following Book of this History.

BEHOLD in what a lamentable Condition Italy was for upwards of sixty Years, when, by the failing of Male-Issue in the Off-spring of Charles the Great, the Empire was transferr'd from the French to the Italians ; who, tho' they abhorr'd the Dominion of Strangers, yet could not govern themselves better. Neither was there any that could give it Relief if it had not been transferr'd from the Italians to the Germans, in the Person of the Great Otho.

The State of these our Provinces; and the aggrandizing of Amalphis.

IN the mean time our Longobard Princes, and the Greeks who had the Government of these our Provinces in their Hands, seeing all going to wreck, and there being none that was able to put a Stop to their ambitious Designs, did not fail to encroach upon one another. The Title of Emperor of the West, or of King of Italy, as to them who took no manner of concern about it, was little better than extinct; whereupon the Power of the Emperors of the West ceasing, that of the Emperors of the East began to increase in these Provinces, and the Forces of the Greeks to be more considerable; whence it happen'd, that the Greeks having regain'd a great Part of Puglia and Calabria, and likewise made themselves Masters of Benevento, endeavour'd also to surprize Salerno; and whereas formerly the Princes of these States had laid their whole Strefs on the Emperors of the West for Assistance against the Saracens, now they wholly depended on those of the East; and the Longobard Princes themselves had obtain'd their Favour, and had frequently demanded the Honour of Patriciate, a Dignity in those Days the greatest that the Greeks could give: So that, as we have said, Guaimarus Prince of Salerno, for the better securing his State, got the Principality confirm'd to him by the Emperors Leo and Alexander, as it had been allotted to Siconolphus by the Division made with Radelchisus.

THE State of these our Provinces towards the End of the ninth Century was this: The Principality of Benevento being confin'd to very narrow Bounds, having had the Principalities of Salerno and Capua disjoin'd from it, was in the Hands of the Greeks, and govern'd by George a Patrician, sent by the Emperors of the East, who were now wont to send Officers to govern Benevento. But the Greeks, through their Pride and Vanity, using the Beneventans ill, made them resolve to shake off the Yoke, and drive them out of that City.

THE Principality of Salerno was govern'd by Guaimarus, which had been confirm'd to him by the Emperors Leo and Alexander, Sons of Basilus. Capua was under Atemulphus, who having driven out Landulphus and Landon his Brothers, had made himself Count of it. The County of Capua at this Time (according to the Anonymous Monk of *Cassino*¹ and Erchempertus) comprehended all betwixt Caserta and Suessula, in length reaching to Aquino, and once as far as Sora; and in breadth from Cajazza to the Tyrrbenian Sea, on both Sides of the Mouths of Linturno, Vulturno, and *Liri*².

A good Part of Puglia and Calabria had come under the Dominion of the Greeks, to whose Cities they sent Patricians or Lieutenants to govern them. Gaeta with its small Dukedom likewise belong'd to the Greeks, who appointed a Duke for governing it; in the Year 812. Duke Gregory govern'd it, and at this Time Docibilis was Duke of it. Naples with its Dukedom was govern'd by Athanasius, both Bishop and Duke, arbitrarily and independently; but the Bounds of this Dukedom were much confin'd, by Amalphis being taken off of it, which was govern'd by a Duke apart, who acknowledg'd the Greek Emperor for his Sovereign.

AMALPHIS, which some reckon no older than from the Year 600, was first govern'd by annual Prefects, afterwards it had its perpetual Dukes, in the same manner as Naples; and being divided from the Dukedom of Naples, by Degrees it began to extend its Limits, and to be govern'd by a Duke in Form of a Commonwealth. Its Bounds reach'd Eastwards to Vico Vecchio; and Westwards near to the Promontory of Minerva, and on that Side the Island of Caprea was afterwards added to it, and the other two Islands of the Galli. The Emperor Lewis taking the Amalphitans under his Protection against the Neapolitans, at which, as we have said, Basilus was offended, assign'd these Islands irrevocably to Amalphis; whence we read, that Levis sent the Amalpbians to set Bishop Athanasius at Liberty, who had been made Prisoner by Sergius Duke of Naples; and for that reason, even as to what relates to the Ecclesiastical Polity, the Bishop of Caprea was Suffragan to the Archbishop of Amalpbis, and not to the Archbishop of Naples. Towards the North this Dukedom comprehended the City of Lettere, of old call'd Castello di Stabia, with Graviano Pirio, now call'd Gragnano, Pimontio, and Casale de Franchi; and towards the South Amalpbis itself, Scala, Ravello, Minori, Majuri, Atrani, Tramonti, Agerula, Citara, Prejano, and Positano.

IN process of Time this Dukedom so exalted itself, that the Amalpbians became famous for Navigation all over the East, and increas'd both in Power and Riches; therefore they made and sustain'd many Wars; they assum'd the Power of making Laws in relation to Trade, and the Commerce of the Sea; which with us had the same Force and Authority as the Rhodian Law had with the Romans; and *Marinus Freccia*¹ testifies, that all Disputes about Navigation and Maritime Commerce were decided by the Amalpbian Laws. And who is it but knows, that the wonderful Invention of the Mariners Compass is owing to Flavio Gisia, a Native of Positano, a small Village of this Dukedom? They likewise assum'd the Prerogative of coining Money, which they laid out in all the Eastern Nations; whence the Tarini Amalpbiani became so famous, which are mention'd in our Customs, and many old Charters. They elected their Dukes out of their own Body, altho' they were afterwards confirm'd and made Patricians by the Emperors of the East. They became much more famous and renown'd in the Time of the Normans, as in the Progress of this History will be seen; and they enjoy'd this Liberty till the Year 1075, that Robert Guiscard having subdu'd Salerno, added this Dukedom to his Dominions; altho' for a long time they still retain'd some Vestiges of their decaying Liberty.

BEHOLD into how many Principalities and Governments, that which now makes one Kingdom was divided in these Times. The Saracens over-running every where, and carrying Destruction and Ruin along with them to every Place, it was no wonder that they at last gave way to a superior Force, and submitted to the powerful and brave Normans, who had now subdu'd the Greeks, Saracens, and Longobards.

C H A P. IV.

The Principality of Benevento retaken from the Greeks; and the County of Capua reunited to it.

THE Beneventans, as we have said, not being able to bear the harsh and severe Government of George the Patrician, resolv'd to shake off the Greek Yoke¹; they who had been us'd to govern, could ill bear to be in Slavery; therefore they wrote to Guaimarus Prince of Salerno, who had married Jota Sister of Guido III. Duke of Spoletto, that he would desire his Brother-in-Law to come to Benevento with a good Army, and they would deliver themselves up to him. This was not that Guido who aspir'd to the Empire, which he long contended for with Berengarius, as some have believ'd; he was the Son of Guido II. Duke of Spoletto, whom Erchempertus mentions²; for, as we have said, the Emperor Guido died of a sudden vomiting of Blood, in the Year 894, and George was driven out of Benevento by this other Guido in the Year 896. Guido then came immediately to Salerno, accompanied with gallant Soldiers, under pretence of seeing his Sister, and afterwards to Benevento with a sufficient Army; the Beneventans who would have none other, surrender'd themselves to him, and drove out George, and for Five thousand Ducats spar'd his Life: Thus did the Greeks lose Benevento five Years after they had taken it.

GUIDO held the Principality of Benevento not full two Years, for he return'd to Spoletto, and being employ'd in other Undertakings, resolv'd to yield it to Guaimarus his Brother-in-Law: Guaimarus attempted to take Possession of it; but the Beneventans because of his cruel and wicked Practices, not being willing to accept of him, they advis'd Adelferius Castaldus of Avellino, to way-lay him in order to frustrate his Designs: Adelferius surpriz'd him in the Night-time, and putting out his Eyes, oblig'd him to retire to Salerno, in the Year 898³. Of which the Beneventans being appriz'd, they resolv'd to restore Radelchis to the Principality, whom they had twelve Years before turn'd out of it. Thus was Radelchis restor'd in the Year 898.

BUT through his Ignorance of the Art of Government, his Simplicity and Indolence, he again lost the Principality; for suffering himself to be ruled by Virialdus, a cruel Man, who treated the Beneventans very ill, he was again turn'd out. He, at the Instigation of Virialdus, banish'd a great many Noble Beneventans, who retir'd to Capua for Shelter, and were there splendidly entertain'd by Count Atenulphus, who so cunningly ingratiated himself into their Affections, that they began to think how to drive out Radelchis, and advance him to the Principality of Benevento; and tho' the Beneventans had often, amidst their Junquetings and Pastimes, insinuated this their Design; Atenulphus seemingly understood it as spoken in Jest, but however knowing what they would be at, he likewise privately began to think on Means by which he might accomplish it.

That he might not be diverted from this Enterprize by Guaimarus, Prince of Salerno, he resolv'd to enter into a near Alliance with him, and by a very submissive and affectionate Embassy, with Prayers and Intreaties, he begg'd the Daughter of Prince Guaimarus the Elder, for Landulphus his Son, and protested, that he would be subject to him, as his Predecessors had been to the Princes of *Salerno*¹; but by the Instigation of Landulphus and Pandon, who having been driven out of Capua by Atenulphus their Brother, had shelter'd themselves in Salerno, all these Offers were rejected: They boasted, that in a short Time they would turn him out of his Dominions, which he had usurped from them, and therefore were against making Peace with him. With them Jota, the Wife of Prince Guaimarus the Elder likewise joyn'd, who, scorning to give her Daughter to Landulphus, was wont to say, that she being descended of Royal Blood (for she was Daughter of Guido II. Duke of Spoletto) would, by no means, match her Daughter with one of her Subjects: She said so, because the Counts of Capua were formerly Subjects of the Princes of Salerno; for, by the Division made of these two Principalities, Capua was comprehended in that of Salerno, and not in that of Benevento.

Therefore Atenulphus seeing himself thus slighted, lost all Patience, and this his Design not succeeding, endeavour'd to make Alliance with Athanasius, both Bishop and Duke of Naples. This Duke had a Daughter, call'd Gemma: He sought her for his Son, to which Athanasius immediately consented, by means of which Match, they entered into a firm and settled Peace².

IN the mean time the Disorders in Benevento increased, and many Citizens, tho' they were not exil'd, yet voluntary flying, left their native Country, and shelter'd themselves in Capua; so that the Beneventans growing numerous in Capua, entered into a Conspiracy with their Kindred there; they imparted the Secret to Atenulphus, and taking Arms, with a few Capuans whom Atenulphus took along with him, went privately to Benevento, and by a secret Correspondence with those within, surpriz'd the City in the Night-time, surrounded the Palace where Radelchis was, and made him Prisoner. In the mean Time, all the Malecontents, and those that had been banish'd, over-running the City, in an Instant both the Nobles and People join'd them, and unanimously proclaim'd Atenulphus. Atenulphus seeing himself with so universal Consent thus rais'd to this high Dignity, did not fail, on his Part, to carry himself with extream Mildness and Humility to all, and in order to gain the Beneventans to be the more firm in his Interest, he was profuse in his Gifts to them: Thus Atenulphus from a Casteldatus, and after having govern'd Capua Thirteen Years as Count, this Year 900, was made Prince of Benevento; and thus was the County of Capua united to the Principality of Benevento, and of two, made one State in the same Person, to the great Dislike of some of Radelchis's Party, who could not bear the Dominion of a Stranger, as they call'd Atenulphus, because he was not descended of the Race of the antient Dukes and Princes of Benevento.

ATENULPHUS did not divide these States, but retain'd the same Polity, neither was this the first Rise of the Princes of Capua; nor did the County of Capua now begin to be a Principality, as some have believed; for Atenulphus, as well as his Sons, were call'd Princes, because they held the Principality of Benevento; and if, sometimes, in some Records of our Antiquity, they are call'd Capuan Princes, it is because both Atenulphus and his Sons, Landulphus and Atenulphus who succeeded him, continu'd to keep their Residence in Capua, which they made their Seat; so that by degrees, according to the Custom of the Vulgar, they began to be call'd Capuan Princes, because they resided in Capua; not that Atenulphus had erected Capua into a new Principality, distinct from that of Benevento, which we see clearly from the Agreement made betwixt Gregory Duke of Naples, and the Princes Landulphus and Atenulphus, renewed afterwards in the Year 933, by John, Nephew of Gregory, who succeeded his Uncle, where, among other Things, we read; In toto Principatu vestro Beneventano cum omnibus suis pertinentiis; nec in toto Comitatu Capuano; nec in Teano cum pertinentiis suis; which Camillus Pellegrinus and the Anonymous Salernitan prove.

ATENULPHUS, the more firmly to establish the Principality in his Male-descendents, forthwith associated his Son Landulphus in the Year 901, who, from this Year, together with his Father, govern'd it; and after having stay'd some time in Benevento, he return'd to Capua, where he resolv'd to reside, leaving the Government of that City to Peter its Bishop, for which he could not much commend himself, because he discover'd that the Bishop had conspir'd, with some Beneventans, treacherously to make himself Master of the City: Whereupon he immediately return'd to Benevento, imprison'd the Rebels, and turn'd out the Bishop, who, full of Shame, retir'd to Salerno, under the Protection of Prince Guaimarus, who receiv'd and furnish'd him all Things necessary, out of Hatred to Atenulphus his Enemy. The City of Benevento, by degrees, began to decay in its Splendor; for the Seat of its Princes being transfer'd to Capua, it thereby lost much of its Majesty, and afterwards being spoil'd by the Saracens, it lost all its Worth and Eminency; and, on the contrary, Capua began to be exalted and become more eminent.

AT the same time there happen'd, also, great Disorders in Salerno; for the Salernitans being uneasy under the harsh and cruel Government of Guaimarus, after Adelferius Castaldus of Avellino had put out his Eyes, openly rebell'd, and had their recourse to Guaimarus his Son, crying out, That they could no longer endure the Cruelty of his blind Father, but would have himself for their Lord; and having so said, they took him, and carrying him to the Church of St. Maximus, proclaim'd him their Prince¹; thus in the Year 901, having depos'd the cruel Father, they liv'd long under the mild Government of the Son, joyfully and with pleasure; so that in the Chronicles of the Princes of Salerno, the first Guaimarus, is call'd Malæ Memoræ, and the Second, his Son, Bonæ Memoræ, just so as the Normans call'd William the Wicked, and William the Good.

New Incursions of the Saracens, and recourse had on that Account to the Emperors of the East.

IN the mean Time, the Saracens, who had fortified themselves strongly in Garigliano, and over-running every where, infested the Principality of Benevento, and the County of Capua, could not be stopp'd by less or equal Forces. Atenulphus once join'd with Gregory Duke of Naples, who had succeeded Athanasius, and with the Amalphitans, endeavour'd to exterminate them; but this Enterprize did not answer his Expectation: He perceiv'd that all would be in vain, if he got not foreign Assistance. It was to no Purpose to have recourse, as formerly, to the Emperors of the West; they were in as great Difficulties themselves, by reason of the so many Revolutions in which they were involv'd: It was wisely resolv'd then, to apply for Assistance to the Emperor Leo, who had succeeded his Father Basilus, and at this Time govern'd in the East, for which Purpose he sent his own Son Landulphus, his Partner in the Government, to Constantinople, who being courteously received by Leo, got a Promise of all the Assistance he could desire. As formerly the Emperors of the West were fond of assisting our Princes, so now those of the East fought to do the same, because by that Means they might be able to restore their Sovereignty over these Provinces, which they had lost by the Power of those of the West; therefore besides sending a powerful Army into them against the Saracens, Leo, in order to make himself acceptable to our Princes, likewise adorn'd them with the Dignity of Patriciate, which was much esteem'd in those Times; therefore he bestow'd it on Landulphus, as he did afterwards on Gregory Duke of Naples, and John Duke of Gasta.

IN the mean time Atenulphus, whilst Landulphus was absent, in this Year 910, also associated his other Son of his own Name Atenulphus, in the Principality; and with great Anxiety was expecting the promis'd Succours, being altogether bent on driving out the Saracens from these Provinces ; but all his Measures were broke by unexpected Death. He died in Capua in the Month of April, this Year 910, and some relate his Death to have been in the Month of July, the following Year. He was buried in Capua, so that the Tombs of the Princes his Successors, are not to be seen in Benevento, but henceforth in Capua, where they fix'd their Seat. He died regretted by all, after having held Beneventum Ten Years and Six Months. A Prince truly glorious, and who was the Raiser of his own Fortune, having, by his own incomparable Industry, from a simple Casseldatus, advanc'd himself to the Throne of the Princes of Benevento ; but much more commendable was he, for having brought about the Union of the Two States of Benevento and Capua, which was the Occasion of their longer Duration, and prevented their Ruin, which would have been sooner than it afterwards happened ; and for having educated his Sons in such a Conformity of Sentiments, that by a singular Example after his Death, with the greatest Unanimity they govern'd the Principality without the least Disturbance.

LANDULPHUS, while he was in Constantinople, hearing of his Father's Death, immediately return'd to Capua, where being made welcome by his Brother Atenulphus, both of them joyn'tly, with wonderful Concord, govern'd the State, neither would they divide it betwixt them, as the Father had advis'd, nor the one govern in Benevento, and the other in Capua ; but both having fix'd their Residence in Capua as formerly, apply'd themselves to the Government of the State.

IN the mean Time, the Army sent by the Emperor Leo, arriv'd under the Command of Nicholas Picigli, a Patrician, who, in order the more to secure the Friendship of the Neighbours, brought with him the Dignity of Patriciate from the Emperor, to Gregory Duke of Naples, and John Duke of Gaeta. And having joyn'd his Army with that of these Two, and with the Troops of Guaimarus Prince of Salerno, and being likewise considerably reinforc'd from Puglia and Calabria, which were then for the most part under the Dominion of the Greeks, he incamp'd along the Garigliano, opposite to the Saracens. Pope John X. or XI. as some have written, who equally interested himself in the Expulsion of these Barbarians, and had therefore written many Letters about it to the Emperor Leo, would likewise have his Share in so glorious an Undertaking, in which he had also engag'd the Marquis of Tuscany his Brother, and came with a great Body of Men and pitch'd his Camp on another Part of the River. *Sigonius*¹ believ'd, that John X. was the first Pope that had been seen at the Head of an Army ; but he certainly was not the first, since as we have said, John VIII. ought not to be robb'd of that Honour, who was the first that laid aside the Keys, in order to brandish the Sword.

THE Saracens sustain'd this Siege for three Months, under the greatest Hardships ; but at last being destitute of all manner of Provisions, out of Despair, set Fire to their Fortrefs and burnt all they had, not sparing the Treasure which they had plunder'd in different Places, and laid up here ; and then in a close Body all together, broke out with Fury, and ran to the Woods and the Tops of the Mountains to save themselves ; but being pursu'd by our People, there was a terrible Slaughter made of them : Thus in the Year 916, according to *Lupus Protaspatha*², the Saracens were driven from Garigliano. But although this Province was freed from that Plague, yet the Remains of them being afterwards joyn'd by another Body that had come from Africa, and besieg'd Rome (which Undertaking they had shamefully given over) at last return'd to Mount Gargano in Puglia, where they built a strong Fortrefs, from whence they annoy'd all that Province, and at last went and pillag'd and burnt Benevento, and put all Puglia and the neighbouring Places in Confusion.

THE Damage which this Province suffer'd from the Saracens was not enough ; but the Inhabitants themselves must occasion greater ; for the Appulians and the Calabrians not able to bear the heavy Yoke of the Greeks, revolted from them, and gave themselves up to Landulphus Prince of Benevento, who was in hopes of restoring Bari and many Cities of Puglia to his Principality, therefore he turn'd his Arms against the Greeks ; but the Appulians and Calabrians were quickly reduc'd by the Greeks, who being terribly intrag'd against Landulphus, had recourse even to the Assistance of the Saracens, whom they invited out of Africa, and in the Year 919, reduc'd them in spite of what Landulphus could do ; and that the City of Bari, the Seat of the Governor, together with Puglia, might be well govern'd, the Emperor sent a new Governor nam'd Ursileus, a noble and valiant Captain; who, with the utmost Care, apply'd himself wholly to the preserving of this Province from the Attempts of Landulphus ; he went to encounter him at Ascoli, where, at the first Onset, Landulphus was taken by the Greeks, and besides, in the Heat of the Battle, Ursileus was killed; which so dishearten'd the Greeks, that they were defeated, so that this Prince not only recover'd his Liberty, but gaining a compleat Victory, he invaded Puglia, which afterwards, according to Lupus Protospata ¹, in the Year 929, in Confederacy with Guaimerus Prince of Salerno, he forc'd to submit and kept Possession of it Seven Years.

WHEREFORE, in these Times, the Success of our Longobard Princes and the Greeks was various: They frequently fought against one another, and once near Matera they had a sharp Encounter, where Imogalaptus the Governor was kill'd on the Spot ; and the Greeks sometimes losing, sometimes gaining, though at last they recover'd Puglia and Calabria from the Longobards ; yet, as Baronius believ'd ², they did not re-take that Part of Campania which is wash'd by Vulturno ; for in these Times, and afterwards, it was always possess'd by the Princes of Benevento, and Counts of Capua, as Pellegrinus ³ well demonstrates. Thus it happened, that sometimes our Longobard Princes were Enemies, and sometimes Friends, Confederates and Dependents of the Greek Emperors, Romanus and Constantine, who succeeded Leo VI. 'Tis very true, that after Puglia and Calabria were restor'd to the Greeks, the Bounds of the Principalities of Benevento and Galeno, were much more confin'd than formerly under the Longobard Princes, when the Dukedom of Benevento was so far extended, that, as we have said, it comprehended all that which now makes the Kingdom of Naples.

PRINCE Landulphus reign'd together with his Brother Atenulphus II. Twenty Two Years, to the Year 932. Afterwards this Prince was turn'd out, and having retir'd to Salerno, was kindly receiv'd by Guaimarus II. his Son-in-Law. However Landulphus retain'd in his publick Writs his banish'd Brother's Name ; and therefore at this Time, Gregory having succeeded his Nephew John, in the Dukedom of Naples, the Agreement made in the Year 911, betwixt the said Gregory and Atenulphus I. was received by him, in which Agreement, John Consul and Duke, promises to Landulphus I. and Atenulphus II. his Brother, though the last was a Fugitive in Salerno, and to Atenulphus III. Son of Landulphus I. not to molest the Principality of Benevento with its Dependencies, nor the Counties of Capua and Teano with their Dependencies, nor the People of those States ; but to preserve a friendly Correspondence with them ; and a solid and settled Peace was agreed upon betwixt these People, and that their Law Pleas should be decided secundam legem Romanorum, aut Longobardorum ; and many other Articles were agreed to betwixt them, according to the Tenor of the Longobard Laws ; whence, as we have observ'd elsewhere, it clearly appears, that from this Time amongst these People, the Longobard was the prevailing Law, and observ'd indifferently. And in this Agreement, 'tis likewise to be observ'd, that the Dukes of Naples were always subordinate to, and dependent on the Emperors of the East ; for at this Time Constantine and Romanus reigning in Constantinople, that by these Promises and Agreements, nothing might be done in Prejudice of the Sovereignty which the Emperors of the East had over the Dukedom of Naples, Duke John adds, Hæc omnia vobis observabimus, salva fidelitate Sanctorum Imperatorum.

ATENULPHUS II. dying in Salerno in the Year 933, Landulphus associated Atenulphus III. his Son, and another Landulphus, likewise his Son, whom we shall call Landulphus II. in the Principality.

LANDULPHUS the Elder died about the Year 943, leaving these two Sons his Successors. But the Year following 944, Landulphus II. was left to reign alone. Beneventum was never separated from Capua, with respect to the Administration and Government, being always comprehended under one Dynasty, though because the Seat was in Capua, they were call'd Principes Beneventanorum & Capuanorum ⁴.

PRINCE Landulphus II. in his Life-time, in the Year 959, associated with himself in the Principality, his two Sons, Pandulphus, whom Ostiensis, and other Writers, call Iron-head (whom we shall often have occasion to mention on account of his famous Exploits, and because the Principality of Salerno was likewise united in his Person) and another Landulphus, whom therefore we shall call III. who, Landulphus II. dying about the Year 963, succeeded him in the Principality; but Landulphus III. having divided with his Brother, the Principality of Benevento fell to his Share, and he fix'd his Seat in *Benevento*¹; so that once more these two States were separated; Landulphus governing in Benevento, and Pandulphus Iron-head in Capua. But afterwards in the Year 969, Landulphus III. dying, although he left a Son Pandulphus II. yet nevertheless, Pandulphus Iron-head, out of a passionate Desire of Dominion, took the Principality of Benevento to himself, and his Son Landulphus IV. excluding his Nephew Pandulphus II. who, nevertheless, at last in the Year 981, having driven out Landulphus IV. recover'd it, and transmitted it to his Posterity, as we shall relate in the following Book.

IN the mean time, by the Death of Guaimarus, which fell out in the Year 933² Gisulphus his Son, succeeded in the Principality of Salerno. He govern'd the Principality long, with alternate Fortune; and in his Time, according to *Leo Ostiensis*³, in the Year 954, the Body of the Apostle Matthew was discover'd in Pesto, a City of Lucania, by the Revelation of that Saint himself; and that Salerno might not be short of Benevento, whither the Body of Saint Bartholomew had been transported from Lipari, that of Saint Matthew was transported to Salerno. Both of them came to us from most remote Parts; the one from the Indies, and this other from Ethiopia, where he suffer'd Martyrdom: From Ethiopia 'tis said to have been transported to Britain, from thence to Pesto in Lucania, and from thence to *Salerno*⁴. We shall likewise hear of the Body of Saint Andrew being worship'd in Amalphis, and that of Saint Thomas in Ortona, and in fine, many Cities of the Kingdom value themselves on having the Bones and Reliques of almost all the Holy Apostles.

The Ecclesiastical Polity.

IS not to be expected that we shall find the Ecclesiastical State in any true Form or Regularity in these Times. The Church was in a most lamentable Condition, and in terrible Disorder, and in a Chaos of Wickedness: Popes were excommunicated by their Successors, their Decrees made void, and the Sacraments administred by them annull'd: Six Popes were turn'd out by those who wanted to succeed them, and Two even murdered. Theodora, a famous Roman Curtesan, by the Faction she had in Rome, made one of her common Bullies Pope, who call'd himself John X. At Twenty Years of Age, John XI. who was the bastard Son of Pope Sergius, who died Eighteen Years before, was likewise made Pope. Pope Stephen VIII. was so branded in the Face with Marks of Infamy, by order of Alberigus, that he never any more shew'd himself in Publick. The Popes were no more elected by the Clergy; but the See of Rome was become a Prey to Covetousness and Ambition. In fine, such and so great Disorders and Inconveniencies were hatched in these Times, Times, that all Historians agree, that these were not Popes, but Monsters; and Cardinal Baronius writes, that the Church was in these Times without a Pope, but however not without a Head, Christ her spiritual Head remaining in Heaven, who does not forsake her.

EVERY Body may judge how the other Churches of Italy, and of these our Provinces were manag'd, by considering what the State of the Members could be when the Head was so much indispos'd. In Capua Landulphus was both Bishop and Count of that City at the same Time; in Naples Athanasius was both Bishop and Duke, and headed Armies, made Leagues with the very Saracens against the Pope and other Christian Princes, and destroy'd these our Provinces. Neither were these Matters better manag'd out of Italy; the great Men gave Bishopricks to their Soldiers, and also to Children under Age: Count Eribertus Uncle of Hugh Capet, made his Son of five Years old Archbishop of Rheims, and Pope John X. confirm'd that Election.

NOTWITHSTANDING all this, towards the End of this ninth Century, and in the Beginning of the Tenth, there were Canons establish'd in several Synods in order to put a Stop to so great Remissness of Discipline; but all to no purpose, they had no Effect for want of being put in due Execution. Some Bishops however, and likewise some private Men made a Collection of these Canons; but almost all of them bestow'd their Labours on Books of Penance; there came out the Penance-Book of Theodorus of Alitgarius, and of a great many more¹. There were besides, some other Collections of Canons, such as that of Jarlandus Crisopolitanus, intitled Candela; that of Isaccus, surnamed the Good, Bishop of Langres; another of Erardus Bishop of Tours; and one of Walter Bishop of Orleans; but above all these Collections, that of Reginon Abbot of Prom, made in the Year 906, by Order of Ratbodus Archbishop of Triers, was the most universal, which comprehended all the Ecclesiastical Law, and was the most Methodical that appear'd in these Times²; therefore Burcardus, Ivo of Chartres, and other Compilers of Canons after them, have made use of it, and have in a manner transcrib'd it in their Collections.

BUT notwithstanding the so great Remissness in the Ecclesiastical State with regard to Discipline and Spiritual Matters, yet for all that, the enlarging of Jurisdiction, and the Increase of Temporal Riches were not in the least neglected. The Popes made use of their Authority not only over the Laicks by Censure and Dispensations, but likewise over the Metropolitans and Bishops; they made new Regulations by suppressing the Rights and Prerogatives of the Metropolitans and Bishops, and they likewise claim'd the Direction of all Ecclesiastical Affairs within their Provinces and Diocesses.

RECOURSE was often had to Rome in those Days, not out of Devotion, but in order to obtain Dispensations in every case, and the Apostolical Dispensations were made a Cloak to cover Avarice and Ambition; the Prohibition establish'd by the Canons in so many Councils, serv'd only to oblige a great many People to run to Rome in order to obtain Dispensations; the forbidden Degrees in Matrimony were therefore extended to the fourth Degree; and the Spiritual Affinity betwixt the Godfather and Godmother, and their Sons and Daughters was introduc'd, which was also extended to Degrees more remote. But the Popes being such as we have above describ'd, dispens'd with every Thing, tho' against the Canons, and the Ecclesiastical Customs, making no Distinction betwixt what they could, and what they could not do, looking upon every Thing that was brought before them by those who had recourse to them, as an Augmentation of their Grandeur; if those that applied to them were Rich and Great, for their own Advantage they prohibited what was desir'd of them; the People partly by their own Simplicity, partly standing in awe of those in Power, approv'd of what they could not prevent: So that it became an establish'd Opinion, that no sooner any Thing whatsoever was confirm'd by the Pope, than all by-past Crimes were blotted out.

MANY would be apt to believe, that the little Concern the Ecclesiastical Order had for Spiritual Matters, and the Looseness of Discipline would have cool'd the ardent Zeal of the Laicks in making Donations to the Churches and Monasteries, and put an End to the new Acquisitions of the Ecclesiasticks; yet it was not so, because by how much more the Care for Spiritual Matters was diminish'd in the Prelates, so much the more were they intent on preserving Temporal Riches; and they had converted the Spiritual Arms of Excommunication, which were formerly only made use of for the Correction of Sinners, to the Defence of their Temporal Possessions, and likewise to the Recovery of them, if by chance they had been lost through the Negligence of their Predecessors. There was not a Council held in this Age, in which, among other Things, there were not Excommunications fulminated against those that had taken Possession of the Goods of the Church, or that had alienated them. The Terror which the Church Censures struck in the People in those Days, was so great, that they were afraid of nothing so much; and it was a wonderful Thing, that the Officers and Soldiers, otherwise most wicked, and without the Fear of God, who robb'd what belong'd to others without any Regard to the offending the Divine Majesty, took great care in preserving the Goods of the Church intire, for fear of Excommunication. Whence it was, that many of small Substance, being desirous to secure what they had from Violence, made Donations of it to the Church, on Condition that they should hold it of her in Fief for a small Acknowledgment. This secur'd the Possessions from being touch'd by those in Power, as such of which the Church had the direct Dominion; afterwards the Male-Line of the Feudatories failing, which often fell out by reason of the frequent Wars, and popular Seditions, the Estates fell to the Church: Whence arose the Distinctions betwixt Feudum datum, & Feudum oblatum, of which *Struvius*¹, Thomafius and *Ertius*² have fully treated. Whence comes the Origin of our Papal Investiture, of which we shall treat in its Place; and whence in fine was introduc'd the Custom of having recourse not only to the Emperors and Princes, but also to the Popes, that by the means of their Præcepta, otherwise call'd Mundiburda, the Possessions put under their Protection and Custody might be protected, by threatening the Invaders and Disturbers of them with terrible Anathema's, by condemning their Souls in company with that of the Traytor Judas, to eternal Punishment in the everlasting Fire of the Bottomless Pit, amongst the blackest and most hideous Devils in Hell; they made use of this and such most frightful and horrible set Forms, for this very Purpose.

IN these Times the Political and Temporal State of these our Provinces was involv'd in as great Confusion and Disorder as the Ecclesiastical, insomuch that our Italians and the Popes themselves, not longer able to bear so many Calamities and Miseries, resolv'd at last to have recourse to Otbo King of Germany for Assistance, whose Reign, as well as those of the other Otbo's his Successors, shall be related in the following Book.

WHILST Italy was groaning under the Tyrannies of the last Berengarius and Adelbertus his Son, the Italians being reduc'd to the utmost Misery, resolv'd to have recourse to the Assistance of Otho Son of Henry King of Germany, who having subdu'd the Saxons and the Sclavonians, by his glorious Exploits had acquir'd no less Fame than Charles the Great, and had made himself illustrious and renown'd over all Europe. Adelaide the Widow of Lothaire join'd in the Invitation, who possessing the City of Pavia, which had been assign'd to her as her Dowry by her Husband

Lothaire ¹, and being as yet young and of a graceful Behaviour, was sought in Marriage by Berengarius for his Son Adelbertus; but because she would not consent to the Marriage, Berengarius besieg'd her in Pavia, took her and sent her Prisoner to the Castle of Garda; she found Means to make her Escape, and begg'd the Assistance of King Otho, offering to marry him, and yield to him her Right to the Kingdom of Italy. Porphyrogenitus ², Luitprandus ³, and others have taken Adelaide to be the Daughter of Berta and Rodolphus King of Burgundy; but Leo Ostiensis ⁴ says, she was descended from a noble Family in Tuscany, and our Anonymous Salernitan ⁵ makes her to be Sister to Gisulphus Prince of Salerno: however that may be, Otho, who was not ignorant of her virtuous Life and Conversation, came quickly to her Assistance, and arriving in Italy with a powerful Army, reliev'd her from the Oppression of Berengarius, and being taken with her Beauty and agreeable Manners, married her, and carried her along with him to Germany, leaving Conrade Duke of Lorraine to prosecute the War against Berengarius and his Son, who were forc'd to go to Otbo in Germany, and submit themselves to his Will¹; Otbo having taken their Oaths and Homage, restor'd them to their Dominions, excepting to the Veronese and Friuli, which he gave to his Brother Henry Duke of Bavaria. But no sooner were Berengarius and Adelbertus restor'd to their Dominions, than they began to plot against Otbo, and to abuse his Subjects; they afflicted Italy with uncommon Oppressions, and us'd the Pope, and all the other Bishops and Lords of Italy very ill. Therefore they made their Complaints to Otbo, and begg'd his Protection, inviting him to return to Italy in order to drive out these Tyrants. The Pope and the Romans offer'd him the Kingdom and the Imperial Crown; Valpertus Archbishop of Milan likewise offer'd to crown and anoint him King of Italy, for which end they sent him a magnificent Embassy.

OTHO being assur'd of the cordial Affections of all the Italians, was unwilling to let slip so fair an Opportunity, and having held a Dyet in Worms, made his Son Otbo II. to be crown'd King of Germany in Aix la Chapelle, when he was but seven Years of Age; and having settled the Affairs of Germany, assembled a numerous Army, with which he march'd through Bavaria, and, by the Way of Trent, together with his Wife Adelaide, he arriv'd in Italy. He was receiv'd by the Italians with universal Acclamations; and tho' Adelbertus had endeavour'd to oppose him with considerable Forces, yet being deserted by his Men, he gave over the Enterprize, and flying, made his Escape to the Island of *Corfica*². In the mean time Otbo enter'd Pavia without any Opposition, and oblig'd Berengarius with his Wife and Family to fly; from thence he went to Milan, where he was receiv'd with great Rejoicings by all the Inhabitants. The Archbishop Valpertus, remembering his Promise, call'd a Council of Bishops, and in the Sight of all the City, Berengarius and Adelbertus were depriv'd of the Kingdom, and Otbo was proclaim'd King of Italy; then they conducted him to the Church of St. Ambrose in great Pomp and solemn Ceremony, and with the Consent of all the People, the Archbishop anointed him, and set the Iron Crown upon his Head: Thus Otbo, whom we shall now call King of Germany and Italy, having this Year 961, with so much Success acquir'd so great a Kingdom, with solemn Oaths promis'd that he would defend Italy with all his Might against the Invasion of any Tyrant whatsoever. From thence having return'd to Pavia, the Year following 962, together with Archbishop Valpertus, he went to Rome with a gallant Army, in order to receive the Imperial Crown from the Hands of the Pope; he likewise carried Adelaide with him, and was receiv'd by the Romans with no less Acclamations and Rejoicings, than Charles the Great was when he enter'd that City. The Rejoicings, Concourse, and ardent Desire of the People were the same at his being proclaim'd Emperor of the West; so likewise the solemn Ceremonies which Pope John XII. practis'd on this Occasion, were no ways different from those made use of by Leo at the Coronation of Charles the Great; Otbo together with John went to the Church of the Vatican, where every Thing proper for so august a Ceremony being ready prepar'd, he was presented by Archbishop Valpertus to the Pope, who anointed him, and put the Imperial Crown upon his Head, whilst all the People cry'd out, *Prosperity and Victory to Otho Augustus, Roman Emperor*³; afterwards having solemnly sworn to defend Italy against the Attempts of Berengarius, and whoever should offer to disturb it, he return'd to Pavia. Sigonius relates, that Otbo also caus'd to be restor'd to the Pope some Lands belonging to the Church, which in the late Revolutions in Italy had been taken from her; and says, that Otbo III. likewise confirm'd the Donations that had been made by Charles the Great and Lewis the Pious to the Church of Rome; so that *Chioccarelli*⁴ was in the Wrong, in attributing this Charter of Confirmation to Otbo I. and not to III. as Sigonius did.

IN this manner was the Empire transferr'd from the Italians to the Germans, of which the Popes will have themselves reputed the Authors, just so as they pretended to be with respect to *Charles the Great*⁵. Thus the Empire of the West having formerly gone from the French to the Italians, was afterwards transferr'd to the Germans in the Person of Otho, who held it by Right of Conquest, and by the free Election of an oppress'd People, who at that Time could find no other Protector, to deliver them from the Tyranny of Berengarius. Otho by our Writers ' is commonly said to be the first German Emperor, altho' Arnolphus, as we have said, was such before him; because say they, the Empire was adjudg'd to Otho and all his Successors for ever, by Pope Leo VIII. in the Year 964, with the Consent of all the Romans; and the Roman Empire was united to the German Kingdom by an indissoluble Knot², which cannot be said of Arnolphus, who at that Revolution of Affairs, in the midst of so many Factions, was elected Emperor more by Party-Intrigue, than a free and universal Consent.

CHAP. I.

Otho re-establishes the Kingdom of Italy: His Expeditions against the Greeks, and the Advancement of the County of Capua to a Principality.

OTHO being settled in the Kingdom of Italy, in Imitation of Charles the Great, turn'd all his Thoughts on re-establishing it with better Laws and Institutes, after so many Revolutions: Many of his Laws for these Ends are still extant, and *Goldastus*¹ collected an intire Volume of them, by which not only the German Kingdom, but also the Italian was resettled. Not that Otho's Laws concerning Fiefs were more clear and express than those of Charles the Great, as the Abb't of *Noce*² from the Authority of Sigonius believ'd; for the first Maker of the Feudal Laws was Conrade the Salick, as we shall relate. But Otho acquir'd much greater Authority over these our Provinces, than Charles the Great himself, and the Sovereignty which he exercis'd in them was much greater than his. Our Longobard Princes, such as the Princes of Benevento and Salerno, and the Count of Capua, were not in a Condition to oppose his Dominion, as Arechis and Grimoaldus did that of Charles and Pepin his Son; on the contrary, they declar'd themselves his Vassals and Feudatories, by subjecting their States to him, and by acknowledging him King of Italy, with the very same Authority that their Predecessors had own'd in the ancient Longobard Kings, and in order to gain his Favour and Protection, each of them strove who should out-do one another in Obsequiousness and Respect to him.

IN these Times, as we have said, Pandulphus Iron-Head, together with his Brother Landulphus III. govern'd the Principality of Benevento, and the County of Capua, who no sooner were appriz'd that Otho, with Adelaide his Wife, was on his way to Capua, in order to make sure of the Fidelity of these Princes, and of Gisulphus in particular (who tho', as the Anonymous Salernitan believ'd, he was his Brother-in-Law, yet was suspected to have a Dependence upon the Greeks, from whom he had got the Honour of Patriciate) than they went out to meet them with a great Retinue, and conducted them to Capua, the Place of their Residence, where they entertain'd this Prince honourably, and with great Magnificence¹. They remain'd here during the Year 963, in which Time they sent an Embassy to Prince Gisulphus in Salerno, with many Gifts, inviting him to come to Capua to see his Sister. Gisulphus, tho' jealous of some sinister Design, at last with his Attendants set out for that City, and being met by Pandulphus and Landulphus, they presented him to the Emperor Otho, who with much Gladness rose from his Throne, and stepped down to meet him, and having embrac'd one another, they kiss'd each other with many Tokens of Affection. The Empress Adelaide (if we may credit the Anonymous Salernitan) seeing her Brother, run to embrace him, and grasping him about the Neck, kiss'd him many times, reproaching him for not coming to see his Sister without being invited: Gisulphus, after such kind Embraces of his Sister and his Brother-in-Law, to his great Contentment, and that of his Retinue, return'd to Salerno.

IT was at this Time, that Pandulphus Iron-Head being in great Favour with Otho, obtain'd by Imperial Authority, that the County of Capua should be advanc'd to a Principality, and that he should be call'd Prince of Capua, as those who succeeded him in Capua were; and from this Time, not from that of Atenulphus I. the Rise of the Princes of Capua must be dated, as Pellegrinus demonstrates. To which Honour, succeeded afterwards in the Year 988, that of Capua's being likewise advanc'd to be a Metropolis; and that John Brother to Landulphus, from being Bishop of that City was rais'd to be Archbishop by John XIII. as we shall more at length relate when we come to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity of this Age.

THUS did our Princes acknowledge for Sovereign the Emperor Otho as King of Italy, who by Virtue of the same Right undertook to drive the Greeks out of Puglia and Calabria, which Provinces they possess'd, and likewise to reduce the Dukedom of Naples under his Dominion.

IN this Year 964, Nicephorus Phocas succeeded to the Empire of the East, who taking it ill that Otho should have acquir'd so great Authority in Italy, and that he had resolv'd to drive the Greeks from Puglia and Calabria, had provided these Provinces with good Garrisons. Their Cities were govern'd by Stratici, a Sort of Magistrates that had continu'd long there, down to the Catapani; and he had conven'd the strongest Body of his Troops in Bari the Metropolis of Puglia: He took it no less amiss, that he had no other Title given him but that of Emperor of the Greeks, and that Otho should assume that of Emperor of the Romans.

BUT Luitprandus Bishop of Cremona, a Creature of Otho's, advis'd him, that before he enter'd into a War with Nicephorus, he should try if by a near Alliance he could obtain of him, what would be uncertain to be got by a doubtful and cruel War; for which end, he thought the readiest and most effectual Way was, if Nicephorus would give the Princess Anna, or Theophania, in Marriage to Otho his Son, and for a Portion yield the two Provinces of Puglia and Calabria. This Princess was the Daughter of the Emperor Romanus Argirus, and the Empress Theophania, who by an execrable Paracide had poison'd Argirus, that she might marry Nicephorus. It was at this Time that Otho sent to Constantinople a magnificent Embassy to Nicephorus, and pitch'd upon the famous Luitprandus Bishop of Cremona, for Ambassador to go and demand that Princess; this Bishop became famous no less for his many Works which he has left us, than for this Embassy.

NEVERTHELESS this Embassy of Luitprandus did not take Effect, for Nicephorus not being able to conceal from him the Malice that was lurking in his Breast against Otho, treated him scurvily, and after having made him stay four Months to no purpose in Constantinople, dismiss'd him without coming to any Conclusion.

IN the mean time, Otho flattering himself that his Design would take Effect, had recall'd his Son Otho to him, who remaining with his Father in Rome, was in this Year 968, associated in the Empire, and anointed and crown'd with the Imperial Crown by the Pope. And Nicephorus at the same time, in order to deceive Otho the more, and to bring his Design about, before he dismiss'd Luitprandus, sent Ambassadors to him, offering him his Alliance, and to send the Princess Theophania to Calabria; and therefore he might send his People as soon as possible thither to receive her.

OTHO not being sufficiently acquainted with the Greek Faith, believ'd him, and likewise acquainted the Dukes of Saxony with it, giving them Hopes, that in a short Time he would recover Puglia and Calabria; and that his Son Otho being married, would return to Germany, therefore he sent his People immediately for that purpose; but they had no sooner arriv'd than they were catch'd unawares in an Ambush, which Nicephorus had caus'd to be laid for them; many were kill'd, and the rest made Prisoners, and carried to Constantinople.

UPON which, Otho, detesting the Greeks, and bitterly inrag'd, invaded and laid waste the Borders of Calabria, and turn'd that Province topsy-turvy. At this Juncture our Longobard Princes join'd him, who as Feudatories were oblig'd to follow him in his Wars; and Pandulphus Iron-Head went likewise to Calabria against the Greeks, and the Saracens, who had been call'd by the Greeks to their Assistance; and Gisulphus Prince of Salerno, tho' his Fidelity was suspected, on account of the Attachment he had for the Greeks, yet on this Occasion (having a little before put himself under the Protection of Otho) shew'd himself willing to assist in this Expedition.

THUS did an obstinate War against the Greeks and Saracens begin; and whilst Pandulphus was in Calabria with Otho, he was advis'd of the Death of Prince Landulphus his Brother. He had held the Principality of Benevento eight Years; and tho' he had left Pandulphus his Son, nevertheless Pandulphus the Brother no sooner heard of his Death, than he went to Benevento, leaving the Emperor in Calabria; and having excluded his Nephew, he advanc'd his own Son Landulphus to be Prince, who was therefore call'd Landulphus IV. ¹

FROM thence Otho return'd to Ravenna, and in the Year 969, Pandulphus, with a Reinforcement sent him by Otho, and some young Beneventans and Capuans, invaded Puglia, and encamp'd with his Army near Bovino. But the Greeks making a furious Salley from the City, engag'd him, and after a doubtful Battle, at last Pandulphus was beaten and made Prisoner by the Greeks, commanded by Eugenius a Patrician, and Lieutenant of the Province, who immediately sent him Prisoner to Constantinople. In the mean time Gisulphus Prince of Salerno was on his march to reinforce Pandulphus, but being too late, whether by any Opposition on his March, or that he march'd slowly, purely out of conceal'd Malice, he quickly return'd to Salerno.

THE Greeks, flush'd with this Victory, invaded the Borders of Benevento, took Avellino, and advanc'd towards Capua; and plundering all the Country, besieg'd the City itself, which for forty Days they kept closely block'd up.

NOW that the Neapolitans saw the Greeks go on prosperously; they join'd Eugenius near Capua. At this Time Marinus was Duke of Naples, the Knowledge of which we owe to the Anonymous Salernitan, for there is no Memory of the Dukes of Naples in these Times after John in the other Historians; and that Charter mention'd by Summontes, believ'd by the new Historian Jannettasius, the Translator of Summontes, to be genuine, wherein there's mention made of Duke Oligamus Stella, whom Jannettasius makes to be the Successor of John, and of Ginellus Capece; Baldassare Joannes, and Sarrus Brancaccius Consuls, is an arrant Forgery, both because Surnames were not as yet in use, and because Capaccius ² and others testify that it was never found amongst the Writings of the Monks of St. Sebastian, where it was suppos'd to be preserv'd: So that our Pellegrinus ³ is in the Right when he says, that we are not to expect an uninterrupted Series of the Dukes of Naples, as of Amalphis; neither can we be assisted in the Matter by any old Charters dated in Naples, because they express nothing but the Names and Times of the Greek Emperors, to whose Dominion that Dukedom was subject.

MARINUS with his Neapolitans invested Capua, where he did nothing but burn and plunder the Country about; Eugenius seeing that they were trifling away their Time to no purpose, and afraid of Otho, it being rumour'd about that he was on his march with a vast Army of Germans, Saxons and Spoletians, towards Capua, in order to relieve it, that he might not be catch'd napping, rais'd the Siege, and march'd to Salerno, where he was receiv'd by Gisulphus, and splendidly regal'd while he remain'd there, which confirm'd the Jealousy that was entertain'd of him, that he had still been in the Interest of the Greeks, and had only feignedly appear'd to be in that of Otbo, and therefore had been so slow in sending Assistance to Pandulphus. Eugenius after having continu'd some Days in Salerno, return'd to *Puglia*¹: Not many Days after, the vast Army of Otbo arrived at Capua, and not finding the Greeks there, they began to over-run and lay Waste, all the Neapolitan Territories, and being joyn'd by the Capuans, laid close Siege to the City of Naples. But not being able to take it, they return'd back, and besieg'd Avellino, which a little before had surrendred to the Greeks, who were now in Possession of it; but it was easily recover'd by the Beneventans, from whence they march'd to Benevento, with a Design to advance into Puglia, to drive the Greeks out of that Province, where they had assembled all their Troops, and had fortified themselves in Bari with a strong Garrison.

WE ought not in this Place to pass over in Silence, that which we shall discourse of at more length, when we come afterwards to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity, that Otbo's Army having halted in Benevento this Year 969, before he would undertake so doubtful an Expedition, and advance with the Arm of Flesh, he thought fit to begin, as it became him, by having recourse to the Assistance of Heaven. Hitherto the Church of Benevento had been govern'd by Bishops; but now John XIII. out of regard to Otbo, and the Princes Pandulphus and Landulphus, as the Year before he had rais'd Capua to be a Metropolis, would do the same to Benevento, therefore he rais'd it to a Metropolis, and assign'd it many Churches for Suffragans, and the first Archbishop that he appointed was Landulphus, in this Year 969, to whom he granted the Use of the Pallium, and confirm'd to him the Sipontine and Garganitan Churches. Whilst then Otbo's Army was making ready for this Expedition, the Archbishop Landulphus, with holy Ceremony, solemnly celebrated Mass, which was heard by all, and after that was over they all receiv'd the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, from the Hands of the said Archbishop; and getting his Benediction, they began their March joyfully towards *Puglia*². Whence 'tis to be observ'd that in these Times in our Provinces, and in Italy, the Communion under both Kinds was continued, and the Participation, as well of the Blood as of the Body was allow'd, neither was the Cup taken away till much later Times.

THE Army of Otbo, which consisted of Beneventans, Germans, Saxons and Spoletians, arriving at Ascoli, was met by Abdila a Patrician, who, with a good Body of Greeks, pretended to attack him, for Eugenius, by reason of his Cruelty, had been made Prisoner by his own Men, and sent to Constantinople. There was a sharp Engagement near Ascoli, and at last the Greeks were defeated, and the Beneventans, after having made a great Booty, return'd in Triumph to *Avellino*³.

IN the mean time, Otbo march'd with his Army towards Naples, and carried off all the Cattle in the Neighbourhood, and as he was returning, was met by Aloara, the Wife of Prince Pandulphus, with her Son all in Tears, who requested him to relieve her Husband, whom Nicephorus treated cruelly in a dark Prison in *Constantinople*⁴. Otbo immediately return'd to Puglia, where he made terrible Havock, laid close Siege to Bovino, and burnt many Places in the Neighbourhood; but whilst these things pass'd in Puglia, Nicephorus this Year 970, suffer'd a violent Death; for Theophania his Wife, together with Joannes Zimisceus, caus'd him to be cruelly murder'd; and the same Year Zimisceus was elected Emperor of the East: Who undoing what his Predecessor had done, immediately set Pandulphus at liberty, sent him to Puglia, and recommended him to Otbo, intreating he would restore him to his Dominions. Zimisceus, in order to gain Otbo's Friendship, sent him Theophania (whom Nicephorus had refus'd him) to be married to his Son Otbo; she was conducted to Rome, where with great Splendor, she was married to Otbo, and proclaim'd Empress⁵. Pandulphus being arrived at Bari, was immediately sent for by Otbo, who receiv'd him very graciously, and restor'd him to his Dominions and former Dignity: Whereupon Pandulphus, in order to gratify Zimisceus for his Liberty, us'd his Interest so much with Otbo, that he made him give over his Undertaking; so that a Peace ensuing, Otbo desisted from invading Puglia and Calabria, and therefore these Provinces were never conquer'd by Otbo, as many Writers have believ'd, contrary to what the anonymous Cotemporary Writer relates. Otho set out for France, and never return'd more to these Provinces; for in the Year 973 he died, after having acquir'd, by his wonderful Exploits, the Surname of Great, and may justly be compar'd with Charles the Great.

Otho succeeds his Father. Disturbances in the Principality of Salerno, to which at last Pandulphus succeeds.

AFTER the Death of Otho the Great, Otho II. his Son, who during his Father's Life-time, had been associated in the Empire, began to govern the Kingdom of Italy alone, and exercise all that Sovereignty there, that his Father had acquir'd, which, by reason of the Quarrels amongst our Longobard Princes, became very great in these Provinces, for whilst Pandulphus Iron-head, who had return'd to Capua, together with Landulphus his Son in Benevento, govern'd these two Principalities, there happen'd such strange Revolutions and Convulsions in Salerno, as turn'd all that Principality topsy-turvy. The Origine of these Mischiefs, was the too great Confidence that Gisulphus had in his Relations, whom he had recall'd from Banishment, and rais'd to that Height, that by unparallel'd Ingratitude, they prov'd the Ruin of his Dominions.

AT ENULPHUS II. who, as we have said, being driven out of Capua, had retir'd to Salerno, under the Protection of Guaimarus II. his Son-in-Law, left many Children, who being Exiles as well as the Father, for a long time went wandering up and down. One of them nam'd Landulphus, at first retir'd to Salerno with his Father, and went afterwards to live in Naples; but thereafter by the Intercession of Gaidelgrima his Sister, who was Wife of Guaimarus II. and Mother of Gisulphus I. he was invited back to Salerno by this Prince his Nephew, in order to please his Mother. Gisulphus, besides his having receiv'd him very affectionately, likewise gave him the County of Consa; but because he was a very cruel and intolerable Man, the Consans, not being able to bear him, drove him out of Consa, neither could Gisulphus long endure him in Salerno, from whence being expell'd, he was necessitated to return again to Naples with his Family: He had Four Sons, Guaimarus, Indolphus, Landulphus and Landenulphus.

IT happen'd, that whilst Landulphus, with his Sons, were in Naples, Gisulphus was taken ill, whereupon Gaidelgrima his Mother, laying hold of the Opportunity, fell into Tears, which Gisulphus perceiving, ask'd her what she ail'd: She quickly answer'd, I lament, because after the Loss of my Husband, I have no Body to comfort me in my great Affliction, now that you are taken ill, and my Brother is at so great a Distance: What would you have me to do then, answer'd Gisulphus? Re-call him with all his Family, reply'd she. Gisulphus, overcome by his Mother's Tears, consented, and when he recover'd of his Illness, Landulphus was immediately invited back to Salerno, who brought Three of his Sons along with him, leaving Landulphus, a Man of a subtle Wit and full of Deceit, in Naples.

LANDULPHUS was received by the Prince with great Marks of Esteem, enrich'd with many Lands, and likewise restor'd to the County of Consa; and not foreseeing what might happen to him, he rais'd him to that Degree, as the anonymous

*Salernitan*¹, who was his Cotemporary; relates, that he was the next to himself in Salerno. He was also most liberal to his Sons: To Ghaimarus he gave the County of Marfico in the Principality of Salerno, with its Privileges and Emoluments. To Indulphus he gave the County of Sarno: To Landulphus, the County of Lauro, likewise in the Principality of Salerno; who dying soon after in the Year 971, Landulphus was call'd from Naples, to whom Gisulphus gave the said County of Lauro, to the great Indignation of the Salernitans and Nobles of that City, who saw Gisulphus so imprudently advance these Princes.

LANDULPHUS the Father being rais'd to such Grandeur, began to think of Means whereby he might invade the Principality of Salerno; and seeing himself so powerful, he likewise procur'd the Assistance of the Dukes of Amalphis and Naples, and being aided by his Sons, especially Landulphus, a prudent and cunning Man, by bribing the Keepers, found means to enter the Prince's Palace, where seizing the unhappy Gisulphus, together with the unfortunate Princess Gemma his Wife, Daughter of Alfanus, and Kinswoman to the Duke of Spoletto; he imprison'd them, giving out, that they had been murder'd, which put the City all in an Uproar. The Salernitans believing them dead, were in the utmost Consternation, and not knowing what to do on such a Turn of Affairs, were forc'd to swear to Prince Landulphus their Tyrant, who being afraid they might discover that Gisulphus and the Princess Gemma were still alive, caus'd them to be removed from Salerno to Amalphis: So that having rid himself of them, the same Year 972 or 973, he assum'd Landulphus his Son for his Colleague in the Principality.

A T this Time, Manso, a Patrician, govern'd as Duke of Amalphis, and in Naples, as we have said, Marinus, a Patrician. These hearing of the Conspiracy, as soon as they understood that Gisulphus had been driven out of Salerno, went thither with some Troops, in order to assist Landulphus, and to fix him in the Principality². Never was greater Ingratitude heard of, than what Marinus Duke of Naples was guilty of on this Occasion, who having so soon forgot the Favours he had receiv'd from Gisulphus, as also the so many Oaths he had sworn, by which he was bound to assist him, now joyn'd with the Tyrant in order to drive him out of his Dominions.

B U T these Designs and wicked Counsels were soon confounded; for the Salernitans being convinc'd that Gisulphus and the Princess Gemma were not dead, but still alive in Amalphis; began immediately to make an Uproar, and to fret at themselves, for having been so credulous, and at the Steps they had taken. To this was also added, that Indulphus, who had seen Landulphus his Brother admitted as Colleague in the Principality, and himself not minded, contrary to what his Father had promis'd him with many Oaths, began to aim at the Principality, by soliciting Marinus Duke of Naples, to assist him in the Undertaking; therefore it was resolv'd, in order to quell the Tumults in some measure, to seize Indulphus, and send him to Amalphis, which was done; the Pretender being remov'd, the Salernitans were obliged to swear to Landulphus the Younger, a very cruel and cunning Prince. But by wicked Counsel not long after, Indulphus was recall'd to Salerno, who dissembling the Injury, began to curry Favour with the Salernitans, to whom he was very profuse; and having brought over to his Party the chief Men, and the Adherents of Prince Gisulphus, he was at great Pains to convince them, that now the Tyrants being driven out, they ought to deliver themselves up to Pandulphus Iron-head, who would be able with his Forces, to restore Gisulphus, and in the mean time, endeavour to fortify themselves in the Castles, that upon the coming of Pandulphus they might be in a Condition to assist him. In effect, many noble Salernitans, and amongst the rest, Risus and Romoalt, two renown'd Personages, repenting them of the Part they had acted in the Conspiracy, went to Amalphis to the detron'd Princes, and there, with many Oaths and Tears, express'd their Sorrow for the Wrong that had been done them, promising to use their utmost Efforts to restore them to their former Dignity.

P R I N C E Pandulphus being invited by the Adherents of Prince Gisulphus and the Salernitans, who had fortified themselves in several Castles, in order to receive his Assistance, compassionating the Case of that unfortunate Prince, who was his first Cousin, with incredible Joy, undertook to restore Gisulphus to Salerno; and convening some of his Forces, march'd towards that Place. He was met by Indulphus, who demanded the County of Consa for himself; but Pandulphus declaring that he could not grant it, he was extremely griev'd, and return'd to Salerno, where he was made Prisoner by his own Men, and deliver'd up to Landulphus. In the mean time, Iron-head having joyn'd the Salernitans that were in the Castles, took all the Places belonging to the Principality of Salerno, laid Waste all the Country about, and closely besieg'd Salerno. The two Landulphus's, the Father and Son, made a bold Resistance, and not trusting to the Salernitans, rely'd upon Manso the Patrician, whom they kept with them in the Palace with his Amalphitans, to whom the Custody of the Towers that surrounded the City was given; but they could not long hold out against the Forces of Pandulphus, who at last, in the Year 974, took the City, and having driven out the Tyrants, took Possession of it, not for himself, but that same Year restor'd it to its lawful Prince. Gisulphus and Gemma, whether they had so agreed betwixt themselves, or whether purely out of Gratitude for so many Favours receiv'd, not having Children, adopted Pandulphus the Son of Pandulphus for their Son, whom they likewise made Prince of Salerno, and Copartner with Gisulphus during his Life, which lasted to the Year 978¹, when he died, and left Pandulphus Successor in Salerno; on which Pandulphus the Father also assum'd the Title of Prince, together with his Son, so that three Titles center'd in the Person of Pandulphus Iron-Head, for he was call'd Prince of Capua, Benevento, and Salerno. Whence the Anonymous Salernitan, who liv'd in these Times, to which he continu'd his History, and dedicated it to this Prince, in a Verse which he compos'd in his Praise, calls him Prince of these three Cities, thus:

Unitur tuo ecce, tuente Deo².*

AS the Valour and Prudence of Atenulphus I. was able to ward off the Ruin of the Longobards, which by reason of the many Revolutions and Disturbances in these Provinces, was imminent: so at this Time the Power of Pandulphus Iron-Head put a Stop to their impending Fall; and some Good might have been expected from the Valour of this Prince, if that most mischievous Custom of the Longobards, of dividing their Dominions equally amongst their Sons, had not been already so inveterate; for tho' at present the Titles were united in one single Person, yet nevertheless Iron-Head gave the Principality of Benevento to Landulphus IV. his Son, and that of Salerno to Pandulphus another of his Sons. All the Longobard Princes of the Race of Landulphus I. Count of Capua, those likewise of Benevento and Salerno, were wont to give Fiefs to all their Sons; who at first liv'd in Friendship and Amity with one another under the same Laws, each one contenting himself with his Share; but such is the Corruption of Human Nature, that in process of Time it bred Discord among them, which split them into Factions, and gave Occasion to Strangers to invade them. At this Time Political Maxims were taken from the Holy Scripture, the Barbarity of the Times not affording them other Books whereby they could be better instructed in the Politicks of this World: They had read the Admonition of David, who says, 'There's not a more pleasant Thing, than habitare fratres in unum, and propos'd it as the Rule of their Conduct; but they were not sensible that this was a Thing much to be wish'd-for, and when attain'd, much to be valu'd, but by Human Nature difficult to be put in Practice; and they might have learn'd from the same Scripture, that a Kingdom divided against itself cannot stand. However that may be, they had no mind to give all to the eldest Son; therefore this Succession taking Place, the principal City was retain'd by him, and the other Brothers were invest'd with Counties, and other Fiefs, who being all of the same Stock, from Dependants, made themselves absolute Lords. Thus Radelchisus Prince of Benevento, as we have related, having had twelve Sons by Caretruda, besides Radelgarius who succeeded him, made them all Counts. The same happen'd to the Principality of Salerno, which, as we have said, was divided by Gisulphus into so many Counties, amongst the Sons of Landulphus, to the great Indignation of the Salerni- tans;

tans, that besides the Nobles of Salerno, it was possess'd by many, who liv'd well fortified in their Castles; with absolute and independent Authority.

BUT above all, the Principality of Capua suffer'd most by being thus dismember'd, for from the Race of Atenulphus, as from the Trojan Horse, there issu'd so many Counts and Lords, as not only fill'd Capua with Counties and Lordships, but likewise Benevento. From the Blood of that Prince were descended the Counts of Venafro, Sessa, Isernia, Marfco, Sarno, Aquino, Cajazza, Teano, and many more: Which, as we have said, tho' at first given as Governments, and not as Fiefs, were afterwards turn'd into Lordships; and hitherto the Thing was tolerable, because the Grant, either by the Death or Felony of the Count, became void, and the County did not go to the Heir; but in the Times we now speak of, the Practice was, for the Reason formerly given, that the Grants were made to the Sons and Heirs, and Investitures given pro se & Hæredibus, as we read among the ancient Records of the Investiture given in the Year 964, in Capua by Pandulphus Iron-Head, and Landulphus his Son, of the City of Isernia with its Dependencies, to Landulphus and his Heirs ¹.

THUS the Counties and Fiefs, not only came to be multiplied, and afterwards divided into so many Parts, by being vested in those of the same Blood, who were apt to aspire to be independent Lords, that thereby the State was brought into Confusion and Disorder, and at last became a Prey to other Nations.

Surnames of Families restor'd among us, which for a long Time had been disus'd.

FROM the Number of so many Fiefs and Counties possess'd by different Families, Surnames took their Rise; for the Longobards having no Surnames for denoting the particular Families, they took them from the Cities and Lands which they possess'd, and where they had fix'd their Residence; thus by Degrees the Custom of the ancient Romans began to take Place again in these our Provinces; tho' Surnames began under our last Longobard Princes, yet it was the succeeding Norman Princes that settled them, as a distinguishing Mark of Families.

THE Romans, who knew nothing of Fiefs, took their Surnames from other Things, and not from the Places which perhaps had been possess'd by their Forefathers. But as the Pastoral Employment and Agriculture were in great Esteem amongst them, many Families took their Surnames from Rural Things belonging to these: From Agriculture, the Lactucinii, the Melii, the Frondisii, the Fabii, the Pisones, the Lentuli, and the Cicerones; and from the Pastoral Employment, the Bubulci, the Bupecii, the Juvenci, the Portii, the Scrophæ, the Pilumni, the Junii, the Satirii, the Tauri, the Vituli, the Vitellii, the Suilli, the Capriani, the Ovini, the Caprilii, the Equini, and others, of which Tiraquellus ¹ has given us a long Catalogue.

THE Roman Families likewise took their Surnames from Nature, according as she was favourable in bestowing some special Comeliness of Person, or graceful Behaviour, or as she was unfavourable in deforming the Body or the Mind with some Vice; thus from the Bigness of the Feet came the Surname of the Planci; that of the Crassi from Fatness; that of the Cincinnati from the Hair; the Nasones from their big Noses, and a great many more. Often from Qualities, as Metellus Celer from his Nimbleness; sometimes from Chance, as Valerius Corvinus; sometimes from a conquer'd Place, as Scipio Africanus, and so of the rest ².

BUT amongst our last Longobards, Surnames were taken for the most part from Cities and Castles, which their Forefathers had possess'd, and whither they went to reside, and pass their Time. Thus from the Castle of Presensano, the Surname of Presensano is deriv'd, which Family, together with the Castle, fail'd in Capua after the Time of King Robert. Thus likewise, according to Erchempertus ¹, Marino was surnam'd Malphitano, because he govern'd in Amalphis, and was Duke of it; and in the same Author ², Landulphus was call'd Suessulanus, because he govern'd in Suessula; and Leo Ostiensis ³ says, Gregory was surnam'd Neapolitanus, because he was Duke of Naples; and the same Author ⁴ gives Landulphus the Surname of Sancta Agatha (of which more afterwards) only, because he was Count of that City. And seeing all those Noblemen had their Descent from Capua, and from the Progeny of Atenulphus, therefore by the Writers of those Times they were likewise call'd noble Capuans; whence came the Surname of the illustrious Familia Capuana, and for a long time all those were call'd noble Capuans, who were descended of the Race of the Counts and Princes of Capua, tho' they were divided into many Families, as the most accurate Pellegrinus demonstrates ⁵: Whence it came, that some of them for a long time after retain'd the Surname of Capuani, or Capua; and others took theirs from the Places they possess'd, tho' of the same Family. Thus the Family of Sesto, descended of the Counts of that Place, and of Landulphus, who was surnam'd Sesto, took its Surname from a Castle of that Name in the County of Venafro, of which Petrus Diaconus makes mention ⁶; which Family liv'd in the greatest Splendor under King William II. and had the chief Military Employments, as may be seen in Luigi Lello ⁷.

AND as these three Families of Franco, Citello, and Rofelle, were of Longobard Extraction, so likewise ought they to be reputed of the Race of Prince Atenulphus, and come from the Places possess'd by their Forefathers, as Pellegrinus shews; and many other Longobard Families, that derive their Origin from these Princes of Capua, and Atenulphus, even after the Longobards were driven out, continu'd in these our Provinces under the Normans, as we shall more particularly relate hereafter, when we shall have occasion to treat of the People of that Nation: So that it occasion'd Leo Ostiensis to say, that Atenulphus, and his Descendants, for many Generations, held the Principalities of Benevento and Capua, for a Hundred and seventy-seven Years; seeing for a long time there were many Barons of the Race of Atenulphus in these Principalities, who were Lords of many Fiefs, and establish'd their own particular Families, by giving their Relations Investiture of many Fiefs, and from whom are descended many Counts, Barons, and other Nobles over all Italy on this Side of the Tyber; and the same was done in the Principality of Salerno. Likewise the Family of Colimonta, from which Pellegrinus proves the Family of Barrile to be descended, takes its Origin from nothing else but from the Castle of Colimonta, which we now call Collemezze; as the noble Family of Gaetana, from Gaeta; for Leo ⁸ Ostiensis calls all those Gaetani, who held the City of Gaeta as Dukes. Thus likewise the Surnames of the illustrious Family of Aquino, has risen from the Counts of that City; and those of Scugri, Sanseverini, Aquivivi, and many others, are taken from the Cities and Lands possess'd by their Forefathers ⁹.

LIKEWISE amongst our last Longobards Surnames were taken, tho' but seldom, from the Names of their Forefathers; thus the Family Atenulpho had its Name from Atenulpho, who was Father of Peter a Cardinal of the Holy Church; and very many others. Surnames were also taken from Magistracy, and Offices as well Ecclesiastick as Secular, and from the Professions of their Forefathers; whence the Family Mastrogiudice according to Freccia ¹⁰ had its Rise, as also those of the Doci, Alfieri, Conti, Ferrari, Cavalcanti, Pilastoppa, and many more. From Behaviour also, and good or bad Inclinations; from Colour, Garments, Beards, the Chin; from Plants, Flowers, Animals, and from an infinite Number of other Occasions and Accidents ¹¹.

BUT 'tis to be observ'd, that tho' this Custom of transmitting Surnames to Posterity, for the better distinguishing of Families, began with us about the End of this Xth Century, yet it was seldom used; for we very rarely find Surnames in the Charters and other Writs of these Times. They began to be a little more frequent amongst the Normans in the XIth and XIIth Centuries; but in the XIIIth and XIVth they were so diffus'd and establish'd, that commonly every Body, tho' of mean Extraction, had Surnames, and transmitted them to their Posterity.

S E C T. II.

The unfortunate Expedition of Otho II. against the Greeks, and the Death of Pandulphus Iron-head.

THE Custom of our last Longobards, of dividing their Dominions into so many Parts, was at last the Occasion of their Ruin, and afforded a fair Opportunity to the Normans to drive them out of these Provinces; for tho' these Barons held their Counties of the Princes of Capua, Benevento, and Salerno; yet forasmuch as they were of the same Lineage of Atenulphus, many of them aspir'd to the same Principalities of Capua, Benevento, and Salerno, from which some of them had been driven out; and tho', as we have said, Pandulphus Iron-head by his Valour and good Success, together with his Sons Landulphus IV. and the other Pandulphus, had govern'd these three Principalities; yet Iron-head was no sooner dead in Capua, in the Year 981¹, than Revolutions and Disorders began anew in these Provinces. To this likewise was added, that Pandulphus, who had procur'd that there should be a firm and lasting Friendship maintain'd betwixt the Emperors of the East and those of the West, was no sooner dead, than all Correspondence was broke off, and the old Quarrels renew'd; for Otho II. who could not endure that Puglia and Calabria should remain in the Possession of the Greeks, under the Emperors Basilus and Constantine, who in the Year 977. had succeeded Zimisceus, disingag'd himself the best way he could from the Affairs on the other Side of the Mountains, and in the Year 980. march'd to Italy with an Army, accompanied by the Empress *Theopbania*².

THE Custom, as we have said, was already introduc'd, that when the Emperors of the West came into Italy, they stopt at Roncaglia, a Place not far from Placentia, where, in imitation of the Dyets, the Dukes, Marquisses, and Counts of many Parts of Italy, the Magistrates of the Cities, and also the Ecclesiastical State met in order to treat of the most important Affairs of Italy; they examin'd the Complaints of the Subjects against their Lords; they gave the Investiture of Fiefs; adorn'd many Barons with Titles; establish'd many Laws concerning the Ecclesiastical State, and remedied some former Abuses. Otho this Year being come to Placentia, assembled the Dyet in Roncaglia, wherein he made many useful Laws. Of this Otho are these Laws, which we have in the second Book of the Longobard Laws, and many under the Title *Qualiter quisq' se defend' debeat*³, wherein rejecting the Proof by Oath, he retain'd that by Duel, and many others collected by Melchior Godalstus in his Volumes⁴.

Otho therefore having, in some measure, settled the Affairs of Italy, went to Rome, where at a Dinner, he caus'd many Noblemen whom he suspected of Disloyalty, to be inhumanly murdered; from whence the Year following 981, he came to Benevento with his Army, where he continu'd for some Time: He was likewise receiv'd into Naples by the Neapolitans, who, little minding the Allegiance due to their Sovereigns the Emperors of the East, also gave him Succours; and whilst he remain'd in these our Provinces, he found Means to augment his Army with those Troops furnish'd by Benevento, Capua, Salerno and Naples for invading Puglia. While he staid here, he inquir'd into the Complaint of John Abbot of St. Vincent in Vulturno, against Landulphus Count of Isernia, who had taken Possession of three Castles belonging to that Monastery ; he gave Sentence in favour of the Monastery, and caus'd a Charter to be drawn up for that end in Benevento, dated the Tenth of October this Year 981¹.

THE same Year that Pandulphus Iron-head died in Capua, it happen'd that Vesuvius vomited out Fire and Flames. It was a common Opinion among the Vulgar, that such Signs, were either preceded or follow'd by the Death of some rich, powerful and wicked Man, whose Soul was carried by the Devils through this Gulf into Hell ; which Opinion had its Rise, as often falls out in these Cases, from the Vision of a Hermit, who, as Peter Damian relates, fancied he had seen the Soul of Pandulphus carried by the Devils into the tormenting Fire of Hell². Indeed Iron-head was the most rich and powerful Man in these our Provinces, in that Age : He was not only Prince of Capua, Benevento, and Salerno ; but was likewise Marquis of Spoletto and Camérino, whereby he was in Possession of little less than the Half of *Italy*³ ; and though we read of many pious Works done by him, and that he had a great Esteem for Pope John XIII. and had enrich'd the Monastery of Cassino in his Life-time with many Donations and Privileges, that according to *Ostiensis*⁴, he was in great Esteem with the Monks ; nevertheless, the Vision of this Hermit made all these Actions not to be valu'd, and it was believed, that he had done them, not out of a sincere Love to Piety and Religion, but for worldly Ends ; to which was added, the heinous Crime of driving Landulphus his Nephew out of the Principality of Benevento.

THUS likewise, John Prince of Salerno, who was Grandfather to the last Guaimarus, being murder'd by his own People in the Year 1052, when Vesuvius vomited Flames, John, who was of that Opinion, said, Procul dubio Sceleratus aliquis dives in proximo moriturus est, atque in Infernum descensurus ; which soon after was applied to Prince John himself, who, the Night following, was unexpectedly found dead in the Arms of one of his Mistresses⁵ ; whence the Vulgar were the more confirm'd in that Opinion, which long continued, even to the Time of our Grandfathers ; and it was likewise foolishly believed, that Vesuvius was one of the Mouths of Hell.

BUT to return to our Purpose, Pandulphus dying, left, as we have said, Landulphus IV. his Son in Benevento, to whom in his Life-time he had given that Principality, and who, for a few Months after the Death of his Father, govern'd Capua. He left Pandulphus another of his Sons, Prince of Salerno, whom Gisulphus had adopted, and who after the Death of his Father, govern'd that Principality for some Months ; he also left other Sons, to wit Atenulphus a Count, Landenulphus a Marquis, Gisulphus who was Count of Teano, and *Laidolphus*⁶.

BUT the Death of this Prince soon broke that Union, which could not long continue, for Pandulphus II. who had been turn'd out of the Principality of Benevento by him, no sooner heard of his Death, than he reveng'd himself of the Wrong he had receiv'd : he drove Landulphus IV. out of the Principality, took Benevento to himself, and transmitted it to his Posterity ; and Landulphus died soon after ; for Otho having march'd with his Army (which was compos'd of many Nations, and likewise Beneventans, amongst whom were this Landulphus and Atenulphus his Brother) towards Taranto, in order to fight the Greeks, and Saracens, who had been invited to their Assistance ; in the Battle which was fought the Year following 982. had his Army defeated, and amongst the rest, the Princes Landulphus and Atenulphus were killed, and Otho himself with Difficulty escap'd⁷.

WHEREUPON it fell out, that after Landulphus's Death, Landenulphus his Brother, and Aloara his Mother succeeded to the Principality of Capua, and Otho having recruited his Army the best way he could, when he return'd to Capua, confirm'd the Principality of Capua to Aloara and Landenulphus, who govern'd it from the said Year 982 to the Year 993, when Landenulphus was cruelly murdered by his own People in the Month of *April*⁸, four Months after his Mother's Death.

THIS Expedition of Otho against the Greeks, was so unfortunate, and the Defeat of his Army so great, that it was firmly believed, if the Greeks had known how to make use of their Victory, they might have carried their Arms to the Gates of Rome. But as the Greeks had perceiv'd the Disloyalty of the Neapolitans, and their other Subjects in this Battle; so Otho had more Reason to impute the Loss of it to the Beneventans and Romans (who abhor'd him on account of the cruel Murder committed on the many Noblemen at the foresaid Feast, for which they afterwards gave him the Surname of Sanguinarius) who in the Heat of the Battle had deserted him. Wherefore 'tis said, that the Year following 983, Otho having return'd to Capua, and recruited his Army, march'd on a sudden to Benevento, and pillag'd that City, and in order to vex the Beneventans the more, he wrapped up the Bones of St. Bartolomew, for which they had so great Devotion, and carried them to Rome, and resolv'd afterwards to transport them to Germany; but being prevented by Death, which happen'd this same Year in Rome, he could not put his Design in Execution; so that they remain'd in that City, where they are at this Day, ador'd in a Church in the Island Lycaonia in the Tyber, which is now much more famous all over the World, on account of those Bones, than for its Rise, which Livy describes in his incomparable History.

THE Beneventans cannot bear what is related concerning this Translation by *Otho Frisingensis*², *Goffredo of Viterbo*³, *Blondus*⁴, *Sigonius*⁵, and other more modern Authors. They, from the Authority of *Robertus Tuitensis*⁶, who takes it from Baronius, and of *Ostiensis*⁷, will have it that about the Year 1000, Otho III. not II. having return'd to Benevento from Monte Gargano, fought the Body of the Holy Apostle from the Beneventans, who, not daring to deny him, had recourse to Fraud, and in place thereof, gave him the Body of St. Paulinus Bishop of Nola, for which they likewise had a great Veneration: Of which Otho being afterwards appriz'd, was much offended at the Cheat, and return'd anew to Benevento, which he besieg'd for many Days; but not being able to take it, he was oblig'd to return to Rome. But *Martinus Polonus*⁸ by adapting himself to the Humour of the Romans, who will have it to be in the Tyber, relates likewise, that Otho III. return'd to Benevento; but that he fought none other but the Body of St. Paulinus from the Beneventans, who, without any Guile, gave it him. Thus a bitter Dispute concerning these Bones hath arisen among the modern Writers; and the Romans and Beneventans worship two Bodies of the same Saint in different Places; and the Neapolitans likewise pretend, that the Head of this Saint is neither at Rome nor Benevento, but in Naples, in the Monastery of the Monks of Queen Donna, and that it was given them by Mary the Wife of Charles II. of Anjou, Son of Charles I. who got it from the Beneventans after he had defeated Manfred; and our Historian Giannettasio believes it to be matter of Fact, notwithstanding the bitter Contest which to this Day continues betwixt the Romans and Beneventans. We have seen in these our later Times, a great many Writers tormenting themselves about this Subject, who, after all their Endeavours to prove, that this Body was either carried to Rome, or remain'd in Benevento, have yet the greatest Part of their Work upon their Hands, to wit, to shew us how it was brought from the Indies to Lipari, as Sigebertus relates. But these Disputes not being to our Purpose, we willingly leave them to those who take Pleasure in such Matters.

C H A P. III.

The Greeks recover greater Strength in Puglia and Calabria. The Advancement of the Dukedom of Bari, at this Time the Seat of the Catapani.

THE Greeks, who under the Emperors Basilus and Constantine had gain'd so signal a Victory over Otho II. establish'd themselves more firmly in Puglia and Calabria; and governing these Provinces with great Authority, incroach'd upon the Borders of the Principalities of Benevento and Salerno, and pretended likewise to exercise Sovereignty over the Longobard Princes. But remembering the late Treachery of their Subjects, in order to keep them in Awe, they resolv'd to have strong Garrisons in these two Provinces. They were also afraid of being attack'd again by the Germans under Otho; and that the Saracens, tho' coop'd up in a few Forts, might disturb them with their usual Inroads, for these never slipt a fit Opportunity for making IncurSIONS into Puglia from Monte Gargano, where they had fortified themselves. Therefore at this Time they had built many strong Castles. They founded in the Plains of Puglia a City, which, in order to revive the glorious Name of Ilium, they call'd Troja, which remains to this Day, for the Normans, next to Melphis, distinguish'd it above all the other Cities of that Province, which at present is call'd Capitanata. They likewise founded there, Draconaria, Cividade, and Firenzuola, Cities not now in being, and other Towns¹. In order to keep their Subjects the more in Awe, they appointed a new Magistrate in Puglia, in their Language, call'd Catapanus, who had full and unlimited Power, and govern'd these Provinces with absolute Sway. Bari, where the Stratico formerly resided, was appointed for his Seat, so that this City exalted itself above all the other Cities of Puglia.

OUR *Gulielmus Appuliensis*² derives this Title of Catapanus from the unlimited Power that was given to this Officer, and says he was call'd Catapanus;

*Quod CATAPAN Græci, nos 7 UXTA dicimus OMNE.
Quisquis apud Danaos vice fungitur hujus honoris,
Dispositor populi parat omne quod expedit illi,
ET 7 UXTA quod cuique dari decet, OMNE ministrat.*

BUT Charles Du-Fresne, in his Notes on the Alexiade of the Princess Anna Comnena, laughs at this Etymology of Gulielmus Appuliensis, and will have it, that Catapanus amongst the Greeks, was the same as Capitaneus among the Latins: Which Leo Ostiensis likewise ridicules, who in his Chronicle³, besides taking it to be the proper Name of a Man, whereas 'tis known to be a Title of Dignity, reckons that the Province of Capitanata, which took its Name from these Officers, came to be corruptly call'd so by the Vulgar, when it ought to be call'd Catapanata; yet Du-Fresne maintains, that Catapanus among the Greeks, was the same as Capitaneus among the Latins, and therefore it ought to be call'd Capitanata, and not Catapanata:

² Gul. Appul. lib. 1.

| ³ Ostiens. lib. 2. cap. 50.

Nicetas ¹ likewise calls this Prefecture Capitanata, which being compos'd of many Cities or Towns, was under the Command of one Captain.

THE Catapani having fix'd their Seat in Bari, Lupus Protospata, who, according to Pellegrinus ² was certainly of Bari, at least of Puglia, gives us a long List of them, and the first, that about this Time in the Year 999, according to him, govern'd this Province, was Tracomotus, or Gregorius, who besieg'd Gravina, and took Theophilactus. In the Year 1006, Xipbeas was sent to be Catapanus of Puglia, who in the Year 1007 died in Bari, to whom Curcua succeeded the Year following 1008. Under whose Government the Inhabitants of Bari rebelling, chose for their Prince Melo of Longobard Extract, who resided in Bari, and will be famous in the History of the Normans; but they being suppress'd by the Greeks, Melo, with his Brother-in-Law Dattus, made their Escape, and wandered up and down. He went first to Ascoli, but being afraid of Treachery, he went to Benevento, from thence to Salerno, and afterwards to Capua, soliciting these Longobard Princes to assist him in freeing Bari from the Tyranny of the Greeks. Curcua dying in the Year 1010, Basilius succeeded him as Catapanus, in whose Time Preccia ³ says, that Bari facta est Sedes magnorum virorum Græcorum. Thereafter in the Year 1017, Andronicus was Catapanus, who fought and defeated Melo ⁴.

THE Year following 1018, he was succeeded by Basilius Bugianus, whom Gulielmus Appuliensis ⁵ calls Baganus, and Leo Ostiensis ⁶, Bajanus. Who, that he might be recorded in the History of Italy, dismember'd a Part of Puglia, bordering on the Principality of Benevento, and made a new Province of it, which he call'd Capitanata, and, as we have said, he built some Cities and Towns, such as Troja, Draconaria, Florentino and others. In 1028, Christophorus was made Catapanus; then Patus, who govern'd to the Year 1031, and the following Year Anatolicus. In 1033, Constantinus Protospata came to be Catapanus, who was call'd Opus. Thereafter Maniacus, to whom in the Year 1038, Nicephorus succeeded, who, in 1040 died in Ascoli. To him succeeded Michael, who was also call'd Duchianus, and after him at last in the Year 1042, Exaugustus, the Son of Bujanus was Catapanus, during whose Government, the Greeks were driven out of these Provinces, after he had been beaten and taken Prisoner in a Battle near Benevento by the Normans: And tho' these Provinces came afterwards under the Dominion of the Normans, but not all at once, therefore we read in Lupus, and the Anonymous of Bari, of other Catapani after Exaugustus, whom we shall mention as occasion offers.

THE Power then of the Greeks, after this Defeat of Otbo II. till the Normans came to have Dominion in these Provinces, was become much more considerable than what it had been the preceding Years, both with regard to the Largeness of their Bounds, which they had extended, and the absolute Empire, which the Emperors of the East had acquir'd in the Political and Temporal, and the Patriarchs of Constantinople, over the Metropolitans and Bishops of Puglia and Calabria, in the Ecclesiastical and Spiritual Government.

PUGLIA, which in the Time of Arechis, and the other Beneventan Princes, his Successors, belonged to the Principality of Benevento, was now dismember'd from it, and being again come under the Dominion of the Greeks, very much diminish'd this Principality. The Greeks on this side reach'd as far as Troja and Ascoli, and excepting Siponto and Monte Gargano, which were still united to this Principality, towards the East, all that Tract of Country, to the very utmost Point of Italy, belong'd to them. Calabria, according to the modern Appellation, was likewise added, which included not only Bruzio, Reggio, Crotone, and other neighbouring Cities; but it also comprehended a great Part of the ancient Lucania, and on that side was bounded by the Principality of Salerno, which was thereby confin'd to a narrower Compass than it had been in the Time of Prince Siconulphus. On another side they very much confin'd the Principality of Capua, insomuch that the Dominion of the Greeks was never at any time so far extended as now, when drawing a Line from Monte Gargano, to the Promontory of Minerva, which is the greatest Breadth of the Kingdom; all towards the East and South, was under their Dominion; as the other Part towards the West and North, was subject to the Longobard Princes; but as the Principality of Salerno extended itself without this Line, towards the East and South; so likewise the Greeks had not altogether lost their Dominion towards the other Part, which was not intirely subject to our Longobard Princes; forasmuch as in this Extent, the Three Dukedoms of Amalphis, Naples and Gaeta were included, in which, though they were govern'd in the Form of Commonwealths, and often not only elected their Magistrates out of their own Body, but likewise their Dukes; nevertheless, the Greek Emperors always preserv'd some Marks of their Authority and supreme Dominion in them, as we have seen, from what hath been formerly said, with regard to the Dukedom of Naples; and the Dukes of Amalphis were wont to be confirm'd by the Emperors of the East, from whom they got the Dignity of Patriciate.

AND the same may be said of Gaeta; for though *Leo Ostiensis*¹ says, that Gaeta was subject to the Pope, and that therefore John VIII. had given it to Pandulphus Count of Capua; nevertheless it was soon recover'd by the Greeks. The Popes claim'd this City, by those Rights which Charles the Great gave them, when he pretended to take it from the Greeks, and make a present of it to the Church of Rome, as he had done Terracina and the other Spoils of the Greeks; but Arechis immediately oppos'd it, and ordered Matters so, that this City quickly was restor'd to the Greeks, and was first govern'd by Patricians, and afterwards by Dukes. But because the Popes do not so easily part with Rights, which they fancy they have once acquir'd; they always kept up their Pretensions, and when Junctures and Times favour'd them, not being able to defend Gaeta of themselves, they gave it to some powerful Prince, who was able to preserve it from the Greeks, as John VIII. did, who gave it to Pandulphus; but because he was severe in his Government over the Gaetans; Docibilis, who was then Duke of Gaeta, had recourse to the Saracens for Assistance, in order to drive him out; so that we see, that at the same Time that Ostiensis says Gaeta was subject to the Pope, there is mention made of Dukes of that City, who depended on the Greek Emperors, such as John, Gregory, Docibilis, and others; and in many Charters made in those Times in Gaeta, some of which we owe to Ughellus, we see the Names of the reigning Emperors of the East inserted. Thus in one, made in the Year 812, we read Imperantibus Domino nostro piissimo imperatore Augusto Michaelio, & Theophilo, magnis pacificis Imperatoribus. And in another made afterwards, which Ostiensis mentions in the Year 884, thus, *Imperantibus Domino nostro Leone & Alexandro pacificis magnis Imperatoribus*². Which is evident; for the Normans, after having driven out the Greeks, took the Title, not only of Princes of Capua; but also of Dukes of Gaeta; though they alter'd nothing of its Polity, but left it to be govern'd by its own particular Dukes and Consuls³.

THE Greeks, though they had so much extended their Bounds, not knowing what Fiefs were in these Times, had not erected Dukedoms, Counties, or other Baronies, either in Puglia or Calabria; but we find a great many of them in the Provinces, subject to the Longobard Princes. They were known, as we have said, in the Counties of Marsico, Molise, Isernia, Apruzzi, Teano, and many others; but were never heard of in Puglia and Calabria, till they came under the Dominion of the Normans; for the Normans being of the same Extraction with the Longobards, receiv'd them together with their Laws and Customs: So that Fiefs were introduc'd into all those Places which they took from the Greeks; from whence sprung (besides the Counts of Puglia and Calabria) the Counts of Capitanata, Principato, Lavello and Loritello; the Counts of Conversano are often mentioned, both in antient Charters, and in the Alexiade of Princess Anna Comnena, as also in the Chronicle of Leo, in Malaterra, Odericus Vitalis, and a great many other Writers⁴; the Counts of Catanzaro, Sinopolis and Cosenza; the Counts of Aversa, and those of Lecce; the Counts of Avellino, Fondi, Gravina, Montecaveoso, Tricarico and many more, of whom we shall have occasion to speak when we come to the Times of the Normans. Formerly, when these Places were subject to the Longobards, they were, as we have said, divided into Casteldati, which were not true Fiefs, but their Cities were committed to the Government of those Longobard Noblemen as an Office, neither could they be chang'd into Fiefs, as was practis'd in those Provinces that had been long in the Possession of the Longobards; because the Greeks, who took them partly from the Saracens, who had taken them from the Longobards, and partly from the Longobards themselves, as we have said, never knew what Fiefs were.

THIS Increase of Power in the Greeks, and the Growth of their Dominion, was the Cause that the Churches of these Provinces, which according to the Disposition of the Emperor Leo, were subject to the See of Constantinople, were more strictly ty'd down to the Obedience of the Patriarchs of Constantinople. Whereupon the Prohibitions of Nicephorus Phocas became of greater Force against the Latin Rites, and which the Patriarchs of Constantinople inforc'd so much, as to command all the Bishops of Puglia and Calabria, for the time to come, not to make use of unleaven'd Bread in the Sacrifices, according to the Latin Rites, but of leaven'd, according to the Greek Usage; which made the Breach betwixt them and the Popes wider, who on no account would allow of it; therefore they begg'd the Emperor Otho, as we have said, to send Luitprandus, Bishop of Cremona to Constantinople: Which Disputes much increas'd in the Pontificate of Leo IX. when the Patriarch Michael Cerularius excommunicated all the Latins, comprehending also Pope Leo himself, because, among other Reasons, they did not observe the Prohibition of unleaven'd Bread. Whence it came, that to this Day, there have continued in these Places, some Vestiges of the Greek Rites, which many Churches still retain; tho' the Popes have neglected no Opportunity to abolish altogether these Vestiges of the Power of the Patriarchs of the East, and tho' they may have succeeded in many Cities, yet nevertheless, they are not quite extinct, but still continue in some.

FOR the same Reason we have ground to believe, that in such Times in these Places, the Novellæ of the Emperors of the East, and the Collections of the Basilicæ, the Eclogues and the other Books, which we have mention'd in the preceding Book, have had some Force and Authority, and, as we have said, the Eclogue of the Basilicæ being found in Taranto, and that famous Library of Greek Authors having been preserv'd for a long Time in Otranto, of which Antonius Galateus makes mention, are strong Indications of the Truth of it. However 'tis true, that though these Books may have had some Authority, it could last but for a short time, for these Places having soon fallen under the Dominion of the Normans, who embrac'd the Longobard Laws, they would acknowledge no other but the Laws of these Princes, or the Longobard, which is evident from the very Customs of the City of Bari, taken from the Longobard Laws: This City having been a long time under their Dominion, and govern'd by their Casteldati, of which we shall have occasion to treat elsewhere.

SUCH then, was the State of these Provinces, which now compose our Kingdom towards the end of the Tenth Century, after the Death of Otho II. whilst the Brothers Basilus and Constantinus reign'd in the East. Puglia and Calabria (Provinces which so far extended their Bounds, that they comprehended all Puglia, Fapigia, Mesapia, both the Calabrias, with that Part of Lucania, which stretches itself towards the Ionian Sea, and therefore had hemm'd in the three Principalities of Capua, Benevento and Salerno) were subject to the Greeks. The Dukedoms of Amalphis, Naples and Gaeta, though they retain'd the Form of Commonwealths, yet by a most antient and just Title, they depended on the Emperors of the East. Aloara, with her Son Landenulphus, reign'd in Capua. In Salerno, Pandulphus his Brother; in Benevento, Pandulphus II. who having driven out Landulphus IV. the Son of Iron-head, had likewise soon after associated in the Principality Landulphus his Son, whom therefore we shall call Landulphus V.

BUT there would have been less Confusion, if these Three Principalities, tho' much diminish'd by the Greeks, had at least acknowledg'd only three Lords; they not only own'd the Emperors of the West, as Kings of Italy for their Sovereigns, who, in these later Times, govern'd with a high Hand, but likewise their being divided into many Counties, was the occasion of their Ruin. The Principality of Capua was divided into the Counties of Fondi, Sessa, Aquino, Teano, Alife, Caserta and others; that of Benevento into the Counties of Marsi, Isernia, Chieti, and some others; that of Salerno, into the Counties of Consa, Capaccio, Corneto and Clinto; and many many Noblemen had made themselves Lords of the Castles of that Principality ; so that many of these Counts reckoning themselves, as they were, of the same Race of Atenulphus, some of them as being descended from the Princes of Salerno, from Vassals, made themselves absolute Lords of their Counties, such as the Counts of Aquino, Marfi, Isernia, St. Agatha and others. The very Monks of Cassino pretended to an absolute Dominion over all those Castles, which, by degrees, they had acquir'd from the Bounty of sundry Longobard Princes ; and the Abbot of *Noce*¹ has endeavour'd to maintain, that they possess'd them as Free-holds, and not as Fiefs, that they acknowledg'd no Lord, and therefore were subject to no Services, for which Cause they fortified them, hired Soldiers for defending them, and maintain'd Troops, after the same manner as the Abbot of St. Gal and other Prelates in Germany do.

I T would have been a Miracle then, if the Dominion of the Longobards had lasted longer in these Principalities ; for they had introduc'd such a Polity, as gave a fair Opportunity, and pav'd the Way for the Normans to subdue them. Neither could the Dominion of the Greeks be of long Duration in these Provinces ; for they behav'd themselves so haughtily towards their Subjects, neglecting to drive the Saracens out of them, that they were the Occasion of their own Ruin, and open'd a wide Door to the Normans, who, in process of Time, subjected them to one single Prince, and laid the Foundation of a very ample and well regulated Monarchy, as we shall see in the following Books.

CHAP. IV.

Otho III. succeeds to the Kingdom and the Empire. New Revolutions happen in Italy, and in these our Provinces on that Account ; and his Death.

THE News of Otho II's Death, which happen'd in Rome in the Year 883, coming to Germany when it was least expected, put all those Princes into Confusion ; for tho' Otho II. had left another Otho his Son, yet he was only Seventeen Years of Age, which prompted the ambitious Henry Duke of Bavaria, first Cousin to the deceas'd Otho, to aspire to the Kingdom of Germany. The Romans demanded an Italian, nam'd Crescentius, for Emperor ; but the Germans quickly broke these Measures, which they saw would be attended with Revolutions and Confusion ; and elected Otho III. for their King, with the Consent likewise of Pope Benedict.

BUT this Prince being so young, and unfit for governing so great a Kingdom, was the Occasion of terrible Disorders, no less in Germany than in Italy ; for while Otho was altogether intent on quelling the Tumults which his Election had occasion'd in Germany, Sedition and grievous Mutinies arose in Italy. Pope Benedict dying in Rome, Peter, Bishop of Pavia was elected, who call'd himself *John XIV.*¹ ; and 'tis very probable, that he being Otho's Chancellor, was, by his Recommendation, advanc'd to that Dignity. But Boniface, the Cardinal Deacon, who had formerly possess'd that Chair, and had been driven out of it, and fled to Constantinople, being provok'd by the Injury which he thought had been done him, return'd from Constantinople and came to Rome in the Year 985. and having rous'd up those of his Faction, and gain'd the People, got the Upper-hand; he imprison'd Pope John, and shut him up in the Castle St. Angelo, where at the End of four Months he died of Hunger; but Boniface surviv'd him only other four Months, for he died suddenly, and John XV. was exalted to the Pontificate, who made Amatus Metropolitan of Salerno, whom Benedict a little before had made Archbishop.

BUT Crescentius, who in Opposition to Otbo, had assum'd the Title of Consul, and made himself Master of Castle St. Angelo, frighted John, and oblig'd him to retire into Tuscany, and to beg Otbo to come into Italy to re-establish him in his See. The Romans, who knew by Experience how much the Visits of the Emperors us'd to cost them, recall'd John; but nevertheless Crescentius maintain'd his Authority in Rome. Otbo coming into Italy in the Year 996, stay'd some time in Ravenna, and while he was in that City Pope John died. The Romans by the Emperor's Order were forc'd to elect Bruno, his Cousin German, Pope, who took the Name of Gregory V. but Crescentius quickly turn'd him out, and plac'd John Bishop of Placentia in the Chair. This Action was not long unpunish'd, for Otbo came immediately with his Army, and re-establish'd Gregory. John with Crescentius fled to the Castle St. Angelo; but the Emperor besieg'd it, which would have been very hard to take, if Crescentius, who defended it vigorously, had not been treacherously kill'd. The new Pope John was taken, his Eyes put out, his Nose and Ears cut off, and in that Condition carried through the Streets of the City upon an Ass, with his Face to the Tail of the Beast. Such were the Revolutions and Disorders of Rome; neither was there less Sedition in Milan on account of the like Reasons.

BUT the Disorders were greater in these our Provinces, and in Capua more than any where else. In these Times, as we have said, Landenulphus and Aloara his Mother govern'd the Principality of Capua, but this Princess died after she had rul'd eleven Years with her Son, and within less than four Months after, some of his wicked Subjects, in the Year 993, having enter'd into a Conspiracy, impiously murder'd him just as he had come out of the Church of St. Marcellus, and Laidolphus his Brother was elected Prince in his Place; but the Death of that unfortunate Prince did not pass unreveng'd, for Trasmondus Count of Cbieti, his Kinsman, having invited Rinaldus and Oderisius Count of Marfi, to his Assistance, two Months after march'd to Capua, and kept it besieg'd for fifteen Days, laying waste all the Country about¹; and shortly after Otbo III. being apprised of the villainous Assassination of Landenulphus, sent the Marquis Ugo, with Orders not to raise the Siege till the Murderers were deliver'd into their Hands, six of whom were hang'd, and the rest put to Death by different Torments. And afterwards, it having come to the Knowledge of Otbo, that Laidolphus, who had succeeded in the Principality, had had a Hand in the Death of his Brother, he thought it was a very wicked Thing to allow such an impious Man to reign in that Place, therefore in the Year 999. he depriv'd him of the Principality, and banish'd him to the other Side of the Mountains, appointing at the same time, Ademarius a Capuan, Prince, who was the Son of Balsamo, his own Creature, whom he had brought up from a Child, and to whom a little before he had given the Title of Marquis²: So that according to the Prophecy of St. Nilo, he was the last that reign'd in Capua ex Semine Aloaræ. But Ademarius enjoy'd this Promotion but a short time, for on account of his unworthy Behaviour he was quickly turn'd out by the Capuans, and Landulphus of St. Agatha, prefer'd to the Principality, who was the Son of Landulphus Prince of Benevento, and Brother to Pandulphus II. who reign'd in Benevento after he had driven out Landulphus IV. At this very Time there were other Misfortunes which invited the Saracens into this Principality; for these cruel Enemies having over-run and destroy'd Campania, in the Year 1000, assaulted Capua and took it. Of which Otbo being apprised, he immediately went into Italy, defeated the Saracens, and drove them out of Capua and its Confines.

THERE happen'd no less Disorders in the Principality of Salerno, for after Iron-head's Death, his Son Pandulphus, as we have said, was left Prince, having been adopted by Prince Gisulphus I. but he held it only a few Months after his Father's

Father's Death, for being depriv'd of his Assistance, the same Year 981. that his Father died, he soon lost the Principality, into which Manfo Duke of Amalphis intruded himself, who together with John I. his Son, held it two Years ¹. Otho II. immediately the same Year 981, in the Month of December, not being able to bear the Intrusion of Manfo, besieg'd Salerno, in order to drive him out of it, as not being its lawful Prince; but Manfo having found Means afterwards to pacify the Emperor, he prevail'd so much with him, that he allow'd him to keep the Principality.

NEITHER did Otho design to restore Pandulphus, perhaps because he was likewise reputed an unlawful Prince, having succeeded to that Principality by the Adoption of Gisulphus; for the Feudal Law ², which by Degrees had been introduc'd into these Places, prohibited adopted Sons to succeed to the Fiefs of the adoptive Fathers. However that may be, Manfo, according to the Salernitan Chronicle, as we have said, associated John I. his Son in the Principality. But afterwards, in the Year 983, Otho II. dying, the Salernitans, not pleas'd with the Government of Manfo Duke of Amalphis, on account of the continual Enmity and Jarrings which were betwixt the Amalphitans and the Salernitans, quickly drove him out, who had likewise been already turn'd out of the Dukedom of Amalphis, (altho' he afterwards recover'd it, and reign'd for other sixteen Years) and in his Room elected Giovanni di Lamberto, who was nam'd II. to distinguish him from Giovanni I. the Son of Manfo, call'd di Lamberto from his Father's Name, perhaps a-kin to the Dukes of Spoletto, who often made use of the Names of Lamberto and Guido; as this Giovanni call'd his Son Guido, whom he made his Colleague in the Principality. Giovanni II. with Guido, reign'd from the Year 983 to 988 ³; but Guido dying that Year, he associated his other Son, nam'd Guaimarus, with whom he reign'd to the Year 994. The same Year, one Night as Vesuvius began to vomit out Fire, Giovanni was found dead lying by a Whore ⁴: So that the Vulgar were the more confirm'd in their Belief, that when Vesuvius vomited Fire, the Soul of some rich wicked Person was carried to Hell. Guaimarus III. so call'd, because there had been two Princes in Salerno of that Name before, and Ostiensis ⁵ likewise calls him the Elder, to distinguish him from Guaimarus his Son, who succeeded him in the Principality; after the Death of his Father govern'd Salerno to the Year 1018. Afterwards, having associated his said Son Guaimarus IV. he held it to the Year 1031. in which he died. His Wife was Guaidelgrima Daughter of Pandulphus II. Prince of Benevento, and Sister of Pandulphus IV. Prince of Capua, whom Ostiensis therefore calls his Brother-in-Law ⁶.

BENEVENTO was never after seen in so majestick and flourishing a Condition as formerly, for by reason of the Disorders and Tumults which had lately happen'd on account of the turning out of Landulphus IV. the Principality was govern'd by Pandulphus II. who was always jealous of, and quarrelling with the Princes of Capua. However, in order to maintain the Principality in his Posterity, in the Year 987. he had associated his Son Landulphus, who was nam'd V. who afterwards begot a Son likewise nam'd Pandulphus, whom the Grandfather in the Year 1014. associated with himself in the Throne, and reign'd together with his Son and Grandson to the Year 1014, when he died ⁷. Landulphus V. continu'd in the Principality together with his Son Pandulphus III. to the Year 1033. in which he died; this Pandulphus III. likewise in the Year 1038. associated a Son of his nam'd also Landulphus, and therefore was call'd VI. To the Calamities of Benevento was added, that Otho III. hated the Beneventans, because it was said, That they, together with the Romans, deserted Otho his Father in the Battle against the Greeks: So that having return'd from Monte Gargano in a great Rage to Benevento, because of the Hatred he bore the Beneventans, he took from them the Body of St. Paulinus, and carried it to Rome ⁸.

IN the mean time, Otho, to quiet the many Disorders which had continu'd in Rome on account of the Rebellion of Crescentius, not thinking it sufficient to have caus'd this Tyrant to be put to Death, went to Rome in the Year 1001, lest the Romans should endeavour to stir up new Commotions; but not being able to suppress a new Conspiracy that was hatch'd against him, for want of sufficient Forces, he thought it more convenient to leave Rome, and march towards Lombardy. 'Tis said, that at his departing, the Wife of Crescentius, whom the Emperor, in Expectation of the Kingdom, had intic'd to grant him the last Favours, now seeing herself disappointed, all in Tears, gave him a Pair of poison'd Gloves ¹, with which Otho, being insensibly infected, died. Leo Ostiensis ² and Antoninus Archbishop of Florence ³ relate, that he died of Poison prepar'd in a Potion, and not in Gloves; which is more probable, it being repugnant to the Rules of Physick, according to the Observations of Redi, that Poison given in such a manner, could have so much Force and Power as to coagulate or thin the Blood so as to kill a Man. Indeed, Otho was scarcely got to Paterno, not far distant from the City of Castellina, when he was taken ill, and there, before he expir'd, declar'd that he died of Poison: Some will have it that he died in Sutri this same Year 1001, such as the Anonymous Cassinensis; others, to wit Sigonius, follow'd by Baronius, in the Year after, 1002. We have many Laws of this Emperor still extant, likewise collected by Goldastus ⁴; but not having left Male-Issue, and the Race of the Otho's being extinct in him, the Germans were put in a terrible Confusion on account of the new Election, which of necessity behov'd to fall upon a Prince of another Family. This therefore gave a fresh Occasion to our Italians to aim at the Empire and the Kingdom of Italy, which they pretended to, by setting up Ardoino the Son of Dodo Marquis of Eporedia, which renew'd their wonted Confusion.

CHAP. V.

The Institution of the Electors of the Empire, and the Election of Henry Duke of Bavaria.

TIS commonly believ'd that at this Time, the Institution of the Electors of the Empire had its Rise; for 'tis said, that Otho III. despairing of Male-Issue, and foreseeing the terrible Disorders that were like to ensue in Germany on account of the Election of his Successor, resolv'd in his Life-time, with the Advice and Authority of Gregory V. to establish a Method of Election; and that in order to prevent Confusion, he restricted what was the Right of all the Princes of Germany, to only seven Electors; and from thence those we now call the Electors of the Empire had their Rise.

BUT as the Author from whom this College had its Institution is uncertain, so likewise the Time when such a Custom was introduc'd is more uncertain, Writers differing in their Opinions about it. Some ' carry it too far back, and will have Charles the Great to be the Author of it; but all Writers reject this Opinion as repugnant to History; for 'tis manifest that this College was instituted a long time after; and from what has been related in the preceding Books of this History, 'tis very clear, that the Successors of Charles the Great were elected Emperors, not by certain Princes of Germany, but by all the Princes of France, yea rather by the preceding Emperor in his Life-time, or by his last Will; and the Empire, as if it had been Hereditary, continu'd in the Race of Charles the Great, till Lewis III. the last of Charles's Lineage, not leaving Male-Issue, was overcome by Berengarius of Verona, and lost both his Life and the Empire. Whereupon, as we have seen in the foregoing Books, the Empire began to decline; for the Italians and Romans acknowledg'd none others for Kings of Italy and Emperors, but those only, who by Strength of Arms overcame their Enemies; thus Berengarius, Lewis Boson, Hugh of Arles, Lothaire his Son, Rodolphus of Burgundy, and others, by possessing themselves of Italy, set up to be Emperors. On the other hand, the Princes of France and Germany acknowledg'd Conrade King of Germany, who was of the Race of Charles, for Emperor, who being at the Point of Death, as Naclerus relates¹, persuaded these Princes to elect Henry Duke of Saxony for his Successor. But neither Conrade nor Henry had ever the Title of Emperor, until after these Events that Otho the Great was elected (according to Naclerus) ab omni populo Francorum, & Saxonum, who having conquer'd Italy, acquir'd likewise, with the Consent of the People of Rome, the Title and Dignity of Emperor, and was anointed and crown'd by the Pope in Rome. And those who succeeded Otho, such as II. and III. Otho's, as if it had belong'd to them by Hereditary Right, were also elected Emperors by all the Princes of Germany, as we have seen: So that to carry back this Custom to the Time of Charles the Great is a manifest Error.

THIS false Opinion gave Rise to another, that the Origin of this College ought to be dated from the Time of Otho III. who despairing of Male-Issue, and foreseeing the Confusions that were like to happen about the Election of his Successor, with the Advice and Authority of Gregory V. confin'd this Faculty which belong'd to all the Princes of Germany, to seven only.

BUT *Onufrius Panvinius*² likewise rejects this Opinion, and will have it that this College of seven Electors was not instituted till after the Death of Frederick, by Pope Gregory X.; for he says, that a long time after the Death of Otho III. all the Princes of Germany, as formerly, both Bishops, and Laicks, elected the Emperors; and that Henry II. Conrade I. and II. Henry IV. and V. Lothaire II. Frederick I. and Philip I. were thus elected. But this Opinion is as false as the other, seeing that long before Gregory X. these seven Electors are mention'd by ancient Writers: Martinus Polonus, who wrote under Innocent IV. Leo Ostiensis, who flourish'd under Urban II. and the Council of Lyons which was held under the same Innocent IV. mention them. Whereupon Baronius, in order to avoid falling into the Error of Onufrius, stumbles upon another, and says, that the College of Electors was first instituted by Innocent IV. in the Council of Lyons, and not by Gregory X. but that Opinion is likewise found to be erroneous by what is said of Gregory X.; for the Writers who flourish'd before the Council of Lyons, or about that Time, speak of this College as a Thing very ancient. The Author of the Book De Regimine Principum (unjustly attributed to St. Thomas, so that our *Cujacius*³ wrongfully loads this Saint with Reproaches, believing him to be the Author of it, and says, that he rav'd through the whole Book) flourish'd before the Council of Lyons. Ostiensis, who wrote his Chronicle before this Council, and Augustinus Triumphus, who soon after wrote concerning the Institution of the seven Electors, carry it back to the Time of Gregory V. and mention it as a Thing of great Antiquity; whence 'tis very unlikely that it had its Rise in the Time of the Council of Lyons. Besides, the seven Electors mention'd in that Council, differ both from the present and the ancient. Martinus Polonus says, that to his Time they consisted of the three Chancellors, to wit, the Archbishop of Mentz, Chancellor of Germany, the Archbishop of Triers, Chancellor of France, and the Archbishop of Cologne, Chancellor of Italy; and four other Princes likewise Officers of the Empire, to wit, the Marquis of Brandenburg Great Chamberlain, the Elector Palatine Butler, the Duke of Saxony Sword-bearer, and the King of Bohemia Cup-bearer. For those mention'd in the Council of Lyons were different Persons, to wit, the Dukes of Austria, Bavaria, Saxony, and Brabant; the Bishops were those of Cologne, Mentz, and Saltzburg.

IN so great a variety of Opinions it seems more probable, that the Institution of the College of Electors was in the Time of Otho III. but that the Custom and Practice of having only seven Electors present at Elections, was later⁴; for grave

Authors relate, that Otbo having no hopes of Male-Issue, and to avoid Confusion in the Election of his Successor, consulted Gregory V. about the Method that was proper to be observed in the Election of the Emperors, to which likewise the Consent of the Princes of Germany was requisite, to whom such Election belong'd; and 'tis probable, that for Peace sake, and to shun Confusion and Factions, some yielded their Privilege, by restricting the Number of the Electors to seven: Altho' it be not recorded in History that such a Practice took Place so soon; for many Princes not being willing to part with this their Prerogative, would likewise be present at the Elections. So we read, that Henry the Successor of Otbo, was not elected by the seven Electors, but, according to Naucerus, by the Princes of Germany; and we have also other the like Instances of many Princes and Prelates of Germany being present, so that among the Letters of Gregory VII. we have one of that Pope directed to all the Bishops, Dukes, and Courts of Germany, for electing a new King in case Henry should not recover his Health. Thus those who say that the College of seven Electors was instituted under Otbo III. and those who will have it to be begun no sooner than Gregory X. or Innocent IV. will be easily reconcil'd; for these mean the Use and Practice, and those the Institution only.

BY which we see, that the Reasonings of Bellarmino and his Followers are as vain, and to as little purpose on this Subject, as on that other, concerning the Translation of the Empire to the French, in the Person of Charles the Great, or to the Germans in that of Otbo, in attributing this Institution to the Authority of the Pope; for neither the Pope nor the Emperor himself could restrict this Faculty to seven only, and deprive the rest of the Princes of Germany, who were to be Losers by it, of their Privileges, without their Consent; and as they could not do it, so in Fact it was not done; and Writers testify, that this Prerogative was confin'd to seven by the Consent of the other Princes. The ancient Chronicle, of which some will have Albertus Stadenfis to be the Author, in the Year 1240. bears, that with the Consent of the Princes, the Bishops of Triers and Mentz elect the Emperor; and *Augustinus Triumphus*¹ relates, that in the Time of Otbo, Gregory V. having summon'd, and ask'd the Consent of the Princes of Germany, instituted the seven Electors. *Leopold*² likewise reports, that in the Time of Otbo III. who had no Sons, it was ordain'd, that the Election of the Emperor should be made by certain Princes of Germany, Officers of the Empire, or of the Imperial Court: But none gives us a more exact Account of this Institution than *Naucerus*³, who says, that Otbo III. having no Male-Issue, with the Advice of the Princes of Germany, establish'd, that upon the Death of the Emperor, the Election should be made in Frankfort, appointing for Electors the three Archbishops, and the four Officers of the Empire abovemention'd; whence it was afterwards introduc'd, that the Election of the Emperor, who was not so call'd, but only Cæsar, or King of the Romans, until he had been crown'd by the Pope in Rome, should solely belong to these Electors. Thus the Emperor Otbo, out of many Princes, pitch'd upon seven Officers of the Empire for Electors, perhaps by the Advice of the Pope, but chiefly with the Consent of the Princes who gave up their Right; and Pope Gregory V. approv'd of the Establishment made with the Consent of the Princes: So that such an Institution ought to be attributed to the Emperor, or rather to the Princes of Germany themselves, than to the Pope, as Cardinal *Cusanus*⁴ observed. And tho' the Practice was not so early as the Establishment, nevertheless afterwards in process of Time, the Princes of Germany, preferring the Good of the Publick to their private Interests, dispens'd with their Privileges, and confin'd the Number of Electors to seven only, who obtain'd such Authority, not from the Pope nor the Emperor, but from the common Consent of all those, to whom such Election formerly belong'd; and the Imperial Authority depends altogether on their Election, and on none other; and if it was the Custom to take the Golden Crown in Rome from the Pope, that was only reputed a Solemnity and Ceremony, and was nothing but what was common with him to other Bishops, who anointed and crown'd their own Princes, as was done in the Kingdoms of Italy, France, Spain, and others: So that the Emperor Maximilian, as Guicciardin relates⁵, in a Speech which he made to the Electors before he went to Italy, protested, and plainly declar'd to them, that he had resolv'd to go to Italy to receive the Imperial Crown with Solemnity (which he knew to be rather Ceremonial than Substantial) because, said he, the Imperial Dignity and Authority depend intirely on your Election.

THE Institution then of this Electoral College, though it had its Rise from the Time of Otho III. yet it was not observ'd in the Election of Henry Duke of Bavaria, who succeeded him; for this Prince, according to the wonted Manner, was made King of Germany by the Princes and Prelates thereof. In the mean time, our Italians perceiving that Otho had left no Sons, conspir'd anew to get the Empire and Kingdom of Italy into their own Hands. In effect, Ardoinus was proclaim'd King of Italy in Pavia, and tho' it was disputed with him by Henry, yet he possess'd it very near two Years. The Archbishop of Milan looking upon this Election of Ardoinus, without his Authority, as an Affront, mov'd Henry to drive him from the Throne. Not only the Pope, but the Archbishops of Milan likewise, pretended that the Election of the Kings of Italy belong'd to them; for they look'd on the Ceremony of their crowning and anointing Kings, which at first was practis'd to render the Action more Solemn, to be a Matter of Right necessarily belonging to them, and claim'd it, as if the Election had absolutely depended on them. A Warning (as there are an infinite Number of such to be observ'd in the Course of this History) both to People and Princes to be upon their Guard against Priests meddling in their Affairs, or any thing that belongs to them; for what at first they get by way of Court'sy, or out of Respect to their Dignity, they afterwards claim as their Due; and then, with the utmost Ingratitude, deny that they owe it to them; but attribute it to their own Authority and Character. Thus Arnulphus Archbishop of Milan (if we may credit Sigonius) held a Council of his Bishops, and depos'd Ardoinus, and confer'd the Kingdom of Italy upon Henry: So that the Popes were grievously offended at this Fact, with regard to Depositions, which they boast to be solely in their Power, with respect to Kingdoms and Empires, though at this Time even the Archbishops of Milan pretended to depose the Kings of Italy. In the mean time Henry, upon Arnulphus's Invitation, sent Duke Otho into Italy to drive out Ardoinus, and the War was carried on with doubtful Success; but Arnulphus perceiving, that Ardoinus, who had laid Waste all the Milanesse, could not so easily be driven out of Italy, wrought so by his Legates, that Henry came to Italy himself with a powerful Army, took Verona, where Ardoinus had fortified himself, and confin'd him to Pavia, to which he laid close Siege, made himself Master of it, and after having pillag'd it, he set Fire to it and reduc'd it to Ashes¹; afterwards he went to Milan, and was immediately crown'd King of Italy by the Archbishop; whereupon, many of our Italians deserted Ardoinus, and sided with the Archbishop and Henry.

NOW, that Henry had vanquish'd and ruin'd his Rival, he went this Year 1013 to Roncaglia, where, following the Example of his Predecessors, he held a Dyet, in which he made many Laws, as King of Italy, for he had not as yet assum'd the Title of Emperor. There were present in the Dyet, according to Custom, many Princes, Marquisses, Counts, Judges, and likewise many of the Ecclesiastical State, both Archbishops and Bishops. It was at this time, that this Prince enacted those Laws which we have in the first and second Books of the Longobard Laws², and by the antient Compiler of these Books, they were added to the others, made by Henry as King of Italy. Sigonius mentions other of his Laws³, and many more were collected by *Godalstus*⁴.

HENRY went shortly after to Ravenna, from whence he sent Ambassadors to Rome to Pope Benedict VIII. by whom he signified to him, that he was ready to come to Rome, in order to take the Imperial Ensigns and Crown⁵: He immediately set out for that City, where being kindly received by the Pope and the Romans, according to Custom, with the usual Ceremonies and Solemnity, he was crown'd with the Imperial Crown by the Pope, and proclaim'd Augustus by the People; from whence, after having confirm'd the Privileges granted by his Predecessors to the Church of Rome, he quickly return'd to Germany, whither he had been recall'd. Thus the Empire and Kingdom of Italy went from the Race of the Otho's to the House of Bavaria, in the Person of Henry II.; and Ardoinus, who held the Kingdom of Italy almost Two Years, having given over all Hopes of being restor'd, became Monk in a Monastery near Turin.

BUT while Henry reign'd in the West, and Basilus in the East, there happen'd Events in these our Provinces, so prodigious and great, as at last terminated in the Dominion of a new People, who, from most slender Beginnings, by the means of their gallant Actions, were able to unite these our Provinces, formerly divided into so many Parts, and subject to so many Princes, under one Head, and who at last digested them into the Form of a well-founded and fix'd Kingdom. These were the courageous and valiant Normans, whose Origine and famous Exploits shall be the ample and shining Subject of the following Books of this History.

CHAP. VI.

The Ecclesiastical Polity of these our Provinces, during all the Tenth Century, to the coming of the Normans.

THE Ecclesiastical Polity, which was introduc'd among us in these Times, began to have some Resemblance to the present, with regard to the Promotion of Bishops, to be Metropolitans. The Popes giving the Pallium, claim'd by this new Pretence, a Power over the Bishops to oblige them to go to Rome to receive it, when he advanc'd them to Metropolitans. From whence comes the Origine of the Claim, that the Causes of their Diocesses, either in Case of Appeal, or Negligence in deciding them, ought to be brought to Rome: And in fine, they pretended to inspect into all their Affairs; for which Cause they made many new Metropolitans and Bishops. They were supported in this by the Otho's, Emperors of the West, and especially Otho I. who, to oppose the Ambition of the Patriarchs of Constantinople, defended them, and also extended their Authority over some of those States that belong'd to the Greek Empire. Otho I. had good Reason to support them; for there was never any Emperor so much favour'd by the Popes as he was. Although the Synod held in Rome by Adrian be disputed, wherein 'tis said, the Power of electing the Pope was given to Charles the Great; yet without all Controversy, Leo VIII. in a general Council held in the Lateran, granted to Otho the Great, and to all the German Emperors his Successors for ever, not only the Kingdom of Italy and the Roman Patriciate, and by an indissoluble Knot, united the Empire of the West to the Kingdom of Germany, whence Otho and his Successors were afterwards Sovereigns of Rome; but likewise Power of disposing of the Holy See, and of electing the Pope at his own Will and Pleasure. Besides, he confirm'd to him the Right of Investiture, which Adrian had granted to Charles the Great, by giving him Power, with the Ring and Staff, to invest the Archbishops and Bishops in their Churches. We have a full Account of this Council held in Rome from *Luitprandus,

* Luitprand. lib. 6. cap. 21.

Ivo Carnutenfis ¹, from whom Gratian took it ², and likewise inserted it in his Decree; and Theodorick of Nismes, from an antient Florentine Code, likewise inserted it in his Treatise of the Rights and Privileges of the Empire ³.

THUS by their mutually favouring one another, the antient Discipline came to be much more corrupted, and the antient Disposition of the Churches to be chang'd. The Popes therefore ordain'd many Bishops, and erected many Metropolis's; but the Advancement of these was according to the Disposition of the Cities of the Empire, by always adapting the Ecclesiastical Polity to the Temporal; which exactly was the Case of these our Provinces.

The Principality of CAPUA.

BENEVENTO and Salerno had formerly been the most conspicuous Cities in these our Provinces, subject to the Longobards; but at this Time Capua outshin'd all the rest. Therefore (laying aside what the Patriarchs of Constantinople did in the Cities subject to the Greek Empire) the first City of our Kingdom that was advanc'd to be a Metropolis by the Popes, was Capua. The Emperor Lewis, in the Year 873, had a mind to make Capua a Metropolis; but as Erchempertus relates ⁴; being diverted by other Affairs, his Design did not take Effect. But John XIII. being cruelly persecuted by the principal Roman Lords, who drove him out of Rome, coming to Capua, was kindly receiv'd by Prince Pandulphus; the Pope out of Gratitude for this Favour, in the Year 968, rais'd Capua to a Metropolis, and consecrated John, the Brother of this Prince, Archbishop ⁵. He had for Suffragans the Bishops of Atina, which Bishoprick was suppress'd in the Time of Pope Eugene III. that of Isernia, which formerly had been united to the Churches of Venafro and Bojano, that of Sessa, which afterwards was disjoyn'd from this Metropolis, and put under the immediate Subjection of the Pope; and in process of Time, Bishops still multiplying in this Principality, he also had for Suffragans, the Bishops of Cajazza, Carniola, Calvi, Caserta, Teano and Venafro. The Bishops of Aquino, Fondi, Gaeta and Sora, were likewise his Suffragans, but these being afterwards withdrawn from the Church of Capua, were subjected to the Apostolick See immediately.

The Principality of BENEVENTO:

THE Principality of Benevento did no less deserve this Honour than that of Capua; its being of greater Extent than all the other Principalities and Dukedoms requir'd it more. Therefore the Archbishop of Benevento had likewise more suffragan Bishops than all the Metropolitans of our Kingdom. Benevento was also in the Year after 969, by the same Pope John XIII. advanc'd to be a Metropolis; and as it was the Head of so large a Principality, so the Polity of the Church keeping pace with that of the Empire, the Bishop of Benevento became the Head of all the Churches of the Principality. Out of respect to the Emperor Otho, and Prince Pandulphus, Landulphus was appointed Archbishop of Benevento, to whom Pope John gave the Pallium, and Title of Metropolitan ⁶. What is particularly observ'd in this Church is, that the Bishop of Benevento, before he was advanc'd to the Rank of Metropolitan, had Siponto, and many other Cathedral Churches subject to him. He was the most favour'd, both by the Popes and the Emperors, and had many Prerogatives and Privileges from his own Princes. He was once honour'd with those two signal Prerogatives, which now are reserv'd to the Pope alone, to wit, to wear a round Mitre, in the fashion of the antient Pontifical * Tiara, with one single Crown, embellish'd with Gold; and while he was visiting his Province, to carry along with him the venerable Sacrament of the Altar; and he as yet retains, after the Manner of the Popes, the Custom of signing his Bulls with a leaden Seal. The Archbishop of Benevento had once the Temporal Lordship of the City of Varano, with many other Towns and Castles, and exercis'd Jurisdiction in many Places; and as yet his Vicars are Judges Ordinary, in Matters of Appeal in Civil Causes, betwixt Laicks; and they retain to this Day, both the pure and mix'd Jurisdiction over the Villages of St. Angelo and Motta, as Ughellus relates¹.

THE Extent of his Principality, likewise of course made the Number of suffragan Bishops to be greater than that of all the other Metropolitans in these Provinces. They once came to the Number of Thirty-two, till some of them were rais'd to be Metropolitans, such as that of Siponto; or were immediately subjected to the Apostolick See; and others, their Cities being destroy'd, were suppress'd. Hitherto he had for Suffragans, the Bishops of St. Agatha de Goti, Avellino, Arriano, Ascoli, Bovino, Volturara, Larino, Telesse, Alife and Siponto. The Popes afterwards having made more Bishops in the Kingdom, and rais'd many Churches to be Cathedrals, the Number of Suffragans increas'd: So that now, by a new Distribution, the Kingdom being divided into many Provinces, we see that this Metropolitan has suffragan Bishops, not only in the Principato ultra, but also in other Provinces. In the County of Molise, he has the Bishops of Bojano, and Gardia Alfiera. In the Principato citra he has Five, the Bishops of Avellino, Arriano, Trivico, Volturara and Monte Marano: In Terra di Lavoro he has Three, to wit, that of St. Agatha de Goti, Alife and Telesse: In the Capitanata Six, to wit, Ascoli, Bovino, Larino, St. Severo, Termoli and Lucera. The Bishopricks of Draconaria, Cividade, Firenzuela, Frigento, Lefina, Montecorvino and Turtiboli, which were Suffragans to the Archbishop of Benevento, by reason of the Desolation of their Cities are now extinct, and the Revenues united to other Cathedral Churches; and those of Lefina to the Magnificent Hospital of the Annuntiation in Naples.

HE had likewise in this Province, when Siponto and Monte Gargano were comprehended in the Principality of Benevento, the Sipontine and Garganican Churches, that had been assign'd to the Bishop of Benevento, from the Time of St. Barbatus by Duke Romualdus, with the Consent of Pope Vitalianus, who, in the Year 668, confirm'd the Sipontine Church to Barbatus and his Successors; and the Beneventan Bishops were likewise call'd Bishops of Siponto for near Four hundred Years; so that Landulphus, who was the first Archbishop of Benevento, had also the Title of Bishop of Siponto; but when this Province was afterwards taken from the Greeks by the Longobards, and fell under the Dominion of the Normans, they were disjoyn'd from Benevento and Siponto, and the antient Bishop's See was advanc'd to a Metropolis. The Sipontine Church from the earliest Times, had its own Bishops; and in the Acts of the Roman Council held in the Year 465, under Pope Hilarius, we read the Subscription of Felix Bishop of Siponto. We find another Felix, likewise Bishop of this City, in the Time of Gregory the Great, to whom we see many Letters of this Pope directed; and in the Decree of *Gratian*², there's mention made of Vitalianus Bishop of Siponto, to whom St. Gregory likewise directs his Letters. Afterwards, on account of the cruel Wars betwixt the Beneventan Longobards, and the Neapolitan Greeks, being reduc'd to a lamentable Condition, it was, as we have said, united to that of Benevento; from which it was not disjoyn'd till the Time of Benedict IX. who, in the Year 1034, separated it from Benevento, and honour'd it with the Archiepiscopal Dignity, and from that Time we frequently find the Names of the Sipontine Archbishops in the Decretals³. Paschal II. gave it afterwards the Bishop of Vesti for Suffragan, which it keeps to this Day.

THESE Archbishops retain the Title of Sipontine, though Siponto be now destroy'd, and another City built upon its Ruins by Manfred, from his own Name, call'd Manfredonia. The Popes, both out of regard to Antiquity, and the Hatred they bear to the Name of Manfred, have made it retain its antient Name. The Prebends and Garganican Citizens likewise pretended, that the Sipontine Archbishops, either on account of the Pleasantness of the Place, or because of Wars, having frequently resided in Gargano, ought to be call'd not only Sipontine, but also Garganican, and that their Church, as well as that of Siponto, ought to enjoy the same Honours and Prerogatives; they also quote for it, a Bull of Pope Eugene III. and they commenc'd a Suit upon it in Rome, which lasted many Ages. But Alexander III.

gave it against them; for having examin'd Eugenius's Bull, it was found to be raz'd and vitiated in that Part, on which they laid their Strefs. The Successors of Alexander, to wit, Lucius, Celestine, Innocent III. and all the other Popes, have confirm'd his Sentence: So that the Sipontine Church alone retains the Honour of Metropolis, to which the Garganican are subject.

THERE are some who believe, that when Benedict IX. advanc'd Siponto to a Metropolis, he likewise gave it four Suffragans, to wit, the Bishops of Troja, Melphis, Monopolis, and Rapolla; but, as Ughellus well proves, these either never, or but for a short time acknowledg'd the Archbishop of Siponto for their Metropolitan; for in the Lateran Council which was celebrated in the Year 1179, under Alexander III. the Bishops of Melphis and Monopolis subscrib'd with the other Bishops that were immediately subject to the Apostolick See; and those of Troja and Rapolla were not present; and in the old Roman Provincial, written more than Five hundred Years ago, these two are said to belong to the Province of Rome, and of late that of Rapolla became extinct, and was given to the Bishop of Melphis.

WE do not find at this Time that the Bishop of Benevento had Suffragans in the two Apruzzi, which were formerly comprehended in the Principality of Benevento; for the Bishopricks of this Province, as being near to Rome, were immediately under the Apostolick See. Aquila built by the Emperor Frederick II. upon the Ruins of Amiterno, of whose Bishop there's frequent mention made in the Letters of St. Gregory the Great, was made an Episcopal See by Alexander IV. who with the Consent of Bernard Bishop of Forco, about the Year 1257 translated the See to Aquila, and having fix'd it in the Church of SS. Maximus and George, ordain'd that he should be no more call'd Bishop of Forco, but of Aquila, as appears by the Bull made for that purpose, recorded by Bzovius in the Ecclesiastick Annals, of which there is an authentick Copy on Parchment preserv'd in the Archives of the Convent of St. Dominicus in Naples, which was extracted at the earnest Desire of the Vicar of Paul its Bishop in the Year 1363. And this Church is Suffragan to no Metropolitan, but immediately under that of Rome. Chieti likewise had its own Bishop immediately subordinate to the Pope, and was not till of late made a Metropolis by Clement VII. in the Year 1527, to which the Bishops of Penna, Adria, and Lanciano were made Suffragans; but these also withdrew afterwards, and subjected themselves immediately to Rome; and Lanciano was thereafter rais'd to a Metropolis, but without getting any Suffragan, retain'd only the Pre-eminency and Title of Archbishop; and at present the Bishop of Ortona remains the only Suffragan to the Metropolitan of Chieti.

The Principality of SALERNO.

THE Principality of Salerno likewise in this tenth Century deserv'd to have its own Metropolitan, as well as those of Capua and Benevento; therefore John Prince of Salerno, desir'd Pope Benedict VII. to raise this City to a Metropolis, which he did in the Year 974, and appointed Amatus Archbishop of it; this Prerogative was afterwards confirm'd to it by Pope John XV. So that the Index join'd to the History of the Kingdom of Italy by Sigonius, which makes the Institution of this Archbishoprick to have been by Sergius IV. in the Year 1009, contains a manifest Error. He had at first many Suffragan Bishops, among which were those of Cosenza, Bisignano, and Acerenza. But according to the Disposition of the Sees subject to that of Constantinople, related in the sixth Book of this History, the Bishops of Cosenza and Bisignano were by the Emperor Leo made Suffragans to the Metropolitan of Reggio; and the Bishop of Acerenza to the Metropolitan of St. Severina; but they were afterwards restor'd to the Sec of Rome, and adjudg'd to the Metropolitan of Salerno. The Bishop of Consa was likewise his Suffragan, as also those of Pesto, Melphis, Cava, Lavello, and Nola; but that of Pesto was afterwards join'd to Capaccio; those of Melphis, Lavello, and Bisagnano withdrew from him, and put themselves immediately under the Apostolick See, and Nola was made Suffragan to the Archbishop of Naples. The Monastery of the Cave was erected at this Time, whose first Abbot was Alferius, and afterwards rais'd to the highest Dignities, was erected into a Cathedral by *Boniface IX.*²; and in the Year 1091. its Abbot Peter was honour'd with the Mitre by Urban II. But Leo X. gave this Monastery a particular

Bishop,

Bishop, who was immediately under the Apostolick See. The Bishops of Consa, Acerenza, and Cosenza, were afterwards advanc'd to Metropolitans.

BY whom, and at what Time the Bishop of Consa was exalted to a Metropolitan is very uncertain: Ughellus by a strong Conjecture¹, believes that it was by Alexander II. or Gregory VII. his Successor; for we see, that in the Year 1051, under the Pontificate of Leo IX. the Bishop of Consa was still Suffragan to the Archbishop of Salerno; and the first we find nam'd Archbishop of Consa, was Leo, who liv'd under the Pontificate of Gregory VII.; and from this Leo afterwards, without Interruption, we see all the rest nam'd Archbishops. The Bishops that from time to time were made in the neighbouring Places were given them for Suffragans; viz. the Bishops of St. Angelo de Longobardi, Bisaccia, Lacedogna, Montemurro, Muro, and Satriano; but this last was put under the Metropolitan of Salerno. As for that of Belfenfe, which is mention'd in the Roman Provincial, as subject to the Metropolitan of Consa, we have no Vestige of it at present.

THE Bishop of Acerenza, who formerly, according to the Novella of Leo, was Suffragan to the Metropolitan of St. Severina, when subject to the Patriarch of Constantinople, being restor'd to the Patriarch of Rome, acknowledg'd the Archbishop of Salerno for Metropolitan; and we read that from the Year 993. to 1051. he had been his Suffragan. He was afterwards exalted to be a Metropolitan by Nicholas II.; for what some have written, as if this Dignity had been conferr'd upon him by Benedict V. is without Foundation. Alexander II. who succeeded Nicholas, confirm'd the Prerogative of Metropolitan to Archbishop Arnulphus, in the Year 1067, and gave him the Pallium; and he had for Suffragans the Churches of Venosa, Montemilone, Potenza, Tulba, Tricarico, Montepeloso, Gravina, Oblano, Turri, Turfi, Latiniano, St. Quirico, and Virolo, with their Castles, Villages, Monasteries, and People: So that the Title of Archbishop of Acerenza began to be conspicuous; and there are many Occasions of making mention of it in our Decretals². But in process of Time, Acerenza being ruin'd by the continual Wars of its Inhabitants, the Archbishop was forc'd to get the Church of Matera annex'd to his own, which having been erected into a Cathedral by Immoent II. was for ever annex'd to that of Acerenza, on this Condition, that the Archbishop of Acerenza, for the greater Dignity of the Church of Matera, should likewise call himself Archbishop of Matera; and that when he resided in Acerenza, the Title of Acerenza should be put before that of Matera; and when he resided in Matera the contrary was to be practis'd. This Union did not last long, for Eugenius IV. in order to remove the Discords betwixt the Chapters and Citizens of the two Cities, divided them, and assign'd Matera its own Bishop. They were afterwards united; but new Quarrels having arisen under the Pontificate of Leo X. at last in that of Clement VIII. it was decided in Favour of Acerenza by the Rota of Rome, preserving to it its ancient Rights and Pre-eminences. But this City falling into the utmost Decay, lost its ancient Splendor; and on the contrary, according to the Vicissitude of worldly Things, Matera having grown larger, and more numerous in Inhabitants, the See of the Archbishops of Acerenza behov'd to be translated to Matera, where they reside at present; and they have still five Suffragan Bishops, to wit, those of Anglona, translated in the Year 1546. by Paul III. on account of its Desolation, to Turfi, Gravina, Tricarico, and Venosa.

THE Bishop of Cosenza formerly Suffragan to the Metropolitan of Reggio, and subject to the See of Constantinople, when Cosenza was afterwards taken from the Greeks, and restor'd by the Normans to that of Rome, was Suffragan to the Archbishop of Salerno; but in what Year, and by what Pope it was disjoin'd, and exalted to be a Metropolis, is very uncertain³. 'Tis commonly believ'd that it was honour'd with this Dignity in the Beginning of the eleventh Century; for in the Year 1056, in the Chronicle of Lupus Protospata there's mention made of a certain Peter Archbishop of Cosenza; and others think that this Change was made under the Pontificate of Gregory IX. or a little before. Altho' he enjoys large Revenues, yet he has but one single Suffragan, which is the Bishop of Martorano, all the other Bishops in the Neighbourhood being exempted, and immediately subject to the See of Rome.

BUT none of all the Metropolitans of these our Provinces can boast of the Dignity of Primate, excepting the Archbishop of Salerno, who was declar'd Primate of all Lucania by Urban II.: So that tho' the Bishops of Consa, Acerenza, and Cosenza, who were his Suffragans, have been since rais'd to be Metropolitans, yet Urban II. by his Bull made in Salerno, in the Year 1099, appointed him Primate over them and all their Suffragans. Ferdinandus Ughellus transcribes the Bull, part of which is likewise recorded by Baronius, whereby the Pre-eminence of Primate over the Archbishops of Acerenza and Consa, and over all the Suffragans, who were oblig'd to promise to yield him all Obedience, was granted to Alphannus Archbishop of Salerno, and his Successors; the Bull likewise prescribes the Method of their Election; that they were to be elected in their Metropolis's, in Presence, and with the Advice and Consent of the Legate of the Apostolick See, and of the Archbishop Primate; and being elected, they were to be sent to Rome with their Patents, in order to be consecrated, and to receive the Pallium, and afterwards to swear Obedience to the Archbishop of Salerno, as their Primate. But in process of Time these Prerogatives have been diffus'd, and now the Archbishop of Salerno exercises his Right of Metropolitan only over the Suffragan Bishops that have remain'd to him, which are the Bishops of Acerno, Campania, Capaccio, Marsicc, Novo, Nocera de Pagani, Nusco, Policastro, Satriano, and Sarno.

S E C T. I.

The Disposition of the Churches subject to the Greek Empire, which were restor'd afterwards by the Normans to the Roman See.

P U G L I A.

AT this Time we see the principal Seat of the Greek Magistrate fix'd in Bari, from whence he govern'd both Puglia and Calabria; wherefore it is by Writers call'd the Head of all the Cities of Puglia, and had the first Rank in this Province. Its Bishop therefore was exalted above all the other Bishops of Puglia; to this was added the Favour of the Patriarchs of Constantinople, who having appropriated him to themselves, and subjected him to the See of Constantinople, endow'd him with many Privileges and Prerogatives. But what he most valu'd himself for, was the Translation hither of the miraculous Bones of St. Nicholas Bishop of Mira; which sacred Relicks, some Baresians trading in the Levant, and returning from Antioch by Sea, and landing in the Washes of Lycia, wrapp'd up, and brought from thence to Bari in the Year 1087. Thus Bari now vies with Benevento and Salerno; for if they were proud of having the Bodies of two Holy Apostles, Bari brags of having that of St. Nicholas; and with so much the more Reason, as that those keep the Bones of their Apostles sapless and dry, but Bari has her Saint's Bones swimming in precious Liquor; of which we have an illustrious Testimony, to wit, that of the Emperor Emanuel Comnenus, who declares it in one of his *Novellæ*¹. The Church of Bari had her ancient Bishops: There's mention made of Gervasius, who in the Year 347 was present in the Council of Sardica; of Concordius, who subscrib'd in the Roman Council under Pope Hilarius, in the Year 465, and others who were only simple Bishops. Antonius Beatillus in his History of Bari will have it, that Peter Bishop of Bari was advanc'd to the Title and Authority of Archbishop and Metropolitan in the Year 530, by Eugenius Patriarch of Constantinople, in the Pontificate of Felix IV.; it being manifest from the Greek Bulls, which are as yet preserv'd in the Cathedral of Bari, that the Patriarchs of Constantinople confirm'd the Elected, and dispatch'd the Bulls; but tho' it be true, that Bari when it was under the Greek Empire likewise belong'd to the Constantinopolitan See, as we read in Balsamo in the Account which he gives of the Bishopricks subject to that Patriarchate, among others, he reckons Bari XXXI, Trani XLIV, Otranto LXVI, and the rest of Calabria XXXVIII. Nevertheless this ought not to be carried so far back as the Year 530, when these Provinces were govern'd by the Goths, and when the Greeks had no Concern either in their Political and Temporal, or Ecclesiastick and Spiritual

Matters; all our Churches being then govern'd by the Roman Pontiff; neither had the Ambition of the Patriarchs of Constantinople extended itself so far in those Times, as to have encroach'd upon these our Provinces, as it did afterwards in the Time of Leo Isauricus, and more under the Emperors Leo Armenus, and Leo Philosophus, who are said to be the Authors of the Disposition of the Churches subject to the See of Constantinople: So that 'tis to be believ'd, that the Bishops of Bari being first honour'd, according to the Greek Vanity, with the Title of Archbishops, were afterwards made Metropolitans by the Patriarchs of Constantinople, who assign'd them twelve Suffragan Bishops, long after that Reggio, St. Severina, and Otranto were under the Constantinopolitan See, when Bari being retaken from the Longobards and Saracens, at last came under the Dominion of the Greeks.

THE City of Canosa, when it was in its flourishing State, vied with Bari with regard to its Bishops; for it likewise had its ancient Bishops, of whom Beatillus made a long List, beginning from the Year 347, down to the Year 800, in which he says, that Peter, a Longobard, and Kinsman of Grimoaldus Prince of Benevento, was elected Bishop of Canosa, whom he takes to have been the last; for he adds, that his See was afterwards in the Year 818 advanc'd to be a Metropolis, so that he was the last Bishop, and the first Archbishop of Canosa; and it could not be said that he had been rais'd to this Rank by the Pope, which would make it to be an elder Archbishoprick than Capua, which all our most exact Writers allow to be the most ancient; whence we must believe, that the Bishop of Canosa was at that Time made Archbishop by the Patriarch of Constantinople, and not by the Pope. However that may be, Canosa being afterwards ruin'd by the Saracens, these two Archbishopricks were united into one, and the Church of Canosa was annex'd to that of Bari; and Angelarius, who succeeded Peter, was the first, that in the Year 845 call'd himself Archbishop of Bari and Canosa, which all his Successors have done since. These Churches being afterwards taken from the Constantinopolitan See, and by the Normans restor'd to the Roman, the Popes allowing them the same Dignity, began to dispose of them as their own, by giving the Archbishops of Bari the Use of the Pallium, which they had not formerly; and Gregory VII, at the Desire of Duke Robert, in the Year 1078, created Ursus a Creature of that Prince Archbishop of Bari, and afterwards in the Year 1089, Urban II. having gone from Melfbis, where he held a Council, to Bari, at the Desire of Duke Roger and Boemondus his Brother, granted and confirm'd to Elias then Archbishop of Bari, his good Friend, having been Monks together in the Monastery of the Trinity of Cava, and to his Successors, the Diocesses of Trani, Bitetto, Bitonto, Giovenazzo, Molfetta, Ruvo, Andria, Cannò, Minervino, Lavello, Rapolla, Melfbis, Salpi, Conversano, Polignano, and beyond Sea, Cattaro, Mondugno, Aquatetta, Montemiloro, Bisepi, Cisterna, with all the other Churches of the Cities and Towns belonging to these Diocesses for his Suffragans, for which he made a Bull, which we read in Ughellus, and it is also recorded by Beatillus.

BUT many of these Suffragans assign'd to Bari, in process of Time were taken from it, some being put immediately under the Roman See, others suppress'd, and others given to Trani, which was afterwards rais'd to be a Metropolis. The Archbishop of Trani is the most ancient of the Modern, for we read many Letters of Innocent IV. directed to him; but his Institution must not be carried so far back as the Pontificate of Urban II. in which he was but a simple Bishop. So that Beatillus is mistaken, when he infers from this Bull of Urban, that because Trani was reckon'd amongst the other Churches assign'd as Suffragans to the Archbishop of Bari, therefore he had likewise created him Primate of Puglia, just so as the same Urban created the Archbishop of Salerno Primate of Lucania, and as he had rais'd the Archbishops of Toledo and Tarragona in Spain, to the Rank and Dignity of Primates; for in the Pontificate of Urban II. it had not as yet been made a Metropolis, which Honour it had about the Time of Innocent III. or a little before, and afterwards the City of Barletta, which is subject to the Archbishoprick of Trani, and not to that of Nazareno; Corato and Castello della Trinita were assign'd to it. The Church of Salpi was afterwards united to this Metropolis, which for a long Time had its own Bishops, but in the Year 1547. it was re-united to that of Trani, as it continues to this Day. It has now the Bishops of Andria and Bisceglia for Suffragans; as for the Bishop of Monopolis, he is immediately under the See of Rome.

T H E R E were taken also from the Metropolitan of Bari, the Bishop of Melpbis, who was subjected to the Pope immediately, and the Bishop of Canne, who being taken from this See, was assign'd to the Archbishop of Nazareth. He has still remaining the Bishops of Bitetto, Bitonto, Conversano, Giovanezzo, Lavello, Minervino, Polignano, and Ruvo for Suffragans; and, which is strange, he has likewise for Suffragan the Bishop of Cattaro, a City of Dalmatia, subject to the Venetians, and formerly Suffragan to the Archbishoprick of Ragusa, afterwards to that of Antivari, and lastly to that of Bari *. But however, tho' the Bishop be his Suffragan, yet a great Part of the Diocess is now possess'd by the Turks, and the remaining Part retains as yet the Greek Schismatical Rites, and with them a great many Errors; they deny the Primacy of the Pope, Purgatory, the Procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son; and they buy Holy Orders from the Bishop of Rascia. The Archbishop of Bari retains likewise the Jurisdiction of judging Appeals from the Courts of Molfetta, Canosa, Ferlizzo, and Rutigliano.

PUGLIA is also remarkable for another Archbishop, who, tho' he resides in the City of Barletta, yet he preserves the ancient Name of his first See, which is that of Nazareth, a City in Galilee, so famous in the World for the Birth of our Redeemer, who call'd himself of Nazareth. After that Jerusalem had been set at Liberty by the illustrious Godfrey, fortunate likewise in having his noble Actions recorded in so lofty a Strain, after so many Ages, by Torquatus Tasso; the Latins made Nazareth a Metropolis; but Palestine being retaken from them in the 1190, and again subjected to the Dominion of the Turks, this famous City came under their Thralldom, and her Bishop being left to shift for himself, and a Fugitive, found no Shelter till he came to Puglia; where being kindly receiv'd by the Pope, who, in order to preserve the Memory and Title of so worthy a Prelate, was pleas'd to appoint him an honorary See in Italy, and ordain'd his Residence to be in Barletta, a City in the Diocess of Trani. There was a Church assign'd him not far from the Walls of this City, with all its Rights, and the Dignity of Metropolitan; and not long after many Parish Churches were subjected to him. Two Cathedral Churches were very soon assign'd to his See, to wit, that of Monteverde in the Year 1434 by Clement VII. and that of Canne in the Year 1455 by Callistus III. The first Church assign'd him being ruin'd by the Wars in the Year 1566, by the Authority of Pius V. the See was translated within the City to the Church of the Abbey of St. Bartholomew. The Archbishop Bernard rebuilt it from the Foundation, and magnificently enlarg'd and adorn'd it. This Archbishop has his Diocess divided into different Places; he has Churches subject to him in Bari, in Acerenza, in Potenza, in the Town of Vadula of the Diocess of Capaccio, in Saponara of the Diocess of Marsico, and in other Places, and enjoys many Benefices call'd Simple. He is titled Archbishop of Nazareth, and Bishop of Canne and Monteverde by a special Grant given him by Clement IV. and confirm'd to him afterwards by Innocent VIII. Clement VII. and Pius V. Roman Pontiffs. He has a singular Prerogative of carrying the Cross, the Pallium, and the Rochet, not only in Barletta and the other Churches of his Diocess, but over all the Catholick World; neither can the other Archbishops dispute it with him under any pretence of Apostolical Concession. He is subject to none but the Pope, and exercises in his Church and Diocess, all Jurisdiction that other Archbishops do in their Churches.

C A L A B R I A.

T H E most conspicuous Metropolis of Calabria under the Greeks was the Church of Reggio. The Patriarchs of Constantinople had subjected it to their See, and as we have seen in the sixth Book of this History, had assign'd it thirteen Suffragan Bishops, to wit, the Bishops of Bova, Tauriana, Locri, Rossano, Squillace, Tropeja, Amantea, Crotone, Cosenza, Nicotera, Bisignano, Nicastro, and Cassano. This Metropolis being afterwards restor'd to the See of Rome by the Normans, retain'd the same Dignity: So that in the old Charters made in the Time of these Normans, and especially by Duke Roger about the Year 1086, they were always call'd Archbishops; and Gregory VII. about the Year 1081, consecrated Archbishop Arnulphus, to whom Duke Robert made profuse Donations, by enriching his Church with many Possessions. In process of Time he lost some of these his Suffragan Bishops.

* Bulla Urbani II. apud Ughel. Simul & Catara, quæ intransmarini litoris ora sita esse cognoscitur.

THE Bishop of Rossano after these Churches were restor'd to the See of Rome was made a Metropolitan; and in the Time of Roger I. King of Sicily, or a little before, Rossano was made an Archiepiscopal See: So that amongst the Records which we have left us of Pope Innocent III. and of the Emperor Frederick II. there's frequent mention made of the Archbishops of Rossano. This Church was the most wedded to the Greek Rites; and tho' she had been restor'd to the Roman See, yet she never would forsake them, insomuch that the Citizens would not surrender to Duke Roger, until he had condescended that they should have a Bishop of the Greek Church; for this Prince had nam'd another of the Latin Church, to have succeeded a Greek Bishop that had died, whereupon he allow'd them to have a Greek one'. There were seven Monasteries of the Order of St. Basil in Rossano, so that the Greek Language and Rites were the more easily preserv'd in it. The Archbishop got likewise some Churches for Suffragans; but they were afterwards all withdrawn, for some of them became immediately subject to the See of Rome, and the Bishop of Cariati, which was the only one remaining, was afterwards subjected to the Metropolitan of St. Severina, so that now neither Rossano nor Lanciano have any Suffragans.

THE Bishoprick of Cosenza was likewise disjoin'd from the Metropolitan of Reggio, and subjected to the Metropolitan of Salerno; but Cosenza, as we have said, was also rais'd to be a Metropolitan. The rest were partly suppress'd, such as that of Tauriana, now destroy'd, in whose Place Seminara has succeeded, the rest were subjected to other Metropolitans; and now there remain to him the Bishops of Bova, Cassano, Catanzaro, Crotone, Gerace, Nicastro, Nicotera, Oppido, Squillace, and Tropeja.

THE Metropolitan of St. Severina subject to the See of Constantinople, being restor'd to that of Rome, retain'd also the same Prerogative, and in the Charters dated in the Time of Roger Duke of Calabria, there's mention made of the Archbishops of this City. He had five Suffragan Bishops given him by the Patriarch of Constantinople; but the Bishop of Acerenza was afterwards made a Metropolitan, and the other of Gallipoli was subjected to the Metropolitan of Otranto, and some were suppress'd; but others being erected in their Room, the Metropolitan of St. Severina has now for Suffragans, the Bishops of Cariati, Umbriatico, Strongoli, Isola, and Belcastro. He likewise had the Bishop of St. Leo, but he was afterwards suppress'd, and his Revenues were annex'd to the Metropolis; he had also the Bishops of Melito and St. Mark, but these were disjoin'd and put immediately under Rome.

O T R A N T O.

BY the Disposition of the Sees, subject to the Patriarch of Constantinople, made by the Emperor Leo, there's no Suffragan assign'd to the Metropolitan of Otranto; but afterwards Nicephorus Phocas, as *Luitprandus*² Bishop of Cremona testifies, about the Year 968, when Polientus was Patriarch of Constantinople, enlarg'd the Province of this Metropolitan, and gave him for Suffragans, the Churches of Turcico, Acerentilla, Gravina, Matera and Tricarico, ordering the Patriarch Polientus to consecrate their Bishops. But this Order had little Effect; and the Metropolitan of Otranto being restor'd to the See of Rome by the Normans, had other Bishops assign'd him for Suffragans, and the same Prerogative was continu'd with this Church, for we read, that in the Assembly held in the Year 1068, by Alexander II. in Salerno, Hugh, Archbishop of Otranto was present. The Popes afterwards assign'd him other Suffragans, which he retains to this Day, to wit, the Bishops of Lecce, Alessano, Castro, Gallipoli and Ugento.

BRINDISI and Taranto being restor'd to the Greek Empire by Lupus Protospata the Catapanus, about the Year 980, according to the Archiepiscopate Nilo, a Constantinopolitano Sacerdotes accipiebat. But Robert Guiscard Duke of the Normans, having taken Brindisi from the Greeks, restor'd its Church to the See of Rome. It was acknowledg'd as an Archiepiscopal See by Urban II. who consecrated it in the Year 1088, and the Bishop of Ostuni was made Suffragan to it: It was once annex'd to the Church of Oria, so that the Archbishops had the Title both of Brindisi and Oria; but these Churches were afterwards divided, and that of Oria was made Suffragan to the Metropolitan of Taranto, and Brindisi kept only that of Ostuni.

TARANTO being restor'd by the Normans to the See of Rome, was made a Metropolis by the Popes, about the Year 1100, and the Bishops of Mottula and Castellaneta were given it as Suffragans, to which the Bishop of Oria was afterwards added.

The Dukedoms of NAPLES and GÆT'A.

THE Church of Naples, as we have seen in the sixth Book of this History, was not advanc'd to be a Metropolis by the Greeks, but the Patriarchs of Constantinople honour'd her Bishop with the Title of Archbishop only; so that he had the chief Honours and Pre-eminency over all the Bishops of this Dukedom. She was rais'd to the Rank of Metropolis by the Popes, towards the End of this Tenth Century, at the same Time that Capua, Benevento, Salerno, Amalphis, and many other Churches were exalted to this Dignity by the Popes. And though Naples was still under the Greek Empire, yet neither the Emperors of the East, nor the Patriarchs of Constantinople could hinder the Popes from raising her to this Dignity. The Popes were always tenacious of their Authority over this Church, and they very much blam'd her Bishops for taking the Honour of Archbishops from the Patriarch of the East. But the Power of the Popes became much greater, when the Dukedom of Naples, reduc'd into the Form of a Commonwealth, was govern'd by Dukes, the Eastern Emperors having nothing but the Shadow of Authority there.

BUT by what Pope, Naples was made a Metropolis, and in what Year, Opinions are very different. *P. Caracciolus*¹, from the Authority of John the Monk, maintains, that it was made a Metropolis by John IX. about the Year 904. But from the List of Bishops, compos'd by Chioccarelli, which he brings down to Nicetas, who govern'd this Church from the Year 962 to 1000; and from what we have hitherto seen, this Advancement ought not to be attributed to John IX. in this Year, but to John XIII. at the same time that Capua, Benevento and Amalphis were made Metropolis's, which *Chioccarelli*² well demonstrates, by shewing us, that from Nicetas, all his Successors began to be call'd Archbishops. The Church of Naples had once for Suffragans, the Bishops of Cuma and Miseno; but these Cities being ruin'd in the Year 1207, their Churches and Revenues were annex'd to the Church of Naples. The Bishop of Aversa, built by the Normans, was Suffragan to the Church of Naples, but afterwards, he was subjected to the Pope immediately. She retains now only the Bishops of Acerra, Pozzuolo and Ischia, to whom afterwards the Bishop of Nola was added, who being taken from the Archbishop of Salerno, whose Suffragan he formerly was, a little before the Pontificate of Alexander III. was subjected to Naples. These few Bishops were assign'd to Naples; and it will appear very strange, to any that considers the present State of Affairs, how Benevento, Salerno, Capua and many other inferior Cities, have so many Suffragan Bishops, and Naples, the Head of a most flourishing Kingdom, has so few; but whoever will call to mind the by-past Ages, and consider how much the Confines of the Dukedom of Naples were restricted, when this City was made a Metropolis, and on the contrary how much more the Principalities of Benevento, Salerno, and Capua, and the other Dukedoms and Provinces, subject to the Greek Empire, were extended, will cease to wonder. And if this City, when it was made a Metropolis, had so confin'd a Dukedom, and consequently so few Suffragans, yet in process of Time, by good Conduct, it was rais'd to so exalted a State, that it alone could vie with the most ample and most populous Provinces of the Kingdom.

GÆT'A likewise subject to the Greek Empire, because of its being claim'd by the Popes, and too near to Rome, when it was taken from the Greeks by the Normans, was neither given as Suffragan to any neighbouring Metropolitan, nor made a Metropolis, because its small and narrow Dukedom would not bear it; so that its Bishop was subjected to the Apostolick See immediately, as it continues to this Day.

Sect. 10.

The Dukedoms of AMALPHIS and SORRENTO.

AMALPHIS in these Times, deserv'd no less than Naples to be exalted to a Metropolis ; it had made itself famous in the East, on account of its Navigation, and become the most rich and populous of all the other Cities ; not only the Greeks, Arabs and Africans, but even the Indians flock'd to it, because of its Commerce ; and Gulielmus Pagliensis ¹ in his Verses, extols it on that Head, above all the Cities of these our Provinces. This City had its Bishops from its Foundation, and in the Time of Gregory the Great, Primerius was Bishop of it, neither is he reckon'd the First. The Church of Rome was much beholden to it, as well for the many Churches which the *Amalphant*s erected in the East, where they maintain'd the Latin Rites, as for having been the first who founded the renown'd and military Order of St. John of Jerusalem in Palestine. Therefore the Popes were in Duty bound, when they were exalting so many Churches to be Metropolis's, to confer that Honour on Amalphis, which tho' by antient Subjection, it depended on the Greek Empire, nevertheless, being rais'd to this sublime State, and govern'd by its own Dukes in the Form of a Republick, the Greeks had only the Image and Shadow of Sovereignty left them in it. Whilst then this Dukedom was govern'd by Duke Manfo, the same who for some Time possess'd the Principality of Salerno, at the Request of this Duke, the Clergy, and People of Amalphis, its Bishop was advanc'd to a Metropolitan by Gregory XV. in the Year 987, and the Bishops of the Dukedom were assign'd him for Suffragans ; for what Freccia writes, that Amalphis was made a Metropolis in the Year 904, by Pope Sergius III. has no Foundation, and is commonly rejected by every Body. His Suffragans are the Bishops of Scala, Minori, Lettere and of the Island of Caprea, which he retains to this Day.

SORRENTO had likewise its antient Bishops, and being in these Times Head of a small Dukedom, was likewise exalted to a Metropolis. Marinus Freccia makes Sergius III. also Author of this Institution, in the same Year with Amalphis ; but 'tis generally believ'd, that this Church was made a Metropolis by John XIII. in the Year 968. after Capua ; and that Leopardus the last Bishop, had this Honour. Her Suffragans are the Bishops of Stabia, which we now call Castellamare, and Massa Lubrense, to which afterwards the Bishop of Vico Equense was added.

SUCH was the Disposition of the Churches of these our Provinces, begun about the End of the Tenth Century, and afterwards compleated in the beginning of the Dominion of the Normans ; which as it altogether resembles the present, so it is no ways conformable to the Disposition and temporal Polity of our Provinces, because when the new Disposition of the Provinces of this Kingdom was made, which were afterwards augmented to Twelve, as we now see them, the Metropolis's had been already fix'd, which keeping Pace with the Polity of the Empire, took that Form and Disposition which the States were found to be in, when, and where they were establish'd ; and tho' many Cities chang'd their Condition, and from great became small, or from small great, yet the Popes would never alter the Disposition of the Metropolis's already establish'd, as well out of regard to Antiquity, as for avoiding Novelty, which often occasions Disorders. However, if they fill'd the Kingdom with more Bishops, by erecting many Churches into Cathedrals, which formerly were not such, for Reasons that we shall relate elsewhere, yet they did not alter the Disposition of the Metropolitans. Besides, as we shall shew in its Place, the new Distribution of the Provinces into Twelve, was chiefly design'd for the better Distribution of the Royal Revenues, and the Number was multiplied by the Officers appointed for collecting them, call'd Treasurers. So that at the same Time the Number of Governors, or Justices, was much less than that of Treasurers, and in later Times they were made equal ; and the Places appointed for their Residence were always changeable, according as the Occasions of the Royal Exchequer, or the publick Good requir'd : Whence this new Disposition made no manner of Alteration in the Polity of the Ecclesiastical State.

IN this State of Affairs did the Normans find these our Provinces, when they came to us. They were put into another Form, when they came under their Dominion, and when all those States, which had been divided into so many Parts, came to be united in one single Person, a very large Kingdom, and a noble Monarchy was establish'd.

THE Normans, which Word in our Language signifies Northern People ¹, came likewise from Scandinavia, as the Goths and Longobards had done; they were not known in the West, till about the End of the Eighth Century, when they landed on the Sea Coast of France, in the Time of Charles the Great; and about Forty Years after, they began to infest those Places, now call'd Utrecht, Holland and Walkeren. The Kings of France, in order to put a Stop to them, were oblig'd, by Agreement, in the Year 882, to give them Frizland for a Habitation ². But they, not satisfied with this Province, began to plunder, burn and destroy all the Neighbourhood round them, under Rollo their Head, a famous and bold Pirate, at the same time that the Saracens, with no less Cruelty, over-ran our Part of Italy on this Side of the Tiber. They besieg'd Paris, invaded Aquitaine, and other Parts of that Kingdom in the Reign of Charles the Simple; so that this Prince not being able to withstand them, resolv'd to make them Friends, and Confederates ; whereupon it was agreed, that Charles should assign them Neustria, one of the Provinces of France, for their Place of Residence, and give Gisla his Daughter, as Dudo of Saint Quintine writes ¹, or his Kinswoman, as Pellegrinus ² hath it, to Rollo in Marriage, and that Rollo, forsaking Idolatry and Gentilism, should embrace the Christian Religion. This Agreement was executed about the Year 900 ³: Neustria, with the Title of Duke, was given to Rollo for ever, who married Gisla, and at the same time receiv'd Baptism, Robert Count of Poitiers standing Godfather, from whom he took the Name of Robert ; and the other Normans, following the Example of their Commander in Chief, became more humane and civiliz'd. The Normans, from their own Name, call'd Neustria, Normandy, which Name it retains to this Day.

THIS Robert, first Duke of Normandy, had a Son nam'd William, whom he made Count of Hauteville, a City of the same Province. William, begot Richard, who was Father of another Richard, and this second Richard begot Robert II. and another Richard, whom we shall call III. And Robert II. was Father of William II. who 'tis commonly said, was the Father of Tancred Count of Hauteville, from whose Loins came those Heroes, who for a long Time govern'd these our Provinces ⁴.

TANCRED, by two Wives, had Twelve Sons, and several Daughters, one of which was nam'd Fredefinna, who was the Wife of Richard Count of Aversa, and Prince of Capua ; another was given to Gaufred Count of Montescaglioso, and another to Volmandus ⁵. The Sons he had by his first Wife, nam'd Moriella, were William surnam'd Fierabras, Drago, Umfred, (who, as we shall shew, were the Three first Counts of Puglia) Godfrey and Serlo. The other Seven were by Fredefinna his second Wife, the Eldest of whom was Robert, surnam'd Guiscard, which in the antient Norman Language, is the same as crafty and subtle ; he came to be Duke of Puglia and Calabria ; the second was Malgerius ; the third, William ; the fourth, Alvered ; the fifth, Umbert ; the sixth, Tancred, and the seventh and last, was Roger, who conquer'd Sicily, and established the Monarchy ⁶.

HOWEVER, these were not the first that came to Italy ; for, as we shall see, some Normans had a little before settled in Aversa, so that we must carefully distinguish them from one another, that we may not confound the Reader, as other Writers have done. The first of them came about the Year 1016. The Sons of Tancred landed in Italy about the Year 1035 ; but not all of them, for Two stay'd in Normandy ; neither did all the rest come together, but as fit Opportunities offered ; sometimes Two, sometimes Three, set out for these our Provinces ; neither did the first come in greater Numbers, as we shall see ⁷.

EVERY Body reading the Adventures of these People, must be surpriz'd, how a few Men come from France, through a Thousand Disasters, were able to make themselves Masters of one of the most delightful Countries in the World ; how one single Family of Norman Gentlemen, assisted only with a handful of their Countrymen, could establish a Monarchy on the Confines of the Empires of the East and West, gain so many and so wonderful Victories over Two powerful Enemies ; free Italy and Sicily from the Incursions and Yoke of the Infidel Saracens, which greater Powers were never able to atchieve ; and after having overthrown the Greeks and the Longobard Princes, lay the Foundation of the fine Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily. Certainly no other Nation, excepting the Romans, were ever so successful as from so mean Beginnings, to arrive at so great Power. The other Nations, such as the Goths and Longobards, as we have seen, came not to Italy like Strangers and Travellers, but with very numerous Armies, which over-run our Country, and settled a Kingdom.

ON the other hand, if we will but consider the unhappy State to which these our Provinces were reduc'd, being divided, and subject to so many Princes ; and the extraordinary Valour and Courage of this Nation, we shall cease to wonder at their fortunate Success. Add to this, that the Manner of waging War us'd in those Times, was not the same as is practis'd now adays: There was at that Time scarce any regular Method of attacking and defending. A whole Army was sometimes routed, without knowing how, or by what Means; and the whole of the Matter consisted, either in the Strength of Body, which was incomparably greater than that of Men now adays, because they practis'd those Exercises more frequently that conduce to the acquiring of it; or in an exceeding great Courage, which imbolden'd the Combatants to do Wonders; or lastly in some presumptuous Undertakings, which nothing but the Event could justify.

TO these three Causes were owing those glorious Actions of the Normans, no ways inferior to those of the Romans, we so much admire. They turn'd France up-side down, and conquer'd many Provinces of it. William the Norman, descended of the same Dukes of Neustria, conquer'd the most flourishing Kingdom of England, and transmitted it to his Posterity. Our Puglia, Calabria and Sicily, the famous Jerusalem, the renown'd Antioch, were all under their Dominion¹.

WE are now to shew what Motives the People of this Nation had, for coming into these our Provinces so remote from them, and how, after various Fortune, they made themselves Masters of them; for we cannot otherwise clearly conceive, how so many, and so divided States, could at last be united in a noble Kingdom, under the Dominion of one single Person, which the Normans govern'd by so good Laws and Institutes, as to transmit it to their Posterity, till after a Series of many Years, for want of Male-Issue, it fell to the Suevi, by a Princess of the Norman Blood. The Rise of our Papal Investiture, and how afterwards this Kingdom came to be reputed a Fief of the Church of Rome, could not well be understood, if these Events should not be related with Exactness; in doing of which we shall make a Discovery of many Truths, which Writers, some out of Sloth, many of set Purpose, have kept in the Dark.

IN relating the Adventures, and all the other Successes of this Nation; I have laid stress only on Cotemporary Historians, and those who have most exactly given us an Account of their Actions, whose Testimonies cannot be suspected. The most Grave and Antient among the Latins, shall be Gulielmus Pugliensis, Malaterra, Leo Ostiensis, Amatus, a Monk of Cassino, Ordericus Vitalis, Lupus Protospata, the anonymous Cassinensis, Petrus Diaconus, and Gulielmus Gemmeticensis. And among the Greeks, the Princess Anna Comnena, Joannes Cinnamus, Cedrenus, Zonaras, and other Collectors of the Bizantine History, which Charles du Fresne hath illustrated with Notes.

GULIELMUS Pugliensis relates in Latin Verse, though not very Elegant, but very good for the Style of the Age in which he liv'd, the Actions and warlike Feats of the Normans in Calabria. He writes not in a poetical Strain, but like an Historian, who resolv'd to give a faithful and distinct Relation in Numbers and Metre. His Account reaches to the Death of the famous Robert Guiscard, which happen'd about the Year 1085; he publish'd it at the Desire of Pope Urban II. who was advanc'd to the Pontificate in the Year 1088, and dedicated it to Roger, the Son and Successor of Robert Guiscard. This small historical Poem in Manuscript, was found by Joannes Tirenceus Hauteneus, Advocate Fiscal of the Province of Rouen, in the Library of the Monastery of Becobelvine near to Strasburg.

MALATERRA is an Author that deserves more Credit: He wrote a very long History in Prose, of the Conquests made by the Normans in Italy, by Order of Roger Count of Sicily and Calabria, who was Brother to Robert Guiscard. This Work having been a long Time buried in Oblivion, the Manuscript of it was found in Saragosa, among the Histories of the Kings of Aragon in the Year 1579 by Geronimus Zurita, who publish'd it; and Baronius mentions the finding of this as a real Treasure; so that they who have wrote the History of Sicily, for not having read this Author, have committed a Thousand Blunders.

LEO Bishop of Ostia, is an Author well known, and is in every Body's Hands; being a Monk of Monte Cassino, he wrote the Chronicle of that Monastery, a little after the Time we are about to discourse of; and tho' his Business was to shew to the World, the Sanctity and Grandeur of that Monastery, nevertheless he affords great Light for understanding the Affairs of the Normans; in whose Kingdom he wrote.

AMATUS, a Monk of Cassino, flourish'd about the same Time; he was also made a Bishop afterwards, though 'tis not known what Bishoprick he got. *Petrus Diaconus*¹ numbers this Amatus amongst the famous Men of Cassino, and says he was most knowing in the Holy Scriptures, and an admirable Poet. Among his other Works, which he compos'd, that de Gestis Apostolorum Petri & Pauli, was dedicated to Pope Gregory VII. and the History of the *Normans*², divided into Eight Books, was dedicated to Desiderius, that famous Abbot of Monte Cassino, who was afterwards Pope by the Name of Victor III. This History of the Normans, written by Amatus, for what we know, was never publish'd in Print. Joannes Baptista Marus, in his Annotations on Petrus Diaconus, relates, that in his Time this History was preserv'd in Manuscript in the Library of Cassino, wherein many Things worth knowing, concerning the Actions and Customs of the Normans, were most accurately describ'd. But the Abbot of Noce laments this Loss, and in his Notes on the Chronicle of *Cassino*³ relates, that it had been taken out of that Library, with many other Things worthy of eternal Memory. This Author liv'd about the Year 1070, when, according to the Taste of that Age, Learning was, for the most part, confin'd to the Monasteries. There flourish'd many others, such as Albericus, Constantinus, Guaiferius, Alphanus, who was afterwards Archbishop of Salerno, and others that may be seen in Petrus Diaconus.

L. U. P. U. S. Protospata, the anonymous Cassinensis, and Petrus Diaconus himself, wrote likewise something concerning the Normans; but Ordoricus Vitalis, and Gulielmus Gemmeticensis much more diffusely, besides a great many modern Writers, who are well known to every Body.

PRINCESS Anna Comnena, made herself famous in the World, as well for her Judgment and Erudition, as her Quality and Birth: She was Daughter of Alexius Comnenus, Emperor of Constantinople and of Irene. Zonaras and Nicetas assure us, that this Princess was a great Lover of Learning, and that she spent most of her Time in reading. She not only apply'd herself to History and polite Learning, but likewise to Philosophy. She wrote the History of Alexius Comnenus her Father, against whom our Robert Guiscard made a most cruel War, which was partly the Subject of her History; and tho' sometimes, according to the Custom of her Nation, she fail'd in relating the Truth exactly, nevertheless she ought to be credited, when she speaks in Commendation of Robert Guiscard, whom she very much hated, as being a bitter Enemy to her Father. In the Preface to her History, she promises to say nothing that might make her be accus'd of Complaisance or Flattery, or that was not consonant with Truth; yet we see, that what she writes of her Father is a continu'd Panegyrick. The Latin Authors are not of the same Opinion, for they represent Alexius as a deceitful, dissembling Prince, whose Reign was more remarkable for his unworthy, than his good Actions; and truly his ill-grounded Jealousy was a great Prejudice to the French, who having taken the Cross upon them, were fighting under Godfrey of Balogne for the Conquest of the Holy Land; but perhaps the Latin Authors have been as sparing, as Anna Comnena was prodigal in her Commendations. Hoeschelius publish'd the first Eight Books of her History, which he had got from the Augustan Library. Joannes Gronovius bestow'd some Pains upon it afterwards, and in the Year 1651, Peter Poussin a Jesuite, publish'd it with his Latin Translation of the Louvre Impression. Afterwards the President Cousin translated it into French, and lastly, Charles du Fresne explain'd it with Notes.

JOANNES CINNAMUS liv'd under the Emperor Emanuel Comnenus, whose Exploits he gives us at large in his History; he is an elegant Writer, and studies to imitate Procopius. He makes frequent mention of our Normans, and his History is now illustrated with Notes by Charles du Fresne. Cedrenus, Zonaras, and the other Writers collected in the Byzantine History, sometimes make mention of our Normans also.

THE Motives that induc'd the Normans to come from Neustria into these our Provinces, ought to be attributed to nothing else but the Zeal these People had for the Christian Religion, after they had forsaken Idolatry, and worshipp'd the true Deity. There was a Custom which prevail'd in the World at that Time of going on Pilgrimage, not so much as now a-days, in order to see Cities, new Fashions, and different Customs, as out of Devotion to visit the most famous Holy Places. Now, in this and the preceding Century, two Places in these our Provinces became famous all over the West, to wit, that of Monte Gargano, by reason of the Angelical Apparition, and the other of Monte Cassino, for the Sanctity and Miracles of S. Benedict and his Monks; but among all the Holy Places, as in Justice it ought, Jerusalem was the most illustrious, a Holy City, where our glorious Redeemer water'd the Earth with his Blood, and where he was buried.

AMONG all the Christians of the North, 'tis incredible how much the Normans of Neustria were inclin'd to this Exercise of Piety; neither the Length of the Journey, nor the Difficulty of the Passage, nor the Rigor of the Weather and Season, nor the Necessity of travelling through the Midst of Robbers and Infidels, nor Hunger, nor Thirst, nor any other greater Danger or Inconveniency whatsoever, frightened them. In order to overcome so many Difficulties, they join'd in Bands, and pass'd through those unfrequented Places, and being of great robust Bodies, inur'd to War, and courageous, were able to cope with whole Armies, and often had bloody Engagements with the Greeks and Infidels, and broke through all Obstacles. On such Occasions, either in the going or returning, they were wont to visit our Sanctuaries of Gargano and Cassino.

IN the Beginning then of the eleventh Century¹, forty, as Leo Ostiensis writes², or, according to the Opinion of others, a hundred of these Normans having left Neustria, travell'd towards the East, and on their Way to Jerusalem, made great Havock amongst those Barbarians. In their Return they took another Rout; for imbarking, they sail'd up the Mediterranean, and arriv'd on the Coast of *Salerno*³, where they landed, and in that City, were honourably receiv'd by the Salernitans, who were amaz'd at the Sight of Men of such robust Bodies. Salerno was govern'd at that Time, as we have said, after the Death of Prince John, by Guaimarus III. his Son, by *Ostiensis*⁴ nam'd the Elder, in order to distinguish him from the other Guaimarus his Son, who succeeded him. This Guaimarus from the Year 994, in which John his Father died, govern'd the Principality, sometimes alone, sometimes with his Son, to the Year 1031, in which his Son died. They were invited by this Prince to stay some time in Salerno, to refresh themselves after the Fatigue of their Voyage, and to partake of the Sweets of the Country. But behold an Accident happen'd, which afforded an Opportunity to these few Normans to shew their Courage, and at the same Time to recompense Guaimarus for the kind Entertainment he had bestow'd upon them. In the Course of this History we have often related, that the Saracens never fail'd to infest the Principality of Salerno, coming sometimes from Africa, and frequently from the neighbouring Sicily, in Ships upon the Coast of this City, and to ruin the adjacent Country, the Fields and Castles, which occasion'd great Calamities: Guaimarus not having Forces sufficient to repulse them, had been oblig'd to buy his Peace with large Sums of Money. While the Normans were in Salerno, the Saracens with a great Fleet arriv'd on the Coast, and threaten'd Ruin and Destruction, unless they got a vast Sum of Money; Guaimarus having no means wherewithal to defend himself, was ready to grant their Demand; and while he and his Officers were busy in raising Contribution amongst his Vassals, the Saracens having landed from their Ships, cover'd the Space betwixt the Sea and the City, where, expecting the Ransom, they gave way to Gormandizing and Excess. The Normans, who were not accusom'd to such ignominious Usage, reproach'd the Salernitans for suffering their Enemies to triumph so insolently over them, by chusing rather to be at the Charges of the Triumph, than to defend themselves, and resolv'd, with unheard-of Bravery to revenge the Affront; and whilst the Saracens, little dreading the Danger, were drinking and revelling, they attack'd them with so much Fury and Bravery, that after a terrible Slaughter, they forc'd the rest to fly, and betake themselves to their Ships with greater speed than they had come ashore. So glorious an Exploit occasion'd no less Joy than Admiration in the Salernitans, and Prince Guaimarus was at a loss how to reward them as they deserv'd; he intreated them to remain in the Country, offering them Habitations, and the most honourable Employments; but they protested that they had had no private Interest in this Action, and that they would have no other Recompence, but the Pleasure of having acquitted themselves of the Duty they ow'd to Religion, by defeating the Infidels. But lest they should seem insensible of his Civilities, and not to comply with his Desire of having such Men as they about him, they promis'd either to return themselves, or send some of their Countrymen of equal Courage with themselves. Therefore they prepar'd to return to their native Country, which they long'd to see. The Prince, not able to detain them longer, us'd all Means imaginable to persuade them upon their Arrival, at least to send him some of their Countrymen; and whilst they were imbarking for Normandy, he order'd many of his Officers to be ready to accompany them, with Vessels loaded with the most exquisite Fruits, as far as their own Country; he likewise presented them with precious Garments of Gold and Silk, and rich Furniture for Horses. Guaimarus was not disappointed, for his generous and noble Behaviour, was not only an Invitation, but likewise a very strong Allurement to the Normans to come to these our Provinces. For on their Arrival in Normandy, having represented the Desire our Princes had for their Nation, they prevail'd upon a great Number of People, and some of them of noble Birth, to undertake the Journey. To which, an Opportunity which we are going to relate, gave a Handle.

IN the Court of Robert Duke of Normandy, amongst other Lords who frequented his Palace, there were William Repostel and Osmond Drengot; this last bearing a Grudge at William, who had publicly bragg'd he had receiv'd the last Favours from his Daughter, challeng'd him to fight a Duel; and notwithstanding they were in Company with Duke Robert, who with his Court was taking the Diversion of Hunting, they engag'd, and Drengot run his Enemy through with his Lance, and kill'd him. Duke Robert taking this as an Affront, endeavour'd to have him seiz'd, in order to make a publick Example of him; whereupon Osmond, to shun the Wrath of his Sovereign, fled first into England; and at last, seeing the Way to Italy so well pav'd to his Hand, resolv'd to go thither with his Kindred, and likewise induc'd others to undertake the Journey with him. This gallant Norman carried many of his Brothers along with him, who according to Ostiensis, were Rainulphus, Asclittinus, Osmondus, and Rodulphus, together with their Sons, Nephews, and many other Friends. This Rainulphus was the first Count of Aversa, and was succeeded by Asclittinus, by *Ordoricus Vitalis*², call'd Anschetillus de Quadrellis, from whom are descended the first Normans who possess'd the Principality of Capua, as we shall see.

THESE Heroes, of most noble Blood, having come from France accompanied with many of their Normans, were receiv'd with much Joy and Marks of Esteem by our Princes, who well remember'd what their Countrymen had done in Salerno a few Years before. Some say that they went first to Benevento, others that they took Service under the Prince of Salerno, and others that they came to *Capua*³; all which may be true, for these new Normans, being less disinterested than those who had fought at Salerno, were ready to serve him who rewarded them best; and our Longobard Princes, who had both the Greeks and Saracens to deal with, coveted to have so gallant Men in their Service, by whose Means they expected to reap great Advantage. However that may be, 'tis certain, that tho' it does not appear precisely in what Year they went to Capua, yet they must have been there before the Year 1017, when Melo, who had fled from Bari, found Sanctuary there, and was kindly receiv'd by Pandulphus IV. who became Prince of Capua in the Year 1016, together with Pandulphus II. the Son of Landulphus of St. Agatha, which gave Opportunities to these new Normans, in his Service, to signalize themselves in many noble Expeditions.

THE Greeks by their new Magistrates call'd Catapani, had made their Government in Puglia insupportable, and gave Occasion to new Disorders and Tumults in Bari the Seat of that Magistrate; for the Baresians not able to bear the severe Government of Curcua the new Catapanus, push'd on by Melo a valiant Captain of the Blood of the Longobards, who liv'd in Bari, whither he had transported his Family a long time before, revolted from the Greek Empire, and hoping to set their native Country at Liberty, put themselves under the Conduct of Melo, whom, with Datus his Kinsman, they chose for their Head. But the Emperors of the East being appriz'd of this Revolution, they immediately sent into Italy Basilus Bajanus to be Catapanus; who, upon his Arrival in Puglia with a goodly Company of Lords and Soldiers of Macedonia, laid Siege to the City of Bari. The Baresians thus beset, instead of defending themselves, minded nothing but to make their Peace with the Greeks at Melo's Cost, offering to deliver him up; which Melo perceiving, he fled immediately to Ascoli with Datus, and not thinking himself safe enough there, retir'd much further off; and in the mean time his treacherous Fellow-Citizens, in order to curry Favour with the Greeks, sent Maralda his Wife, and Argirus his Son to Constantinople. Melo, who had retir'd from Ascoli to Benevento, and from thence to Salerno, at last stopp'd at Capua, where he crav'd Assistance against the Greeks from Pandulphus, as he had done from the Princes of Benevento and Salerno his Countrymen. On his Arrival in Capua he found the Normans, who had come there a little before; he had already heard of their Valour, and finding them fit for his Purpose, by great Promises engag'd them in his Service; and having likewise listed other Troops belonging to the Longobard Princes, from whom he had begg'd Assistance, he made up an Army, with which he presently march'd against the Greeks, whom he attack'd and defeated in three successive Battles, and made himself Master of some Cities of Puglia; but afterwards he lost all the Fruits of his Victories in the fourth Battle, which happen'd in the Year 1019, near the City of Canne, a Place formerly famous on account of the ancient Defeat of the *Romans*¹, where Melo was overcome rather by the Treachery of his own Men, than the Power of the Greeks, tho' the Normans continu'd faithful, and fought gallantly. Melo, seeing his Army reduc'd to a very low Pass, was resolv'd to seek Assistance elsewhere, and having recommended all the Normans that were left, to Pandulphus Prince of Capua, and Guaimarus Prince of Salerno, he went immediately to the Emperor Henry, to whom he represented the lamentable Condition of these our Provinces, which were in Danger of being dismember'd from the Empire of the West, by the prevailing Power of the Greeks, and begg'd of him to send a strong Army against the Greeks, and even to go and command it himself: Henry being engag'd in other Enterprizes, and not performing his Promises, oblig'd Melo twice to undertake the same Journey, in order to solicit the promis'd Succours; but in the Midst of these Negotiations Melo ended his Days while he was with the Emperor Henry, and the Normans having lost their valiant Captain, resolv'd to engage in some other Service.

ADINOLPHUS the Brother of Pandulphus Prince of Capua, and Abbot of Monte Cassino, was so often oppress'd by the Counts of Aquino, who frequently made IncurSIONS upon the Lands of that Abbey, that in order to repulse them, he resolv'd to employ the Courage of the *Normans*², who very faithfully perform'd what they were intrusted with, and always protected the Lands of that Monastery from a Village call'd Piniatario, not far from the City of St. Germano, where they had fortified themselves. Others of the Normans following Datus, had put themselves under the Protection of Pope Benedict VIII. who had given them the keeping of the Tower of Garigliano, which belong'd to the Estate of the Church; thus Datus reckon'd himself secure, for the City of Capua cover'd him from being attack'd by the Greeks.

BUT the Treachery of Pandulphus Prince of Capua occasion'd new Disturbances in these Provinces, all which conduc'd to the Rise of the Normans. This Prince, tho' in appearance he seem'd to favour the Party of Henry Emperor of the West, whose Subject he was; nevertheless he kept secretly a strict Correspondence and Friendship with Basilus Emperor of the East, and went so far, that at last he was induc'd to send the Golden Keys to Constantinople, and subject himself, his City, and the whole Principality to the Empire of the East, just as it had been formerly subject to that of the West³. The Emperor Basilus, to whom this Acquisition was of great Importance, immediately advis'd Bajanus of it, and charg'd him by means of Pandulphus to endeavour to get Datus and his Normans into his Clutches. He effectually and punctually executed his Prince's Commands, and that Pandul- phus might not be dissuaded from it by the Abbot Adinolphus his Brother, he resolv'd to bring him over likewise to his Interest, for which purpose he made use of very effectual Means, by making a Donation to his Monastery of the whole Inheritance of a certain Maraldus of Trani, that had been escheated¹; and having sent a great Sum of Money to Pandulphus, he intreated him, that if he was truly faithful to the Emperor Basilus, he would give him a free Passage through his Dominions, in order to seize Datus. The Request was immediately granted, and Bajanus with a considerable Army came and attack'd Datus in Garigliano; the Besieg'd, tho' catch'd napping, defended themselves for two Days with great Courage, but at last Courage was oblig'd to yield to Force. Bajanus took the Place, and treated with the utmost Rigour, all those whom he found in it, excepting the Normans, whom he spar'd at the earnest Intreaty of the Abbot Adinolphus. But he had no Pity on Datus, for this unfortunate Captain was conducted to Bari, and punish'd as a Paracide, by being put into a Sack and thrown into the Sea.

THE Emperor Henry having heard of the Invasion of the Greeks, the Treachery of Pandulphus, and the cruel Death of Datus, bethought himself, that after the Loss of Puglia, and the Principality of Capua, not only Rome, but all Italy was in Danger, if he did not speedily succour them; for he had been too long in perceiving what Melo had so often fore-told, but was at last rous'd up, and having drawn together a great Army, he invited the Normans (who had been left at liberty at the Desire of Adinolphus) to fight under his Banner, and forthwith, this Year 1022, directed his March towards *Italy*². He divided his Army into three Bodies; of one compos'd of Eleven thousand Soldiers, he made Poppo Patriarch of Aquileja Captain, who march'd towards Abruzzo in order to enter the Dominions of the Greeks on that Side; another Body of Twenty thousand commanded by Belgrimus Archbishop of Cologn (for in those Times it was no strange Thing, for the greater Prelates of the Church to be seen at the Head of Armies, which we shall see anon practis'd by the very Popes themselves) was sent towards Rome, to seize the Abbot of Cassino, with the Prince of Capua his Brother, who had been accus'd to the Emperor as the Author of Datus's Death; Henry kept the other with himself, designing to march through Lombardy, and by the Way of Marca to attack the Greeks.

THE Abbot Adinolphus no sooner heard that a whole Army was marching against him, than he left the Monastery, and resolving to save himself in Constantinople, in great haste he fled to Otranto, where having embark'd on the Adriatick Sea, he was Shipwreck'd, and himself with all his People drown'd.

THE Prince his Brother, when he saw that he was besieg'd in Capua by the Archbishop of Cologn, lest he should be betray'd by his own Vassals, who hated him mortally, surrender'd himself to the Prelate, on Condition to be carried to Henry, before whom he promis'd to prove his Innocence³. Belgrimus took him under his Protection, and carried him to Henry, who at that Time had laid close Siege to Troja in Puglia, a City built by the Greeks that very Year, which a few Days after surrender'd to him. The Emperor was overjoy'd, and conven'd all his Barons, as well Italians, as those beyond the Mountains, for judging his Cause; who unanimously sentenc'd him to die; but the Archbishop, under whose Protection he had put himself, by Intreaties and Tears prevail'd so far upon the Emperor, that he chang'd the Sentence of Death into perpetual Banishment, caus'd him to be put in Chains, and carried him with him to Germany.

HENRY gave the Principality of Capua to Pandulphus Count of Tiano, and at the same Time he invested Stephen, Melo, and Peter, Nephews of the famous Melo, in that County, who had undertaken to maintain it against the Greeks, as their Uncle had done before. Thus did the Emperors of the West dispose of the Principality of Capua, and the Counties of which it was made up. But Henry being oblig'd to recall his Army on account of the excessive Heats of Puglia, which his Germans could no longer bear; he intrusted the Designs he had upon Italy to the Bravery of the Normans, leaving it upon them to drive the Greeks out of it. He recommended to them particularly, that upon any emergent Occasion they should assist the Nephews of the renown'd Melo, to whom he likewise gave some other famous Normans for Assistants; who, according to Ostiensis, were Giselbertus and Gosmanus, Stigandus, Turstinus, Balbus, Walterus de Canosa, and Hugo Fallucca, with eighteen other gallant Companions.

THE Emperor Henry likewise recommended these Normans to the Princes of Benevento and Salerno, and to Pandulphus of Tiano, the new Prince of Capua, bidding them to employ them on all Occasions. But these Princes soon forgetting the great Obligations the Longobards were under to the Normans, who had done them great Service against the Greeks, began to despise them; whether they thought they stood no more in need of them, or whether they took it in ill Part that they were employ'd in the Emperor's Service; they suffer'd them to wander in the Woods, without so much as allowing them a Place for Shelter, and deny'd them their wonted Pay.

THE Normans, who were not us'd to bear such Injustice, took Arms against the Inhabitants of the Country, and immediately brought them to be at their Discretion; and in order to obtain more securely what they wanted, they chose themselves a Leader of their own Nation. The first was Turstinus, one of those brave Men mention'd by Ostiensis, of Strength equal to his Courage, and every way qualified for the Post. But not long after this gallant Captain, by the Deceit of the Puglians, was attack'd by a Dragon, and tho' he kill'd him, yet died by the venomous Breath of that Serpent, as Guilielmus Gemmeticensis has it¹: However there were not wanting worthy Successors to revenge his Death, for the Normans unanimously chose Rainulphus, a valiant and skilful Warrior², who was the first of the Normans that took upon him the Quality of Prince in Italy, and who establish'd a certain and fix'd Seat in these our Provinces, as we shall see anon.

IN the mean time Henry, after having reign'd Twenty-two Years, in the Year 1025, ended his Days in Germany, without leaving any Issue; and on account of his Piety, and more for his singular Chastity, which, even tho' married, he would preserve, we now pay him the Honour due to Saints. He built many Churches in Ramberg, which he subjected to the Pope. A most prudent Prince, who, considering, that for want of Children, Confusion and Disorders might happen about the Election of his Successor, upon his Death-bed, he call'd for the Princes of the Empire, and nam'd Conrad Duke of Franconia, surnam'd the Salick, a wise and gallant Prince of the illustrious House of Saxony, to be his Successor³. The Princes of the Empire consenting, elected him King of Germany and Emperor: So that Conrad was advanc'd to the Throne, not by Hereditary Right, but by Election, as was the Custom, tho' he was nam'd by his Predecessor, as if the Electors with common Consent had intrusted Henry with the Election. Neither was that which Otho III. had prescrib'd, observ'd in his Election, for he was not elected by the seven Electors only, but by all the Princes; and Otho's Regulation was not put in Practice till long after.

BASILIVS Emperor of the East likewise died this Year 1025, and shortly after in 1028 Constantine, and Romanus, surnam'd Argirus, was elected their Successor.

*The City of Averſa founded, and Rainulphus the Norman made

THE Death of Henry, and the Election of Conrad, chang'd the Face of Affairs in theſe our Provinces. The new Prince of Capua, Pandulphus of Tiano, on account of his abominable Practices, and eſpecially his Avarice, was abhorr'd by all. He had diſguſted the Normans, who ſeeing themſelves treated ſo unworthily, oppreſs'd the Country People, and held them in Subjection; therefore his own Vaffals deteſted him. He had likewiſe diſoblig'd Guaimarus III. Prince of Salerno, and by his Behaviour had brought Things to that paſs, that he became his inveterate Enemy.

ALL theſe Things wrought his Ruin, for after Henry's Death, Guaimarus us'd all Means to gain the Favour of the new Emperor Conrad, and manag'd Matters ſo well, that he enter'd into a ſtrict Correſpondence and Friendſhip with him. Guaimarus had married Gaidelgrima Siſter of Pandulphus IV. who was ſtill in cloſe Priſon in Germany: The firſt Favour he deſir'd of Conrad, was to ſet his Brother-in-Law at liberty, and to reſtore him to the Principality of Capua ¹. Conrad granted his Requeſt, and order'd him to be reſtor'd to that Principality.

RAINULPHUS, who with his Normans had been ſo ill us'd by Pandulphus of Tiano, ſeeing ſo fair an Opportunity to be reveng'd, preſently join'd with Guaimarus, and with their united Forces, reſolv'd to reſtore Pandulphus IV. to the Principality of Capua. This Prince being aſſiſted by Guaimarus and the Normans, as alſo by his old Friends he had in Puglia, and by Bajanus the Catapanus himſelf, and the Counts of Marſi, laid Siege immediately to Capua, in order to drive out his Competitor, who defended the Place for the Space of eighteen Months; but not being able to hold out longer, was oblig'd to ſurrender it to Bajanus, who took him under his Cuſtody and Protection, and ſent him, with his Son John, and all that belong'd to him, to Naples, where he was courteouſly receiv'd by Sergius who was then Duke of it.

PANDULPHUS IV. like all ambitious Men, not ſatiſfied with having recover'd his former Principality, was grievouſly offended that Pandulphus of Tiano ſhould be protected by Sergius, ſo that he began under this Pretence to reſolve upon new Enterprizes againſt the Dukedom of Naples.

HE had not ſhewn himſelf ſo grateful to the Normans as the important Service they had done him at this Juncture deſerv'd, wherefore they reſolv'd to eſtabliſh themſelves in ſome Place in that Neighbourhood: They firſt pitch'd upon a Place, which is thought to be that which we now call Ponte a Selice, three Miles above Averſa, which appear'd to be the moſt Fertile ²; but when they began to build, the Foundation prov'd Marſhy, therefore they quitted it, and built their City at ſome Diſtance from it, which afterwards, from their Name was call'd Averſa la Normanna, and was poſſeſs'd by Rainulphus with the Title of Count, for Reaſons which we ſhall relate.

PANDULPHUS IV. delay'd putting his Designs against Sergius Duke of Naples in Execution only one Year. The Dukedom of Naples was at this Time, after Marinus, whom the Anonymous Salernitan mentions, govern'd by this Sergius, and tho' by ancient Tenure it was subject to the Emperor of the Greeks, nevertheless it was govern'd by the Dukes with absolute Authority, in the Form and Disposition of a Republick. When Pandulphus march'd his Army against Naples, Sergius being unprovided, and at a great Distance from the Greeks, who could give him no Assistance, was forc'd to leave the City, which, after a short Resistance, surrender'd to Prince Pandulphus; this was the first Time that Naples had been subdued by the Longobard Princes, and made subject to their Dominion, after the Efforts of so many others, who never could conquer it; Pandulphus of Tiano having made his Escape, fled to Rome, where he soon ended his Days in a miserable Exile.

SERGIUS being driven out of the Dukedom of Naples, and not able to find Assistance for turning out the Invader any where else, very wisely had recourse to the Normans, assuring them of a more generous Treatment than they had hitherto had from the Longobard Princes. Rainulphus, who had been ill us'd by that Prince, embrac'd all Opportunities by which he might the better establish himself, and procure his own Advantage, and upon these Promises, accepted the Invitation, and with his Normans join'd Sergius, and did him such signal Service, that they forc'd Pandulphus to quit Naples, after he had been three Years in Possession of it, and restor'd Sergius to his Dukedom, to the great Glory and Reputation of Rainulphus.

SERGIUS, not following the Example of the Longobard Princes, was mindful of his Promises to Rainulphus, kept his Word, and enter'd into a strict Alliance with the Normans, and in order to a more close Union betwixt them, he married a Kinswoman of Rainulphus; and besides, to secure himself against the Insults of the Prince of Capua, he built a strong Fort betwixt that City and Naples, made Rainulphus a Count¹, and gave the Title of County to all the Territories about that City which they were building, and had then begun to inhabit, which cover'd the Dukedom of Naples; and seeing he was resolv'd to keep up an Aversion betwixt the Normans and the Prince of Capua, 'tis thought that on that account this City was call'd Aversa.

'TIS not improbable, what Summontes, from the Authority of Joannes Villani, says, that the Reason that induc'd Duke Sergius to give the Title of Count to Rainulphus, must have been, because that Territory was within the Demesnes of Naples, being only eight Miles distant from it; and the rather, because *Villani*² in his Chronicle of Naples says, that the Normans built Aversa, which formerly was a Castle belonging to Naples. But this Title, as we shall shortly see, was confirm'd afterwards to Rainulphus by the Emperor Conrad. Thus did the Normans begin to have a fix'd Residence in these our Provinces; but much greater Acquisitions follow'd afterwards, on the Occasions which we shall soon relate.

SECT. I.

The coming of the Sons of Tancred Count of Hauteville, and the Death of Conrad the Salick; and his Laws.

RAINULPHUS being thus establish'd in Aversa, set about fortifying himself there, and began to act as a Prince; he sent Ambassadors to the Duke of Normandy, inviting his Countrymen to come and partake with him of the charming Country, where he was already Master of a County; and to induce them the more, he gave them hopes of their having the same good Fortune: Upon this Invitation there came a much greater Number of Normans into Italy than at first; with these came the eldest Sons of Tancred of Hauteville, the Head of the Family, of whose numerous Off-spring, from which were descended the Heroes, who not only conquer'd these our Provinces, but likewise Sicily, we shall shortly give an Account.

The Expedition of the Sons of Tancred into these our Provinces ought to be plac'd in the Year 1035, they came not all the same Time, but the first were William, Drogo, and Umbert. The rest came afterwards, and only two remain'd in their native Country ¹.

THESE valiant Champions having first push'd their Fortunes in diverse Places, at last arriv'd in Italy with other Normans, and fix'd themselves in Salerno, under the Protection and Pay of that Prince. The Principality of Salerno was govern'd at this Time by Guaimarus IV. Son of Guaimarus the Elder, who had been dead since the Year 1031. This Prince, after the Example of his Father, had a great Esteem for these last Normans, whom he valu'd above all the rest of their Nation; whether it was out of Inclination or Policy, 'tis certain that he employ'd them in all his Affairs, and had such Regard for them, that he still heap'd Favours upon them; and therefore as a most prudent Prince, govern'd his State with Vigour and Magnificence.

ON the contrary, Pandulphus Prince of Capua, who had been ungrateful to them, by his Cruelty and Avarice, had gain'd the Hatred of every Body; his frequent Incurfions, and the Robberies which he committed on the Monastery of Cassino, oblig'd these Monks, in order to protect themselves from his Tyranny, to have recourse to the Emperor Conrad then in Germany, to whom with Tears in their Eyes they complain'd of the Destruction of their Monastery, and intreated him to come into Italy to relieve them from the Oppression of this Tyrant, putting him in mind that it was a Duty incumbent on him, because their Monastery was under his Protection, as it had been under the immediate Care of his Predecessors ².

TO this were likewise added, for hastening Conrad's coming into Italy, the Revolutions that had happen'd at the same in Lombardy, of which the Archbishop of Milan was reputed the principal Author ³. Therefore Conrad resolv'd at last to undertake a Journey towards these our Provinces; and in the Year 1038, having pass'd the Alps, with a powerful Army enter'd Italy, and stopp'd at Milan, where he quell'd the Insurrection, by imprisoning the Rebels, and likewise the Archbishop the Promoter of it. He soon after went to Rome, where he heard the Complaints of a Multitude of People against the Prince of Capua; he took Cognizance of his Crimes, and having gone to the Monastery of Cassino, sent Ambassadors to Pandulphus to induce him by fair Means to restore what he had unjustly taken from that Monastery; but he persisting in his Disloyalty, Conrad came to Capua himself, and Pandulphus, to avoid his Indignation, retir'd to the Castle of S. Agatha. The Emperor being receiv'd in Capua with great Pomp and Rejoicings, was, with great Solemnity, and the usual Ceremonies, crown'd there on the Feast of Pentecost. It was then the Custom of the Emperors to repeat these Solemnities frequently on the most solemn Days of the Year; for this see how the most incomparable Pellegrinus corrects the Anonymous Cassinensis; for Conrad was not first crown'd King or Emperor in Capua, it was in the Year 1026 that he was proclaim'd King, and the Year following Emperor, the first time he came to Rome. In the mean time Pandulphus us'd all Means possible to pacify Conrad, by begging his Pardon; at last he offer'd him Three hundred Pounds of Gold, the half of which he paid immediately, and the other half was to be paid at a certain Time, and in the mean while, until the whole was paid, promis'd, to give his Daughter and a Nephew as Hostages; the Emperor accepted the Offer, to whom he presently sent the Money and Hostages. But this Prince soon after repenting of what he had done, and reckoning that he might easily get in again to Capua, as soon as Conrad was gone, after many Delays, he at last refus'd to pay the Remainder of the Gold. Conrad having now discover'd the Intention of this Prince, and that he would no sooner begone, than, according to his mischievous Inclinations, he would quickly return to Rapine and Cruelty, resolv'd to deprive him intirely of the Principality of Capua, and give the Investiture of it to another.

FOR which end he call'd an Assembly of the Grandees, and many of his Barons, at which he would likewise have the Noblemen of Capua present, that nothing might be done without their Advice and Consent, and in case Pandulphus was to be depos'd, he might more maturely advance another, that should be more deserving of the Principality. Pandulphus was depos'd, and the Principality given to Guaimarus of Salerno, a most prudent Man, and in great Favour with the Emperor Conrad; and now these two Principalities were united in the same Person.

PANDULPHUS having left his Son in the Castle of S. Agatha, went to Constantinople to seek Assistance from the Emperor. But being prevented by Guaimarus, instead of giving him Assistance, the Emperor banish'd him, and he continu'd an Exile as long as the Emperor liv'd, which was above two Years; after whose Death, he was restor'd to his Liberty by his Successor; but, not able to procure any Assistance, he return'd without Success ¹.

AT this time Guaimarus, being mindful of the signal Services the Normans had done him, took hold of the Opportunity to advance them; and to shew the Desire he had for their Promotion, he procur'd from the Emperor, the Investiture of the County of Aversa in favour of Rainulphus ²; for tho', as we have said, Rainulphus had been made Count over the Normans by Sergius Duke of Naples; yet that was no more than a Dignity bestow'd on him by way of Office, that is to say, appointing him Captain over his fellow Soldiers, as Pellegrinus has learnedly explain'd it. The Emperors of the West at this Time, claim'd the sole Right and Prerogative to give the Investiture of Fiefs over all Italy: The Popes, in Imitation of them, pretended afterwards, that the Investiture of Benefices belong'd to them only, of which we shall have occasion to treat elsewhere. Therefore Guaimarus, in order to give the Normans a more sure Footing in the County of Aversa, got the Emperor to invest him in it, by Virtue of which Investiture, he enjoy'd not only the Office, but likewise the Fief of the City and County, and all those Royalties, that are usually comprehended in such Concessions.

THE Normans made suitable Returns for these Favours, for not long after, by their Assistance, Guaimarus took Sorrento, and reserving the Title of Duke of Sorrento to himself, gave that City to Guido his Brother. With their Assistance he likewise conquer'd Amalphis, which he kept to himself, and subjected it to his own Principality ³. Soon after he assum'd the Title of Duke of Puglia and Calabria, and so many Titles and Seignories were united in his Person, that no Prince in those Times, equal'd him in Power and Grandeur in these our Provinces. Wherefore in some Charters recorded by Ughellus in his Italia Sacra, granted by Guaimarus IV. we observe so many Titles ascrib'd to this Prince, as in one dated in Melfis, Vigesimo Sexto anno Principatus Salerni Domini Nostri Guaimarii gloriosi Principis; & Sexto anno Principatus ejus Capuæ; & quinto anno Ducatus illius Amalphis, & Sirrenti & secundo anno supra scriptorum Principatum, & Ducatum Domini Gisulfi eximii Principis, & Ducis filii ejus; & secundo anno Ducatus eorum Apuliæ, & Calabriæ, mense Junii Duodecima Indictione ⁴.

IN the mean time Conrad, having left Capua, went to Benevento, from thence by la Marca, he cross'd the Mountains, carrying with him the Hostages he had got from Pandulphus; and in the following Year 1039, ended his Days in Germany, leaving Henry his Son, surnam'd the Black, his Successor in the Empire.

AMONG the many Excellencies wherewith Conrad was adorn'd, was his Skill in the Laws, and the great Care he had in establishing them: Upon his Arrival in Italy at Roncaglia, as was the Custom of his Predecessors, he establish'd many prudent and wise Laws; some of which we read in the third Book of the Lombard Laws, others in the Books of the Feudal Law, and Godafstus collected many more of them in his Volumes ⁵.

HE was the first, who, to the Feudal Customs, added written Laws for regulating Successions; and to this Day the Succession to Fiefs is regulated according to the Custom which the Lombards introduc'd into Italy. Fiefs, as we have said, according to antient Custom, were wont to be granted for a Time only ⁶, the Granter reserving to himself the Power to resume the Fief at his Pleasure. Afterwards the Grant was made for one Year only; at length Fiefs were granted during the Vassal's Life; but did not go to the Sons: In fine, one of the Sons was included, which was when the Lord confirm'd the Fief to him, that had been granted to the Father;

last of all, the Grant was extended to all the Sons, and by the Feudal Customs the Succession went no further.

CONRAD the Salick, before he came to Rome to take the Imperial Crown, in the Year 1026, according to the Custom of his Predecessors, in the Assembly of the Princes and People in Roncaglia, being requested by his Vassals, that he would be pleased to admit to the Succession of Fiefs, not only the Sons, but likewise their Sons; which failing, that the Brothers of the Deceas'd might also succeed, consented, and therefore a Law was publish'd, That if the Vassal should have no Sons alive, the Grandson, by a Son, should succeed in the Fief; and that if he had no Grandsons, but Brothers lawfully begotten of the same Father, they should likewise possess the Fief¹.

THIS Law, which is fully recorded by Sigonius², though the Compilers of the Feudal Books have not inserted it all, is to be read in the Third Book of the Longobard Laws, in which were collected all the other Laws of the Emperors of the West, as Kings of Italy, which were in Force, not only in Lombardy, and in all the other Parts of Italy, but likewise in these our Provinces, except what was subject to the Greek Empire, for the Reasons formerly mention'd in the Course of this History, and especially in the Time of Conrad, when the Authority of the Emperors of the West was at the Height of its Greatness in the Principalities of Capua, Salerno, and Benevento; when they depos'd the very Princes, and dispos'd of their Principalities at their Pleasure; the Longobard Laws were in greater Force and of more Authority in our Kingdom, than the Feudal, as we shall see hereafter when we come to treat of the Compilation of these and the Feudal Laws.

GERARDUS de Nigris, a Senator of Milan, in his first Book of Fiefs³, has given us the Substance of this Law; and the Compilers of the other Feudal Books have neglected to insert it among the other Feudal Constitutions of those Emperors that succeeded Conrad, because it had been already inserted in the Books of the Longobard Laws, the Use of which was more frequent amongst our Forefathers, than that of the Feudal Books; though from one Place of Andrea d'Isfernia⁴, we gather, that it had likewise been transcrib'd in some Codes of the Feudal Laws, that were then in every Body's Hands, though in many Places mangled and torn.

WE have other Capitula of this Prince in the second Book of Fiefs, under the Title da Capitulis Conradi, likewise enacted in Roncaglia, in which also Fiefs are treated of. Neither, by the bye, is the Error of Carolus Molineus⁵ pardonable, when at the same time that he blames our Interpreters, who, through their Ignorance in History, fell into many Blunders, he himself stumbles upon what he had found Fault with in them, by attributing these Capitula not to Conrad the Salick, but to Conrad II.; for this Conrad, of whom he is speaking, was never in Italy, so that he could not enact them in Roncaglia.

WHENCE we are likewise convinced of the other Mistake of Molineus⁶, into which we cannot but admire, that besides Craig and Hornius, our most careful Pellegrinus⁷ should also have fallen, who, on very slender Grounds, have reckon'd Lotbair I. Grandchild of Charles the Great, Author of that Constitution, which we read in the first Book of Fiefs⁸, by which the Succession to Fiefs was extended to the Father's Brother; for if that Emperor had been Author of it, Conrad the Salick could not have been the first, who added the written Laws to the Feudal Customs; but Lotbair I. who held the Empire of the West more than 200 Years before Conrad.

BUT we are convinc'd, that this Law was Lotbair's III. (whom others with more Truth call II.; as for the other Lotbair, who for a few Days usurp'd the Empire after Berengarius, amidst so many Revolutions, we are not to mind him) and not Lotbair's I. because it was publish'd in Rome in the Year 1133 or 1137, under the Pontificate of Innocent, and not of Eugen, as we read incorrectly in the vulgar Code, in an Assembly (as was usual) of the knowing Men and Barons of many Cities of Italy; and Conrad's Law concerning Succession in Fiefs was confirm'd by Lothaire; and besides, the Succession was extended in favour of the Father's Brother, which Conrad had not done, as the incomparable Cujacius learnedly observ'd, tho' unjustly censur'd by Pellegrinus. This will be yet more evident when we consider, that if from the Time of Lothaire I. Uncles on the Father's Side, were allow'd to succeed to Fiefs, it would have been ridiculous to have intreated Conrad with so much Earnestness, as the Vassals then did, to extend the Succession to Brothers, when 200 Years before, it had been allow'd even to Uncles. We are convinc'd by other Arguments, that this Law ought to be attributed to Lothaire III. which may be seen in Schilterus and Struvius. But we must pardon this Mistake in the most careful Pellegrinus, who would meddle for once in Matters that did not concern him, but not in Molineus, who was most knowing in our Feudal Laws.

CHAP. II.

The Conquest of Puglia by the Normans.

WHILST Conrad was employ'd in setting the Affairs of Italy in order, there fell out in these our Provinces, such favourable Opportunities for the Normans to aggrandize themselves, as rais'd their Minds to more daring Undertakings. These noble and valiant Champions who fought under the Banner of Guaimarus Prince of Salerno, by various Conjunctions, became so powerful, that Guaimarus himself began to be jealous of them, especially the Interest which the Sons of Tancred acquir'd, gave him Umbrage, though he durst not shew it; whereupon, in order to get rid of these Suspicions, he bethought himself of Means for removing them to some distant Place on honourable Pretexts, being afraid to deal roughly with them in his own Territories; when behold an Opportunity offer'd, which was equally advantageous to both.

THE Empire of the East, which, as we have said, after the Death of Basilus and Constantine, was govern'd by the Emperor Romanus Argirus, by frequent Disorders and intestine Commotions, was miserably declining in its Grandeur and Splendor, and a great Part of it had been subdued by the Saracens, whose Fury these Emperors were not able to restrain. The Greeks, who imputed their Declension to the Cowardice of their Sovereigns, frequently mutiny'd, murder'd their Princes, and set up others in their Room, whom they thought capable to restore the Empire to its antient Grandeur; but being often disappointed in their Expectations, and yet most imprudently persisting in the same Course of Tumult and Slaughter, at last, were the Cause of the total Ruin of so great and vast an Empire. For this end, having advanc'd Michael Paphlagon to the Throne, they allow'd him barbarously to murder the Emperor Romanus. This cunning Prince, in order to get his Election approv'd of by the People, and to convince them that they had not been mistaken, as at other Times, in raising him to the Throne, resolv'd to gain their Esteem by a notable Conquest, by driving the Saracens out of Sicily, and reuniting it as formerly to the Greek Empire, from which it had been torn by these Barbarians; for which Purpose, in the Year 1037, he sent an Army into Italy, under the Command of the Catapanus Georgius Maniaces, who, upon his Arrival, did all that was possible for putting the Designs of his Sovereign in Execution¹. The Fame of the Norman Valour had reach'd the furthest Parts of the East, so that Maniaces thought it absolutely necessary to have some of these gallant Champions to assist him in the Expedition; therefore in the Name of the Emperor, he begg'd of Prince Guaimarus, that he would let him have some of these brave Soldiers, that had lately acquir'd so great Reputation in his Country, assuring him that he would be very thankful for such a Favour. But there was no need of much intreaty to procure Guaimarus's Consent to what he desired. He was as willing to give the Normans, as Maniaces was to have them, whereupon he acquainted them with the Emperor's Designs, and demonstrated, that their Compliance would be of great Advantage to them; he likewise promis'd them great Things, besides what the Emperor was to bestow on them.

THE Normans, considering that this Opportunity might not only put them in a way of acquiring Honour, but likewise be a Means of getting a more sure Footing, immediately accepted the Offer, and march'd from Salerno, in number Three hundred, having at their Head, William, Draco and Umfred, the Sons of Tancred, who not long before had come thither from *Normandy*². Maniaces received them with much Pleasure, and having presently sent for some Troops out of Puglia and Calabria, Provinces subject to the Greeks, caus'd the Fleet to be made ready, and sail'd immediately for Sicily, and arriving at Messina, laid close Siege to it. Such was the Valour of the Normans in this Expedition, that the Place soon surrendred, and Maniaces declar'd that this Conquest was owing to the Normans alone, which so heighten'd the Esteem he had for them, that he made them Presents, with fresh Promises, in order to encourage them to fight still more boldly³. He advanc'd further into the Country, and made himself Master of considerable Posts, and marching to Syracuse, laid Siege to it. This Place was commanded for the Saracens, by a certain Arcadius, who, vigorously attacking the Greek Army, put it in Disorder; but while he was boasting of this Action, William gave him such a furious Blow with his Lance, that he laid him dead at his Feet. At which both the Greeks and Saracens were equally astonish'd, and 'tis said, that it was on this Occasion he got the Surname of Bracciodiferro, or Iron-arm.

THE Saracens immediately rally'd their Troops; but William with his Men being posted at the Head of the Greeks, dispers'd them in such a Manner, that the Greeks remain'd Masters of the Field; but the Greeks taking Advantage of the Victory, which was solely owing to the Normans, for they had no other Share in it, but that of bare Spectators, took all the Spoil of the Enemies, and divided it amongst themselves, without leaving any Part of it to the Normans, who had acquir'd it by their Valour. For the Greeks, according to their wonted Vanity and Haughtiness, began to slight this gallant People, and to give the Command of Towns to Greeks only, without minding the Normans, contrary to what Maniaces had promis'd. But they being highly provok'd at so great Ingratitude, resolv'd to complain to Maniaces of these Wrongs the Greeks did them, that they might discover how he took it, and whether he approv'd of what had pass'd. There had accompanied the Normans in this Expedition, a gallant Lombard, of the Family of the Archbishop of Milan, according to *Ofsiensis*⁴, nam'd Arduinus; but Curopolata and Cedrenus will have it, that this Arduinus had been a Captain of the Norman Troops, who being well skill'd in the Greek Language, serv'd them as Interpreter; him they sent to Maniaces, to represent their Grievances, which he did in a very handsome Manner; but Maniaces taking these Complaints amiss, look'd upon them as an Incroachment upon his Authority, and upbraided the Messenger. Besides, Arduinus having taken a fine Horse from a Saracen, whom he had knock'd down, was commanded to restore him, as belonging to Maniaces, but refusing to comply, had not only the Horse taken from him, but was himself ignominiously whipt round the Camp⁵. *Gulielmus Pugliensis*⁶ and *Cedrenus*⁷ report, that this Affront was put upon Arduinus not by Maniaces, but Doceanus, who succeeded him in the Command. However that may be, the Normans taking the ignominious Usage as no less done to them, than to Arduinus who receiv'd it, highly incens'd, resolv'd to take Arms immediately upon the very Spot against the Greeks, in order to wash away with their Blood, the Injuries they had hitherto receiv'd; but Arduinus, who was meditating how to revenge himself to better Purpose, hinder'd them, and shewing himself more cunning than the Normans, perswaded them to take no notice of what had pass'd, any more than he himself would do, until he had accomplish'd a certain Design, which would pave the way to greater Conquests.

HE bethought himself, considering the Condition of the Greek Forces in Puglia and Calabria, that there was good Ground to hope, if they were invaded by the Normans, they would subject themselves to their Dominion; and indeed they could expect no better Opportunity than this; for these Provinces, by reason of the Expedition of Sicily, which the Greeks had upon their Hands, were quite drain'd of Troops, Maniaces having transported them, as we have said, to Sicily for this Expedition; neither was there any Thing to be fear'd from the Inhabitants, who on account of the harsh Government, and the Vanity and Haughtiness of the Catapani, had frequently rebell'd, and were only kept under by Force: So far were they from being willing to oppose those who endeavour'd to withdraw them from the Greek Empire, which they abhorr'd and detested to that Degree, that in order to shake it off, they had attempted to subject themselves to Melo their Countryman, and a Citizen of Bari. Besides they were much weaken'd by the Wars which our Longobard Princes had often made against them; but especially by the frequent Incurfions of the Saracens, who being fortified in Monte Gargano, kept Puglia in continual Fear and Confusion.

ON the other hand the Normans were still increasing in Number, some coming daily, either from Normandy, or the Holy Land, whither they went on Pilgrimage. The Settlement of Rainulphus in the County of Aversa, contributed much to the Support of the Normans; for, besides that Sergius Duke of Naples was his Ally and Kinsman, he kept his warlike Normans in so good Discipline, that they were always ready for any Undertaking, how great soever.

BUT besides all these Things, 'tis incredible how much the Confusion and Disorders that happen'd in Constantinople, which turn'd that Empire and all its Provinces topsy-turvy, conduc'd to this Undertaking. These were the most favourable Conjunctions which at last brought their Designs to bear in such a manner, as we shall by-and-by relate.

AR DUINUS, in order to cloke his Designs, seem'd no ways concern'd at the Affront, and the Normans likewise dissembled it, and, as if no such Thing had happen'd he behav'd himself civilly to all the Greeks of his Acquaintance. In short, he knew so well how to dissemble, that, as Malaterra relates ¹, having brib'd Maniaces's Secretary, he prevail'd so far upon him, that he obtain'd a Passport for himself, with some of his Men to go to Calabria. Leo Ostiensis ² relates, that in order to obtain this, he pretended he was going to Rome out of Devotion to visit the Holy Places; however that may be, the Normans having one Night imbarck'd with him, cross'd the Phare by means of the Passport without any Obstacle. They no sooner landed in Calabria than they began to destroy all the Country, and march'd towards Puglia, resolving to make themselves Masters of it, not without well-grounded Hopes of succeeding. For this end Arduinus went to Aversa to solicit Assistance from Rainulphus; to whom he laid open his Designs, that Puglia, a large and opulent, but defenceless Province, because the Greeks were become effeminate, would be an easy Conquest; and that it would be a Reproach, if now, when the Number of the Normans, so famous Warriors, and renown'd for so many Victories, was increas'd, they should be any longer coop'd up, betwixt Penury and Misery, within the narrow Bounds of a small County ³. Rainulphus was pleas'd with the Advice, approv'd of all that Arduinus had set forth, and without longer Delay assembled some Troops, committing them to the Charge of twelve gallant Captains; and that there might arise no Disputes, it was unanimously agreed, that the Conquests should be equally divided amongst them; and a half given to Arduinus, as the chief Author of the Undertaking, every one solemnly swearing exactly to observe what had been agreed to amongst them. Arduinus return'd with Three hundred Soldiers, and being join'd with some other Normans in Puglia, immediately besieg'd Melphis, one of the most considerable Cities at that Time in Puglia. The Inhabitants being surpriz'd, presently surrender'd the Place. They quickly after made themselves Masters of Venosa, Ascoli and Lavello. They so fortified Melphis, strong by its natural Situation, that it became impregnable, the Seat of their Dominion, and Head of all the other neighbouring Cities which they conquer'd. Thus the Normans this Year 1041, having made themselves Masters of a considerable Part of Puglia, soon after began to extend the Bounds of their Dominion over all the Province.

THE Greeks being surpriz'd at this Loss, and impatient to recover it, were prevented by the Disorders which luckily fell out in the East, as if they had been of purpose to favour the Normans, and which put all the Court of Constantinople in Confusion. The Emperor Michael, surnam'd Papblagon, whom the Empreſs Zoe lov'd so much, that for a Reward of the Familiarity they had had together, she rais'd him to the Imperial Throne, fell into a kind of an Epilepsy, and being wearied of Government, turn'd Monk. He left the Empire to his Nephew, likewise call'd Michael, surnam'd Calaphates, under the Tuition of his Uncle John; but this new Emperor, on account of his Cruelty, and for having turn'd out his Uncle John, to whom he ow'd so much, and much more for having treated the Empreſs Zoe so ungratefully, who had adopted him her Son, and rais'd him to the Imperial Dignity, had made himself so odious and abhorr'd of his Subjects, that by openly rebelling they restor'd Zoe to the Throne. She was no sooner restor'd, than she turn'd out Calaphates, caus'd his Eyes to be put out, and married Constantinus Monomachus, who also became her Colleague in the Empire¹. By reason of these preceding and subsequent Troubles, the Affairs of Puglia, Calabria and Sicily, went very cross for the Greeks. Maniaces began to think of taking Advantage of them, and was suspected of having a Design to take Possession of Sicily for himself, of which being accus'd at Court, he was quickly recall'd, and condemn'd to close Prison. These different Catastrophes hinder'd the Court of Constantinople from being able to put a Stop to the Designs of the Normans, who in the mean time had successfully executed in Puglia, what Maniaces had unfortunately attempted to do in Sicily.

BUT at last the Greeks lost all Patience, and the Emperor having assembled a powerful Army, sent it to Puglia under the Command of a new General nam'd Ducio, in order to recover the Cities that had been taken from them, with Orders to give no Quarter to the Normans, but to extirpate them altogether. They had a fierce Engagement at the River Olievento, but such was the Courage and Bravery of the Normans, that tho' the Greeks were much superior both in Number and Force, yet they broke them, and made a prodigious Slaughter among them, and Ducio escap'd with Difficulty, to send to Constantinople to acquaint the Emperor with the unfortunate Event². This Prince being terribly griev'd, caus'd other Troops to be assembled, and immediately sent them to Ducio: They fought a second Time at Canne, where the Greeks were likewise defeated. They engag'd anew at the River Ofanto, but the brave Normans gave them so terrible an Overthrow this third Time³, that they quite dispers'd them, and made themselves Masters of many other Castles in that Neighbourhood; and thus, enrich'd with the Spoils of the Greeks, they came to have a powerful Footing in that Province.

THESE gallant and skilful Warriors, lest their Power should create Jealousy in the neighbouring Longobard Princes, in order to gain the Affections of the People of the Country, resolv'd to chuse a Commander in Chief, of their Nation, whom they were to obey as their Fellow-Soldier. Prince Pandulphus III. who govern'd at this Time in Benevento, had a Brother nam'd Adinolphus, whom they unanimously elected for their Leader⁴.

IN the mean time the Court of Constantinople, which had been extremely surpriz'd at these unlucky Disasters, blaming Ducio for all, presently recall'd him, and caus'd a stronger Army to be assembled, and sent to Calabria under the Command of another General. This was Exaugustus, by Malaterra surnam'd Annon, Son of that Bugianus, who in the Empire of Basilus, had behaved himself so excellently well against the famous *Melo*¹; but he, who had no better luck than his Predecessor, having engag'd with the Normans under Monte Piloso, or as Cedrenus reports² at Monopolis, was so terribly routed (in which Action Bracciodiferro signaliz'd himself above all the rest) that the greatest Part of his Army being cut to pieces and dispers'd, he himself was taken and made Prisoner. The Normans being overjoy'd, and triumphing on so glorious an Action, held a Council amongst themselves how to dispose of Exaugustus, and resolv'd to make a Present of him to Duke Adinulphus; but this Prince left the Normans, and carried him to Benevento, in order to dispose of his Prisoner for his own Advantage, and, contrary to the Expectation of the Normans, sold him to the Greeks for a great Sum of Money.

THIS so highly incens'd the Normans, who had not observ'd great Tokens of his Courage in the many Engagements he had been with them, that they resolv'd to chuse another Leader, and unanimously elected Argirus the Son of the famous Melo, who not long before having been Prisoner in Constantinople, had cunningly made his Escape on the Death of Michael Paphlagon, and being arriv'd in Puglia, was kindly receiv'd by the Normans, who, for the Motives above related, not taking upon them as yet to elect one of their own Nation, thought it better to bestow that Honour on Argirus, by raising him up upon a Shield, according to the Custom at that Time us'd in France.

THE Court of Constantinople being to seek what Captain they should now send, resolv'd anew to make use of Maniaces, whereupon, they set him at Liberty, and sent him immediately to Calabria against the *Normans*³. Maniaces would signalize his coming above all the rest with unheard-of Cruelty, and struck so much Terror into the Country, that the Normans having engag'd him near Monopolis and Matera, and finding they were unequally match'd, thought it best to retire to some fortified Places, there to wait some lucky Turn, and till he had spent his Fury.

THEY were not disappointed, for soon after the Emperor Calaphates, as we have said, having been depos'd, and Constantinus Monomachus rais'd to the Throne by the Empress Zoe, whom she married: Maniaces hearing that the Advancement of Constantine gave Offence, resolv'd to make Advantage of the so many Disorders of the Court, and openly rebell'd against Zoe and Monomachus, with a Design to get himself proclaim'd Emperor by his Adherents; and having laid aside all Thoughts of Assistance from Constantine, he intangled himself in many difficult Undertakings, which created him Trouble, and gave him Diversion in many Places. For having thrown off all Respect and Obedience to his Prince, he barbarously laid waste all the Country about Monopolis and Matera, at the same Time that Argirus on the other hand had taken Giovenazzo, and besieg'd Trani; whereupon the Emperor Constantine sent Pardus into Puglia as new Catapanus, with a great Sum of Gold and Silver, in order to suppress the Rebellion of Maniaces; who being advis'd of it, surrounded him with his Soldiers, cruelly murder'd him, and stripp'd him of all his Treasure, which he shar'd betwixt himself and his Army, by which means he got himself to be proclaim'd Emperor, and put on all the Marks of Empire⁴; afterwards having in vain attack'd Bari, he retir'd to Taranto, where he had fix'd his Residence. There Argirus and the Normans besieg'd him; seeing himself not secure there, he went to Otranto, from thence, crossing the Adriatick, he arriv'd in Bulgaria; where engaging with Stephanus Sebastophorus, he was defeated and taken, and had his Head struck off and sent to the Emperor in *Constantinople*⁵.

THE Normans amidst so many Revolutions, neglected not to make their Advantage, so that with little Trouble they regain'd what they had abandon'd upon the coming of Maniaces. And by the new Conquests which they Daily made, having establish'd their Fortunes on a better Footing, for the greater Security, they resolv'd to have no Captain but one of their own Nation; and tho' they had a great Esteem for Argirus, yet they had observ'd, that under his Command they had not been able to maintain themselves against the Power of Maniaces, and that the greatest and most glorious Actions had been owing to William Bracciodiferro; they therefore thought it better to put themselves under his Command; whereupon they assembled this Year 1043, in the City of Matera, where Maniaces a few Months before had exercis'd the greatest Cruelties, and elected him their Commander in Chief, and honour'd him with the Title of Count: He was therefore the first that was call'd Count of Puglia.

S E C T. I.

Of William Bracciodiferro, the first Count of Puglia, created in the Year 1043.

THIS was the first Title, and the Source of all the other Titles, which the Royal House of the Normans had in Puglia, and afterwards in Sicily; which it got, neither by the Authority of Pope Benedict XI. nor from the Greek Emperor Constantine XI. who at this Time reign'd in the East, but, as Lupus Protospata, and Leo Ostiensis relate, by the Election of the Captains, Soldiers and People, that is to say, the Italian, Longobard and Norman Lords, Heads and Prime Men of the Army, who being assembled in Council, ordain'd that the Title of Count should be conferr'd on William Bracciodiferro; which Decree being approv'd of by the inferior Captains, and all the Italian and Norman Army, he was by the Soldiery proclaim'd Count, which was a better and more legal Right, than if he had got it either from the Emperors of the East or West, or the Pope. 'Tis probable, as Inveges^{*} conjectures, that the Normans at this Election made use of particular Ceremonies in creating him Count; that besides the Sound of Kettle-Drums and Trumpets, which was the Custom at the Promotion of Counts (as may be seen in Hugo Falcandus, when Riccardo di Mandra was made Count of Molise) they made use of the old Italian Ceremony of putting the Standard in his Hands, as if he had been appointed chief Standard-Bearer of the Italian and Norman Confederacy, against the Emperor of the Greeks; and from that Time, in place of a Crown, the Counts wore above their Arms a plain Circle, without Jewels, in order to distinguish them from Marquisses and Dukes, and without Rays, to distinguish them from Princes.

THE Normans then having thus elected William Count of Puglia, in order peaceably to enjoy their Conquests, and to prevent Contention amongst themselves, resolv'd amicably to divide the conquer'd Places, as also those they had a mind to conquer. In the Beginning of their Dominion, they introduc'd a Polity and Form of Government, not unlike that which the Longobards had observ'd for the Space of ten Years, when upon the Death of Clephis, being unwilling to chuse a new King, they divided the Kingdom, and those to whom Counties were given in Charge, govern'd them with the same Laws and Institutions; but upon grave and weighty Emergencies they all conven'd in Pavia, where they discuss'd the most important Affairs of the Commonwealth.

THE Normans, tho' they fought under a Captain, whom they chose in order to avoid Confusion and Disorders, which usually fall out when Undertakings are not manag'd by one Person; nevertheless every one did his best, rather as a Fellow-Soldier than Officer, and many had equal Share in the Conquests, and gave the same Assistance. Rainulphus Count of Aversa had sent thither a good Body of Men under twelve Captains; William Bracciodiferro had very much signaliz'd himself in this Expedition; Drago and Umfred his Brothers had also distinguish'd themselves above all the rest; Arduinus the first Promoter of the Undertaking, and many other gallant Champions, did not fail to expose their Persons to all Danger, on all Occasions. Therefore from the Beginning, when they undertook so noble a Design, it was unanimously agreed, that what should be conquer'd was not to be given to one, but equally divided amongst them. And tho' William had been elected Count, yet that was only a Title of Honour, not that Puglia should be yielded to the Dominion of one single Person, as it was afterwards.

AT first they introduc'd a Form of Government rather Aristrocratical, than Monarchical, for by the Advice of Guaimarus Prince of Salerno, their ancient Ally, they call'd a Dyet in Melphis, where they were all to be present, to which they likewise invited Guaimarus and Rainulphus. They divided the Cities thus; to Rainulphus Count of Aversa, was given the City of Siponto, and Monte Gargano, with all the Villages and Places belonging to them; to William Bracciodiferro, was given the City of Ascoli, and with common Consent the Title of Count was annex'd to it; to Drago, Venosa; to Arnolius, Lavello; to Hugo, Monopolis; to Peter, Trani; to Walter, Civita; to Rodulphus, Catine; to Tristianus, Montepiloso; to Erveus, Trigento; to Asclittinus, Acerenza; to Rodulphus, St. Angelo; to Raimfridus, Minervino; and to Arduinus, according to their Oath, his Share was likewise assign'd. Thus what they had hitherto conquer'd in Puglia was divided. The City of Melphis only, which was the first and strongest Place they had as yet conquer'd, was common to all. They reserv'd this City as a Place of meeting for consulting about the most important Affairs of their Nation; whereupon Melphis began to raise its Head above all the other Cities of Puglia, so that the Popes thought it a fit Place to hold a Council in; and Amalphis being likewise famous for its Navigation, occasion'd, that the Ultramontane Writers, not being well acquainted with our Cities, often confounding the one City with the other, have taken the one for the other, being deceiv'd by the Resemblance of the Names.

THESE did the Normans make themselves Masters of the greatest Part of our Puglia; neither were their Conquests confin'd to this Province, but were carried on in the other Provinces, as we shall shortly relate. They took Puglia from the Greeks, who were in Possession of it, tho' the Emperor of the West pretended a Right to it as King of Italy, to whom, as a Part of the Kingdom of the Lombards, it was subject, and govern'd by Castaldi sent by the Dukes of Benevento; and therefore, when it again fell under the Dominion of the Greeks, the Othos often attempted to subject it to the Empire of the West, tho' in vain.

MEAN while Argirus, seeing no Share had been allow'd him in the Distribution of the Cities, separated from the Normans, and did not mind his being neglected by them, because he had resolv'd to make himself Prince of Bari, as his Father Melo had been; he had deserv'd well of the Emperor Constantinus Monomachus, by having suppress'd the Rebellion of Maniaces, and oblig'd him to fly to Bulgaria, where he was put to Death; for which he not only obtain'd the Favour of this Prince, but he likewise gave him Bari, with the Title of Prince, and Duke of Puglia, and he was also made a Patrician, that, as his Vassal, he might support his Interest in these Provinces. Thus Argirus being fix'd in this other Part of Puglia, under the Protection of the Emperor of the East, gave Rise to the Principality of Bari, which at last came likewise under the Dominion of the Normans, as we shall relate.

IN the mean time the Normans as they acquir'd greater Power, so they became more bold, and in a manner insolent in attacking their Neighbours. Those who serv'd under Rainulphus Count of Aversa, frequently molested the Monastery of Monte Cassino, and at last came to open Invasion; but the Abbot opposing them, it would have broke out into a bloody War, if Guaimarus their Ally, and at the same time a Friend of the Abbot, had not interpos'd, and made Peace betwixt them.

BUT this Year 1046, the Normans were grievously afflicted for the Death of two of their famous Captains. Those of Puglia lost the renown'd William, the Director of all their Affairs, who was indu'd with wonderful Resolution and Courage against his Enemies, and Meekness and Affability towards his own Men. He, as Gulielmus Appulienfis, his Cotemporary, relates¹, was a Lion in Battle, and a Lamb in Conversation and Council. He reign'd only three Years in Puglia; and had been in Italy from the Year 1035 to his Death, twelve Years; he was buried in Venosa in the Church of the Trinity, a City, that in the abovemention'd Division had been assign'd to Drago his Brother. Those of Aversa shortly after lost Count Rainulphus, who, having left no Sons, was succeeded by Asclittinus, according to *Ostiensis*², surnam'd Count John, or as Ordericus Vitalis has it³, de Quadrellis. Asclittinus govern'd the County of Aversa but a short Time, for dying in the Year 1047, tho' he left Sons, the County was soon invaded by Rodulphus, by Ostiensis surnam'd Capellus, and by Gulielmus Appulienfis Drincanottus; but he was quickly turn'd out by the Aversans, who chose another Rodulphus for Count, nam'd Trinclinottes, who dying soon after, the Aversans put Richard the Son of Asclittinus in his Place, who at that Time serving in the Wars in Puglia under Drago, whose Sister he had married, was recall'd by them, and got the Government of the County of Aversa. This was he, who in the Year 1058, having driven Prince Pandulphus V. out of Capua, made himself Master of that Principality, which he transmitted to his Posterity, as we shall relate: So that the first Norman Princes of Capua, were all descended from this Asclittinus; there's no occasion for confounding them with the other Normans of Puglia and Calabria, who were of the Race of Tancred Count of Hauteville ¹.

THESE likewise, on the Death of William, resolv'd immediately to appoint another in his Place; whereupon they chose Drago his Brother to be Count of Puglia ², a worthy and gallant Captain. Pirri, believing that William had left Sons, wrote, that the Normans having excluded these Sons, chose Drago his Brother in his Place, because it was their Custom to prefer the Elder Brothers to the Sons of the Deceas'd; but as Inveges well observes ³, that Reason is trifling, because amongst the Normans themselves, the Dukedom of Normandy went from Father to Son, as the Norman Chronicle and Gordon observe, and when Sons were wanting the Brothers succeeded; as Robert II. the sixth Duke, succeeded his Brother Richard III. who died without Issue, as Gordon observes, in the Year 1028. Hence 'tis more likely, that the Brother, and not the Son of William I. succeeded to the Title of Count, because William either had no Wife in Italy and France, or if he had, she was barren, according to Inveges; or that at first, the Counts of Puglia were not made by Succession, but Election.

D R A G O II. Count of Puglia.

WHILST Drago govern'd Puglia, his younger Brothers who had continu'd in Normandy, were passionately bent on coming to see him; their Father Tancred was at great Pains to keep two of them at least with himself, to keep up his Family in Normandy. Robert and some of his Brothers came hither, bringing with them many other Gentlemen of their Nation, who came not arm'd, or with a Body of Horse and Foot, but disguis'd in the Habits of Pilgrims, with Staves in their Hands, and Budgets on their Shoulders, as if they had been going to visit the Sanctuaries of Monte Cassino and Gargano, in order to shun being made Prisoners by the Romans, who seeing this foreign Nation to be so flourishing in Puglia, were already jealous of it, as an Enemy both of the Italians and Greeks. Thus the Normans fix'd themselves, and increas'd daily more and more in Puglia; which was owing to the good Conduct of Drago, who in order to their better footing, caus'd Umfred his third Brother, and the Eldest of those that had come along with him, to be created Count; and to Robert, who was afterwards nam'd Guiscard, the eldest Son of Tancred by his second Wife, knowing him to be a Man of greater Parts, and more daring than the rest, he committed the greatest and boldest Undertakings; for having taken the Castle of St. Mark situated on the Frontiers of Calabria, he gave the Charge of it to him, with Orders, as Occasion should offer, by incroaching upon Calabria, to enlarge their Borders.

BUT whilst Drago was thus employ'd in raising his own Nation, there fell out other lucky Events at the same Time, which gave him more sure Footing in Puglia that he had newly conquer'd. The Emperor Henry II. as we have said, had succeeded his Father Conrad in the Empire, and being diverted by the Hungarian War, could not mind the Affairs of Italy; but having disingag'd himself the best way he could from that Expedition, he was for diverse Reasons necessarily forc'd to come into Italy. The News of so many Revolutions which happen'd in these our Provinces

Provinces drew him hither, over which, as King of Italy, he was not willing to lose that Sovereignty and Title his Predecessors had possess'd; and tho' he did not much mind the Growth of the Normans in Puglia and Calabria, thinking it would be for his Advantage if these two Provinces were wholly taken from the Greeks; nevertheless he was willing that the Normans should hold them of him; and as the Lombard Princes had acknowledg'd him for their Sovereign, so he would have the Normans do the same. But the Disorders and Confusions, and the abominable Enormities which arose in Rome on account of the Elections of the Popes, were the chief Causes of his coming to Italy; for the Imperial Authority being sunk in Rome, and the People having reassum'd the Power of electing the Pope, this Church fell again into Confusion and Disorder. This City had never been so grievously afflicted by the Avarice and abominable Behaviour of the Ecclesiastical Order as at this Time. The greatest Prelates did not stick to purchase with Money the greatest Offices, not excepting the High Priesthood, and that in Face of the Sun, and as publickly to expose the most sacred Functions to Sale. They did not stand in awe with open Force and Arms to invade the Cathedral of St. Peter; and when Faction and Arms fail'd, they had recourse to Ambition, Simony, Poison, Treachery, and Murder; for Benedict made no scruple to sell one Share of the Pontificate to Sylvester III. and another to Gregory VI. all three sitting in Rome at the same Time, which occasion'd horrible Confusion, especially when Gregory, both with Horse and Foot Soldiers possess'd himself of St. Peter's Church, and much strengthen'd his Party by a great Slaughter of his Opposers. Learning and the Doctrine of the Fathers were laid aside, and no Vestige of the Gospel remain'd. The Deacons, Priests, and even Bishops, were not asham'd to keep Concubines publickly in their Houses, even in Rome; neither did they blush to make their spurious Children their Heirs by their last Wills. In short Rome was become another Babylon, there being no Wickedness which they did not commit; insomuch, that few had Virtue enough to resist the Contagion; and those who have written of the Calamities of these Times, confess they want Words sufficient to express such heinous Enormities and Wickedness; and the famous Abbot Desiderius, who liv'd in these Times, being afterwards rais'd to the Pontificate by the Name of Victor III. giving a short Relation of these Debaucheries, declares that he had not the Courage to name them, because of the Horror such Looseness of Manners rais'd in him¹.

THEREFORE Henry came to Rome this Year 1047, and tho' he did what he could to redress so great Wickedness, by expelling Benedict, turning out Sylvester, and banishing Gregory to Germany; yet the Manners of the Ecclesiasticks were so detestable, and their Ignorance so great, that when a new Pope was to be chosen, Ostiensis laments sadly², that there was not one to be found in Italy worthy of that Office; so that to make the best of a bad Market, they were forc'd to elect a Saxon, Bishop of Bamberg, who took the Name of Clement II.

THE Romans being highly pleas'd with Henry for his good Conduct, elected him for their Patrician, and besides the Imperial, they adorn'd him with the golden Patrician Crown. Henry now disingag'd from the Affairs of Rome, set out for these Provinces, together with Pope Clement, to settle the Affairs thereof, visited Monte Cassino, and stopp'd in *Capua*³. Prince Guaimarus had held the Principality of Capua nine Years, and had been invested in it by Conrad, who had taken it from Pandulphus; but this Prince, on account of his many Acquisitions, gave great Jealousy to the rest; for after having added the Principality of Capua to that of Salerno, he had likewise subjeected the Dukedom of Sorrento, and the more considerable one of Amalphis; he had for Vassal the Duke of Gaeta; and moreover, with the Assistance of the same Normans whom Argirus, while he was besieging Bari, had sent him, he aspir'd to the Conquest of Puglia and Calabria; neither did he stick, as we have said, out of Vain-glory, to assume likewise amongst his Titles, that of Duke of Puglia and Calabria.

ON the other hand Pandulphus, who had been expell'd by Conrad, and after the Death of Calefatus, had been freed from his Exile by his Successor, was return'd to Italy, and with the Help of the Counts of Aquino and Sesto, began to think of getting himself restor'd to his Principality; whereupon after the Death of Conrad, who never could bear him because of his Cruelty, when Henry succeeded, he entertain'd better Hopes. For Henry, partly spur'd on by the Jealousy which the overgrown Power of Guaimarus had rais'd in him, and partly by the pressing Sollicitations and rich Presents of Pandulphus, came to Capua, and manag'd Matters so dextrously with Guaimarus, that he made him resign the Principality into his Hands, which he bestow'd on Pandulphus and Landulphus his Son ¹.

The first Investitures given by the Emperor Henry to the Normans.

THE Affairs of Capua being thus settled, Henry resolv'd to gain the Normans over to his Interest, and was very solicitous to have them to hold of him. Mean while Drago Count of Puglia, and Rainulphus Count of Aversa, had not neglected, as soon as Henry came to Capua, to tender him their Respects; they visited him, and made him a Present of many Horses, and a great Sum of Money. At this Time Henry gave the Investiture to these Norman Princes of the County of Aversa (as Conrad had formerly done to the other Rainulphus) and to Drago of all he possess'd in Puglia ¹. Thus did these new Princes get themselves more firmly establish'd in those Dominions, which they had possess'd hitherto by Virtue of no other Right but what the Law of Arms had given them. Altho' the Normans had taken Puglia and Calabria from the Greeks, and not from Henry, nevertheless the Emperors of the West pretended they belong'd to them as Kings of Italy, to whom these Provinces were subject during the Dominion of the Longobards; for regaining of which, the Emperors had had many Wars with the Greeks, therefore it ought not to seem strange, if on all Occasions that offer'd, they were willing to invest those who had taken them from the Greeks, which was now the Case of the Normans.

BUT Henry not only gave them the Investiture of these States, but likewise yielded them all the Territory of Benevento, on the Occasion which we shall relate. At this Time Pandulphus III. with his Son Landulphus govern'd the Principality of Benevento ²: Henry after he had invested the Normans in Capua, left that City in order to go to Benevento; the Beneventans remembering that they had always been ill us'd by the Emperors of the West, particularly by the two last Otho's, the Emperors Visits were no ways acceptable to them. Now that they heard of Henry's coming, and that he was bringing Pope Clement II. along with him, they refus'd him Entrance, shut their Gates, and fortified themselves. Henry, highly offended at the Affront, and not in a Condition to revenge himself at that Time, got the Pope to excommunicate the whole City; whence, as we have observ'd in another Place, 'tis evident, that long before Gregory VII. general Interdictions of whole Cities were in use in the Church; and not content with this, he took all the Territory from the Beneventans, and those open Places of the Principality that were easily conquer'd, and of his own Authority gave them to the Normans ³.

THUS Henry having better establish'd the Normans in the Counties of Aversa and Puglia, and part of the Principality of Benevento, return'd to Germany, carrying with him Pope Clement, and Gregory the former Pope, on whom he had pass'd Sentence of Banishment.

THIS Year then 1047, the Royal Norman House began to subject itself to take Investiture and Infeoffment, not from the Roman Pontiffs, who at this Time did not pretend to it, but from the Emperors of the West, who as Kings of Italy, for the Reasons already mention'd, believ'd that these Provinces belong'd to their Empire.

BUT

BUT whilst the Emperor of the West was thus disposing of these our Provinces, the Emperor of the East, who had been appriz'd, that Henry had granted the Investiture of Puglia to the Normans, and that he had dispos'd of this Province as if it belong'd to his Empire, and not to that of the East, as it did; and that therefore the Normans were establish'd in such a manner, that there were no Hopes left of expelling them out of it, full of Rage and Indignation, resolv'd immediately to send a new Officer nam'd Argirus, loaded with Gold, Silver, and rich Stuffs, that if he should not be able to drive them out by Force, he might endeavour to do it by Bribery, and inviting them in the Name of the Emperor to go over with their Troops into Greece, where they should have suitable Commands in a War he had resolv'd to make upon the Persians, by which they would reap great Advantage¹. The Normans, who immediately perceiv'd the Snare, answer'd him frankly, that they were resolv'd never to leave Italy, unless expell'd by Force. Argirus was so vex'd to see that all his Artifice was discover'd, that he resolv'd to make use of other more villainous Means. With the Treasure he had brought from Constantinople he brib'd many of the Puglians, and some that were most intimate with Drago, and among the rest, one nam'd Riso, who was likewise his Creature². This Traytor, whilst Drago in one of his Castles, nam'd Montoglio, was going to Church in the Morning, hid himself behind the Door, and flew upon him and kill'd him with a Dagger; the other Conspirators, who had also hid themselves with Riso, kill'd a great many of the Count's Guard, and made themselves Masters of the Fort. The same was done in diverse Parts of Puglia, where they had been acquainted with the Conspiracy; so that there was greater Slaughter made among the Normans by this Conspiracy, than had been in the Wars which had lasted many Years.

BUT Umfred, who had been made Count in Drago's Life-time, with extreme Grief being appriz'd of the Death of his Brother, and the barbarous and treacherous Murder of those of his Nation by the Puglians, presently join'd all his Forces, and having vigorously attack'd the Castle of Montoglio, after a long Siege made himself Master of it, and having got the Assassine, with his Accomplices into his Hands, put them to Death by different sorts of exquisite Torments. Argirus resolv'd to defend himself, by heading some few Troops which he assembled; but Umfred attack'd him, defeated him, and forc'd him to retire in Confusion, which brought him in Disgrace with the Emperor, so that soon after he died of Grief. From this Incident, the Normans, in order to be reveng'd of the Greeks, were resolutely bent on driving them out of Calabria, and began to keep a watchful Eye over the Puglians, and to treat them more roughly, who therefore being wearied of their Government, began to fill the World with Complaints, and to invent the most odious Calumnies against the Normans. They charg'd them as guilty of a Thousand Crimes; call'd their Government Tyrannical and Cruel, laid their Grievances before Henry, and shortly after before Pope Leo, whence proceeded the many Innovations and Disorders which we are now going to relate.

C H A P. III.

The Origine of our Papal Investitures ; and the unfortunate Expedition of Leo IX. against the Normans. His Imprisonment and Death.

THE Subject we are now about to treat of, by reason of its Novelty and Oddness, needs no Recommendation : It contains an Attempt of the Popes upon this Kingdom, and in what Manner, and from what slender Beginnings they have at last obtain'd, that now it is reputed a Fief of the Church of Rome. Neither is the Oddness of it more surprising, than how, without an Army, without a Fleet, but only by their exquisite Cunning, and continual Application, they have been able to establish this Right, acquir'd by them not as Heads of the universal Church, or Patriarchs of the West, but as secular Princes, and to accomplish what neither the Emperors of the West, nor those of the East, by long Wars, and great Armies, could ever obtain. But the Quarrels of Princes, the Stupidity and Superstition of the People, the Ignorance and Barbarity of the Age, and the exquisite Cunning of the Popes, all put together, were sufficient to remove all Obstacles and Impediments.

FROM this Time forth, having occasion frequently to mention the Roman Pontiffs, that I may not be charg'd with Temerity, my Purpose is not to speak of them as High Priests, and Vicars of Christ ; but as secular Princes, who, in order to make themselves Masters of many States and Principalities in Italy, minded their own Interest, like all the other Princes, who had Dominion there. I shall make a just Distinction betwixt these two Personages ; when I have occasion to discourse of the Ecclesiastical Polity, then I speak of them as Heads of the Church, and Patriarchs of the West, who have the Government of our Churches. When they meddle with secular Affairs, they shall be represented only as Men, like other Princes. Therefore it will not seem strange to see them in these Times at the Head of Armies, making Leagues, and enlisting Soldiers : Which made the Schism betwixt the Greeks and Latins the more irreconcilable, and gave occasion to the Greeks to call the Roman Pontiffs, no more Bishops, but Emperors ; and *Petrus Diaconus*¹ in the Acts, of the Dispute which he had before the Emperor Lothaire, and which the Abbot of *Noce*² avouches for true, contrary to the Opinion of Baronius, relates, that a Philosopher having come out of Greece into Italy, made an Oration in presence of the Emperor Lothaire, and among other things told him ; Romanum Pontificem, Imperatorem, non Episcopum esse ; and the same Writer reports³, that having had a Dispute with the same Person about the Holy Ghost's proceeding from the Father and the Son, among other Things, the Greek upbraided him, and speaking of Innocent II. said, In occidentali climate nunc impletum videmus quod Dominus per prophetam dicit, Erit, ut populus, sic sacerdos, cum pontifices ad bella ruunt ; sic papa vester Innocentius facit, pecunias distribuunt, milites congregant, purpurea vestimenta amiciuntur.

³ TIS likewise true, that when their Dominions were not in a Condition to furnish them with Money sufficient to maintain numerous Armies, they frequently joyn'd

the Spiritual to the Temporal Arms, by which they became superior to the Princes, and terrible to the People. They had usurp'd the Power of deposing Princes from their Kingdoms and Dominions, of raising and pulling them down at their Pleasure, of creating Dukes and Counts, and even believ'd that they had likewise Power of making Kings and Monarchs; and in the latter Ages, they carried Matters to such an Excess, that there was not a Prince in Europe, that did not do Homage to the Apostolical See as a Vassal. In fine, by these means they came to pretend, that this Kingdom was a Fief of their Church, and to treat the Possessors as their Subjects and Vassals.

HENCE proceeded so many Revolutions, when the Popes invited foreign Princes to come and take Possession of this Kingdom; hence arose so many Wars and Disorders; and that in process of Time, the Kings of Naples considering that their Kingdom, for a long Tract of Land, bordering upon the Estate of the Church, was liable to be disturb'd by the Power of the Popes; some of them, unwilling to bear the Yoke, were in continual Enmity and War with them, and often made themselves Masters of Rome; others more peaceable, did not think fit to quarrel with them, remembering the Calamities that had happen'd on that account, in the Reign of the Suevi, and the latter Debates which King Alphonfus I. and Ferdinand his Son had often with them; and seeing the Jurisdiction of the Borders, Tribute, Collation of Benefices, Tenures of the Barons, and many other Differences would still be Bones of Contention, they resolv'd to cultivate Friendship with them, judging themselves abundantly secure if they had all, or at least a Part of the most powerful Barons of the Roman Jurisdiction depending on them¹.

WE shall now speak of the Roman Pontiffs, as Princes; and I look upon it as a better way to handle their Case as such, on this Subject of Investitures, than to bring them on the Stage in the other Quality. If secular Princes will but look narrowly into the first Rise of their Kingdoms and Monarchies, few will be able to make good their Titles; for the best of them will be found grounded either on War, Usurpation or Rapine; but long and peaceable Possession for many Ages, gives them sufficient Right to the lawful Possession of them now, and it would be unjust to invade them. Thus if we consider the Popes as secular Princes, possessing many States in Italy, though they cannot shew a lawful Title to their Claim of Investitures, as we shall see anon, yet it cannot be reckon'd null and void, because of their long Possession. But what is thought sufficient to a temporal Prince, perhaps will not support the Claim of the Vicars of Jesus Christ: They ought to make a nice Inquiry, not so much into the Time and long Possession, as into the Rise, the Occasions, the Rights and first Grounds of their Acquisitions.

BUT before we come to lay open these Sources, and how in those Times the Roman Pontiffs, by means of these Investitures began to incroach upon the temporal State of these Provinces, and at last made them Feudatory, it will be necessary that we give a succinct Account of the State they were in in those Times, and by what Princes they were govern'd.

THE three Principalities of Benevento, Salerno and Capua were subject to the Longobard Princes: Pandolphus III. with his Son Landolphus, reign'd in Benevento; Guaimarus IV. in Salerno, and Pandolphus in Capua. The Dukedom of Amalphis, with that of Sorrento, which formerly belong'd to that of Naples, were subject to Guaimarus. The Dukedom of Gaeta was govern'd by John; and that of Naples by Sergius. The greatest Part of Puglia was under the Dominion of the Normans, and Calabria was in danger, but as yet belong'd to the Empire of the East. The Emperors both of the West and East, pretended equally to the Sovereignty and supreme Dominion of all these States. The Emperor of the West, as King of Italy, claim'd it over all that Tract of Country, which formerly was comprehended in the antient Dukedom of Benevento, and included almost all the present Kingdom; so that he exercis'd all Sovereignty over the Longobard Princes, and took upon him to depose them and expel them their States, and to bestow them on others. He claim'd the same over Puglia and Calabria, which formerly, for the most Part, were annex'd to the Dukedom of Benevento; and there being no End of Ambition, there was no Corner of these our Provinces, which he did not claim as subject to him; whereby he assum'd the Power of investing Rainulphus in the County of Aversa, tho' this City had been built within the Jurisdiction of the Dukedom of Naples, which by antient Right, belong'd to the Emperors of the East, and not to those of the West.

ON the other hand, the Emperor of the Greeks, perhaps on better Grounds; pretended that all these Provinces belong'd to his Empire of the East, from which they had been wrested, and unjustly possess'd by the Longobards. That the Provinces of Puglia and Calabria indisputably were subject to it, and that the Dukedoms of Naples, Amalphis, Gaeta and Serrento held of it.

THE Sovereignty of these our Provinces was disputed and struggled for, betwixt these two Princes, which was the Occasion of the many Wars we have related in the Course of this History. Hitherto the Roman Pontiffs had not dream'd of claiming a third Share, nor pretended to any Sovereignty over them. Altho', by the Bounty of Charles the Great, and his Successors, they had got a Share of the Spoils of the Longobards, which these had taken from the Greeks, whereby they became Lords and Masters of the Dukedom of Rome, the Exarchate of Ravenna, Pentapolis, and some other Cities of Italy, as we have seen in the preceding Books of this History; yet they had never intermeddled with these Provinces which now compose our Kingdom; and though we read in Ostiensis, that they pretended to have a Right over Gaeta, and had possess'd it for some time, nevertheless it was soon recover'd by the Greeks, and afterwards govern'd by its own Dukes; and these very Pretensions, which we read were confin'd to Gaeta alone, convince us the more, that all the Countries of the other Provinces were intirely out of the Question. Neither in these Times could such Pretensions be grounded on the counterfeited Donation of Constantine, or on that of Charles the Great, or Lewis the Good; for it is the constant Opinion of the most grave Authors, that all those Instruments and Diploma's, in the Manner they are now conceiv'd, were forg'd in the Time of Hildebrand; and much less could their Pretensions be founded on what we read of Lewis the Good, and the other Emperors his Successors, their having confirm'd the Patrimonies of Benevento, Salerno, Capua, Naples and those of Puglia and Calabria; for these Patrimonies, as we have seen elsewhere, were nothing but the Possessions, which the Church of Rome, by the Piety and Bounty of the Faithful, had in these Provinces, and were call'd St. Peter's Patrimony; so that *Chioccarelli*¹ was in the wrong, in order to give a Foundation to these Investitures, to rely on Constantine's Donation, and the Grants of Lewis and Otbo. Neither was it ever heard, that the Princes of Benevento, Salerno or Capua, and much less the Greeks, had ever acknowledg'd the Roman Pontiffs for their Sovereigns, or had ever sought Investiture of their Dominions, by becoming their Liege-men, or swearing Fealty and Homage to them.

'TIS very evident then, that the Roman Pontiffs had no manner of Superiority or any Right whatsoever, over these our Provinces, sufficient to justify their Claim; but by the Opportunities that were laid open to them in these Times, and which they greedily embrac'd, and cunningly made use of, at last they acquir'd it in the Manner we are going to relate.

AFTER the Death of Clement II. which fell out in Germany, whither, Nine Months before, he had gone in Company with the Emperor; Benedict, who had been expell'd by Henry, and had retir'd to, and fortify'd himself in his own Castles, immediately invaded the Papacy a-new, but could not hold it above Eight Months, for the Emperor Henry quickly sent Pope Bishop of Brixen, from Germany to Rome, in order to succeed Clement, who took the Name of Damasus. He died of Poyson 23 Days after his Exaltation, and the Romans intreated Henry to send them for Successor, Bruno Bishop of Toul, a German by Nation, and of Royal Descent, but much more famous for his Learning and Sanctity: in the Year 1049, they elected him Pope, and he was nam'd Leo IX.

IT was then thought, as his Co-temporary Writers² report, that by the Election of so eminent a Person, in such wretched Times, very rare to be found, the Affairs of Rome, and these our Provinces, would be restor'd to a State of Tranquillity, the Disorders of the Clergy be at an end, and Italy enjoy a settled Peace; but tho' the Piety of Leo and his unspotted Life were such, that at last he was Canoniz'd; nevertheless tho' not so much by his own Inclination, as by the Instigation of others, he was reputed the Author of many Innovations, which produc'd sad Disorders, and very pernicious Consequences. It was he, who, travelling through France in his Pontifical Habits, met Hildebrand a Monk of Cassino, at Clugny, a Man of singular Cunning, and was persuaded by him, to strip himself of his Pontifical Garments, and enter Rome like a Pilgrim, and get himself elected Pope by the People and Clergy, in order to abrogate the Abuse of receiving the High Priesthood from Laick Hands. This was the Seed of the many Disorders and cruel Wars, about Investitures, betwixt the Popes and the Emperors of the West, who seeing this Privilege, which for many Years they had maintain'd, contraverted, march'd Armies in order to preserve it, burning and destroying where-ever they went; and on the other Hand, the Successors of Leo, and especially this same Hildebrand, who was afterwards Pope, with Excommunications, Depositions and Conspiracies, stirr'd up Children against their Parents, and put all Europe in Confusion; so that being more influenced by Leo's Example, than the Strength of Reason, the Popes became more bold and obstinate in their Enterprizes.

BUT much more pernicious, and of much worse Consequence was the other Example of Leo's putting himself at the Head of Armies. We have formerly seen the Popes John VIII. and X. at the Head of Armies; however they had at least the Pretence of fighting against the perfidious and infidel Saracens, and their Adherents; but Leo took up Arms against the purest Christians, such as the Normans were, who, for Piety and Catholicism, were inferior to no Nation whatsoever; he fought without a reasonable Cause, or Pretence of Religion; but purely for enlarging the temporal Power of the Church, and increasing her worldly Riches; he made a most unjust War, so unpleasant to God, that his Wrath and Indignation were visible in the unhappy Success. If his Predecessors, who, for their abominable Lives, were look'd upon as the Plagues of Mankind, had undertaken such a War, the Example wou'd not have had such mischievous Effects on his Successors; but being done by Leo, a Holy Pope, it made them the more bold, and afterwards to be guilty of greater Extravagances and Novelties; not adverting to what Peter Damian, a Co-temporary Writer, speaking of this Conduct of Leo, says, That the Apostle Peter was a Saint, not because he denied Christ, but on account of his other excellent and incomparable Virtues; so Leo, not for this Deed, but because of his Innocence and unspotted Life, deserv'd this Title.

LEO IX. out of Piety and Devotion, had frequent Occasions of visiting many Parts of these Provinces. This same Year 1049, in which he was advanc'd to the Pontificate, and in which Pandolphus Prince of Capua died, he came to visit the Sanctuary of Monte Gargano, and in his returning, that of Monte Cassino, where he convers'd very familiarly with these Monks, and adorn'd that Monastery with many Prerogatives, and from thence went to Rome. But soon after in the following Year 1050, he return'd hither anew; there are some who write, that this same Year he held a Council in Siponto, where he depos'd two Archbishops; but Wibertus alone makes mention of this Sipontine Council, for Ostiensis, nor any other Writers do not so much as speak of it. After having visited these Sanctuaries, he resolv'd to see the most conspicuous Cities of the Country; he went first to Benevento, where he had an Opportunity to gain the Affections of these Citizens, and make them to be at his Devotion; for this City being still under the Interdiction of his Predecessor Clement, he took that off.

THE next Year he went to Capua, from thence he return'd a second Time to Benevento, and the same Year 1051, he likewise visited Salerno. This City the following Year 1052, was in the greatest Confusion, on account of the horrible Assassination of Guaimarus by a Conspiracy, contriv'd against him by the Amalphytans, whom he had us'd ill, and by their Adherents and some Salernitans, who having cruelly murder'd him on the Sea-shore, surpriz'd the City. But Guido, the Brother of Guaimarus, being assisted by the Normans, the fifth Day after retook it, and restor'd it to Gisulphus the Son of Guaimarus, who succeeded his Father in the Principality.

BUT during the Stay which the Pope made in these Cities, he was glad to hear the Complaints of the Puglian and Longobard Princes against the Normans, who growing stronger every Day by their new Acquisitions in Calabria, and the Principality of Benevento, began to create Jealousy in their neighbouring Princes, and especially in Pope Leo, who, as his Predecessors had been jealous of the Longobards; could not endure the Prosperity of the Normans, and finding they would not easily part with what they had once acquir'd, and that they frequently incroach'd upon the Possessions of the Churches, he thought it inconsistent with his own Interest, that of the Emperor his Cousin, and of Italy, to suffer this Nation to proceed in their Conquests; therefore he resolv'd to go to Germany, as he did this same Year 1051, and laid before the Emperor Henry, that the Normans were now become very grievous to the Inhabitants of the Country, by extending their Limits beyond the Places with which he had invested them, and that they attempted to subject all these Provinces, and withdraw them from their Allegiance to the Empire of the West; that they were so insolent as even to rob the Goods of the Churches; that they were no longer to be born with, because they would occasion greater Mischief, but ought to be expell'd Italy; that he himself had Courage enough to do it, and if the Emperor would send a good Army into Italy, he would put himself at the Head of it, and drive these Tyrants quite out of the Country. Leo prevail'd so far with Henry, that he consented to his Request, and having caus'd a powerful Army to be assembled, gave him the Command of it, with which he march'd towards Italy. But Geberardus Bishop of Eichstat, a Creature and Counsellor of the Emperor, disapprov'd of it, as scandalous in the Popes to put themselves at the Head of Armies against Christians; and could not forbear chiding the Emperor, and wrought so much upon him, that all the Army, except a few Troops left with Leo, was countermanded. Neither ought it to be pass'd over in Silence, that this same Bishop, when he was afterwards Pope, by the Name of Victor II. presently was of another Mind, and was sorry for what he had done, in depriving Leo of such powerful Assistance, perhaps thinking, that he would have been able to have advanc'd the Interest of his See thereby, more than he had done, seeing by his Imprisonment he had made it worse.

NEITHER did Leo neglect at this Juncture to take Care of the Interest of the Church of Rome, by a Commutation, in which both himself and the Emperor found their Advantage. Henry I. by the Germans nam'd II. out of his own Patrimony, had caus'd to be built a magnificent Church in Bamberg in Honour of St. Gregory; and being desirous to have it erected into a Cathedral, got Pope Benedict to consecrate and erect it into an Episcopal See; but the Emperor was oblig'd, by way of yearly Tribute, to present to the Church of Rome, a fine white Horse, with all his Trappings and Furniture, besides a hundred Marks of Silver likewise every Year. Henry the Black now resolv'd to get this Church freed from that Tribute and Subjection to the Church of Rome, as too great a Burthen upon it; Leo did not refuse to do it, but it could not be executed without something else was given to the Church of Rome in lieu of it; therefore he thought on some Expedient, which was quickly found out to both their Advantages.

HENRY, by reason of the Indignity the Beneventans had put upon him, in shutting him out of their City, mortally hated Benevento; and considering that it would be a difficult Matter for him to bring it under his Obedience, in order to be reveng'd, he resolv'd to exchange it with the Pope for the Claim he had on Bamberg. The State of the Principality of Benevento at this Time, as we have said, was this: The City was govern'd by Prince Pandulphus and Landulphus his Son, but a great Part of it was already under the Dominion of the Normans, to whom this same Henry, on the Occasion we have told, had given all the Lands of Benevento; neither had the Normans, who, without such a Gift, were ready enough to incroach upon their Neighbours, neglected to possess themselves of the rest of the Principality. Thus Henry, who parted with little of his own, except the Right of Sovereignty, which he pretended to over that City, then possess'd by Pandulphus, gave the City of Benevento to Leo in exchange, which he had not granted to the Normans, it not being included in the Beneventan Territories with which he had some Time before invested them. And 'tis not to be thought, that this Exchange could have been made for the whole Principality of Benevento, tho' at this Time it had been much lessen'd by the Principalities of Salerno and Capua being wrested from it; nevertheless it comprehended many Cities and Towns of the large Province of Sannio, in which were contain'd the two Apruzzi, the County of Molise, and also many other Parts of other Provinces;

Provinces; and it would be Folly to think that the Principality of Benevento would have been given in Exchange for a hundred Marks of Silver, for the white Horse was not remitted; neither truly can it be conceiv'd, how certain modern Writers, some inconsiderately, others maliciously, could take upon them to write such Extravagances without the Support of any cotemporary Writer, and instead of the City of Benevento, to write the Principality of Benevento; for we have no Writer more ancient, that mentions this Exchange, than *Leo Ostiensis*¹, who plainly relates, as the Thing itself demonstrates, that there was such an Exchange of the Bishoprick of Bamberg, for the City of Benevento, and not for the Principality; and *Petrus Diaconus*², who wrote soon after Leo, mentions only the City, and not the Principality; and the Event evinces the Truth of it, for the Church of Rome has retain'd the City only, and not the Principality, over which it never pretended the least Right, but it has undergone the same Fate with all the other Provinces, as will be seen in the Course of this History. But this Exchange did not take Place at this Time; for tho' upon Leo's coming into Italy with the Troops which the Emperor had given him, Prince Pandulphus and his Son had been banish'd that City³, and a certain Rodulphus elected Prince of Benevento, yet nevertheless they soon return'd, and possess'd Benevento many Years, until they were expell'd it by Robert in the Year 1076, from which Time by Agreement made with the Normans, the City of Benevento began to be govern'd by the Church of Rome, and the Principality by the Normans, as we shall relate hereafter; so that the new Neapolitan Historian⁴ is widely mistaken, who with a great Ostentation of Eloquence in relating the Transactions about this Exchange, says, it was made with the Principality of Benevento; and it seems he never had read Ostiensis, who speaks only of the City of Benevento.

IN the mean time, Leo having put himself at the Head of a great Army compos'd of Germans, and a good Body of Italian Troops, consisting not only of Laicks, but also Clergy⁵, gave the Command of the Germans and the Suevi, to Guarnerius a Suevian, and of the rest to Albertus Tramundus, Asto, and Rodulphus, whom a little before he had made Prince of Benevento, and march'd the Army towards Puglia in order to find the Normans, who being much inferior in Number, he believ'd he could easily defeat and drive them out of Puglia, and all the Places they had hitherto conquer'd.

THE Normans being surpriz'd at the News of this March, were terribly afraid, not only because by the Conspiracy hatch'd against them by Argirus they had lost their chief Commanders, and the greatest Part of the gallant Warriors, but likewise because they had to do with an Army not compos'd of Greeks and Puglians, but of Germans, Men of prodigious Stature and Strength, courageous and skill'd in military Affairs; besides they could not trust the Puglians, by reason of the Hatred they bore them. Therefore they bethought themselves of Means how to ward off the impending Danger; whereupon they sent Ambassadors to the Pope to desire Peace of him; they offer'd to subject themselves in all Matters relating to him; that they pretended only to possess those Lands they had acquir'd with the Sweat of their Brows and their Arms; that they had not robb'd the Churches, offering their Service with all the Submission and Respect imaginable. But Leo, who thought he was sure of Victory because of his strong Army, and being likewise push'd on by the Germans, who despis'd the Normans on account of their low Statures, dismiss'd the Ambassadors with a very harsh Answer, That he would make no Peace with them, unless they would march out of Italy; but they replied, That it was next to impossible to oblige so great a Multitude to go shift for themselves and Families; all their Requests were to no Purpose, they were sent back without concluding any Thing.

WHEN these hard Terms were reported to the Normans, they became desperate, and resolv'd rather to die honourably, than basely and shamefully to part with what they had acquir'd with so much Toil and Labour; and notwithstanding the Inequality of their Forces, and want of Provisions, chose to accept of the Battle, tho' with so great Disadvantage, and every one of them to die or be Victorious.

THEREFORE they divided their Army into three Bodies, and gave the Command of them to their most renown'd Captains, of which Count Umfred, Robert Guiscard, and Richard Count of Aversa, the Son of Asclettinus, who had succeeded Rodulphus, were the most eminent.

IN the mean time Leo drew up his Army in Order of Battle in a great Plain near Civitate, in the Province of *Capitanata*¹, and having dispos'd it under the foresaid Commanders, there was nothing to hinder the two Armies from engaging, but a little Hill that divided them. The Normans were the first that mounted it in order to view the Enemy, and finding that they consisted of a great Number of Italians, who knew nothing of military Discipline, and a few German Troops regularly drawn up, and much more to be fear'd, took their Measures accordingly, and divided their small Army into three Bodies. The right Wing was given to Richard Count of Aversa, in order to charge the Italians; Umfred commanded the main Body, with what Cavalry there was for attacking the Germans; and Robert Guiscard had the left Wing, with a good Number of chosen Calabrians who had ingag'd in their Service ever since they had been in that Country. He had Orders not to advance much, but to serve for a small Corps de Reserve, to be always ready to sustain the rest of the Army, and in Time of need to supply it with fresh Troops.

RICHARD first of all charg'd the Italians commanded by Rodulphus so suddenly and resolutely, that they had not time to make the least Resistance. Their Fear put them into such Confusion, that in Retreating, the one half bore down the other, and Richard gallantly pursuing them, they took themselves to a shameful Flight, so that this brave Commander, what with the Sword, and what with Darts, made a terrible Slaughter².

COUNT Umfred had much ado to manage the Germans, and especially the Suevi. He discharg'd a terrible Shower of Arrows upon them, which they return'd him in the same Manner, after which they fell upon one another with their Swords, and made a dreadful Slaughter on both Sides. Then Robert Guiscard thought it time to come to his Brother's Assistance; which he did immediately, with Pandulphus and Landulphus his Son, who had been banish'd *Benevento*³, back'd likewise by his Calabrians, who under his Discipline had become gallant Soldiers; he threw himself with Fury into the Midst of the Enemy. The Battle was desperate, and the Bravery of Robert incredible; so that at last he defeated and put the Enemy into such Confusion, that after having made a prodigious Slaughter, perceiving there were still some remaining, he made a fresh Attack, and cut them all to pieces⁴.

THE Pope, who at a little Distance beheld this bloody Tragedy, seeing himself brought into such Distress, when he least thought of it, resolv'd to retire to the City of *Civitate*⁵; but he was not long safe there, for it was presently besieg'd, and he forc'd to surrender. One may easily conceive what Perplexity of Mind the Pope was in, and how he was puzzled when he fell into the Enemies Hands, whom he had treated so harshly and severely, and whom he took to be a barbarous and inhuman People, without Religion, and had describ'd them as such to the Emperor Henry.

BUT he quickly found how much the Normans had the Christian Religion at Heart, and what Regard they had for him, whom they respected as the Head of the Christian Church, and Vicar of Jesus Christ. For seeing as a Secular Prince he had made War against them, they might have treated him as they thought fit Jure Belli, and according to the Laws of Victory. But they were not then so learn'd, as to conceive a Distinction betwixt two Persons in one Man, an Invention of Churchmen to cloke the monstrous Conduct of a Pope, which was no ways consistent with the Character of St. Peter's Successor. They look'd upon him always on account of his sublime Character, as worthy of the utmost Respect and Veneration, Religion, which they so much regarded, could inspire, and with singular Piety, and profound Respect, conducted him honourably and decently to their Camp. They not only set him at Liberty, but Umfred took his Parole, and with a great many of his Officers accompanied him to *Benevento*⁶, and besides told him, that if he had thought fit to go to Rome, they would have accompanied him to Capua. The Pope, surpriz'd at this Generous and Christian Behaviour, not only chang'd the bad Opinion he had formerly entertain'd of them, but repented him of what he had hitherto done so unadvisedly and unbecoming his Character, and bitterly lamented his Misfortunes. He enter'd Benevento on the Eve of St. John, in the Year 1053, and continu'd there to the 12th of March of the following Year 1054, the Festival of St. Gregory the Pope²; and there, by reason of the Fatigue he had undergone, and an Oppression of his Spirits, fell sick, and sent for Count Umsfred, who conducted him to Capua, where he stay'd twelve Days and then return'd to Rome. Upon his Arrival there, in order to reconcile the Differences which in these Times were become more implacable than ever betwixt the Churches of Rome and Constantinople, he sent three Legates to the Emperor Constantinus Monomachus, to wit, Peter Archbishop of Amalphis, Frederick his Chancellor, and Umbertus Bishop of St. Rufina, which Bishoprick was afterwards by Calixtus II. annex'd to that of Porto; but this Legation was not successful, for Leo soon after, with great Signs of Piety and Repentance, ended his Days in the Month of April this Year 1054; and for his Sanctity and upright Life, was esteem'd a Saint.

IN this Juncture of Affairs 'tis said, that Leo, after having absolv'd the Normans from the Censures, and the Offences which he reckon'd they had done him, gave to Umsfred and his Heirs, the Investiture of Puglia and Calabria, and likewise of all they could conquer in Sicily, and that Umsfred on the other Hand, paid Homage to the Holy See for these Lands, as Fiefs depending on it; and that this was the first Investiture the Normans had, as Inveges and others write.

INDEED *Malaterra*³, speaking of the Submission and Respect the Normans pay'd Leo at this Juncture, says, That this Pope, as an Acknowledgment, Omniem terram, quam pervaserant, & quam ulterius versus Calabriam, & Siciliam lucrari possent de Sancto Petro hæreditariæ Feudo sibi, & hæredibus suis possidendam concessit. But this was nothing else but a Testimony of his Friendship for the Normans, who wanted nothing of him but to bless their Arms, in order to justify all their future Undertakings; which the Normans, as being a religious People, desir'd at least, as a Pretence to vindicate their Acquisitions, and have the Popes for their Friends, who at that Time, by their Censures and Excommunications had become terrible to Princes. These were the Beginnings of our Papal Investitures, which afterwards were brought to Perfection by Nicholas II. by those Investitures he gave to Rôbert Guiscard of the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria, and of Sicily, as we shall relate.

MEAN time the Normans having defeated Leo's Army, though they had treated himself with so much Respect, and made him their Friend, thought fit not to slip so favourable an Opportunity of extending their Dominion, and carrying their Arms further. They restor'd nothing to the Pope of what he pretended to in Benevento; for tho' Pandolphus Prince of Benevento, and Landolphus his Son, upon Leo's coming, had been banish'd that City, nevertheless after Leo's Defeat by the Normans, whom they assisted in the Battel, they return'd anew to govern *Benevento*⁴; and it was not rul'd by the Church of Rome till many Years after, so that the Exchange made with Henry, did not take Place at this Time, and their Possession of it was more owing to the Bounty of the Normans, than to that Exchange; for which we need no better Testimony than the antient Chronicle of the Dukes and Princes of Benevento, the Author of which was a Monk of the Monastery of St. Sophia in that City, and it is preserv'd in the Archives of the Vatican, which the most careful Pellegrinus caus'd to be printed, to whom it was sent from Rome by the Abbot Constantinus Gaetanus a Monk of Cassino, who had transcrib'd it from an antient MS. in the *Vatican*⁵. In this Chronicle⁶ we read, that though Pandolphus and Landolphus his Son, who govern'd Benevento, were banish'd on the coming of Leo; nevertheless 'tis subjoin'd, that they return'd thither, and that Pandolphus after having reign'd many Years there, forsook the World and turn'd Monk in the same Monastery of St. Sophia, leaving Landolphus his Son for Successor, who held the Principality to his Death in the Year 1077. Whence we are clearly convinc'd that the Exchange with Henry did not take Place; but if the Church of Rome acquir'd this City afterwards, it was owing to the Bounty of the Normans; as for the Right she had by Virtue of that Exchange made with Henry, it was given up, as shall be seen by and by.

THE Normans took care to make their Advantage of this Victory, for they subjected all Puglia to their Dominion, after Thirteen Years Wars, from the Time they invaded it. They took from the Greeks, Troja, Bari, Trani, Venosa, Otranto, Acerenza, and all the other Cities of this Province, so that Gulielmus Pugliensis might well say;

*Jamque rebellis eis Urbs Appula nulla remansit :
Omnes se dedunt, aut Vexigalia solvunt.*

FROM this time they were solely intent on the Conquest of Calabria, as we are now going to relate.

C H A P. IV.

The Conquest of Calabria by the Normans. Pope Stephen opposes it; but he dying opportunely in Florence, all his Measures were broke.

THE Election of a Successor to Leo IX. occasion'd new Disorders in Rome, and after that Church, by reason of opposite Factions, had been a Year without a Head, at last the famous Hildebrand, who had come to Rome from the Monastery of Clugny, and was made Sub-Deacon of that Church, being a Man of exquisite Cunning, was imploy'd to put an end to all these Disputes. The Romans not finding a fit Person in Rome to be Pope, sent Hildebrand to the Emperor in Germany, to desire such a one as he, in the Name of the Clergy and People of Rome, should pitch upon; the Emperor consented, upon which he demanded Geberardus Bishop of Eichstat, whom we lately mention'd: Tho' much against the Emperor's Inclination, who was unwilling to part with him, Geberardus came to Rome, and being plac'd in that See, was nam'd Victor II. He had no sooner mounted the Pontifical Throne, than he presently was of an Opinion, contrary to what he had while he was in Germany, where he had oppos'd the Assistance demanded by Leo, which, when Pope, he heartily repented; and if his Pontificate had not been so very short, and his Power greatly diminish'd by the late Defeat, and that of the Normans increas'd, they had found Victor of the same Mind with Leo.

BUT he died in Florence in the Year 1057, two Years after his Exaltation, and Frederick Abbot of Monte Cassino and Cardinal, was elected in his Place, who took Possession of that See on the Festival of St. Stephen, and therefore call'd himself Stephen X. by some, for Reasons formerly related, nam'd Stephen IX. He followed the same Footsteps with his Predecessors. It has been observ'd with Astonishment by the careful Searchers into the Deeds of the Popes, that though their Predecessors, in order to support their Undertakings, had suffered Death, Imprisonment and other Calamities; yet for all that, their Successors were not deterr'd from pursuing the same Measures, but expos'd themselves more obstinately to all Dangers and Persecution. They were persuaded that the Growth of the Normans in these our Provinces, was their Fall and Decay, as they had been jealous of the Longobards, when they became too powerful in Italy. Therefore the Popes charg'd the Normans with a Thousand Enormities, such as robbing of Churches, laying waste Provinces, and in fine, made them to be hated by the Country People, that thereby they might justify their own Undertakings, and impose them upon the World as Praise-worthy. And though they could not pretend to any Right of Sovereignty over these Provinces, yet their Jealousy oblig'd the Normans, who, before this, had none to struggle with but the Emperors of the East, from whom they wrested these Provinces, now to be on their Guard against the Popes, who, as if the Wrong had been done to themselves, vigorously oppos'd their Designs, and did their utmost to put a Stop to their Progress.

FORMERLY, as may have been observ'd in the Course of this History, when the Popes were not so powerful, they were wont to crave the Assistance of foreign Princes, as in order to expel the Longobards, they had recourse to the French; whereas now being grown more powerful by their temporal Dominion over so many States, when other Succours were at a great Distance, and there were no Hopes of getting any from the Emperor, and their own Dominions, were able enough to furnish them with Troops; they acted by themselves, and when these fail'd, they had recourse to spiritual Arms and Excommunications, to which the Influence of Religion had given so much Vigour and Terror, that they were not only dreadful to the People and Princes, but, which is surprizing, were formidable and frightful to the very Officers and Soldiers, who, though for the most part they were profligate Men; and made no Scruple to lead wicked Lives, and rob their Neighbours, without minding that thereby they offended the divine Majesty, yet stood in Awe of Ecclesiastick Censures.

STEPHEN, upon his Advancement to the Papacy, prepar'd immediately to drive the Normans out of Italy. He was descended originally from the Dukes of Lorrain, and being of Royal Blood, resolv'd to signalize his Pontificate with great and remarkable Actions. He had first been made Chancellor of the Apostolick See by Leo IX. afterwards Abbot of Monte Cassino, and by Victor II. Cardinal. Being now rais'd to the Papacy, he had a Mind, in Imitation of Leo, to expel the Normans out of *Italy*¹; but being born for greater Things, prepar'd himself for a more noble Undertaking.

THE Year before, which was 1056, Henry had died in Germany, and left a Son Seven Years old, who afterwards succeeded him in the Empire, likewise nam'd Henry after his Father. There's great Confusion in the Number of these Henrys amongst the German and Italian Writers. Henry the Black, by the Germans is call'd III. and by the Italians II. not reckoning the other Henry, who was only King of Germany, but never Emperor. We shall follow the Italians, and call the Successor of Henry the Black, Henry III. not IV. Henry died after having reign'd Seventeen Years and Four Months. His Laws were collected by *Godalfus*², and Cujacius has recorded some of them in his Fifth Book of Fiefs.

On account of the Minority of the Son, the Empress Agnes his Mother, took the Government upon her. Stephen taking advantage of the Time, resolv'd to raise Duke Godfrey his Brother, to the Imperial Throne, with a Design to joyn his own Forces with those of his Brother, in order to drive the Normans, whom he mortally hated, the more easily out of Italy.

BUT in the mean Time, these gallant Champions had made wonderful Progress in Calabria, under the famous Robert Guiscard, to whom Count Umfred his Brother, had sent a good Body of Troops to be employ'd in the Conquest of this Province³. After they had made themselves Masters of Melvito, by a cunning Stratagem of Robert, they had extended their Limits further, and soon after added the Cities of Bisignano, Cosenza and Martura to their Dominion.

NEITHER did the Death of Umfred, which happen'd about the Year 1056, interrupt the Course of their Conquests, but they rather went on at a greater Rate; for Umfred having left only two young Sons, Bacelardus and Hermanuus, recommended the Government of his Dominions to Robert his Brother, as he did also his Children, especially Barcelardus the Eldest ; so that Robert having succeeded in the County of Puglia, struck Terror in all the neighbouring Princes, more especially in Pope Stephen, who hated him the more on that account.

BUT Stephen, though he had Courage enough to undertake, yet he wanted Power, or rather Money, to drive the Normans out of Italy; therefore all his Thoughts were employ'd how to fill his Coffers, and the Affair he was engag'd in, put him upon too desperate and scandalous Methods. He, who from Abbot of Monte Cassino, had been rais'd to the Chair of St. Peter, even now when he was Pope, resolv'd to retain that Abbacy, nor would he allow of another to be chosen in his Room; so that by a double Right, he dispos'd of that Monastery at his own Will and Pleasure¹. By the many Oblations of the Faithful in these Times, in which the Monks had succeeded too well, they had amass'd a vast Treasure of Gold and Silver, which they kept in this Monastery with great Care and Circumspection: Stephen seeing he had no other way for obtaining his End, resolv'd to have it in his Clutches, therefore he order'd the Overseer to bring all the Treasure of Gold and Silver that was in the Monastery privately to Rome. He design'd to carry it to Tuscany, where his Brother Godfrey was, and impart his Design to him, that they might return together to drive the Normans out of Italy. One may easily judge what Consternation the Monks were in on the News of so mischievous an Order: With Lamentations and Tears they endeavour'd to divert the Pope, but all in vain, so that at last, being forc'd by cruel Necessity, they pack'd up the Treasure, and carried it to Rome. When the Pope saw it, and at the same Time observ'd the Grief and Anguish of the Monks that brought it, struck with the Monstrousness of the Fact, and conscious of the Heinousness of the Crime, he presently repented his having demanded it, and sent it back again². But shortly after, having gone to Tuscany, where he stopp'd in Florence, he was suddenly seiz'd with a Faintness, which in a few Days, put an end to his Life in the Year 1058³.

STEPHEN being dead, all his Designs evanish'd, which fell out so luckily for the Normans, that having none other to hinder their Progress, they were soon in a Condition to extend their Conquests, not only in Calabria, but also over the Principality of Capua, on an Occasion we shall shortly relate.

S E C T. I.

Robert Guiscard is Proclaim'd first Duke of Puglia, and Calabria.

IN the mean Time, on the Death of Stephen, Rome was again involv'd in Confusion and Disorders; for Gregorio d'Alberico Count of Frescati, and some other Roman Lords, in the Night-time, with arm'd Force, plac'd John Bishop of Velletri, in the Holy Chair, who took the Name of Benedict; but Peter Damian, a Man of Worth (who a little before had been call'd from Eremo, and made Bishop of Ostia) with the other Cardinals oppos'd this Election, and order'd Matters so, that Hildebrand in his Way from Germany, whither he had been sent by Stephen to the Empress Agnes, hearing of these Disorders, stopp'd in Florence, and endeavour'd to bring over the chief Romans from the opposite Faction, and with the Assistance of Duke Goffredo Marquis of Tuscany, manag'd Matters so, that those Cardinals, who had had no hand in the Election of Benedict, met in Sienna, and elected Gerardo Archbishop of Florence, Pope. The Empress Agnes, Mother of Henry, confirm'd the Election, and order'd Duke Goffredo to put Gerardo in Possession, and expel Benedict, who voluntarily abdicated the Papacy; whereupon Gerardo went to Rome, and was acknowledg'd for lawful Pope, and nam'd Nicholas II. who shortly after in the Year 1059, held a Synod of 113 Bishops, where Benedict appear'd, ask'd Pardon, and protested that he had been compell'd to do what he had done. In this Council Regulations were made concerning the Freedom of Elections, on a Vacancy of the See, and it was ordain'd, that the Cardinals should have the greatest Share in them; then then the Elected was to be declar'd to the Clergy and People, and lastly, the Consent of the Emperor was to be ask'd.

THESE Revolutions, which very frequently happen'd in Rome, and the many Disorders in the Court of Constantinople, wonderfully contributed to the Growth of the Normans. They had nothing to fear from any Quarter; for the Minority of Henry III. during the Government of the Empress his Mother, made the Affairs of these our Provinces to be little minded. Constantinople was all in Disorder and Confusion, by reason of the Death of Constantinus Monomachus, which fell out in the Year 1054; for Theodora Sister of Zoe, had succeeded in the Empire, and she dying a Year after, Michael Stratioticus was put in her Room by the Officers of the Palace; but he became Monk afterwards, and voluntary renounc'd the Crown in the Year 1057; so that there arose new Factions about the Election of a Successor, but that of Isaac Comnenus being the strongest, in the Year 1058, he was proclaim'd Emperor.

THE Normans therefore had a fair Opportunity for enlarging their Dominions, and those of Puglia under the renown'd Robert Guiscard, extended them almost over all Calabria. This Prince now Count of Puglia, was acknowledg'd, not as Tutor to Bacelardo his Nephew, but, according to Gulielmus Apuliensis ¹, as Sovereign Lord. He appear'd not to be satisfied on this Occasion with the simple Guardianship, as indeed he shew'd afterwards; but pretended to succeed to Umfred, as Umfred had succeeded to his elder Brothers, and he had already appointed Roger his younger Brother to succeed himself, with whom he had shar'd the Government, and therefore had created him Count. For this end he was wholly intent on driving the Greeks out of the rest of Calabria; he took Cariati, and many other Places in the Neighbourhood, and at last march'd his Army to Reggio, the head City of the Province, and laid Siege to it. The Besieg'd not able to hold out long, surrender'd it to Robert, who now Master of so famous and antient a City, was no longer satisfied with the Title of Count, but with solemn Ceremony caus'd himself to be proclaim'd Duke of Puglia and Calabria. Leo Ostiensis ² says, that it was the Honour of having taken Reggio, that gave Birth to this new Title. Curopolata writes, that it was the careless and childish Government of Michael VII. Emperor of the Greeks that gave Rise to it; but Pellegrinus ³ shews us, that Robert did it in Emulation of the Greeks, and to pull down their Pride. In Bari they had made Argirus Duke of Puglia, though the greatest Part of it was at this Time subject to the Normans; for though the Greeks had lost whole Provinces, yet they still retain'd the vain-glorious Titles and Names of them, and often transferr'd them to other Parts, as they did with the Name of antient Calabria, which, as we have observ'd in the preceding Books, was no sooner in the Possession of the Longobards, than they transferr'd the Name of Calabria to another Province, which at that Time was still subject to them.

THERE are various Opinions about the Manner how Robert came by this Title of Duke. Leo Bishop of Ostia, seems to say, That it was by an accidental Acclamation of the People; but Curopolata says, That the Lords and Barons of Puglia his Vassals, seeing that he had added Calabria to his Dominion of Puglia, with common Consent agreed, that the Title of Duke should be given to Robert, and reserv'd to themselves the Title of Counts over the Lands they had divided amongst them; which shews us that Sigonius ⁴ is mistaken, who pretends, that Robert being puff'd up with Pride on his having taken Reggio in Calabria, and soon after, Troja in Puglia, scorning the old Title of Count, of himself, and by his own Authority, took the Title of Duke of Puglia and Calabria.

AUGUSTINUS INVEGES ⁵ imagines, that the same Ceremonies then us'd in France at the Creation of a new Duke of Normandy, as they are describ'd by the antient Writers of the History of the Normans, were practis'd at the Creation of this new Duke; where 'tis said, that the Archbishop after some Prayers, and the Oath which the new Duke swore to defend the People committed to him, and to govern them with Justice, Equity and Mercy, gave him the Ring, and afterwards girt him with the Sword ; whence, says he, 'tis very probable, that Guiscard the Norman, being to be created Duke of Puglia in Italy, made use of the same Ceremonies. Dukes had also their particular Crowns, Caps of Maintenance, Mantles, and their proper Titles. The Ducal Crown which they put above their Arms, as Scipio Mazella describes it ¹, was a Circle without Rays, or rather Points upwards, (which belong'd to Princes only) but in place of Points, they had some Pearls, and Jewels set round it. The Cap, which was the second Mark of a Duke, as Bartholomæus Cassaneus ² describes it, was in the Form of a Hat, surrounded with a round Crown, but not straight nor circular, such as Kings wear ; and Cassaneus confesses he never could find out the Origine of this Ducal Cap. Inveges imagines the Ducal Mantle to have been like that of the Archdukes of Austria, as it's describ'd by Guazzi ³, to wit, a Garment of different Colours, reaching down to the Feet, trimm'd with Ermine. Duke Robert, in the Year 1059, appear'd at publick Solemnities, dress'd in this Manner with the Ducal Robes and Crown ; whence in his Charters and other Writs, he began to use this Title ; Ego Robertus Dux Apuliæ, & Calabriæ.

CHAP. V.

The Principality of Capua being taken from the Longobards, came under the Dominion of the Normans of Aversa.

THE Normans who were settled in Aversa, as well as those of Puglia, extended their Bounds over their Neighbouring Country. Richard Count of Aversa, being now powerful, had a Design upon the Principality of Capua, invaded it, and laid close Siege to the City. At this Time Pandolphus V. govern'd Capua, who though for some time he could have defended the City with his own Troops, yet Richard straitning the Place still more and more, he was forc'd to offer Seven thousand Crowns of Gold, if he would raise the Siege ¹ ; which Richard then accepted of ; but Pandolphus V. was no sooner dead in the Year 1057. and succeeded by Landolphus V. than Richard invaded Capua anew, and besieg'd the City more closely than before. The Capuans offer'd another greater Sum for their Liberty : Richard would hear of no Terms ; but that the City must be surrender'd to him. It was a hard Matter to get the Capuans to consent ; but at last being reduc'd to Famine, and Landolphus yielding and quitting the Principality, Richard was receiv'd and proclaim'd Prince this Year 1058.

RICHARD, like Archiebis, first Prince of Benevento, would have himself anointed with sacred Oyl ², which Custom all the Norman Princes of Capua retain'd afterwards ³. And though it had been stipulated in the Capitulation, that the Capuans should have the keeping and guarding of the Gates and Towers of the City, which this new Prince Richard wink'd at for the present, yet he resolv'd at another more proper Time to deprive them of that Privilege likewise. In the mean time he went to Monte Cassino, where he was receiv'd with great Solemnity by the Monks, and return'd to Campania, which extends itself as far as the River Sele, and in the Space of three Months conquer'd the whole Province; from thence he return'd to Capua, and having conven'd all the Nobility, he set forth to them, that it was very reasonable the Gates and Towers of the City should be deliver'd up to him; but the Capuans obstinately refusing to comply, in great Wrath he left the City, laid close Siege to it anew, and reduc'd them to Famine.

IN the mean time the Citizens sent their Archbishop to Germany to seek Assistance from the Emperor Henry; but this Prince not being in a Condition to mind these our Provinces, dismiss'd him with great Promises and fair Words, which were never perform'd. The Capuans then being left without all Hopes, and able to resist no longer, surrender'd the Towers, Gates, Themselves, and all their Effects to the Discretion and Mercy of Richard. Thus in the Year 1062, the Capuans, after having bravely defended themselves for the Space of ten Years against the Power of their Enemies, lost the Principality of Capua, which became subject to the *Normans*¹, first under Prince Richard, who was descended of Asclettinus, afterwards under the other Successors of the same Race, and at last it came under the Dominion of those other gallant Normans of the Blood of Tancred Count of Hauteville, as we shall see in the following Book. Therefore the Mistake of *Sigonius*² is unpardonable, who reckon'd this Richard to be the Brother of Robert Guiscard, as if from this Time the Principality of Capua had come under the Dominion of the Normans of Puglia to the Sons of Count Tancred.

THUS ended the Dominion of the Longobards in the Principality of Capua, which from Atenulphus, in an uninterrupted Series of many Years, had continu'd till it was quite extinguish'd in the Person of Landulphus V. a most unfortunate Prince, who, besides his being forc'd to desert his Dominion, saw, to his great Grief and Affliction, the many Children he had begotten, reduc'd to a needy and wandering Life, in the very Country where he had reign'd. And the Abbot *Desiderius*³ in his Dialogues relates, that in his Time, he had seen many Sons of Landulphus going about as Vagabonds and Exiles, begging Bread to support their miserable Lives; which he look'd upon as a Punishment for the Wickedness and Cruelty of that most wretched Prince Pandulphus IV. of whom they were descended. Whence it may be gather'd, that the Blood of the Longobard Princes was not quite extinguish'd in the Principality of Capua; for besides that there still remain'd some Counts of the Race of Atenulphus, whose Descendants for some Time, were distinctly known in some Families by the Fiefs they possess'd; there were likewise remaining the Sons of Landulphus, who, because of their extreme Misery and Poverty, as we may reasonably believe, have been the Forefathers of Mechanics, Labourers, and other Handycrafts-men, some of whom, though not known, may be amongst us to this Day: Which we ought to take for a Warning of the Inconstancy and Changeableness of Worldly Things, and not be puffed up on account of the Nobleness of our Pedigree above others, who, tho' they cannot make it appear, yet perhaps are descended of more noble and illustrious Blood than ourselves. Seneca relates an Instance of the like nature to his *Lucilius*⁴, that after the Defeat of Marius's Army, many born of great Parentage and noble Blood, as well Knights as Senators, upon the Overthrow of Marius's Faction, were reduc'd to so abject Conditions, that some became Shepherds, others Ploughmen, and liv'd in Cottages.

IN the following Book, to which we refer the Ecclesiastical Polity of this eleventh Century, we shall see the gallant Normans, after having thus vanquish'd the Greeks in Puglia and Calabria, and the Longobards in the Principality of Capua, proceeding triumphantly in the Conquest of the other Provinces, till they establish a great and flourishing Kingdom.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K X.

DUKE Robert, not allowing Bacelardus his Nephew to succeed in his Father's Dominions, govern'd the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria, not as Tutor, but as his own Inheritance, and in order to extend his Dominion the better over the other Provinces, and to secure the Conquests he had made, with all Submission, he endeavour'd to cultivate the Pope's Friendship, being taught so to do by the Behaviour of Leo; so that by having him on his Side, he might justify his Undertakings, and render them Praise-worthy in the Eye of the World, without the Blemish of Usurpation. On the other Hand the Popes being now grown more terrible to Princes on account of their Excommunications, slipp'd no Opportunity of taking Advantage of the Opinion that prevail'd every where of their Superiority and Power. For which reason the Papal Investitures were more firmly establish'd among us in the Pontificate of Nicholas II. to which a Revolt that happen'd in Puglia at the same Time, when Duke Robert was triumphing in Calabria, contributed not a little.

BACELARDUS taking in ill Part that his Uncle Robert had depriv'd him of the Succession to his Paternal Dominions, made heavy Complaints, which so mov'd the Compassion of many of the Inhabitants of Puglia, that they openly revolted and assaulted some Places of that Province. But Robert's Vigilance soon put a Stop to their ill-concerted Designs; for having attack'd them all on a sudden, he soon reduc'd those Places that had revolted, and stifled the Rebellion; and without halting, march'd to the furthest Parts of the Capitanata, where the Greeks were still in Possession session of some Places, which he surpriz'd, and amongst the rest took the City of Troja, which the Greeks had built some Years before, and made the chief City of this Province.

THE Conquest of the City of Troja rous'd the Pope; for the Roman Pontiffs in those Days pretended, that this City belong'd to them by a special Right, in the same manner as Benevento. But all Authors are silent as to the way how they came by this special Right; for, according to the Authority of *Leo Ostiensis*², which we have already related, this City was in the Greek Dominions, which in the Year 1022 they had built from the Foundation, under the Catapanus Bejanus, and gave it the Name of Troja, in Memory of the famous City of that Name in the lesser Phrygia, of which they reckon'd this a Colony.

AND tho' when Henry came into Italy with that formidable Army, he laid Siege to that City, as the same *Leo*³ relates, and forc'd the Trojans to surrender to him; yet he pardon'd them at that Time⁴, and return'd to Germany; neither do we read that he made a Present of it to the Church of Rome, as he did of Benevento. But however that may be, Nicholas II. who, constantly treading in the Footsteps of his Predecessors, was jealous of this Progress of Robert, under pretence that this City belong'd to the Apostolick See, gave him to understand that he must restore it to him. The Normans had no mind basely to part with what they had conquer'd from the Greeks with their Arms, and so much Fatigue and Labour; so that Robert, little minding the Demand of the Pope, march'd back towards Calabria.

NICHOLAS II. was not in a Condition to march an Army against him, as Leo had done; and the Assistance he could expect from the Emperor of the West was at a great Distance, and these Emperors began now to withdraw the Respect they were wont to have for the Popes, and to have an Aversion for them, because they disputed their Right in the Election of Popes, and Investitures of other Benefices which they had hitherto been in Possession of. Neither could Nicholas expect Assistance from the neighbouring Longobard Princes; for the Principality of Capua was in the Possession of the Normans; the Power of the Prince of Salerno was very inconsiderable; and that of the Prince of Benevento less to be depended on. There was nothing to be expected from the Greeks, who were implacable Enemies of the Popes, on account of the famous Schism betwixt these two Churches, which had now taken such deep Root, that it had quite alienated the Greeks from the Latins.

NICHOLAS II. then had no other Game to play but to have recourse to Spiritual Arms and Excommunications. The Popes had already begun to employ them against Princes, as we have seen in the preceding Books; yet they had then been made use of for Reasons which they at least believ'd to be more justifiable, and often on account of Religion, and their abominable Heresies; they also made use of them for breaking Confederacies which Christian Princes frequently enter'd into with the infidel Saracens, as John VIII. did against the Neapolitans and Amalphytans, for which he had a specious Pretext of Piety and Religion. But afterwards, as it usually happens, that good Things are often put to a bad use, they began to use them indifferently, either for worldly Ends, or to gratify some Prince, but chiefly to preserve and increase the Temporal Riches of the Church. Thus we have seen the Beneventans treated because they would not open the Gates of their City to the Emperor Henry, who got Clement II. to excommunicate them, and afterwards carried him to Germany with him as one of his Courtiers.

AS in the primitive Church the Prelates minded only Spiritual Matters, so they made no use of Excommunications but against Hereticks, or for the Correction of publick Sinners; the chief Design of them was against those who had imbib'd wrong Notions with regard to Religion, who, after many Admonitions, if they did not acknowledge their Errors, were separated from the Church: And in the second Place, in order to avoid Scandal, they were employ'd against publick Sinners. And they had no other Effect, but to deprive them of the Sacraments and other Spiritual Things which the Church bestow'd on the Faithful. But afterwards, and especially in these Times, the Spiritual Care was abated in the Prelates; and on the contrary, the Avarice of Temporal Riches increas'd in the Ecclesiastick State, so that as Ex-communications were formerly made use of only for the Correction of publick Sinners, and against Hereticks, they were now more frequently used, not only in the Defence, but likewise in Recovery of the Temporal Possessions, if perchance thro' the Neglect of their Predecessors they had been lost.

BUT it would have been to no purpose to have made use of these Arms, if at the same Time they had not made the People believe, that in whatever manner they were fulminated, if the Goods were not restor'd, the Possessors were irrecoverably damn'd, which they imputed more to the Censure than the Sin. And in order to make them more terrible, they had found Means to introduce a new Doctrine, that the Excommunicated were not only render'd unworthy of what the Church bestow'd on the Faithful, which was the true Effect of Excommunication, but likewise that it unmann'd, defam'd, and render'd them abominable; that they ought to be shunn'd as infected with the Plague, and depriv'd of Civil Society and Commerce; and several Papal Decretals were made for rendering them incapable of making Wills, Contracts, to sue at Law, adopt, or do any other legal Act; they could exercise no Office in the State, and a thousand other Things, of which perhaps we shall have occasion to treat more at large elsewhere.

'TIS incredible with what Terror and Dread these Censures affected the Minds, not only of the common People, but those of higher Rank, yea Princes themselves; and it was truly matter of Astonishment, that the Officers and Soldiers, Men otherwise addicted to all Wickedness, and without the Fear of God, and who did not stand in awe to offend Him by robbing their Neighbours, yet were so over-aw'd by the Dread of Excommunication, that they guarded the Goods of the Church with great Respect; and in these Times there was no surer way of preserving one's worldly Goods, than by putting them under the Keeping and Protection of the Apostolick See.

FROM this (as we have observ'd elsewhere) a large Field was open'd for augmenting the Temporal Possessions of the Church; for many People unable to preserve their Effects from being seiz'd by Force, a Thing too common by the Depravity of the Age, were induc'd to make them over to the Church, on Condition that they should still be Masters of their Estates, and hold them of the Church in Fief for a small Acknowledgment; for in these Times it was the Custom to convert Frecholds into Fiefs, by resigning them to the Prince who had given the Investiture. And of this sort of Fiefs call'd Oblata, there's mention made in our Feodal Books, and Cujacius treats of them at large. This secur'd Estates, as being under the Protection and direct Dominion of the Church, which had recourse to her Censures in case they were invaded; by this the Church had a prodigious Advantage, for tho' she receiv'd nothing during the Life of the Possessor but a small Quit-Rent, yet when the Male-Issue of the Feudatories fail'd, which often happen'd in these Times by reason of the continual Wars, and popular Seditious, the Estates fell to the Church.

THE Normans were no less terrified and over-aw'd by these Censures than others; for having but lately embrac'd the Catholick Religion, which they had in great Veneration, as their frequent Pilgrimages to the most noted holy Places both in the East and West demonstrated, and being greater Votaries of the Apostolick See than any other Nation, as we have seen by their Behaviour to Pope Leo; they were very unwilling to expose themselves to these terrible Thunder-bolts. Nicholas II. encourag'd by this, resolv'd to try them, and thinking to obtain by the Censures, what Leo could not do with Armies, he solemnly excommunicated Robert and his Normans.

HOWEVER these Thunder-bolts were thrown in vain; for the Normans as well as they, knew very well how to keep what they had acquir'd with so much Labour and Danger, and they thought it would be the Height of Baseness to yield what they were in Possession of by so much Toil; whatever Respect they had for the Popes and the Apostolick See, yet when the Question was to part with what they had got, they took Example from the Popes themselves, and were not easily persuaded to do it; and tho' they dreaded the Censures thunder'd out against them, yet not to that Degree as to part with what they had taken, because they reckon'd the Censures unjustly pronounc'd against them.

MATTERS then being brought to this pass, that neither Side was in a State of Tranquillity, both came to think seriously how to extricate themselves from so much Distrust and Anguish of Mind, by means of an Agreement that might be for their mutual Advantage.

ROBERT consider'd with himself, that tho' he was sure he could not be forc'd to quit his Conquests by the Power of the Popes, yet it was not convenient to have them for Enemies; for tho' as Matters now stood, they could get no Assistance from the Emperors of the West, nor other neighbouring Princes, yet he had been taught by long Experience, that as Opportunity should offer, they would not fail to give him Disturbance; and that the greatest Rubs his Nation had met with, had been more owing to the Popes than the Greeks. The Censures, yea rather the Misfortunes they had often brought upon other Princes, much terrified him, lest they might occasion a Revolt amongst the People, and especially those of Puglia, who were terribly afraid of them, and not as yet well settled; that his Conquests were but lately made in foreign Countries, where he stood more in need of Friends than Enemies; that the Party for his Nephew Bacelardus might be strengthen'd by getting Encouragement from the Popes, who were ready to take Advantage of all Opportunities, the rather, because they were of Opinion that he himself was an Usurper: In fine, he saw it necessary for him to have the Pope on his Side, not only on account of what he had already acquir'd, but much more for what he had as yet to conquer in the other Provinces, that by the Authority the Popes had assum'd, he might be confirm'd in the Possession of what he hop'd to conquer.

ON the other hand the Pope consider'd, that the Normans did not mind Excommunication; that they were a People who would part with nothing willingly; that neither the Power of the Church, nor the neighbouring Princes was able to constrain them, and no Succours were to be expected from the Emperors of the West, who were at Variance with the Popes on account of their Election and the Investitures; and tho' Nicholas in a Council held a little before in Rome, had found Means to satisfy Henry, yet Matters were like to come to an open Rupture betwixt him and the Romans; that in order to be able to maintain the Cause of the Clergy, the People of Rome, and the Popes, against the Emperor, it behov'd him to pitch upon some powerful and gallant Prince, who henceforward might be able to support them, because otherwise all their Designs would come to nothing; that he could pitch upon none fitter than Robert, who with his Forces would be able to oppose him effectually, and to restore that Prerogative to the Church of Rome, which the Emperors had usurp'd: In fine, that there might be a way found out of reconciling Robert to the Apostolick See, whereby it would rather reap Advantage than Detriment.

ON these Considerations both Parties were dispos'd by means of a Reconciliation to put an End to all Debates, and to restore Peace. Robert resolv'd to be before-hand with the Pope, and having retir'd to Calabria, sent him an Ambassador with generous Offers to satisfy him in whatever he desir'd, and for that End invited him to an Interview, with which he assur'd him he would have good reason to be pleas'd.

THE Pope, who desir'd no better, and which likewise answer'd his Ends, was very well pleas'd, and accepted the Proposal; he having resolv'd before to hold a Council for reforming in some measure the abominable Manners of the Ecclesiasticks, sent him Word, that he had appointed this Council to be held in Melphis, where he resolv'd to be in Person, and where they two being met together should adjust all Differences to their mutual Satisfaction.

THE Corruption of Manners in the Ecclesiastick State in these Times was excessive; for laying aside all Shame, they did not scruple to keep Concubines publicly in their Houses, as also the Children born of them, as Peter Damian with Grief relates. Nicholas made some Canons in the Roman Council against such Concubinage; but in these our Provinces this Vice had got such Footing, that neither Bishop, Priest, Deacon, yea nor the very meanest of the Clergy wanted their Concubines; therefore Nicholas this Year 1059 held a Council in the City of Melphis, wherein he condemn'd and detested that vile Custom, by imposing severe Punishment on the Fornicators, and he likewise depos'd the Bishop of Trani. But for all that, this wicked Practice could not be rooted out: it appear'd next to impossible to get the Priests to leave it off, whence, in the Councils held since, we see nothing so much much inculcated, as to have the Priests to wean themselves from it, but always to no purpose; for the Use of Concubines was so publick in these our Provinces, and the Number of them so great, that they pretended Exemption from Secular Judicatories, and that they were not liable to the Penalties appointed by Secular Princes against Concubinage; that seeing they belong'd to Priests, they ought to enjoy the same Privilege with them. And 'tis surprizing, that Charles II. of Anjou, in his Time should ordain, that the Concubines of Priests should not be liable to forfeit the fourth Part of their Goods, as other Seculars were, tho' he did not think fit to exempt them from Secular Judicatories, a Privilege which the Priests claim'd.

THE Pope then being at the Council in Melphis, the famous Robert arriv'd in that City accompanied with Prince Richard, and all the Norman Nobility; after great Rejoicings and Entertainments, they came to the main Point.

THE Normans, for the greater Security of their Dominions, got the Popes engag'd to defend them, particularly against the Emperors, from whom they had taken them: Puglia and Calabria were not contraverted, having been taken from the Emperors of the East, and not from the Popes, who had no manner of Title to them. On the other hand, the Emperors of the West pretended, that what the Normans possess'd in these our Provinces, they held it of them in Fief, having been invested in it by Henry II. and that as Vassals they ought to acknowledge them for their Sovereigns; that Richard, who had robb'd Landulphus of the Principality of Capua ought to be reckon'd their Vassal, in the same manner as the Longobard Princes of Capua his Predecessors were, that Principality being subject to the Emperors of the West as Kings of Italy; they pretended the same Right over the Principalities of Benevento and Salerno, which Robert intended to invade. The Popes then were to engage themselves against those two powerful Enemies, whose Dominions were the subject Matter of this Treaty.

THEREFORE a Method was thought on, that would turn to both their Advantages. As we have said, there had been already a Custom introduc'd, that for the better Preservation of Estates, the Owners made them over to the Church of Rome, paid a small Acknowledgement, declar'd themselves Vassals, and swore Fealty. In these Contracts all the Advantage was on the Pope's Side, for they gave nothing away; on the contrary, besides the Oath of Fealty and Quit-Rent, in case of Failure of lawful and Male-Issue, the Estates devolv'd to the Church, and it was in the Pope's Power to invest others. Neither People nor Princes were at pains to inquire into this Right of Investiture, and by what Authority the Popes assum'd a Power to create Dukes and Counts, and oblige them to swear Fealty to them; it was sufficient to them if they were protected by Excommunications, which were so much dreaded, that their Enemies abstain'd from making War upon them in order to avoid the Censures of the Church. Besides they likewise saw the Popes were come to that pitch of Greatness, that they arrogated to themselves the Power of absolving Vassals from their Oaths, and likewise of deposing Emperors, and the greatest Monarchs in the World; so that they were the less surpriz'd at their giving the Titles of Counts and Dukes, when they presum'd to make the very Emperors of the West, and to transfer the Empire from one Nation to another.

BUT to fancy or imagine that Popes had not only a Power to give Investiture, and take Oaths of Fealty for those Lands that were made over to them, but also to do the same with respect to Provinces and Kingdoms not as yet conquer'd, is still more astonishing. As for those who were preparing to make such Conquests, it was an easy matter to persuade them of it, because they found their account in it, which not only encourag'd them in the Undertaking, but likewise secur'd them in the future Conquests, because if the former Possessors after the Conquest, should endeavour to recover their Right, they were sure to be expos'd to the Thunder-bolts of the Church.

IT was no hard Thing then to make an Agreement, when the Parties had nothing in view but to rob their Neighbours of their Rights, and to make their Advantage by the Bargain. There was no occasion to mention the Dominions taken from the Greeks and Longobards in the Agreement. Prince Bacelardus who had been robb'd by his Uncle, was not regarded in it; Prince Landulphus who had been expell'd Capua, was as little minded; but both Parties having an Eye to their own Interest and Designs, the Agreement was concluded in this manner; That Robert and his Normans should be absolv'd from all Censures; that the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria briz should be confirm'd to him; and besides, when he shall drive the Greeks and Saracens, who possess'd the greatest Part of Sicily, out of that Island, the Pope should give him the Investiture of it with the Title of Duke; and in fine, that the Principality of Capua should be confirm'd to Richard, who had usurp'd it from Landulphus.

ON the other hand it was agreed, that Robert and Richard, and their Successors, should put themselves under the Protection of the Pope, who confirm'd to them the Possession of all the Dominions they had in Italy, and of Sicily when they should conquer it from the Saracens; therefore they swore an Oath of Fealty as Feudatories of the Holy See, to which Robert was oblig'd to pay yearly Twelve-pence of Pavia for each Yoke of Oxen, as Leo Ostiensis relates¹; and Fr. Tolomeo of Lucca adds, that this annual Tribute was not so much as demanded by the Pope, but that Robert oblig'd himself to pay it of his own Free-Will.

THIS Agreement was settled in Melphis in the Year 1059, and tho' some have written that it was likewise confirm'd in the Council held in this City; nevertheless it not being an Affair that concern'd the Council, which was only conven'd for reforming the Manners of Ecclesiasticks, others have not ventur'd to say it, but only that while the Pope was at this Council in Melphis, he receiv'd the Oath of Fealty from the Normans, and gave the Investiture. However that may be, 'tis most certain, the Treaty was very faithfully perform'd on both Sides; and Robert took the Oath of Fealty, which Baronius says he found in a Book in the Vatican call'd Liber Censusum, in which the Form of the Oath which Robert swore to the Pope is recorded: it begins thus; Ego Robertus Dei Gratia, & S. Petri, Dux Apuliæ & Calabriæ, atque utroque subveniente futurus Siciliæ. Sigonius observes, that the Pope did not confirm him Duke with the French Ceremonies us'd by the Dukes of Normandy, as already related, to wit, by putting the Ring on his Finger, the Cap on his Head, and girding him with the Sword; but after the Italian manner, by putting the Standard in his Right Hand, which made him Standard-bearer of the Holy Church; whence Guiscard from this Year began to use this Ducal Title; Dux Apuliæ, Calabriæ, & futurus Siciliæ.

SOME also say, that Robert at this Time restor'd the Cities of Benevento and Troja to the Pope, but without any Foundation of Truth; for at this Time the City of Benevento was in the Possession of Landulphus its Prince, and Pandulphus his Son, who had been now restor'd to their Principality, as the Cotemporary Author of the Chronicle of the Dukes and Princes of Benevento relates; and it was not restor'd to the Church of Rome by Robert till long after, when he had vanquish'd the Longobard Princes who held that Principality, and expell'd them their Dominions, as shall shortly be told. Neither is there any mention made in grave and ancient Writers of the Restitution of Troja to the Pope, seeing there is no Evidence that the Popes could ever have had any Right to it; for a few Years after the Greeks had built it, the Normans took it from them; and what confirms this the more, is, that at this Day we find Benevento only in the Possession of the Church of Rome, but we read no where, that ever Troja was under her Dominion.

THIS is the Foundation of the Right which the Popes pretend to have over the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily; a Foundation tho' in those Times weak and tottering, nevertheless in process of time being grown more firm and fix'd, by the Cunning of the Successors of Nicholas II. it was able to support such great and lofty Buildings, that the Popes came to dispose of these Kingdoms at their Pleasure, and to transfer them from one Nation to another, as may be observ'd in the Course of this History.

THEY owe this Advantage, and this so considerable a Part of their Temporal Grandeur to the Normans, who, in order to engage them in their Defence, particularly against the Emperors of the East, who could plead that a great Part of what these Conquerors had made themselves Masters of, belong'd to them, or that they held it in Fief of the Emperors of the West, from whom they had formerly got Investiture, did not scruple to declare themselves Vassals of the Popes, that none might pretend to make War against them, without exposing themselves to the Censures of the Church.

Romanæ Ecclesiæ ab eis primo recepta, nec non Investitione census per singulos annos, per singula bovm paræ, denarios duodecim.

THESE were the first Seeds, which being afterwards cultivated with skilful Hands, in process of Time, took such deep Roots, and from whence sprung such lofty Plants, that at last the Kingdom of Sicily was reckon'd the special Patrimony of St. Peter, and a Fief of the Roman Apostolick See. Whence our Writers believed, that the Church of Rome had invested the Normans therewith, as being her Patrimony, for which some quote the Donation of Constantine the Great, some that of Pepin and Charles the Great, and others those of other Emperors of the West. These Writers continued in this Darkeness through their Ignorance of History, till *Marinus Freccia*¹, by the Light thereof, discover'd the Cheat, and let the World see that these Investitures were grounded on nothing but Custom. And speaking of this Investiture of Nicholas II. and of others that follow'd afterwards, he did not scruple to say, Ecclesia non dedit, sed accepit; non transtulit, sed ab alio occupatum recepit; he pity'd his Kinsman Matteo degli Afflitti, who wrote, that Constantine the Great, gave this Kingdom to the Church, and said, Affinis meus historicus non est, auditu percepit, &c.

THIS first Investiture, with respect to the Person of Robert, comprehended only the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria, as Gulielmus Pugliensis sings².

Unde sibi Calaber concessus & Appulus omnis.*

And as to Richard, the Principality of Capua only. But it was couch'd in such a Manner, that it might be interpreted to extend to all the other Provinces, which as yet had not been subjected by the Normans: Robert was likewise invested with Sicily, that was as yet to be taken from the Greeks and Saracens, who were in Possession of it. The same ought certainly to be understood with respect to the Principalities of Salerno, Benevento, Amalphis, Naples, Bari, Gaeta, and all that now makes up the Kingdom, as the Event prov'd; for they were no sooner conquer'd by the Normans, and the Greeks and Longobard Princes intirely expell'd, than the Popes gave the Investiture of them, with all the Pleasure imaginable, because, besides, that it cost them nothing, they found their account in it, more than the Normans themselves.

ON the other hand, the Normans were easily catch'd, for they saw the Advantages, which we have already taken Notice of, but were not aware of the Consequences, and excepting the small Acknowledgement of Quit-rent, the Sovereignty was lodg'd in them, and they govern'd their Dominions with a free and absolute Sway, as supreme and independent, and reckon'd themselves rather Tributaries, than real Feudatories of the Apostolick See; for in those Times, the Word Liege-man was not taken in the same Sense, as it is now by our Feudists, but denoted a sort of Confederacy and League, when the Inferior, by swearing Fealty, oblig'd himself to assist the Superior in his Wars, or to pay him a certain yearly Tribute or Quit-rent³. The same was practis'd among Princes themselves, witness Robert Count of Namur, to Edward III. King of *England*⁴; the Duke of Guelder, to Charles King of France, and Philip of Valois King of France, to Alphonfus King of *Castile*⁵.

THIS Custom was more frequent with respect to the Popes, on the foresaid account. The Kings of England oblig'd themselves to pay Tribute to the Apostolick See, which was exacted from that Kingdom, till the Reign of Henry VIII. and was call'd St. Peter's Pence; yea, there was not a Prince in Europe, who did not subject their Kingdoms to pay Tribute to the Church of Rome; so that Cujacius speaking of this Custom, which was become very frequent in those Times, said, & qui non Reges olim? The Popes at first were satisfied with the Quit-rent only, in order to make the Yoke seem easy; but in process of Time, made a Handle of it, to pave the Way to greater Pretensions, which they cunningly trump'd up, as occasion offer'd, as shall appear in the Course of this History.

The Dukedom of Bari subjected by the Normans.

AFTER this Interview, which prov'd to the Satisfaction of both Parties, the Pope return'd to Rome, and Robert to Calabria, in order to reduce some other Towns that were as yet in the Possession of the Greeks, of which he soon made himself Master ; and perceiving that Count Roger his Brother, had behav'd himself with extraordinary Courage in these Expeditions, he left him in Calabria to compleat the Conquest thereof, which he did most gallantly, and he himself in the mean time went to Puglia, and contriv'd means how both to secure and enlarge his Conquests.

FOR this End he resolv'd to make the Longobard Princes his Allies, by marrying one of their Daughters, and finding that the Prince of Salerno was the most powerful, he sent Ambassadors to Gisulphus II. who had succeeded Guaimarus IV. his Father in that Principality; to desire his Sister in Marriage. Although the Match was honourable, yet Gisulphus made some Difficulty in it, as knowing it was the Genius of that Nation, to catch at all Advantages, and besides that it might be of dangerous Consequence, because at the same time that he sought his Sister, his Wife Alverada was still alive, by whom he had a Son the famous Boemondus. But he gave him to understand that he had divorc'd her, because she was his near Kinswoman, which at that Time was thought would not be dispens'd with by the Pope, as being rarely practis'd: Gisulphus durst not give him a Denial, for fear of breaking with him; whereupon he gave him his eldest Sister, nam'd *Sicelgaita*¹. At the same time he gave another Sister in marriage, nam'd Gaidelgrima, to another Norman Prince, and gave him for Portion with her, Nola, Marigliano, Palma, Sarno and some other neighbouring Places, which had never been subject to the Princes of Capua, but to those of *Salerno*². This was Giordano I. Son of Richard Count of Aversa, who, after having taken the Principality of Capua from Landolphus, the last of the Longobard Princes, had made Giordano his Son Prince of it. He had also made him Duke of Gaeta, as he himself was ; not but Gaeta had likewise its own particular Dukes under these two Princes, to wit, Goffredo, or Loffredo Ridello, in the Year 1072, and others ; but they were so call'd, just as Pandolphus was said to be Count of Capua, to whom Pope John VIII. had given it, though Docibilis was Duke of it, who was subject to Pandolphus, as Goffredo was at this Time to the Norman Princes of Capua.

MEAN while Robert set out on the bold Expedition into *Sicily*³, and after having, with his Brother Roger, made many Conquests there, which shall be related in a more proper Place, he return'd to Calabria with his new Spouse, and seeing the Greeks were still in Possession of Bari, Otranto, and some other Places of antient Calabria, he bent all his Thoughts on driving them out of that Corner, and especially out of Bari, where they had assembled all their Forces.

BUT before he set out for this Expedition, he was oblig'd to suppress a new Conspiracy, which Goffredo and Gocelino, two considerable Norman Cavaliers had hatch'd, under pretence of restoring Bacelardus the Son of Umsfred, to the County of Puglia, which Robert had robb'd him of. As soon as this noble Champion was appriz'd of it, he surpriz'd the Conspirators, imprison'd and punish'd many of them with the utmost Rigour, and put the rest to flight : Gocelino retir'd to Constantinople for Shelter amongst the Greeks, and Goffredo fled to a Castle ; and the unfortunate Prince Bacclardus run to Bari, from whence some time after, he went to Constantinople to beg Assistance of the Emperor Constantinus Ducas, who in the Year 1060 had succeeded Isacius.

BAR I had hitherto maintain'd itself under the Dominion of the Emperors of the East, and as Head of that Province, likewise continu'd to be the Seat of the chief Grecian Magistrates, for at this Time the Emperors of Constantinople had rais'd it to be the Metropolis of a new Principality, call'd the Principality of Bari ; it was formerly a Dukedom, and the Greeks had made Argirus Duke of it, and, according to their wonted Vanity, call'd it the Dukedom of Italy. They had drawn together all their Forces into this City, as the Place of greatest Defence; wherefore it was the Source of Sedition against the Norman Princes for many Years, and a safe Shelter for the Seditious ; which made Robert for a long Time consider how he might besiege it.

BUT the Baresians were no sooner appriz'd of the Designs of this Prince, than they sent to Constantinople to acquaint the Emperor, who being spurr'd on by Gocelino, immediately sent a new Catapanus, Stephanus Pateranus, or, as he's call'd, Sebastophorus, to defend the City. This new Catapanus being come to Bari, resolv'd to make a strong Defence ; in the mean time Robert assembled his Army, and not thinking it sufficient for the Siege of this Capital, he over-run the neighbouring Places, and ere he march'd to Bari, sat down before Otranto, which he harra's'd so much, that he oblig'd it to surrender ; thereafter having order'd many Ships to come from Calabria, he reinforc'd his Army with a good Body of Troops, and at last in the Year 1067, laid close Siege to Bari, both by Sea and Land ¹. This Siege was very remarkable, where there were many glorious Actions perform'd on both Sides, which the Design of my Work obliges me to pass over, and I do it the more willingly, seeing there are not wanting Writers, who give account of them at large ².

ACCORDING to Gulielmus Pugliensis ³, and Leo Ostiensis ⁴, this Siege lasted little less than four Years, and the Place was attack'd and defended with extreme Valour and equal Courage. The new Catapanus made an obstinate and gallant Defence, and the Besiegers, intrepid and bold Attacks ; and this Enterprize of the Normans would have prov'd unsuccessful, if Robert's Army had not been reinforc'd by his Brother Roger, who having made himself Master of a good Part of Sicily, sent him another Army to his Assistance. At last Robert overcame the Obstinacy of the Besieged, and oblig'd them to surrender that most important Place ; for in the Month of April in the Year 1070, the Gates were open'd, and they yielded at Discretion. Duke Robert made his Entry into the City, and treated the Baresians with all Humanity : He valued the Catapanus, and left it to his Choice, either to remain in Bari with his Greeks, and serve him, or to return to Constantinople, which last he embrac'd ; and after Robert had spent many Days in Bari in publick Feastings and Rejoycings, he imbark'd, and with a Fleet of 58 Ships, sail'd for Sicily, in order to besiege Palermo ⁵.

THUS did the famous Robert conquer Bari, a City that had so long maintain'd itself under the Dominion of the Greeks, and by various Turns of Fortune, sometimes taken, sometimes re-taken, was now for the last Time dismembred from their Empire, though the Greeks afterwards attempted to recover it, but in vain, for Robert kept Possession of it, and transmitted it to his Posterity. And thus did the Dukedom of Bari pass from the Greeks to the Normans under Robert, who created a new Duke to govern it. And thus by degrees the Way was pav'd to the Union of these Provinces under one single Person, which was happily compleated by Roger, who had the Glory to wear the united Crowns of the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia.

C H A P. II.

The Conquest of Sicily by the Normans.

IN the mean time Pope Nicholas II. died in Florence in the beginning of July in the Year 1061, whose Pontificate had lasted two Years and a Half¹, and the wonted Disorders and Tumults happen'd in Rome about the Election of his Successor. The famous Hildebrand, in order to quiet them, joyn'd with the Cardinals and Roman Nobility, and after three Months, elected the Bishop of Lucca, a Native of the Milaneze, who took the Name of Alexander II. The Emperor, who had not been consulted in the Election, being much offended, caus'd the Bishop of Parma his Chancellor, to be elected Pope, whom they nam'd Honorius II. in opposition to Alexander; and moreover, sent him to Rome with a good Army, to drive out his Rival. Whereupon the Jars betwixt the Popes and the Emperors of the West, broke out into open War and Factions, and each of them strove to increase his Party. Some of the greatest Prelates of the Church, and the most renown'd Divines of that Age were of the Emperor's Party, and supported his Cause; but the intrepid Hildebrand, with unheard-of Boldness and Vigour, oppos'd them all; and when the Archbishop of Cologne check'd Alexander, for daring to take the Papacy upon him, without the Consent of the Emperor, contrary to what had been formerly practis'd; told him to his Face, That to ask the Emperor's Consent, was a damnable and most corrupt Custom, and contrary to the Canons of the Church; that neither the Pope, nor the Bishops, nor the Cardinals, nor the Archdeacons, nor any Persons whatsoever, ought to comply therewith; that the Apostolick See was free, and subject to none; that Nicholas II. had acted the Part of a Fool, and the Church ought not to lose its Dignity through any Man's Folly; and that so great an Indignity, as to allow the Kings of Germany to make Popes, was by no means to be born with.

THEREFORE the Quarrels increas'd, and they became more exasperated against one another, but by the Cunning and Activity of Hildebrand, Alexander's Party grew strongest, and that of Honorius was depress'd, who, the same Year that he had intruded into the Papacy, was depos'd, and condemn'd in the Council of Mantua; but for all that, he never parted with the Pontifical Badges.

DURING the Pontificate of Alexander II. by reason of the Agreement made a little before with his Predecessor, there was no occasion of Dispute betwixt him and the Norman Princes; on the contrary, Alexander confirm'd to Robert what Nicholas II. had granted him, and whilst Roger was making Preparation for the Expedition into Sicily, he sent him a Standard for the Conquest of it; it being at that Time the Custom, as Baronius relates², that when the Popes had a Mind to encourage any Christian Prince to conquer a new Kingdom, they sent him a Standard, and declared him Standard-Bearer of the Holy Church. But at the same time that the Normans were paying all Respect to the Apostolick See, they serv'd their own Interest; in the mean time they did not neglect to leave Monuments of their Piety and Bounty towards the Churches, and particularly to the Monastery of Monte Cassino, while the Abbot Desiderius govern'd it, Richard Prince of Capua, made so large and noble Donations, that Leo Ofiensis and Petrus Diaconus relate, there never were better and more agreeable Times for these Monks¹. This Prince, besides many Castles and Places in the Neighbourhood of that Monastery, gave it the Castle of Teramo, which, by the Rebellion of its Count, had been formerly forfeited secundum Longobardorum legem, as he says in his Charter, related by P. Abbot of *Noce*². He gave it many other Churches, for Churches then were Matter of Traffick, and amongst the rest the Church of Calena, situated in Gargano near the City Vesti; for according to the Division made in Melpbis, Siponto with Monte Gargano fell to Richard's Share. Therefore the Abbot Desiderius, tho' of Longobard Extraction, adhered to the Normans, and was their Dependent, and seem'd no ways uneasy at the Depression of the Longobard Princes, tho' formerly he had shewn himself to be of different Sentiments with respect to his Nation.

BUT this Prince Richard, hearing what Progress the Normans descended from Tancred of Hauteville, had made in Puglia and Calabria, and what they were now making in Sicily, thought it would be reckon'd want of Courage in him if he did not follow their Example: Spurr'd on by this Reflection, and not content with the Principality of Capua, which he had taken from Pandulphus, he resolv'd upon greater and more noble Undertakings. He design'd to take Advantage of the Jars which had arisen betwixt the Pope and the Emperor Henry for the Reasons above related, and therefore, without any Scruple, invaded Campania di Roma, and advanc'd near to Rome itself, in order to get the Start of Henry, who intended to go to that City to receive the Imperial Crown from the Hands of the Pope³. When he was in the Neighbourhood of Rome, he us'd all Means possible to get the Dignity of Patriciate from the Romans, which was then in the greatest Esteem, and wont to be the next Step to the Empire; but Henry being appriz'd of it, in all haste march'd to Italy with a great Army, and was join'd by Goffredo Marquis of Tuscany. The Normans knowing themselves to be inferior in Force, were oblig'd to give over the Undertaking, and retire out of Campania; and after some Skirmishes, at last, by the Interposition of the Pope, Richard made up Matters with Goffredo, and return'd to Capua.

THE Pope soon after having been invited by the Abbot Desiderius to consecrate the Church of Monte Cassino, which he had magnificently rebuilt, went thither with Hildebrand and many Cardinals, where he perform'd the Function with solemn Ceremony and Magnificence, at which ten of our Archbishops, and 43 Bishops assisted. And for making it the more splendid, he also invited all our Princes, as well Norman as Longobard, who possess'd these Provinces, as also the Dukes of Naples and Sorrento. Gisulphus Prince of Salerno, with his Brothers, and Richard Prince of Capua, with Giordano his Son, and Rainulphus his Brother, went thither; but what is worth our observing, and much to our Purpose is, that Landulphus Prince of Benevento was present at this Solemnity, as Leo Ostiensis, an Eye-Witness, and at that Time Library-Keeper of Monte Cassino, relates, which confirms what the Anonymous Beneventan wrote in the Chronicle of the Dukes and Princes of Benevento, that Landulphus was restor'd to the Principality of Benevento, and that it was long after that the Principality became extinct, when the City devolv'd to the Pope, and the rest of it to the Normans. Sergius Duke of Naples, and another Sergius Duke of Sorrento, were likewise present; for Sorrento was dismember'd from the Dukedom of Naples, to which it formerly was subject, as Amalphis had been long before; and these two Dukedoms were govern'd after the manner of Republics by their Dukes and Consuls, tho' they depended on the *Greek Empire*⁴, and Amalphis had been subjected to the Princes of Salerno. There were present likewise the Counts of Marsi, and many other Barons both Longobard and Norman, of which at this Time there was a great Number in these Provinces.

ONLY the famous Duke Robert was not there. He with his Brother Roger, was in Sicily, wholly intent on the Siege of Salerno. Maniaces with the Assistance of the Normans had in a great measure restor'd this Island, which had fallen under the Yoke of the Saracens, to the Empire of the East; but after the Normans were disoblig'd, and Maniaces was succeeded by Governors not equal to the Charge, it had been retaken by the Saracens, who had driven the Greeks out of all the strong Places, except Messina; but at last in the Year 1058, they were forc'd to abandon that City, and leave the whole Island to the Discretion and Power of these Infidels. Robert Guiscard with his younger Brother Roger invaded it, and after having subdu'd almost all the chief Cities, had only Palermo, the strongest and principal City of the Island to conquer, and on which the Saracens laid their whole Strefs; but these two gallant Champions laid so close Siege to it, that in less than five Months the Saracens were forc'd to surrender it to Robert, who with his Brother Roger made their Entry into the City with the infinite Acclamations of the People. As soon as Robert had conquer'd Palermo, in order to gain the Affection of the Saracens, he left it to their Choice, either to turn Christians, or to continue in their Mahometan Religion. It was at this Time that Robert invested ¹ Roger his Brother with all this Island, and created him Count of Sicily, for by his Prowess and excellent Conduct he had acquir'd it. He retain'd to himself the half of Palermo, of the Valley of Demonæ, and of Messina; and having left his Brother in Sicily, he return'd to Puglia, and stopp'd in Melphis ². Hence 'tis clear, that Roger did not seek Investiture from the Pope, because he held it of his Brother Robert.

THUS these two Princes, the one reigning in Puglia with the Title of Duke, the other in Sicily with that of Count, struck Terror into all their Neighbours. Some have believ'd, because Robert invested his Brother Roger with Sicily, who acknowledg'd that he held his Dominion and Title of Count of Sicily of him, that therefore this Island was subject to the Dukes of Puglia; and that the Royal Title of King of Sicily, which Roger afterwards got from Anacletus the Antipope, and which was confirm'd to him by Innocent II. as we shall relate, was meant of this our Kingdom, which was call'd the Kingdom of Puglia, and not of the Island of Sicily ³. Others on the contrary, such as Inveges ⁴, say, that this our Kingdom was subject to the Island of Sicily.

BUT from what we have said, and much more from what we shall observe, it will appear, that the Kingdom of Puglia was neither subject to that of Sicily, nor Sicily to Puglia, for each of them had its own particular Laws, and was govern'd by its proper Officers. 'Tis true indeed, when we consider that the Normans made themselves Masters of this Island, after they had conquer'd Puglia and Calabria, it may seem probable that it was reckon'd as an Accession to these Dukedoms, and consequently subject to the Dukes of Puglia; but seeing Robert resided in Puglia, and Roger in Sicily, and govern'd those two States independently of one another, it cannot be said positively that the one was subject to the other. And tho' when Robert died, Roger succeeded him in the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria, and fix'd his Royal Seat in Palermo, where the Norman Kings his Successors also had theirs, yet for all that the Kingdom of Puglia was not subject to that of Sicily, but both were govern'd as two distinct Kingdoms, and neither of them reputed a Province of the other, which we shall make clear in the Progress of this History.

MEAN while Robert return'd to Melphis, and was receiv'd with Acclamations and Rejoicings by all the Barons of Puglia and Calabria, who congratulated him as their Sovereign on his Conquest of Palermo ⁵. Only Peter the Son of the Count of Trani would never pay him that Respect, but affected an intire Independency, and therefore had refused him Assistance for the Expedition of Sicily ⁶. Robert therefore taking this in ill-part, order'd him to deliver up the City of Trani, and some other Towns subject to him; but Peter boldly refus'd to comply, which was the Cause of his Ruin, for Trani was besieg'd and soon taken; the other Towns that depended on him, such as Bisceglia, Quarato and Giovenazzo had the same Fate. However Peter retir'd to Andria, where he might have defended himself long enough; but wanting Provisions, and going into the Country with a strong Guard in order to get some, he was so unlucky as to be taken in his Return, by the Duke's Soldiers. Robert seeing him brought thus low, us'd him with all Tendernefs and Humanity, and obliging him only to take an Oath of Fealty, he generously restor'd all he had taken from him excepting Trani.

IN the mean time Alexander II. died in the Month of April in the Year 1073, who, while he was Pope had led a solitary and private Life, and had committed the Government of the Holy See to the famous Hildebrand; who, without minding the Emperor, immediately conven'd the Clergy and People of Rome in order to elect a Successor; and the same Day that Alexander died, he himself was proclaim'd Pope. Hildebrand desir'd the Emperor Henry to confirm his Election; but this Prince took some time to consider of it, and sent Count Eberard to Rome to take Information in what manner such a precipitate Election had been made. Hildebrand so much caref'd the Count, that he induc'd him to write in his Favour; and Henry seeing it would be to no purpose to oppose an Election already made, because Hildebrand was more powerful in Rome than he, consented to it. So he was ordain'd Priest, and afterwards Bishop of Rome, in the Month of June of the same Year 1073, and at his Ordination took the Name of Gregory VII.

Robert conquers the Principalities of Salerno and Amalphis.

ROBERT after having subdu'd Sicily, resolv'd presently to add the other Provinces that remain'd in our Country to his Dominions; and by a lucky Opportunity, which we shall relate, he was successful in the Conquest of the Principality of Salerno from his Kinsman Gisulphus.

THE Amalphitans, as we have said, having fallen under the Dominion of Guaimarus Prince of Salerno, had found his Government too severe, and in order to shake off the Yoke, had invaded the City, and together with the other Conspirators near the Sea-shore, cruelly murder'd him; but they were suppress'd by Guido his Brother, who, in the Space of five Days after the Tumults, recover'd the City, and restor'd it to Gisulphus his Nephew, the Son of Guaimarus. But for all that Gisulphus treated the Amalphitans much more harshly than his Father had done, therefore they resolv'd to have recourse to Duke Robert, that he would be pleas'd to intercede for them with his Kinsman, to use them with some Humanity and Tenderneſs. The Duke being mov'd with Compassion, sent Ambassadors to Gisulphus, begging him to forbear to treat the Amalphitans after so cruel a manner, but the Prince looking upon this Intercession as an impertinent Remonstrance, receiv'd the Ambassadors very coldly; and seeking an occasion to pick a Quarrel, pretended that the Coast from Salerno to the Port of Fico belong'd to him; and likewise declared, that he would have Areco and Sancta Euphemia restor'd to his Dominion, of which the Duke had made himself Master. Robert at first endeavour'd to gain his Kinsman by fair Means; and to accommodate Matters amicably; but Gisulphus refus'd to treat at any rate, perhaps trusting to the Assistance he expected from Richard Prince of Capua, who had espous'd his Interest, and was then at Variance with Robert Guiscard; who, that he might not have two Enemies to contend with, adjust'd Matters privately with Richard, and having made him very advantageous Offers, perswaded him to be on his Side against the Prince of *Salerno*². He likewise made a particular Treaty with the Amalphitans, and took them under his Protection, and having put a Garrison into their City, prepar'd to lay Siege to the City of Salerno with his own Troops, and those of the Prince of Capua.

A L L those who had the Interest of Gisulphus at Heart, counsell'd him to ward off the Blow; and Gregory VII. who lov'd him as his Son, and Desiderius his great Friend, advis'd him not to break with *Robert*¹; but he being obstinate did not listen to them. However Desiderius did not desist, but knowing that Robert had already besieg'd Salerno, he engag'd Prince Richard to go with him in order to soften Gisulphus; but all to no purpose: On the contrary, he could not forbear declaring, out of an ill-grounded Pride, that he did not value the Duke's Friendship a Rush, and renounced it for ever.

ROBERT being highly offended, laid aside all fair Means, and besieg'd that City so closely, that at the End of five Months it was reduc'd to the utmost Necessity. Those who commanded the Place, perceiving they could hold it no longer, thought on their own Security². One of the chief Persons in the Place was Bacelardus Son of Umsfred, who, after having in vain expected Assistance from the Emperor of Constantinople, had return'd into Puglia, and us'd all Means to be reveng'd of his Uncle; but being afraid that if he should fall into his Hands, he would use him with the utmost Severity, he fled in the Night-time to Sanseverino, in the Neighbourhood, where he was receiv'd. The Duke wrote to Count Roger to come with all haste from Sicily to besiege Sanseverino, whilst he should put an End to the Siege of Salerno. But he soon made himself Master of the Place, for the Walls of the City were so batter'd down, that the Inhabitants came to invite Robert to enter at the largest Breach, to prevent the Misfortune to which a Place taken by Assault was liable. However Gisulphus did not surrender for all that, but defended himself in the Citadel; but being furiously attack'd by Robert, he was forc'd at last to shew as much Submission, as formerly he had shewn Pride; he yielded himself to the Clemency of the Victor, and of all Favours begg'd that of his Liberty, which was granted him; and having first retir'd to Monte Cassino, he afterwards put himself under the Protection of Pope Gregory VII. who assign'd him some Villages in Campagna di Roma to live in; nevertheless he continu'd to take the Title of Prince of Salerno, and Duke of Puglia and Calabria, as his Father Guaimarus had done, but not of Sicily, as by a Mistake we read in the Pedigree of the Princes of Salerno written by Pellegrinus.

THE Duke caus'd Salerno to be fortified anew, and march'd against Bacelardus to prevent his fortifying himself in Sanseverino. In a short time he join'd his Brother Roger, who had already attack'd the Place; so that being more closely besieg'd, it was oblig'd to capitulate; which made Bacelardus and his Brother Hermanus resolve to retire again to Constantinople, where these unfortunate Princes spent the rest of their Days in great Misery, and where after many Years they died.

THUS in the Year 1075, according to the Anonymous Cassinensis, Fr. Tolomeo of Lucca, and Camillus Pellegrinus, was the Principality of Salerno united to the Dukedoms of Puglia, Calabria and Sicily, under the famous Duke Robert, who also being Master of Amalphis, threaten'd likewise to subdue what remain'd of these Provinces to his Dominion. And thus were the Longobard Princes extinguish'd in Salerno; but that Nation was not quite extirpated; there were still many Families of Longobard Extract, both in the Principality of Capua, and in the neighbouring Countries³. There still remain'd Guaimarus Count of Capaccio, Pandulphus Count of Corneto, Jordanus Lord of Castello, Corneto del Cilento Nephew of Prince Guaimarus, Astolphus Son of Count Gisulphus, Romualdus Son of Peter Count of Atemulfo, Castelmannus Son of Count Adelferius, Berengarius Son of Count Alphannus, John and Landulphus Sons of Count Ademarus, surnam'd the Red, John Son of Count Guaimarus, Gloriosus Son of Count Pandulphus, who were still alive in the Years 1110 and 1114; and Sicelgaita Daughter of Gloriosus, and Widow of Marinus Caccapete of Naples, was still alive in the Year 1115⁴. So likewise Pellegrinus relates, that the Noble Family of Porta in Salerno, descended of the Counts Guaiferius and Albertus, who were of Longobard Extract, continu'd in a direct Line till the Year 1335, as is mention'd in the ancient Charters; as also we find in old Monuments many other Salernitan Counts for seven or eight Generations down to that Time, as the same Author attests. And tho' it be next to impossible to find a Series of them in a direct Line, yet for all that the Longobard Blood is not quite lost in this Province; and perhaps at this Time is conceal'd under the coarse Cloths of Boors and Rusticks. This lets us see, that Noble Blood is of no Value, when Splendor and Riches have left it.

C H A P. IV.

The Principality of Benevento intirely subjected to the Dominion of the Normans, and the City of Benevento to the Church of Rome.

PRINCE Gisulphus being expell'd Salerno and Analphis, made Gregory VII. very much dread the Consequence of the Growth of the Norman Princes; but especially he was desirous to have Gisulphus restor'd, whom he so much lov'd, because by that Means he might be able to ballance the Power of those Princes, therefore he watch'd an Opportunity to bring it about. He was also encourag'd to set up another Party against Robert, and to take his expell'd Nephews under his Protection; but it was not long before Robert and his Brother Richard furnish'd him a large Field for Quarrels and Intrigues. These Princes, not content with having expell'd Gisulphus from Salerno, but seeing he had got Shelter in Campania di Roma, under Gregory, they resolv'd to pursue him even in that Place, and on that account to invade Campania; whereupon they immediately march'd their Army that way, and took Possession of a Part of *Marca d'Ancona*¹. But as soon as the News reach'd Rome, that these Princes had enter'd upon the Lands of the Church, Gregory, who of all the Popes was the least capable to suffer such an Affront, and who wanted nothing more than such an Occasion for driving out his Enemies, call'd a Council in Rome, and with publick Ceremony and Solemnity excommunicated these two Princes and their Adherents². But perceiving that they did not much mind these Thunderbolts, at the same Time he apply'd more effectual Means; he sent a good Army against them, which made them quickly retreat. The Duke and Prince, that they might not lose the Opportunity of making other Conquests elsewhere, came and besieg'd the Cities of Benevento and Naples. The Duke invested Benevento, and the Prince Naples.

THE City of Benevento was at this Time govern'd by Landulphus VI. This Prince, tho' he had been the Father of many Children, yet they had all died in his Life-time. Pandulphus whom he had made Partner in the Principality, had been kill'd in the Year 1074, by the Normans near Monte Sarchio; so that he surviving all his Sons, held the Principality till the Year 1077, but being full of Years and decay'd, after having reign'd 39 Years in Benevento, he ended his Days there in 1077, and leaving no Issue, the Succession of the Princes of Benevento fail'd in him. This is the Period of this Principality; such is the Instability of worldly Affairs. This Principality which above all others extended its Bounds the most, and in the Time of Arechis comprehended almost all that which is now the Kingdom of Naples, at this Time was quite extinguish'd, which Misfortune did not happen to the Principalities of Capua and Salerno; for tho' the Longobard Princes fail'd in them, yet the Principalities continu'd long under the Normans; and tho' Roger form'd these Provinces into a Kingdom, yet he did not extinguish these Principalities; for among other Titles he took likewise those of Prince of Capua and Salerno, with which he also adorn'd his Sons. But that of Benevento was quite extinguish'd, for the City came under the Dominion of the Popes, and the other Lands and Cities of the Principality became subject to the Normans, which they added to the other Provinces they had conquer'd; wherefore in their Titles they did not retain that of Prince of Benevento, as being quite extinct.

THEREFORE on the Death of Landulphus VI. the last Prince of Benevento without Issue, Gregory laid Claim to the City as belonging to the Church of Rome. On the other hand Robert, who had made himself Master of many Towns of this Principality, resolv'd to reduce Benevento under his Dominion, as he had done those Towns which acknowledg'd it for their Head. Therefore committing the Charge of the Siege of Naples to Richard Prince of Capua, he took that of Benevento upon himself. But Benevento, by the Vigilance and Direction of Gregory, and Naples by the Bravery of its Citizens, who defended themselves gallantly, held out a long Time.

IN the mean time Richard was taken ill, and being reconcil'd to Gregory, and absolv'd from the Censures of the Church, died soon after. Giordanus his Son, who succeeded him, differing in Sentiments from his Father, immediately rais'd the Siege of Naples, and breaking the League his Father had made with Robert, join'd with the Pope. Robert likewise having left some Troops at the Siege of Benevento, had retir'd into Calabria; so that Giordanus taking Advantage of his Absence, in Confederacy with the Pope, push'd on Matters so far, that having receiv'd a great Sum of Money from the Beneventans, he immediately rais'd the Siege of their City, levell'd all their Works, and broke the Machines which Robert had prepar'd for reducing that City to his Obedience.

ROBERT was so much provok'd at this Behaviour of Giordanus, that he immediately return'd from Calabria into Puglia, where after the Reduction of Ascoli, Monte Vico, and Ariano, he march'd presently to the River Sarno, where he lay, in order to give him Battle; and they would actually have enagag'd if the Abbot Desiderius had not interpos'd, who manag'd Matters so effectually, and with so much Dexterity, that he pacified Robert, and got him to consent to a Peace, and made these two Princes as good Friends as formerly¹. Desiderius likewise reconcil'd Robert with the Pope, and was so much a Friend to both, that he went to Rome and got the Pope to absolve him from the Excommunication, and had the Glory to make Peace between these Princes, at the very Time, when by their Quarrels and Debates they were so exasperated against one another, that a bloody and cruel War seem'd unavoidable.

THUS the Normans being made Friends with the Pope, obtain'd Absolution from the Censure; and on the other hand Robert having reduc'd the Towns of Monticulo, Carbonara, Pietrapalumbo, Monteverde, Genziano and Spinazzola under his Obedience, had no mind to renew the Siege of Benevento, but left it intirely free to Gregory; from this Time this City began to be govern'd by the Church of Rome, which introduc'd a new Polity, and sent Governors to it, who, for the most Part were Cardinals².

THUS did the City of Benevento come under the Dominion of the Church of Rome, before these Provinces were united and form'd into a Kingdom; for which reason, the Popes in the Investitures they have ever since this Time given of the Kingdom of Naples, reserve to themselves the City of Benevento, as not comprehended therein, but independant on it, and subject to the Church of Rome; whence the Beneventans are reputed Foreigners, and not Natives of the Kingdom.

THUS we see how these our Provinces, that were subject to so many Princes, by Degrees came to be united in the Person of Robert, and at last under Roger Count of Sicily, were join'd and form'd into a Kingdom. Now there remain'd nothing for Robert to conquer but the small Dukedom of Naples. This Dukedom tho' it acknowledg'd the Emperors of the East for their Sovereigns, and it may be seen in the Writings of these last Times, that the Names of those Emperors were inserted in them, as may be observ'd in that quoted by Summontes, which we see is in the Name of Alexius Comnenus; nevertheless it maintain'd itself in the Form of a Republick, govern'd by its Dukes and Consuls, who by reason of the Declension of the Greeks in these Parts, had, in a Manner, thrown off all Dependence on the Emperors of the East. All the rest had been conquer'd by the Normans; by Robert Guiscard, Puglia, Calabria, the Principality of Bari, Salerno, Amalphis, Sorrento and the Lands of the Dukedom of Benevento: By Richard, the Principality of Capua, and the Dukedom of Gaeta, which City, though it had its particular Dukes, yet depended on the Prince of Capua.

C H A P. V.

The Debates which the Emperor Henry had with Pope Gregory, who had recourse to Duke Robert, and was by him reliev'd when besieg'd in Castle St. Angelo, by the Emperor's Army.

THE Peace which Desiderius had manag'd between the Pope and Duke Robert, was so seasonable for them both, that many Advantages resulted to each of them from it; but especially to Gregory, who otherwise must have been involv'd in great and insuperable Difficulties; for without the Assistance of Robert, he had certainly been crush'd by Henry. The Discords between him and the Emperor were come to that Height, that they broke out into an open Quarrel, and at last ended in Seditions, Wars and obstinate Schisms. The Emperor storm'd that the Pope had depriv'd him of the Right of Investiture, and that he had no Share in the Election of the Popes, and besides, was highly offended that the Countess Mathilda had made over many Lands and Castles in Liguria and Tuscany to the Apostolick See¹. Gregory on the other Hand, accus'd Henry, that for Money, and by his private Authority, he had invested Bishops and Abbots, and at first check'd him severely, but afterwards, in the Year 1076, he proceeded to Censures. Henry likewise offended at a saucy Embassy that Gregory had sent him, immediately call'd a Council in Worms, in which Gregory was accus'd of many Crimes and Enormities, and depos'd; afterwards he sent his Ambassadors to Rome, with contemptuous and reproachful Letters, commanding him to quit the Papacy. On the other hand, Gregory having call'd another Council in Rome, excommunicated all the Bishops who had consented to his Deposition in Worms; depos'd Henry from the Kingdoms of Germany and Italy, and absolv'd all his Subjects from the Oath of Fealty they had taken to him; forbidding them to pay him any more Obedience, and exhorting all Princes to rise in Arms against him. The Princes of Germany considering that it would be of dangerous Consequence to have any Quarrel with the Pope, now when he was engag'd in a War with the Saxons, persuaded the Emperor to make Peace with him, and at the same Time they solicited the Pope to come into Germany, that all Differences might be made up. Gregory pretended to be willing, but being arriv'd at Vercelli, he retir'd to Canossa, a Castle situated in the District of Reggio. Henry being hard put to it by the Saxons, design'd at any rate to make Peace with the Pope, so that quickly passing the Alps, he came to Canossa and begg'd his Pardon¹. Gregory at first would not admit him, but after having made him attend Three Days bare-footed, at the Gate of the Castle, by the Intercession of the Pope's Creatures, and the Princes of the Empire, he at last granted him Pardon.

BUT Gregory knowing that Henry, on the account of the rough Usage he had met with, would be more irritated, and being appriz'd by Matilda, that the Emperor was setting a Trap to catch him, immediately return'd to Rome, where in the Year 1080, with greater Solemnity he excommunicated him anew, depos'd him from the Empire, absolv'd his Vassals from their Oaths, and forbad all Christians to obey him, and gave the Kingdom of Germany to Rodolphus Duke of Suevia, and exhorted all the Princes of Germany to elect him Emperor. When Henry heard that the Saxons had elected Rodolphus Emperor, in opposition to him, he left Italy, went to France and engag'd in Battle with Rodolphus; they fought gallantly, and there was terrible Slaughter on both Sides; but Night coming on, the Decision was reserv'd till the next Day, when the Battle was begun afresh, and at last Rodolphus's Army giving way, Henry obtain'd a compleat Victory. Rodolphus was kill'd in this Battle, but before he died, held up his bleeding Hand, in presence of his Captains, and said²; You see this Hand; with this I swore to my Lord Henry, not to attempt upon his Life and Honour; but the Pope forc'd me to break my Oaths, and usurp that Honour which did not belong to me. What End I have brought my self to, you now see; and they who put me upon this, will find the Fruits of it.

AFTER Henry had vanquish'd his Rival, he return'd into Italy, to revenge the Affront put upon him by Gregory; and having call'd a Council of Bishops, first in Mentz, afterwards in Breslaw, he caus'd Gregory to be depos'd, and in his Room the Archbishop of Ravenna was elected Pope, who took the Name of Clement III. from thence marching to Rome with a powerful Army, he drove out Gregory, and plac'd Clement in that See³, and would have him to crown him Emperor. In the mean time, Gregory, with his Adherents, had retir'd into Castle St. Angelo, where he could get no Assistance from the Romans, and none else were willing to succour him, because the Emperor's Forces were too many for them; one may easily guess in what a Consternation his Holiness was in. And besides, Giordanus Prince of Capua, and his Normans, being afraid that Henry, at the Head of so formidable an Army, would expel them that Principality, join'd with him against *Gregory*⁴, so that the Pope was reduc'd to a lamentable Condition.

HE had no other Remedy, but to have recourse to the renown'd Robert. But he was at too great a Distance to give him Relief: This Prince a few Years before, had given in Marriage one of his Daughters, nam'd Helena, to Constantine the Son of the Emperor Michael Ducas, a Prince of such Comeliness, and so well dispos'd, that the Princess Anna Comnena did not scruple to say, That he was the Master-piece of God's Creation. This Princess could not bridle the Passion she had conceiv'd against the Emperor Michael, for having bestow'd so accomplish'd a Son on the Daughter of a Man such as Robert was, whom, according to the Vanity and Haughtiness of the Greeks, she call'd a pitiful Robber, and unworthy to be allied with the Emperors of the East; but this unhappy Princess Helena, a few Years after, had fallen into the utmost Misery, for Nicephorus Botoniates having driven Michael from the Empire of the East, had confin'd all his Family to a Monastery, and, with unheard-of Barbarity, had castrated Constantine, the Husband of Princess Helena. Such an outrageous Injury was an Affront done to Duke Robert, who could do no less than interest himself in the Affair, and besides, he look'd upon this Occasion of carrying his Arms into the East, with a secret Pleasure.

FOR which Cause, he receiv'd very graciously a Greek, who appear'd at his Court, and who gave out that he was the Emperor Michael, and to gain the more Credit, he gave a particular Account of his Escape from the Monastery, to which he said he had been confin'd, for contracting Alliance with the Normans. The Duke caus'd extraordinary Honour to be paid his Personage, as if he had really been the Emperor⁵. Nevertheless many Lords, who had been at Constantinople, and seen Michael, could not be persuaded that it was he, or if it was, he was very much alter'd. But Robert did not care to enter into the detail of the Matter, whether he was the real or a counterfeit Michael; it was the same for his Purpose. He pretended only to reconduct him to Constantinople, at the Head of an Army, and to restore him to the Imperial Throne, perhaps with Intention to take Possession of it himself, if he should find that this Person was not the real Michael. In effect it was thought to be a very good Handle, whereby he might the more easily draw in the Greeks, and have a plausible Pretence to concern himself in the Affairs of the Empire of the East: Whoever the suppos'd Michael might be, whom Anna Comnena calls a Greek Monk, nam'd Rector, Robert did not neglect to take Advantage of the Character he took upon him.

BUT when the Duke had made ready every thing necessary for so important an Expedition, he had Advice, that there had been a new Revolution in Constantinople, and that the Princess Helena had been set at Liberty, from the miserable Prison she had been shut up in; for Alexius Comnenus a little before, having been proclaim'd Emperor in Thrace by the Legions, had depos'd Nicephorus Botoniates, and caus'd him to be shav'd, and had enter'd Triumphantly into Constantinople, where having taken the Princess Helena out of the Monastery, he treated her very honourably; by so doing, he design'd to gain over Duke Robert to his Interest, whom he much esteem'd, and much more fear'd, lest he should oppose him in the Infancy of his good Fortune.

BUT all this did not put a Stop to Robert's Designs, who having every thing in Readiness for that Expedition, lost no Time in setting about it; so that having gone to Otranto, where he was to embark his Army, he first provided for the Government of his Dominions in Italy, which he left to Roger, surnam'd Bursa, his second Son, whom he had by Sigelgaita his second Wife, and at the same time, in presence of the People, declar'd him Heir of the Dukedoms of Puglia, Calabria and *Sicily*¹. This was a genteel and gallant Prince; he left him for Ministers, Robert Count of Loritello his Nephew, and Count Gerard, a Person of great Experience and known Integrity.

He embark'd with his Dutcheß Sigelgaita, who, like a Heroine, would follow her Husband at the Head of his Army. He likewise took along with him the valiant Boemondus his Son, whom he had by his first Wife Adelgrita, and some Norman Barons. In the Year 1081, being arriv'd at the Isle of Corfu, they landed and attack'd the Forts, in order to reduce that Island to their Obedience: Alexius being appriz'd of Robert's Motions, prepar'd an Army to suppress him; whence commenc'd so bloody a War, full of so great Events, that the Princess Anna Comnena, the Daughter of the Emperor Alexius, was induc'd to write the History of it, in which, though she strove to magnify the Actions of her Father, yet she could not mention Robert, without commending his extreme Valour and Magnanimity. My purpose obliging me to pass over so renown'd Adventures, I refer the Curious to the History of this Princess, and to what Malaterra, and Gulielmus Pugliensis have written of them. In short, after Robert had taken the City of Durazzo, he made himself Master of that Island, and aspiring to greater Matters, he carried his Conquests into Bulgaria, and made all that Country tremble at the Hearing of his Name, even to the Gates of Constantinople.

WHILST this illustrious Hero was engag'd in this War with Alexius Comnenus, he receiv'd pressing and earnest Letters from Pope *Gregory*², who at the same time congratulated him upon his Victories in the East, and represented to him the urgent Occasion the Apostolick See had for his Assistance, and the lamentable Condition he himself was in by Henry's Army. The Duke, before he left Otranto, had been appriz'd of Henry's Attempts, who had sent him Ambassadors, in order to bring him over to his Party; but Robert dismiss'd the Ambassadors immediately, and advis'd the Pope of it in such obliging Terms, as even to declare, that if his Troops had not been already embark'd, he would have led them to Rome himself; but tho' the State of his Affairs call'd him necessarily elsewhere, yet he had not neglected to recommend the Interest of the Holy See to Count Robert his Nephew, and Count Girard his good Friend ¹.

BUT now that he was disingag'd from the Conquest of Corfu, and had carried his Victorious Arms into Bulgaria, hearing of the pressing Necessity, though he was successful in his Conquests, yet he left them off to go and give the Pope the Assistance he had promis'd him; and leaving the Command of the Army to his Son Boemondus, and the Count of Brienna, he embark'd for Italy, with a small Number of his People in Two Ships, and landed at Otranto.

HOWEVER desirous he was to march immediately to Rome, yet he could not do it so suddenly, but contented himself with sending a large Sum of Money to the Pope, while he should put an End to the Affairs of Puglia, that indispensably requir'd his Presence; for some Cities taking advantage of his Absence, had withdrawn themselves from his Obedience, and soon after his Departure from Otranto, the Inhabitants of Troja and Ascoli, had first of all begun to Mutiny, by refusing to pay the Tribute to his Son Roger, and some other Cities, and many Barons had follow'd their bad Example, and at the very Time that he landed in Otranto, Goffredus Count of Conversano, was going to besiege the City of Oria. But the Duke was no sooner arriv'd, than he dispers'd the Aggressors, who left the Attempt and took themselves to Flight. With the same Facility that he had prevented the Siege of Oria, he punish'd the City of Canne, by destroying it altogether, for being more obstinate in its Mutiny than the rest. These glorious Expeditions put an end to the seditious Commotions that just before had arisen.

NOTHING else would have stopp'd him from going to Rome, had it not been Giordanus Prince of Capua. This Prince, as we have said, having taken part with Henry against the Pope, Lorded it over Campania with his Troops, so that Robert was oblig'd to remove this Bar, in order to have free Passage to Rome: This valliant Champion not only drove away these Troops, but also laid Siege to Aversa, to get Possession of it. However Giordanus defended the Place gallantly; so that Robert seeing he could not expect to be Master of it so soon, and the Pope pressing for Relief, abandon'd the Siege, and march'd to Rome, where he found Gregory closely besieged in Castle St. Angelo, while the Emperor and his Anti-pope were enjoying themselves peaceably in the Lateran Palace. Henry, who had but a small Garrison with him in Rome, resolv'd to quit the City; on the other hand, Robert surrounded Rome with his Army, and early one Morning, drew near to the Gate of St. Lorenzo, which he observ'd to be worse guarded than the rest, and order'd Ladders to be apply'd to the Walls, and mounting thereon, immediately open'd the Gates to all the Army. He march'd through the Streets of Rome without any Obstacle, and coming to Castle St. Angelo, reliev'd the Pope, and conducted him honourably to the Lateran Palace ².

THE Romans of Henry's Faction were surpriz'd at so gallant an Action, and though afterwards they recover'd a little Courage, and had hatch'd a Conspiracy against the Normans, yet Robert immediately suppress'd it in such a Manner, that the Romans, terrified, resolv'd to beg Peace of the Pope, which he granted them.

THE renown'd Guiscard being disingag'd from so glorious an Expedition, and the Tumults quell'd, march'd his Troops out of Rome to return to Puglia; but Gregory not trusting as yet to the Romans, and afraid to expose himself another Time to their Insults, resolv'd to follow the Duke and his Norman Army. Therefore he left Rome, follow'd by the Cardinals and a great Number of Bishops, and after some Days stay in Monte Cassino, where they were splendidly entertain'd by the Abbot Desiderius, he retir'd into Salerno, without ever returning to Rome, whose Fidelity he always suspected.

Investiture given by Gregory VII. to Duke Robert.

IN this Progress which the Pope made with Duke Robert, the Investiture which this Prince had got from Nicholas II. and Alexander his Predecessor, of the Dukedoms of Puglia, Calabria and Sicily, was renew'd by Gregory, as we read in the decretal Epistles ¹ of this Pope, and is dated from Capperano, a Place famous afterwards, for the Treason hatch'd there by the Count of Caserta against King Manfred. At this Investiture, the Greatness of Soul and the Intrepidity of Hildebrand deserve Admiration, who, notwithstanding the very signal and recent Favours he had receiv'd from Robert, yet though he was furrounded by the Norman Army, he would not consent to include in the Investiture, the Principality of Salerno, the Dukedom of Amalphis, and a Part of Marca Firmana, which Robert had conquer'd since the Investiture of Pope Nicholas, and which he was then in Possession of; but would only invest him with what his Predecessors Nicholas and Alexander had done, leaving out these other Places.

AND that from this Deed there might no Prejudice result to either Party, they both expressly reserv'd their Rights. Robert, by the Oath of Fealty he took to Gregory, promis'd to assist the Apostolick See, and to defend the Regalia, and the Lands of St. Peter against all Persons, and not to invade or seek to acquire them, expressly excepting Salerno, Amalphis, and part of the Marca Firmana, of which, as he says, adhuc facta non est definitio. On the other hand, Gregory declar'd in the Investiture, that he invested him only with what his Predecessors Nicholas and Alexander had granted him, adding, de illa autem terra, quam iniuste tenes, sicut est Salernus, & Amalphia, & pars Marchiæ Firmanæ, nunc te patienter Substineo in confidentia Dei omnipotentis & tuæ bonitatis, ut tu postea exinde ad honorem Dei & Sancti Petri ita te habeas, sicut ut & te agere, & me suscipere decet, sine periculo animæ tuæ & meæ. This shews how artful this Pope was, who at the same Time that he left Robert in suspense, would keep as it were, a Bridle in his Jaws, by making him depend upon himself and his Successors for the Investiture of these Places; and besides, would shew that it was the Prerogative of the Roman Pontiffs only, to take and give other Peoples Dominions, and to justify or disapprove of the Conquests of Princes at their Pleasure, by declaring them Just or Unjust as they thought fit; he likewise found out a very subtle Medium betwixt just and unjust Acquisitions, to wit, to support unjust Possessors in confidentia Dei Omnipotentis, that, according as they behav'd themselves towards the Church of Rome, so the Popes were to determine the Conquests to be just or unjust.

THUS we see, to what Pitch the Authority of the Popes, and the Stupidity of secular Princes, by standing so much in Awe of the Censures, were arriv'd in these Days; for fear of being depos'd, and having their Vassels absolv'd from their Oaths, they were at their Beck, and acknowledg'd their unbounded Authority, to avoid Seditions and destructive Revolutions in their Dominions, being terrified at the fresh Instance of the Emperor Henry, who saw a cruel War kindled in Germany, only because Gregory was not in his Interest.

The Conquests of Duke Robert in the East. His Death, and that of Gregory VII. soon after.

WHILST Robert was employing his Arms to so good Purpose in Italy, in the Service of the Apostolick See, he was amply rewarded by the prosperous Success which his renown'd Son Boemondus had in the East. This gallant Champion, at the same time that his Father had the Glory of driving the Emperor of the West from Rome, having engag'd in Battle with Alexius Comnenus, had likewise the Glory to put the Emperor of the East to flight in Bulgaria.

THE News which Robert had of this Victory, gain'd by Boemondus over the Emperor Alexius, gave him an earnest Desire of returning to the East, to accomplish what his Son had so prosperously begun. After he had given the necessary Orders to his Officers for the Government of his Dominions in Italy, he put to Sea with a considerable Fleet, and taking with him his other Son Roger, and many principal Barons, and joyning the Venetian Fleet betwixt the Island of Corfu and Cephalonia, he went to fight that of the Greeks, not inferior in Strength to his own. After they engag'd, the Greeks found themselves so hard press'd upon, that they were forc'd to fly. The Normans sunk many Gallies, dispers'd their Fleet, and taking more than 2500 Prisoners, triumph'd a second Time over their Enemies in the East¹. But the Corruption of the Air, which happen'd this horrid Winter, oblig'd the Troops to take some Rest, and such a contagious Distemper seiz'd the Army, that it destroy'd above Ten thousand of the best of it. And Boemondus catch'd it to that degree, that he was forc'd to return to Italy to breathe a better Air; and there are² who write, that this Sickness of Boemondus, was the Effect of the bad Arts of Sigelgaita his Step-mother, who had resolv'd to poison him, lest this Prince, after his Father's Death, should seize on the Dominions of Puglia and Calabria, in prejudice of her own Son Roger. Neither do they scruple to say, that when Sigelgaita was appriz'd that the Duke her Husband had made a Discovery of her malicious Designs, fearing he would take his Revenge, she resolv'd likewise to poison him, and that she actually did it the following Year, and fled with her Son and other Lords of her Party, and put Roger in Possession of the Dominions in Italy, in prejudice of Boemondus. However that may be, (for Authors who wrote at the same Time, and in the same Country where the Normans reign'd, report quite contrary Things of the Dutcheß Sigelgaita) after Boemondus was gone, the Duke sent his second Son Roger, to besiege Cephalonia, which a little before had rebell'd against him.

BUT whilst this invincible Hero was altogether bent on this Expedition, in the Month of July, he was seiz'd with a violent Fever, and oblig'd to retire to Casopoliis, a small Castle on the Promontory of the Island of Corfu, to be cur'd. Sigelgaita went immediately thither, but in the mean time the Fever was become so violent, that it soon put an End to his Days, in the Sixtieth Year of his Age.

THIS Year 1085, will always be remarkable for the unfortunate and much-to-be lamented Death of this Hero, and of other two great Personages of Europe. It was unluckily to the Normans for the sad Loss of Robert Guiscard. It was lamentable to the Church of Rome, for the Death of the famous Hildebrand. And it was deplorable to England, for the Loss of the renown'd William the Conqueror, Duke of Normandy and King of England.

THE News of Robert's Death having reach'd the Norman Troops in the East, put the Army into such Consternation, that they did nothing but lament; and Sigelgaita and her Son Robert, in all haste, carried the Duke's Body into Italy. When they came to Otranto, they perceiv'd it was already begun to Putrify, which made them resolve to leave the Heart and Bowels there, and having imbalm'd the rest of the Body anew, they carried it to Venosa, the burying Place of all the other Norman Princes. The City of Venosa, as William of Puglia reports² (who here ends the Five Books of his Latin Poem) may be proud, above all the other Cities of Puglia, both for being the Place of Horace's Birth, and for preserving the Tombs of so many illustrious Captains. Here remain to this Day the Ashes of this Hero, whom we may deservedly surname the Conqueror. It was by his own Valour and Industry alone, that from a plain Gentleman, he rais'd himself to be a Sovereign, the most dreaded in Europe, capable not only to deal with the most powerful Princes of the World in his Time, but likewise to vanquish them, and give them Laws. His Virtues, and the Endowments both of his Body and Mind, were so admirable, that his greatest Enemies, such as the Princess Anna Commena, who, though according to the Greek Vanity, she spoke despicably of his Birth, nevertheless did not fail to attribute to him all those eminent Qualities, which are requir'd in a Conqueror. And though these great Actions of his were accompanied with too great a Passion for Empire, which often led him to use Cruelty and Dissimulation; yet these are the ordinary Imperfections, which no Conqueror ever was, or can be free of. As for the rest, his Affection for the Christian Religion, with the great Assistance he gave the Church of Rome, the Bounty he bestow'd on many Churches, and particularly on the Monastery of Cassino, cover'd these Defects from the Eyes of the World, and besides, they were generally defended as Maxims of human Politicks.

ROBERT reign'd four Years with the Title of Count of Puglia and Calabria; Twelve with that of Duke, and Fourteen with that of Duke of Puglia, Calabria, Sicily, and Lord of Palermo. He liv'd in Italy from 1047 to 1085, Thirty-nine Years, and left Two Sons by as many Wives. Some report, that to prevent Disputes about the Succession to his Dominions, he left by his Will, Sicily to his Brother Roger, with which he had invested him in his Life-time, with the Title of Count. To his eldest Son Boemondus, all that he had conquer'd in the East; and to his second Son Roger, by Sigelgaita, the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria, the Principality of Salerno, and all that he possess'd in Italy. 'Tis likewise said, that though he had treated his second Son better than the Eldest, as well because Sigelgaita was present at making the Will, who got her own Son preferr'd to her Step-son, as because Boemondus being born of his first Wife, whom he did not reckon a lawful one, as being too near akin to him, he thought Roger more lawfully begotten than Boemondus, and therefore preferr'd the one to the other. But, either he did not make a Will, as is question'd by some, or these his Sons were not contented with it; for Roger and Boemondus both pretended to succeed, and each of them had considerable Factions. But by the Cunning of Sigelgaita, who got Roger Count of Sicily, to favour his Nephew her Son, his Faction grew the strongest; so that having succeeded to the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria, and all the other Dominions of Italy, conquer'd by Guiscard, he began to take upon him the Government of these Provinces. And besides, Roger Count of Sicily, having kept a more strict Friendship with Roger than with Boemondus, for a further Testimony of his Kindness, had yielded many Places to him in Calabria, which Duke Robert had reserv'd for the Count of Sicily. Thus the Count having openly declar'd himself in Roger's Interest, fought all Opportunities to support it against the Efforts of Boemondus, who often, but in vain, endeavour'd to disturb his Dominions.

THIS Year 1085 was likewise remarkable for the Death of the famous Hildebrand in Salerno, a Death very ominous and deplorable to the Church of Rome. She lost a Pope the most Daring and Intrepid of all that ever had possess'd that See; he did not stick at the most evident Dangers, where his Honour or Liberty were at Stake, in order to defend those Prerogatives and Pre-eminences which he reckon'd belong'd to the Apostolick See, against the greatest Kings and Monarchs of the Earth; and if he was persuad'd that what he took in Hand was supported by just Pretensions, he became more bold and forward than the Princes themselves. It was he, who raising his Crozier above Scepters and Crowns, as if his being Head of the Universal Church, had intitled him to be Monarch of the World, and King of Kings, and Emperor of Emperors; treated Princes, yea, the very Emperors, with so much Disdain and Haughtiness, that he did not scruple to excommunicate them, depose them from their Dominions, which he transferr'd to other Nations, and absolve their Vassals from their Obedience.

BY his seeming to be convinc'd that he had Power to do all this, and by his great Zeal for Justice, and the Defence of the Apostolick See, he gain'd the Applause of many, who reckon'd him a Zealous, Pious, Religious, and Just Man, a learned Canonist, a good Divine, and a bold Defender of the Ecclesiastical Rights and Liberties. To which were added some other Virtues, wherewith he was adorn'd, such as an austere Life, and an unwearied Application to the Interest of that See; his Compassion towards the Poor, his defending the Oppressed, and protecting the Innocent, acquir'd him the Fame of a Saint; so that tho' some of his contemporary Writers have given him a different Character, some calling him an Innovator, Ambitious, Cruel, Perfidious, Haughty, a Disturber of Kingdoms and Provinces, Author of Seditions, Slaughter, and cruel Wars, and who had a Mind to establish an intolerable Authority in the Church, as well in Spirituals as Temporals; yet there are others, according as their Interest led them, who have given him the Character of a Pope altogether zealous for the Service of God, wise, pious, and merciful; yea, a Modern Author gives to him, no less than to Gregory I. the Surname of Great, because to a certain Greatness of Soul, and Intrepidity of Mind, he join'd a holy Life and Conversation, above all the Princes of his Time. But none has drawn the Picture of this Pope better, or so much to the Life, as that judicious Painter, who drew it in the Church of St. Severino in Naples. We see there the Image of this Pope, amongst those of the other Pontiffs of the Order of St. Benedict, having in his Left-Hand the Crozier with Fishes, in the Right-Hand, lifted up in a lashing Posture, a prodigious Scourge, and under his Feet, Scepters, Imperial and Royal Crowns. And after having shewn Gregory to have been the Terror and Scourge of Princes, and to have trampled on Scepters and Crowns; being likewise willing to shew, that all this was very consistent with a holy Life, and Purity of Manners, he has written above his Head, in Letters a Cubit long, these Words; Sanctus Gregorius VII.

Boemondus disturbs the Dominions of his Brother. Amalphis and Capua revolt. The Origine of the Crusades.

THE Death of Gregory occasion'd terrible Disorders in the Church of Rome, for the Romans being put to a puzzle about the Election of a Successor, by reason that Gilbert the Antipope had made himself Master of some Churches of Rome, and would have himself to be acknowledg'd for lawful Pope; at last, a Year after they determin'd to elect Desiderius the famous Abbot of Cassino, as Hildebrand himself had advis'd, that seeing it was necessary for the Good of the Church, to have a Pope of Weight and Influence with Secular Princes, they should not overlook Desiderius. But he oppos'd it, and stood out so obstinately, that in fine, by Force, and against his Will, they proclaim'd him Pope by the Name of Victor III. But he stubbornly persisting in his Refusal, it was thought necessary to call a Council in Capua, to which the Norman Princes were likewise invited, that they might use their Interest to get Desiderius to accept of the Papacy. Roger Duke of Puglia was at such Pains on this Occasion, that he brought him at last to accept of it; and having conducted him to Rome, turn'd Gilbert out of the Church of St. Peter by Force, and caus'd Victor to be ordain'd. Hugo Bishop of Die, Legate of Gregory VII. and promoted to the Archbishoprick of Lyons, pretended likewise to the Papacy; and he was one of those, who most of all oppos'd the Ordination of Victor. The Romans of Gilbert's Faction took Possession of the Church of St. Peter anew, and after many Acts of Hostility, Victor was oblig'd to retire to his Monastery of Monte Cassino, from whence in the Month of August he went to Benevento, in order to hold a Council, compos'd of the Bishops of Puglia and Calabria, in which he made an Harangue against Gilbert, and excommunicated him anew. He there also excommunicated the Archbishop of Lyons, and the Bishop of Marseilles, and renew'd the Prohibition against receiving the Investiture of the Benefices from the Hands of Laicks. But whilst Victor was holding this Council, he was taken ill, which made him in all haste return to Monte Cassino, where he died, the 16th of September, in the Year 1087, after having appointed Otho Bishop of Ostia his Successor.

THE Church of Rome therefore by the Death of Victor, fell into fresh Troubles about the Election of a Successor; at last the Romans elected Otho Pope, who was a Frenchman of Chatillon, in the Diocess of Rheims, and had been taken from the Monastery of Clugny to be a Cardinal, and had done signal Service to Gregory VII. who had sent him Legate into Germany against Henry. He was elected in a Meeting of Cardinals and Bishops held in Terracina, and nam'd Urban II.

THIS Urban, of all the Popes, had the greatest Love for the Normans; for observing that Boemondus took it in ill Part that Roger possess'd so many Dominions in Italy, and on his Return to Otranto commenc'd a War against his Brother, interpos'd, and made an Agreement betwixt them, on these Conditions, that Boemondus, besides what he possess'd, should have the Cities of Maida and Cosenza; but afterwards they exchange'd these Cities, and in place of Cosenza, Boemondus got Bari, and Cosenza continu'd to be Duke Roger's. This Year 1089, Pope Urban went to Melphis ¹ in order to celebrate a Council, wherein he open'd the Project of the grand Crusade, and the League against the Infidels was concluded; Duke Roger went thither to pay his Respects to Urban, who confirm'd his Investiture, as his Predecessors had done to Robert his Father ².

IN the mean time, Cosenza having rebell'd, the Duke had recourse to the Count of Sicily his Uncle, who immediately reduc'd it; and it was at this Time that Roger, as an Acknowledgment for the many Favours he had receiv'd from his Uncle, gave him the half of the City of Palermo, where the Count began to build a Castle, which is now call'd the Royal Palace ³. Thus the one Roger reigning in Sicily, and the other in Puglia, in process of Time these came to be two distinct and separate Kingdoms, each of which was govern'd by its own Laws, Customs, and Officers.

COUNT Roger, who by the Death of his two Sons Goffredus and Giordanus, was very much afflicted, this Year 1093 had the Pleasure to have another Son born to him by the Countess Adelaida his last Wife, whom he call'd Simon; which put him in a Condition to go more deliberately to Calabria to suppress a new Disorder that had begun to break out in his Family.

DUKE Roger, his Nephew, had made an illustrious Alliance by marrying Adala, Niece of Philip I. King of France, and Daughter of Robert Marquis of Flanders ⁴. He had by her two Sons, William and Lewis, who were to be his Successors. But the Duke falling grievously sick not long after in Melphis, a Rumour had pass'd that he was dead; Boemondus who then liv'd in Calabria, thinking this a fit Opportunity, immediately takes Arms, and invades his Brother's Dominions; protesting nevertheless, that he did it in Favour of the Duke's Sons, till they should be of Age fit to govern. The Count of Sicily, who suspected this Zeal, and was offended at his daring to proceed thus without his Consent, went thither with a powerful Army, and was no sooner got there, than Boemondus was oblig'd to retire. In the mean time the Duke being restor'd to perfect Health, contrary to all Expectation, Boemondus went presently to Melphis to congratulate him, and to restore him all he had made himself Master of, justifying his Conduct as well as possibly he could.
